PREFACES
TO
THE COLLECTED EDITION OF TEN VOLUMES,
PUBLISHED IN 1837, 1838.

PREFACE
TO
THE FIRST VOLUME.

At the age of sixty-three I have undertaken to collect and edit my Poetical Works, with the last corrections that I can expect to bestow upon them. They have obtained a reputation equal to my wishes; and I have this ground for hoping it may not be deemed hereafter more than commensurate with their deserts, that it has been gained without ever accommodating myself to the taste or fashion of the times. Thus to collect and revise them is a duty which I owe to that part of the Public by whom they have been auspiciously received, and to those who will take a lively concern in my good name when I shall have departed.

The arrangement was the first thing to be considered. In this the order wherein the respective poems were written has been observed, as far as was compatible with a convenient classification. Such order is useful to those who read critically, and desire to trace the progress of an author's mind in his writings; and by affixing dates to the minor pieces, under whatever head they are disposed, the object is sufficiently attained.

Next came the question of correction. There was no difficulty with those poems which were composed after the author had acquired his art so far as he has acquired it), and after his opinions were matured. It was only necessary to bear in mind the risk there must ever be of injuring a poem by verbal alterations made long after it was written; inasmuch as it must be impossible to recall the precise train of thought in which any passage was conceived, and the considerations upon which not the single verse alone but the whole sentence, or paragraph, had been constructed: but with regard to more important changes, there could be no danger of introducing any discrepance in style. With juvenile pieces the case is different. From these the faults of diction have been weeded wherever it could be done without more trouble than the composition originally cost, and than the piece itself was worth. But inherent faults of conception and structure are incurable; and it would have been mere waste of time to recompose what it was impossible otherwise to amend.

If these poems had been now for the first time to be made public, there are some among them which, instead of being committed to the press, would have been consigned to the flames; not for any disgrace which could be reflected upon me by the crude compositions of my youth, nor for any harm which they could possibly do the reader, but merely that they might not cumber the collection. But "nescit vox missa reverti." Pirated editions would hold out as a recommendation, that they contained what I had chosen to suppress, and thus it becomes prudent, and therefore proper, that such pieces should be retained.

It has ever been a rule with me when I have imitated a passage, or borrowed an expression, to acknowledge the specific obligation. Upon the present occasion it behoves me to state the more general and therefore more important obligations which I am conscious of owing either to my predecessors, or my contemporaries.

My first attempts in verse were much too early to be imitative, but I was fortunate enough to find my way, when very young, into the right path. I read the "Jerusalem Delivered" and the "Orlando Furioso" again and again, in Hoole's translations: it was for the sake of their stories that I perused and re-perused these poems with ever new delight; and by bringing them thus within my reach in boyhood, the translator rendered me a service which, when I look back upon my intellectual life, I cannot estimate too highly. I owe him much also for his notes, not only for the information concerning other Italian romances which they imparted, but also for introducing me to Spenser;—how early, an incident which I well remember may show. Going with a relation into Bull's circulating library at Bath (an excellent one for those days), and asking whether they had the "Faery Queen," the person who managed the shop said "yes, they had it, but it was in obsolete language, and the young gentleman would not understand it." But I, who had learned all I then knew of the history of England from Shakespear, and who had moreover read Beaumont and Fletcher, found no difficulty in Spenser's English, and felt in the beauty of his versification a charm in poetry of which I had never been fully sensible before. From that time I took Spenser for my master. I drank also betimes of Chaucer's well. The taste which had been acquired in that school was confirmed by Percy's "Reliques" and Warton's "History of English Poetry;" and a little later by Homer and the Bible. It was not likely to be corrupted afterwards.

My school-boy verses savoured of Gray, Mason, and my predecessor Warton; and in the best of my juvenile pieces it may be seen how much the writer's mind had been imbued by Akenside. I am conscious also of having derived much benefit at one time from Cowper, and more from Bowles; for which, and for the delight which his poems gave me at an age when we are most susceptible of such delight, my good friend at Bremhill, to whom I was then and long afterwards personally unknown, will allow me to make this grateful and cordial acknowledgment.

My obligation to Dr. Sayers is of a different kind. Every one who has an ear for metre and a heart for poetry, must have felt how perfectly the metre of Collins's "Ode to Evening" is in accordance with the imagery and the feeling. None of the experiments which were made of other unrhymed stanzas proved successful. They were either in strongly marked and well-known measures which unavoidably led the reader to expect rhyme, and consequently balked him when he looked for it; or they were in stanzas as cumbersome as they were ill constructed. Dr. Sayers went upon a different principle, and succeeded admirably. I read his "Dramatic Sketches of Northern Mythology" when they were first published, and convinced myself when I had acquired some skill in versification, that the kind of verse in which his choruses were composed was not less applicable to narration than to lyrical poetry. Soon after I had begun the Arabian romance, for which this measure seemed the most appropriate vehicle, "Gebir" fell into my hands, and my verse was greatly improved by it, both in vividness and strength. Several years elapsed before I knew that Walter Landor was the author, and more before I had the good fortune to meet the person to whom I felt myself thus beholden. The days which I have passed with him in the Vale of Ewias, at Como, and lastly in the neighbourhood of Bristol, are some of those which have left with me "a joy for memory."

I have thus acknowledged all the specific obligations to my elders or contemporaries in the art, of which I am distinctly conscious. The advantages arising from intimate intercourse with those who were engaged in similar pursuits cannot be in like manner specified, because in their nature they are imperceptible; but of such advantages no man has ever possessed more or greater, than at different times it has been my lot to enjoy. Personal attachment first, and family circumstances afterwards, connected me long and closely with Mr. Coleridge; and three-and-thirty years have ratified a friendship with Mr. Wordsworth, which we believe will not terminate with this life, and which it is a pleasure for us to know will be continued and cherished as an heir-loom by those who are dearest to us both.

When I add what has been the greatest of all advantages, that I have passed more than half my life in retirement, conversing with books rather than men, constantly and unwearably engaged in literary pursuits, communing with my own heart, and taking that course which upon mature consideration seemed best to myself, I have said every thing necessary to account for the characteristics of my poetry, whatever they may be.

* It was in a mood resembling in no slight degree that wherewith a person in sound health, both of body and mind, makes his will and sets his worldly affairs in order, that I entered upon the serious task of arranging and revising the whole of my poetical works. What, indeed, was it but to bring in review before me the dreams and aspirations of my youth, and the feelings whereto I had given that free utterance which by the usages of this world is permitted to us in poetry, and in poetry alone? Of the smaller pieces in this collection there is scarcely one concerning which I cannot vividly call to mind when and where it was composed. I have perfect recollection of the spots where many, not of the scenes only, but of the images which I have described from nature, were observed and noted. And how would it be possible for me to forget the interest taken in these poems, especially the longer and more ambitious works, by those persons nearest and dearest to me then, who witnessed their growth and completion? Well may it be called a serious task thus to resuscitate the past! But serious though it be, it is not painful to one who knows that the end of his journey cannot be far distant, and, by the blessing of God, looks on to its termination with sure and certain hope.

TO

THE SECOND VOLUME,

BEING

THE FIRST OF TWO VOLUMES ENTITLED "JUVENILE AND MINOR POEMS," BEGINNING WITH "THE TRIUMPH OF WOMAN," AND ENDING WITH "HYMN TO THE PENATES."

THE earliest pieces in these Juvenile and Minor Poems were written before the writer had left school; between the date of these and of the latest there is an interval of six-and-forty years: as much difference, therefore, may be perceived in them, as in the different stages of life from boyhood to old age.

Some of the earliest appeared in a little volume published at Bath in the autumn of 1794, with this title:—"Poems, containing the Retrospect, &c. by Robert Lovell and Robert Southey, 1795;" and with this motto—

"Minuentur atræ Carmine curæ." Horace.

At the end of that volume, Joan of Arc was announced as to be published by subscription.

Others were published at Bristol, 1797, in a single volume, with this motto from Aken-side:—

"Goddess of the Lyre,— with thee comes
Majestic Truth; and where Truth deigns to come
Her sister Liberty will not be far."

A second volume followed at Bristol in 1799, after the second edition of Joan of Arc, and commencing with the Vision of the Maid of Orleans. The motto to this was from the Epilogue to Spenser's Shepherd's Calendar:—

"The better, please; the worse, displease: I ask no more."

In the third edition of Joan of Arc, the Vision was printed separately, at the end; and its place was supplied in the second edition of the Poems by miscellaneous pieces.

A separate volume, entitled "Metrical Tales and other Poems," was published in 1805, with this advertisement:—"These Poems were published some years ago in the Annual Anthology. (Bristol, 1799, 1800.) They have now been revised and printed in this collected form, because they have pleased those readers whom the Author was most desirous of pleasing. Let them be considered as the desultory productions of a man sedulously employed upon better things."

These various pieces were re-arranged in three volumes, under the title of Minor Poems, in 1815, with this motto, and they were published a second time in the same form, 1823.

"Nos hæc novimus esse nihil;"

The Ballads and Metrical Tales contained in those volumes, belong to a different part of this collection; their other contents are comprised here; and the present volume consists, with very few exceptions, of pieces written in youth or early manhood. One of these written in my twentieth year, not having been published at the time, would never have been made public by my own act and deed; but as Wat Tyler obtained considerable notoriety upon its surreptitious publication, it seemed proper that a production which will be specially noticed whenever the author shall be delivered over to the biographers, should be included here. They who may desire to know more than is stated in the advertisement now prefixed to it, are referred to a Letter addressed to William Smith, Esq. M. P., 1817, reprinted in the second volume of my Essays Moral and Political, 1832.

The second volume of this part of the Collection contains one juvenile piece, and many which were written in early manhood. The remainder were composed in middle or later life, and comprise (with one exception, that will more conveniently be arranged elsewhere,) all the odes which as Poet Laureat I have written upon national occasions. Of these the Carmen Triumphale, and the Carmina Aulica, were separately published in quarto in 1814, and reprinted together in a little volume in 1821.

The Juvenile and Minor Poems in this Collection bear an inconsiderable proportion to those of substantive length: for a small part only of my youthful effusions were spared from those autos-da-fé in which from time to time piles upon piles have been consumed. In middle life works of greater extent, or of a different kind, left me little leisure for occasional poetry; the impulse ceased, and latterly the inclination was so seldom felt, that it required an effort to call it forth.

Sir William Davenant, in the Preface to Gondibert, "took occasion to accuse and condemn all those hasty digestions of thought which were published in his youth; a sentence, said he, not pronounced out of melancholy rigour, but from a cheerful obedience to the just authority of experience. For that grave mistress of the world, experience, (in whose profitable school those before the Flood stayed long, but we, like wanton children, come thither late, yet too soon are called out of it, and fetched home by death,) hath taught me that the engenderings of unripe age become abortive and deformed; and that 'tis a high presumption to entertain a nation (who are a poet's standing guest, and require monarchical respect,) with hasty provisions; as if a poet might imitate the familiar despatch of falconers, mount his Pegasus, unhood his Muse, and, with a few flights, boast he hath provided a feast for a prince. Such posting upon Pegasus I have long since foreborne." Yet this eminently thoughtful poet was so far from seeking to suppress the crude compositions which he thus condemned, that he often expressed a great desire to see all his pieces collected in one volume; and, conformably to his wish, they were so collected, after his decease, by his widow and his friend Herringman the bookseller.

Agreeing with Davenant in condemning the greater part of my juvenile pieces, it is only as crudities that I condemn them; for in all that I have written, whether in prose or verse, there has never been a line which for any compunctious reason, living or dying, I could wish to blot.

Davenant had not changed his opinion of his own youthful productions so as to overlook in his age the defects which he had once clearly perceived; but he knew that pieces which it would indeed have been presumptuous to reproduce on the score of their merit, might yet be deemed worthy of preservation on other grounds; that to his family and friends, and to those who might take any interest in English poetry hereafter, they would possess peculiar value, as characteristic memorials of one who had held no inconsiderable place in the literature of his own times; feeling, too, that he was not likely to be forgotten by posterity, he thought that after the specimen which he had produced in his Gondibert of a great and elaborate poem, his early attempts would be regarded with curiosity by such of his successors as should, like him, study poetry as an art,—for as an art it must be studied by those who would excel in it, though excellence in it is not attainable by art alone.

The cases are very few in which any thing more can be inferred from juvenile poetry, than that the aspirant possesses imitative talent, and the power of versifying, for which, as for music, there must be a certain natural aptitude. It is not merely because "they have lacked culture and the inspiring aid of books*," that so many poets who have been "sown by Nature," have "wanted the accomplishment of verse," and brought forth no fruit after their kind. Men of the highest culture, of whose poetical temperament no doubt can be entertained, and who had "taken to the height the measure of themselves," have yet failed in their endeavour to become poets, for want of that accomplishment. It is frequently possessed without any other qualification, or any capacity for improvement; but then the innate and incurable defect that renders it abortive, is at once apparent.

The state of literature in this kingdom during the last fifty years has produced the same effect upon poetry that academies produce upon painting; in both arts every possible assistance is afforded to imitative talents, and in both they are carried as far as the talent of imitation can reach. But there is one respect in which poetry differs widely from the sister arts. Its fairest promise frequently proves deceitful, whereas both in painting and music the early indications of genius are unequivocal. The children who were called musical prodigies, have become great musicians; and great painters, as far as their history is known, have displayed in childhood that accuracy of eye, and dexterity of hand, and shaping faculty, which are the prime requisites for their calling. But it is often found that young poets of whom great expectations were formed, have made no progress, and have even fallen short of their first performances. It may be said that this is because men apply themselves to music and to painting as their professions, but that no one makes poetry the business of his life. This, however, is not the only reason: the indications, as has already been observed, are far less certain; and the circumstances of society are far less favourable for the moral and intellectual culture which is required for all the higher branches of poetry, . . . all indeed that deserves the name.

My advice as to publishing, has often been asked by young poets, who suppose that experience has qualified me to give it, and who have not yet learnt how seldom advice is taken, and how little therefore it is worth. As a general rule, it may be said that one who is not deceived in the estimate which he has formed of his own powers, can neither write too much in his youth, nor publish too little. It cannot, however, be needful to caution the present race of poetical adventures against hurrying with their productions to the press, for there are obstacles enough in the way of publication. Looking back upon my own career, and acknowledging my imprudence in this respect, I have nevertheless no cause to wish that I had pursued a different course. In this, as in other circumstances of my life, I have reason to be thankful to that merciful Providence which shaped the ends that I had roughly hewn for myself.

PREFACE

TO

THE THIRD VOLUME,

THE SECOND OF "JUVENILE AND MINOR POEMS."

In a former Preface my obligations to Akenside were acknowledged, with especial reference to the Hymn to the Penates; the earliest of my Inscriptions also originated in the pleasure with which I perused those of this favourite author. Others of a later date bear a nearer resemblance to the general character of Chiabrera's epitaphs. Those which relate to the Peninsular War are part of a series which I once hoped to have completed. The epitaph for Bishop Butler was originally composed in the lapidary style, to suit the monument in Bristol Cathedral: it has been remodelled here, that I might express myself more at length, and in a style more accordant with my own judgement.

One thing remains to be explained, and I shall then have said all that it becomes me to say concerning these Minor Poems.

It was stated in some of the newspapers that Walter Scott and myself became competitors for the Poet-Laureateship upon the death of Mr. Pye; that we met accidentally at the Prince Regent's levee, each in pursuit of his pretensions, and that some words which were not over-courteous on either side passed between us on the occasion;—to such impudent fabrications will those persons resort who make it their business to pander for public curiosity. The circumstances relating to that appointment have been made known in Mr. Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter. His conduct was, as it always was, characteristically generous, and in the highest degree friendly. Indeed, it was neither, in his nature nor in mine to place ourselves in competition with any one, or ever to regard a contemporary as a rival. The world was wide enough for us all.

Upon his declining the office, and using his influence, without my knowledge, to obtain it for me, his biographer says*, "Mr. Southey was invited to accept the vacant laurel; and to the honour of the Prince Regent, when he signified that his acceptance must depend on the office being thenceforth so modified as to demand none of the old formal odes, leaving it to the Poet-Laureate to choose his own time for celebrating any great public event that might occur, his Royal Highness had the good sense and good taste at once to acquiesce in the propriety of this alteration. The office was thus relieved from the burden of ridicule which had, in spite of so many illustrious names, adhered to it." The alteration, however, was not brought about exactly in this manner.

I was on the way to London when the correspondence upon this subject between Sir Walter Scott and Mr. Croker took place. A letter from Scott followed me thither, and on my arrival in town I was informed of what had been done. No wish for the Laureateship had passed across my mind, nor had I ever dreamt that it would be proposed to me. My first impulse was to decline it; not from any fear of ridicule, still less of obloquy, but because I had ceased for several years to write occasional verses: the inclination had departed; and though willing as a bee to work from morn till night in collecting honey, I had a great dislike to spinning like a spider. Other considerations overcame this reluctance, and made it my duty to accept the appointment. I then expressed a wish to Mr. Croker that it might be placed upon a footing which would exact from the holder nothing like a schoolboy's task, but leave him at liberty to write when, and in what manner, he thought best, and thus render the office as honourable as it was originally designed to be. Upon this, Mr. Croker, whose friendliness to me upon every occasion I gladly take this opportunity of acknowledging, observed that it was not for us to make terms with the Prince Regent. "Go you," said he, "and write your Ode for the New Year. You can never have a better subject than the present state of the war affords you." He added that some fit time might be found for representing the matter to the Prince in its proper light.

My appointment had no sooner been made known, than I received a note with Sir William Parsons's compliments, requesting that I would let him have the Ode as soon as possible, Mr. Pye having always provided him with it six weeks before the New Year's Day. I was not wanting in punctuality; nevertheless, it was a great trouble to Sir William that the office should have been conferred upon a poet who did not walk in the ways of his predecessor, and do according to all things that he had done; for Mr. Pye had written his odes always in regular stanzas and in rhyme. Poor Sir William, though he had not fallen upon evil tongues and evil times, thought he had fallen upon evil ears when he was to set verses like mine to music.

But the labour which the Chief Musician bestowed upon the verses of the Chief Poet was so much labour lost. The performance of the Annual Odes had been suspended from the time of the King's illness, in 1810. Under the circumstances of his malady, any festal celebration of the birth-day would have been a violation of natural feeling and public propriety. On those occasions it was certain that nothing would be expected from me during the life of George III. But the New Year's performance might perhaps be called for, and for that, therefore, I always prepared. Upon the accession of George IV., I made ready an Ode for St. George's Day, which Mr. Shield, who was much better satisfied with his yoke-fellow than Sir William had been, thought happily suited for his purpose. It was indeed well suited for us both. All my other Odes related to the circumstances of the passing times, and could have been appropriately performed only when they were composed; but this was a standing subject, and, till this should be called for, it was needless to provide any thing else. The annual performance had, however, by this time fallen completely into disuse; and thus terminated a custom which may truly be said to have been more honoured in the breach than in the observance.

TO
THE FOURTH VOLUME, CONTAINING
"THALABA THE DESTROYER."

IT was said, in the original Preface to Joan of Arc, that the Author would not be in England to witness its reception, but that he would attend to liberal criticism, and hope to profit by it in the composition of a poem upon the discovery of America by the Welsh prince Madoc.

That subject I had fixed upon when a school-boy, and had often conversed upon the probabilities of the story with the schoolfellow to whom, sixteen years afterwards, I had the satisfaction of inscribing the poem. It was commenced at Bath in the autumn of 1794; but, upon putting Joan of Arc to the press, its progress was necessarily suspended, and it was not resumed till the second edition of that work had been completed. Then it became my chief occupation during twelve months that I resided in the village of Westbury, near Bristol. This was one of the happiest portions of my life. I never before or since produced so much poetry in the same space of time. The smaller pieces were communicated by letter to Charles Lamb, and had the advantage of his animadversions. I was then also in habits of the most frequent and intimate intercourse with Davy,—then in the flower and freshness of his youth. We were within an easy walk of each other, over some of the most beautiful ground in that beautiful part of England. When I went to the Pneumatic Institution, he had to tell me of some new experiment or discovery, and of the views which it opened for him; and when he came to Westbury there was a fresh portion of Madoc for his hearing. Davy encouraged me with his hearty approbation during its progress; and the bag of nitrous oxide with which he generally regaled me upon my visits to him, was not required for raising my spirits to the degree of settled fair, and keeping them at that elevation.

In November, 1836, I walked to that village with my son, wishing to show him a house endeared to me by so many recollections; but not a vestige of it remained, and local alterations rendered it impossible even to ascertain its site,—which is now included within the grounds of a Nunnery! The bosom friends with whom I associated there have all departed before me; and of the domestic circle in which my happiness was then centered, I am the sole survivor.

When we removed from Westbury at Midsummer, 1799, I had reached the penultimate book of Madoc. That poem was finished on the 12th of July following, at Kingsdown, Bristol, in the house of an old lady, whose portrait hangs, with that of my own mother, in the room wherein I am now writing. The son who lived with her was one of my dearest friends, and one of the best men I ever knew or heard of. In those days I was an early riser: the time so gained was usually employed in carrying on the poem which I had in hand; and when Charles Danvers came down to breakfast on the morning after Madoc was completed, I had the first hundred lines of Thalaba to show him, fresh from the mint.

But this poem was neither crudely conceived nor hastily undertaken. I had fixed upon the ground, four years before, for a Mahomedan tale; and in the course of that time the plan had been formed and the materials collected. It was pursued with unabating ardour at Exeter, in the village of Burton, near Christ Church, and afterwards at Kingsdown, till the ensuing spring, when Dr. Beddoes advised me to go to the south of Europe, on account of my health. For Lisbon, therefore, we set off; and, hastening to Falmouth, found the packet, in which we wished to sail detained in harbour by westerly winds. "Six days we watched the weathercock, and sighed for north-easters. I walked on the beach, caught soldier-crabs, admired the sea-anemonies in their ever-varying shapes of beauty, read Gebir, and wrote half a book of Thalaba." This sentence is from a letter written on our arrival at Lisbon; and it is here inserted because the sea-anemonies (which I have never had any other opportunity of observing) were introduced in Thalaba soon afterwards; and because, as already stated, I am sensible of having derived great improvement from the frequent perusal of Gebir at that time.

Change of circumstances and of climate effected an immediate cure of what proved to be not an organic disease. A week after our landing at Lisbon I resumed my favourite work, and I completed it at Cintra, a year and six days after the day of its commencement.

A fair transcript was sent to England. Mr. Rickman, with whom I had fallen in at Christ Church in 1797, and whose friendship from that time I have ever accounted among the singular advantages and happinesses of my life, negotiated for its publication with Messrs. Longman and Rees. It was printed at Bristol by Biggs and Cottle, and the task of correcting the press was undertaken for me by Davy and our common friend Danvers, under whose roof it had been begun.

The copy which was made from the original draught, regularly as the poem proceeded, is still in my possession. The first corrections were made as they occurred in the process of transcribing, at which time the verses were tried upon my own ear, and had the advantage of being seen in a fair and remarkably legible handwriting. In this transcript the dates of time and place were noted, and things which would otherwise have been forgotten have thus been brought to my recollection. Herein also the alterations were inserted which the poem underwent before it was printed. They were very numerous. Much was pruned off, and more was ingrafted. I was not satisfied with the first part of the concluding book; it was therefore crossed out, and something substituted altogether different in design; but this substitution was so far from being fortunate, that it neither pleased my friends in England nor myself. I then made a third attempt, which succeeded to my own satisfaction and to theirs.

I was in Portugal when Thalaba was published. Its reception was very different from that with which Joan of Arc had been welcomed: in proportion as the poem deserved better it was treated worse. Upon this occasion my name was first coupled with Mr. Wordsworth's. We were then, and for some time afterwards, all but strangers to each other; and certainly there were no two poets in whose productions, the difference not being that between good and bad, less resemblance could be found. But I happened to be residing at Keswick when Mr. Wordsworth and I began to be acquainted; Mr. Coleridge also had resided there; and this was reason enough for classing us together as a school of poets. Accordingly, for more than twenty years from that time, every tyro in criticism who could snatter and sneer, tried his "prentice hand" upon the Lake Poets; and every young sportsman who carried a popgun in the field of satire, considered them as fair game.

Keswick, Nov. 8. 1837.

PREFACE

TO

THE FIFTH VOLUME,

CONTAINING

"MADOC."

WHEN Madoc was brought to a close in the summer of 1799, Mr. Coleridge advised me to publish it at once, and to defer making any material alterations, if any should suggest themselves, till a second edition. But four years had passed over my head since Joan of Arc was sent to the press, and I was not disposed to commit a second imprudence. If the reputation obtained by that poem had confirmed the confidence which I felt in myself, it had also the effect of making me perceive my own deficiencies, and endeavour with all diligence to supply them. I pleased myself with the hope that it would one day be likened to Tasso's Rinaldo, and that as the Jerusalem had fulfilled the promise of better things whereof that poem was the pledge, so might Madoc be regarded in relation to the juvenile work which had preceded it. Thinking that this would probably be the greatest poem I should ever produce, my intention was to bestow upon it all possible care, as indeed I had determined never again to undertake any subject without due preparation. With this view it was my wish, before Madoc could be considered as completed, to see more of Wales than I had yet seen. This I had some opportunity of doing in the autumn of 1801, with my old friends and schoolfellows Charles Wynn and Peter Elmsley. And so much was I bent upon making myself better acquainted with Welsh scenery, manners, and traditions, than could be done by books alone, that if I had succeeded in obtaining a house in the Vale of Neath, for which I was in treaty the year following, it would never have been my fortune to be classed among the Lake Poets.

Little had been done in revising the poem till the first year of my abode at Keswick: there, in the latter end of 1803, it was resumed, and twelve months were diligently employed in reconstructing it. The alterations were more material than those which had been made in Joan of Arc, and much more extensive. In its original form the poem consisted of fifteen books, containing about six thousand lines. It was now divided into two parts, and enlarged in the proportion of a full third. Shorter divisions than the usual one of books, or cantos, were found more convenient; the six books therefore, which the first part comprised, were distributed in seventeen sections, and the other nine and twenty-seven. These changes in the form of the work were neither capriciously made, nor for the sake of novelty. The story consisted of two parts, almost as distinct as the Iliad and Odyssey; and the subdivisions were in like manner indicated by the subject. The alterations in the conduct of the piece occasioned its increase of length.

When Matthew Lewis published the Castle Spectre, he gave as his reason for introducing negro guards in a drama which was laid in feudal times, that he thought their appearance would produce a good effect; and if the effect would have been better by making them blue instead of black, blue, said he, they should have been. He was not more bent upon pleasing the public by stage effect, (which no dramatist ever studied more successfully,) than I was upon following my own sense of propriety, and thereby obtaining the approbation of that fit audience, which, being contented that it should be few, I was sure to find. Mr. Sotheby, whose Saul was published about the same time as Madoc, said to me a year or two afterwards, "You and I, Sir, find that blank verse will not do in these days; we must stand upon another tack." Mr. Sotheby considered the decision of the Pie-Poudre Court as final. But my suit was in that Court of Record which sooner or later pronounces unerringly upon the merits of the case.

Madoc was immediately reprinted in America in numbers, making two octavo volumes. About nine years afterwards there appeared a paper in the Quarterly Review, which gave great offence to the Americans; if I am not mistaken in my recollections, it was the first in that journal which had any such tendency. An American author, whose name I heard, but had no wish to remember, supposed it to have been written by me; and upon this gratuitous supposition, (in which, moreover, he happened to be totally mistaken,) he attacked me in a pamphlet, which he had the courtesy to send me, and which I have preserved among my Curiosities of Literature. It is noticed in this place, because, among other vituperative accusations, the pamphleteer denounced the author of Madoc as having "meditated a most serious injury against the reputation of the New World, by attributing its discovery and colonization to a little vagabond Welsh Prince." This, he said, "being a most insidious attempt against the honour of America and the reputation of Columbus."*

This poem was the means of making me personally acquainted with Miss Seward. Her encomiastic opinion of it was communicated to me through Charles Lloyd, in a way which required some courteous acknowledgement; this led to an interchange of letters, and an invitation to Lichfield, where, accordingly, I paid her a visit, when next on my way to London, in 1807. She resided in the Bishop's palace. I was ushered up the broad brown stair-case by her cousin, the Reverend Henry White, then one of the minor canons of that cathedral, a remarkable person, who introduced me into the presence with jubilant but appalling solemnity. Miss Seward was seated at her desk. She had just finished some verses to be "inscribed on the blank leaves of the poem Madoc," and the first greeting was no sooner past, than she requested that I would permit her to read them to me. It was a mercy that she did not ask me to read them aloud. But she read admirably herself. The situation, however, in which I found myself, was so ridiculous, and I was so apprehensive of catching the eye of one person in the room, who was equally afraid of meeting mine, that I never felt it more difficult to control my emotions, than while listening, or seeming to listen, to my own praise and glory. But, bending my head as if in a posture of attentiveness, and screening my face with my hand, and occasionally using some force to compress the risible muscles, I got through the scene without any misbehaviour, and expressed my thanks, if not in terms of such glowing admiration as she was accustomed to receive from others, and had bestowed upon my unworthy self, yet as well as I could. I passed two days under her roof, and corresponded with her from that time till her death.

Miss Seward had been crippled by having repeatedly injured one of her knee-pans. Time had taken away her bloom and her beauty, but her fine countenance retained its animation, and her eyes could not have been brighter nor more expressive in her youth. Sir Walter Scott says of them, "they were auburn, of the precise shade and hue of her hair. In reciting, or in speaking with animation, they appeared to become darker, and as it were to flash fire. I should have hesitated," he adds, "to state the impression which this peculiarity made upon me at the time, had not my observation been confirmed by that of the first actress on this or any other stage, with whom I lately happened to converse on our deceased friend's expressive powers of countenance."* Sir Walter has not observed that this peculiarity was hereditary. Describing, in one of her earlier letters, a scene with her mother, she says, "I grew so saucy to her, that she looked grave, and took her pinch of snuff, first at one nostril, and then at the other, with swift and angry energy, and her eyes began to grow dark and to flash. 'Tis an odd peculiarity: but the balls of my mother's eyes change from brown into black, when she feels either indignation or bodily pain."†

Miss Seward was not so much over-rated at one time, as she has since been unduly depreciated. She was so considerable a person when her reputation was at its height, that Washington said no circumstance in his life had been so mortifying to him as that of having been made the subject of her invective in her Monody on Major André. After peace had been concluded between Great Britain and the United States, he commissioned an American officer, who was about to sail for England, to call upon her at Lichfield, and explain to her, that instead of having caused André's death, he had endeavoured to save him; and she was requested to peruse the papers in proof of this, which he sent for her perusal. "They filled me with contrition," says Miss Seward, "for the rash injustice of my censure."‡

An officer of her name served as lieutenant in the garrison at Gibraltar during the siege. To his great surprise, . . for he had no introduction which could lead him to expect the honour of such notice, . . he received an invitation to dine with General Elliot. The General asked him if he were related to the author of the Monody on Major André. The Lieutenant replied that he had the honour of being very distantly related to her, but he had not the happiness of her acquaintance. "It is sufficient, Mr. Seward," said the General, "that you bear her name, and a fair reputation, to entitle you to the notice of every soldier who has it in his power to serve and oblige a military brother. You will always find a cover for you at my table, and a sincere welcome; and whenever it may be in my power to serve you essentially, I shall not want the inclination."§

These anecdotes show the estimation in which she was, not undeservedly, held. Her epistolary style was distorted and disfigured by her admiration of Johnson; and in her poetry she set, rather than followed, the brocade fashion of Dr. Darwin. Still there are unquestionable proofs of extraordinary talents and great ability both in her letters and her poems. She was an exemplary daughter, a most affectionate and faithful friend. Sir Walter has estimated, with characteristic skill, her powers of criticism, and her strong prepossessions upon literary points. And believing that the more she was known, the more she would have been esteemed and admired, I bear a willing testimony to her accomplishments and her genius, to her generous disposition, her frankness, and her sincerity and warmth of heart.

PREFACE

TO

THE SIXTH VOLUME,

THE FIRST OF "BALLADS AND METRICAL TALES."

MOST of the pieces in this volume were written in early life, a few are comparatively of recent date, and there are some of them which lay unfinished for nearly thirty years.

Upon reading, on their first appearance, certain of these Ballads, and of the lighter pieces now comprised in the third volume of this collective edition, Mr. Edgeworth said to me, "Take my word for it, Sir, the bent of your genius is for comedy." I was as little displeased with the intended compliment as one of the most distinguished poets of this age was with Mr. Sheridan, who, upon returning a play which he had offered for acceptance at Drury Lane, told him it was a comical tragedy.

My late friend, Mr. William Taylor of Norwich, whom none who knew him intimately can ever call to mind without affection and regret, has this passage in his Life of Dr. Sayers:—"Not long after this (the year 1800), Mr. Robert Southey visited Norwich, was introduced to Dr. Sayers, and partook those feelings of complacent admiration which his presence was adapted to inspire.—Dr. Sayers pointed out to us in conversation, as adapted for the theme of a ballad, a story related by Olaus Magnus of a witch, whose coffin was confined by three chains, sprinkled with holy water; but who was, nevertheless, carried off by demons. Already, I believe, Dr. Sayers had made a ballad on the subject, so did I, and so did Mr. Southey; but after seeing the Old Woman of Berkeley, we agreed in awarding to it the preference. Still, the very different manner in which each had employed the same basis of narration might render welcome the opportunity of comparison; but I have not found among the papers of Dr. Sayers a copy of his poem."

There is a mistake here as to the date. This, my first visit to Norwich, was in the spring of 1798; and I had so much to interest me there in the society of my kind host and friend, Mr. William Taylor, that the mention at Dr.

Sayers's table of the story in Olaus Magnus made no impression on me at the time, and was presently forgotten. Indeed, if I had known that either he or his friend had written or intended to write a ballad upon the subject, that knowledge, however much the story might have pleased me, would have withheld me from all thought of versifying it. In the autumn of the same year, I passed some days at Hereford with Mr. William Bowyer Thomas, one of the friends with whom, in 1796, I had visited the Arrabida Convent near Setubal. By his means I obtained permission to make use of the books in the Cathedral Library, and accordingly I was locked up for several mornings in that part of the Cathedral where the books were kept in chains. So little were these books used at that time, that in placing them upon the shelves, no regard had been had to the length of the chains; and when the volume which I wished to consult was fastened to one of the upper shelves by a short chain, the only means by which it was possible to make use of it was, by piling upon the reading desk as many volumes with longer chains as would reach up to the length of its tether; then, by standing on a chair, I was able to affect my purpose. There, and thus, I first read the story of the Old Woman of Berkeley, in Matthew of Westminster, and transcribed it into a pocket-book. I had no recollection of what had passed at Dr. Sayers's; but the circumstantial details in the monkish Chronicle impressed me so strongly, that I began to versify them that very evening. It was the last day of our pleasant visit at Hereford; and on the following morning the remainder of the Ballad was pencilled in a post-chaise on our way to Abberley.

Mr. Wathen, a singular and obliging person, who afterwards made a voyage to the East Indies, and published an account of what he saw there, traced for me a facsimile of a wooden cut in the Nuremberg Chronicle (which was among the prisoners in the Cathedral). It represents the Old Woman's forcible abduction from her intended place of burial. This was put into the hands of a Bristol artist; and the engraving in wood which he made from it was prefixed to the Ballad when first published, in the second volume of my poems, 1799. The Devil alludes to it in his Walk, when he complains of a certain poet as having "put him in ugly ballads with libellous pictures for sale."

The passage from Matthew of Westminster was prefixed to the Ballad when first published, and it has continued to be so in every subsequent edition of my minor poems from that time to the present: for whenever I have founded either a poem, or part of one, upon any legend, or portion of history, I have either extracted the passage to which I was indebted, if its length allowed, or have referred to it. Mr. Payne Collier, however, after the Ballad, with its parentage affixed, had been twenty years before the public, discovered that I had copied the story from Heywood's Nine Books of various History concerning Women, and that I had not thought proper to acknowledge the obligation. The discovery is thus stated in that gentleman's Poetical Decameron (vol. i. p. 323.). Speaking of the book, one of his Interlocutors says, "It is not of such rarity or singularity as to deserve particular notice now; only if you refer to p. 443, you will find the story on which Mr. Southey founded his mock-ballad of the Old Woman of Berkeley. You will see, too, that the mode in which it is told is extremely similar."

"MORTON. Had Mr. Southey seen Heywood's book?"

"BOURNE. It is not improbable; or some quotation from it, the resemblance is so exact: you may judge from the few following sentences."

Part of Heywood's narration is then given; upon which one of the speakers observes, "The resemblance is exact, and it is not unlikely that Heywood and Southey copied from the same original."

"BOURNE. Perhaps so: Heywood quotes Guillerimus, in Special. Histor. lib. xxvi. c. 26. He afterwards relates, as Southey, that the Devil placed the Old Woman of Berkeley before him on a black horse, and that her screams were heard four miles off."

It cannot, however, be disputed, that Mr. Payne Collier has made one discovery relating to this subject; for he has discovered that the Old Woman of Berkeley is a mock-ballad. Certainly this was never suspected by the Author, or any of his friends. It obtained a very different character in Russia, where having been translated and published, it was prohibited for this singular reason, that children were said to be frightened by it. This I was told by a Russian traveller who called upon me at Keswick.

THE SEVENTH VOLUME,

OR

SECOND OF "BALLADS AND METRICAL TALES."

THE two volumes of this collection which consist of Ballads and Metrical Tales contain the Author's earliest and latest productions of that kind: those which were written with most facility and most glee, and those upon which most time and pains were bestowed, according to the subject and the mode of treating it.

The Tale of Paraguay was published separately in 1825, having been so long in hand that the Dedication was written many years before the Poem was completed.

All for Love, and The Legend of a Cock and a Hen, were published together in a little volume in 1829.

PREFACE

TO

THE EIGHTH VOLUME,

CONTAINING

"THE CURSE OF KEHAMA."

SEVERAL years ago, in the Introduction of my "Letters to Mr. Charles Butler, vindicating the Book of the Church," I had occasion to state that, while a school-boy at Westminster, I had formed an intention of exhibiting the most remarkable forms of Mythology which have at any time obtained among mankind, by making each the ground-work of a narrative poem. The performance, as might be expected, fell far short of the design, and yet it proved something more than a dream of juvenile ambition.

I began with the Mahomedan religion, as being that with which I was then best acquainted myself, and of which every one who had read the Arabian Nights' Entertainments possessed all the knowledge necessary for readily understanding and entering into the intent and spirit of the poem. Mr. Wilberforce thought that I had conveyed in it a very false impression of that religion, and that the moral sublimity which he admired in it was owing to this flattering misrepresentation. But Thalaba the Destroyer was professedly an Arabian Tale. The design required that I should bring into view the best features of that system of belief and worship which had been developed under the Covenant with Ishmael, placing in the most favourable light the morality of the Koran, and what the least corrupted of the Mahomedans retain of the patriarchal faith. It would have been altogether incongruous to have touched upon the abominations engrafted upon it; first by the false Prophet himself, who appears to have been far more remarkable for audacious profligacy than for any intellectual endowments, and afterwards by the spirit of Oriental despotism which accompanied Mahomedanism wherever it was established.

Heathen Mythologies have generally been represented by Christian poets as the work of the Devil and his Angels; and the machinery derived from them was thus rendered credible, according to what was during many ages a received opinion. The plan upon which I proceeded in Madoc was to produce the effect of machinery as far as was consistent with the character of the poem, by representing the most remarkable religion of the New World such as it was, a system of atrocious priesthood. It was not here as in Thalaba the foundation of the poem, but, as usual in what are called epic poems, only incidentally connected with it.

When I took up, for my next subject, that mythology which Sir William Jones had been the first to introduce into English poetry, I soon perceived that the best mode of treating it would be to construct a story altogether mythological. In what form to compose it was then to be determined. No such question had arisen concerning any of my former poems. I should never for a moment have thought of any other measure than blank verse for Joan of Arc, and for Madoc, and afterwards for Roderick. The reason why the irregular rhymeless lyrics of Dr. Sayers were preferred for Thalaba was, that the freedom and variety of such verse were suited to the story. Indeed, of all the laudatory criticisms with which I have been favoured during a long literary life, none ever gratified me more than that of Henry Kirke White upon this occasion, when he observed, that if any other known measure had been adopted, the poem would have been deprived of half its beauty, and all its propriety. And when he added, that the author never seemed to inquire how other men would treat a subject, or what might be the fashion of the times, but took that course which his own sense of fitness pointed out, I could not have desired more appropriate commendation.

The same sense of fitness which made me choose for an Arabian tale the simplest and easiest form of verse, induced me to take a different course in an Indian poem. It appeared to me, that here neither the tone of morals, nor the strain of poetry, could be pitched too high; that nothing but moral sublimity could compensate for the extravagance of the fictions, and that all the skill I might possess in the art of poetry was required to counterbalance the disadvantage of a mythology with which few readers were likely to be well acquainted, and which would appear monstrous if its deformities were not kept out of sight. I endeavoured, therefore, to combine the utmost richness of versification with the greatest freedom. The spirit of the poem was Indian, but there was nothing Oriental in the style. I had learnt the language of poetry from our own great masters and the great poets of antiquity.

No poem could have been more deliberately planned, nor more carefully composed. It was commenced at Lisbon on the first of May, 1801, and recommenced in the summer of the same year at Kingsdown, in the same house (endeared to me by many once delightful but now mournful recollections) in which Madoc had been finished, and Thalaba begun. A little was added during the winter of that year in London. It was resumed at Kingsdown in the summer of 1802, and then laid aside till 1806, during which interval Madoc was reconstructed and published. Resuming it then once more, all that had been written was recast at Keswick: there I proceeded with it leisurely, and finished it on the 25th of November, 1809. It is the only one of my long poems of which detached parts were written to be afterwards inserted in their proper places. Were I to name the persons to whom it was communicated during its progress, it would be admitted now that I might well be encouraged by their approbation; and indeed, when it was published, I must have been very unreasonable if I had not been satisfied with its reception.

It was not till the present edition of these Poems was in the press, that, eight-and-twenty years after Kehama had been published, I first saw the article upon it in the Monthly Review, parts of which cannot be more appropriately preserved any where than here; it shows the determination with which the Reviewer entered upon his task, and the importance which he attached to it.

"Throughout our literary career we cannot recollect a more favourable opportunity than the present for a full discharge of our critical duty. We are indeed bound now to make a firm stand for the purity of our poetic taste against this last and most desperate assault, conducted as it is by a writer of considerable reputation, and unquestionably of considerable abilities. If this poem were to be tolerated, all things after it may demand impunity, and it will be in vain to contend hereafter for any one established rule of poetry as to design and subject, as to character and incident, as to language and versification. We may return at once to the rude hymn in honour of Bacchus, and indite strains adapted to the recitation of rustics in the season of vintage:—

It shall be our plan to establish these points, we hope, beyond reasonable controversy, by a complete analysis of the twenty-four sections (as they may truly be called) of the protentious work, and by ample quotations interspersed with remarks, in which we shall endeavour to withhold no praise that can fairly be claimed, and no censure that is obviously deserved."

"The reviewer fulfilled his promises, however much he failed in his object. He was not more liberal of censure than of praise, and he was not sparing of quotations. The analysis was sufficiently complete for the purposes of criticism, except that the critic did not always give himself the trouble to understand what he was determined to ridicule. "It is necessary for us," he said, "according to our purpose of deterring future writers from the choice of such a story, or from such a management of that story, to detail the gross follies of the work in question; and tedious as the operation may be, we trust that in the judgement of all those lovers of literature who duly value the preservation of sound principles of composition among us, the end will excuse the means." The means were ridicule and reprobation, and the end at which he aimed was thus stated in the Reviewer's peroration.

"We know not that Mr. Southey's most devoted admirers can complain of our having omitted a single incident essential to the display of his character or the development of his plot. To other readers we should apologize for our prolixity, were we not desirous, as we hinted before, of giving a death-blow to the gross extravagancies of the author's school of poetry, if we cannot hope to reform so great an offender as himself. In general, all that nature and all that art has lavished on him is rendered useless by his obstinate adherence to his own system of fancied originality, in which every thing that is good is old, and every thing that is new is good for nothing. Convinced as we are that many of the author's faults proceed from mere idleness, deserving even less indulgence than the erroneous principles of his poetical system, we shall conclude by a general exhortation to all critics to condemn, and to all writers to avoid the example of combined carelessness and perversity which is here afforded by Mr. Southey; and we shall mark this last and worst eccentricity of his Muse with the following character:—Here is the composition of a poet not more distinguished by his genius and knowledge, than by his contempt for public opinion, and the utter depravity of his taste,—a depravity which is incorrigible, and, we are sorry to add, most unblushingly rejoicing in its own hopelessness of amendment."

The Monthly Review has, I believe, been for some years defunct. I never knew to whom I was beholden for the good service rendered me in that Journal, when such assistance was of most value; nor by whom I was subsequently, during several years, favoured in the same Journal with such flagrant civilities as those of which the reader has here seen a sample.

PREFACE

TO
THE NINTH VOLUME,

CONTAINING

"RODERICK, THE LAST OF THE GOTHs."

THIS poem was commenced at Keswick, Dec. 2. 1809, and finished there July 14. 1814.

A French translation, by M. B. de S., in three volumes 12mo., was published in 1820, and another by M. le Chevalier * * *, in one volume 8vo. 1821. Both are in prose.

When the latest of these versions was nearly ready for publication, the publisher, who was also the printer, insisted upon having a life of the author prefixed. The French public, he said, knew nothing of M. Southey, and in order to make the book sell, it must be managed to interest them for the writer. The Chevalier represented as a conclusive reason for not attempting any thing of the kind, that he was not acquainted with M. Southey's private history. "Would you believe it?" says a friend of the translator's, from whose letter I transcribe what follows; "this was his answer verbatim: N'importe, écrivez toujours; brodez, brodez-la un peu; que ce soit vrai ou non ce ne fait rien; qui prendra la peine de s'informer?" Accordingly a Notice sur M. Southey was composed, not exactly in conformity with the publisher's notions of biography, but from such materials as could be collected from magazines and other equally unauthentic sources.

In one of these versions a notable mistake occurs, occasioned by the French pronunciation of an English word. The whole passage indeed, in both versions, may be regarded as curiously exemplifying the difference between French and English poetry.

"The lamps and tapers now grew pale,
And through the eastern windows slanting fell
The roscate ray of morn. Within those walls
Returning day restored no cheerful sounds
Or joyous motions of awakening life;
But in the stream of light the speckled motes,
As if in mimicry of insect play,
Floated with mazy movement. Sloping down
Over the altar pass'd the pillar'd beam,
And rested on the sinful woman's grave
As if it enter'd there, a light from Heaven.

So be it! cried Pelayo, even so!

As in a momentary interval,
When thought expelling thought, had left his mind

Open and passive to the influxes
Of outward sense, his vacant eye was there, . .
So be it, Heavenly Father, even so!

Thus may thy vivifying goodness shed
Forgiveness there; for let not thou the groans
Of dying penitence, nor my bitter prayers
Before thy mercy-seat, be heard in vain!
And thou, poor soul, who from the dolorous house

Of weeping and of pain, dost look to me
To shorten and assuage thy penal term,
Pardon me that these hours in other thoughts
And other duties than this garb, this night
Enjoin, should thus have pass'd! Our motherland

Exacted of my heart the sacrifice;
And many a vigil must thy son perform
Henceforth in woods and mountain fastnesses,
And tented fields, outwatching for her sake
The starry host, and ready for the work
Of day, before the sun begins his course." * *

Il se livrait à toutes ces réflexions quand la lumière des lampes et des cierges commença à pâlir, et que les premières teintes de l'aurore se montrèrent à travers les hautes croisées tournées vers l'orient. Le retour du jour ne ramena point dans ces murs des sons joyeux ni les mouvemens de la vie qui se réveille; les seuls papillons de nuit, agitant leurs ailes pesantes, bourdonnaient encore sous les voûtes ténébreuses. Bientôt le premier rayon du soleil glissant obliquement par-dessus l'autel, vint s'arrêter sur la tombe de la femme pécheresse, et la lumière du ciel sembla y pénétrer. "Que ce présage s'accomplisse," s'écria Pelage, qui, absorbé dans ses méditations, fixait en ce moment ses yeux sur le tombeau de sa mère; "Dieu de miséricorde, qu'il en soit ainsi! Puisse ta bonté vivifiante y verser de même le pardon! Que les sanglots de la pénitence expirante, et que mes prières amères ne montent point en vain devant le trône éternel. Et toi, pauvre âme, qui de ton séjour douloureux de souffrances et de larmes, espères en moi pour abrégier et adoucir ton supplice temporaire, pardonne moi d'avoir, sous ces habits et dans cette nuit, détourné mes pensées sur d'autres devoirs. Notre patrie commune a exigé de moi ce sacrifice, et ton fils doit dorénavant accomplir plus d'une veille dans la profondeur des forêts, sur la cime des monts, dans les plaines couvertes de tentes, observant, pour l'amour de l'Espagne, la marche des astres de la nuit, et préparant l'ouvrage de sa journée avant que le soleil ne commence sa course."—T. i. pp. 175—177.

* See p. 661.

In the other translation the motes are not converted into moths, — but the image is omitted.

Consumées dans des soins pareils les rapides heures s'écouloient, les lampes et les torches commencent à pâlir, et l'oblique rayon du matin dorait déjà les vitraux élevés qui regardoient vers l'Orient : le retour du jour ne ramenoit point, dans cette sombre enceinte, les sons joyeux, ni le tableau mouvant de la vie qui se reveille ; mais, tombant d'en haut, le céleste rayon, passant au-dessus de l'autel, vint frapper le tombeau de la femme pécheresse. "Ainsi soit-il," s'écria Pelage, "ainsi soit-il, ô divin Créateur ! Puisse ta vénéralte bonté verser ainsi le pardon en ce lieu ! Que les gémissemens d'une mort pénitente, que mes amères prières ne soient pas arrivées en vain devant la trône de miséricorde ! Et toi, qui, de ton séjour de souffrances et de larmes, regardes vers ton fils, pour abrégier et soulager tes peines, pardonne, si d'autres devoirs ont rempli les heures que cette nuit et cet habit m'enjoignoient de te consacrer ! Notre patrie exigeoit ce sacrifice ; d'autres vigiles m'attendent dans les bois et les défilés de nos montagnes ; et bientôt sous la tente, il me faudra veiller, le soir, avant que le ciel ne se couvre d'étoiles, être prêt pour le travail du jour, avant que le soleil ne commence sa course."—pp. 92, 93.

A very good translation in Dutch verse was published in two volumes, 8vo. 1823-4, with this title:—"Rodrigo de Goth, Koning van Spanje. Naar het Engelsch van Southey gevolgd, door Vrouwe Katharina Wilhelmina Bilderdijk. Te 's Gravenhage." It was sent to me with the following epistle from her husband Mr. Willem Bilderdijk.

"Roberto Southey, viro spectatissimo,
Gulielmus Bilderdijk, S. P. D.

"Etsi ea nunc temporis passim invaluerit opinio, poetarum genus quam maxima gloriæ cupiditate flagrare, mihi tamen contraria semper insedit persuasio, qui divinæ Poëseos altitudinem veramque laudem non nisi ab iis cognosci putavi quorum præ cæteris e meliori luto sinxerit præcordia Titan, neque aut verè aut justè judicari vatem nisi ab iis qui eodem afflato moveantur. Sexagesimus autem jam agitur annus ex quo et ipse meos inter æquales poëta salutor, eumque locum quem ineunte adolescentia occupare contigit, in hunc usque diem tenuisse videor, popularis auræ nunquam captator, quin immo perpetuus contemptor ; parvus ipse laudator, censor gravis et nonnunquam molestus. Tuum vero nomen, Vir celeberrime ac spectatissime, jam antea veneratus, perlecto tuo de Roderico rege poemate, non potui non summis extollere laudibus, quo doctissimo simul ac venustissimo opere, si minus divinam Aeneida, saltem immortalem Tassonis Epopœiam tentasse, quin et certo respectu ita superasse videris, ut majorum perpaucos, æqualium neminem, cum vera fide ac pietate in Deum, tum ingenio omnique poëtica dote tibi comparandum existimem. Ne mireris itaque, carministui gravitate ac dulcedine captam, meoque iudicio fultam, non illadatam in nostratibus Musum tuum illud nobile poemata feminea manu sed insueto labore attractasse, Belgicoque sermone reddidisse. Hanc certe, per quadrantem sæculi et quod excurrit felicissimo connubio mihi junctam, meamque in Divina arte alumnam ac sociam, nimium in eo sibi sumpsisse nemo facile arbitrabitur cui vel minimum Poëseos nostræ sensum usurpare contigerit ; nec ego hos ejus conatus quos illustri tuo nomini dicandos putavi, tibi mea manu offerre dubitabam. Hæc itaque utriusque nostrum in te observantiæ specimina accipe, Vir illustrissime, ac si quod communium studiorum, si quod veræ pietatis est vinculum, nos tibi ex animo habe addictissimos. Vale.

"Dabam Lugduni in Batavis. Ipsis idib.
Februar. CIOJCCCCXXIV."

I went to Leyden, in 1825, for the purpose of seeing the writer of this epistle and the lady who had translated my poem, and addressed it to me in some very affecting stanzas. It so happened, that on my arrival in that city, I was laid up under a surgeon's care ; they took me into their house, and made the days of my confinement as pleasurable as they were memorable. I have never been acquainted with a man of higher intellectual power, nor of greater learning, nor of more various and extensive knowledge than Bilderdijk, confessedly the most distinguished man of letters in his own country. His wife was worthy of him. I paid them another visit the following year. They are now both gone to their rest, and I shall not look upon their like again.

Soon after the publication of Roderick, I received the following curious letter from the Ettrick Shepherd, (who had passed a few days with me in the preceding autumn,) giving me an account of his endeavours to procure a favourable notice of the poem in the Edinburgh Review.

"Edinburgh, Dec. 15. 1814.

"MY DEAR SIR,

"I was very happy at seeing the post-mark of Keswick, and quite proud of the pleasure you make me believe my 'Wake' has given to the beauteous and happy group at Greta Hall. Indeed few things could give me more pleasure, for I left my heart a sojourner among them. I have had a higher opinion of matrimony since that period than ever I had before, and I desire that you will positively give my kindest respects to each of them individually.

"The Pilgrim of the Sun is published, as you will see by the Papers, and if I may believe some communications that I have got, the public opinion of it is high; but these communications to an author are not to be depended on.

"I have read Roderick over and over again, and am the more and more convinced that it is the noblest epic poem of the age. I have had some correspondence and a good deal of conversation with Mr. Jeffrey about it, though he does not agree with me in every particular. He says it is too long, and wants elasticity, and will not, he fears, be generally read, though much may be said in its favour. I had even teased him to let me review it for him, on account, as I said, that he could not appreciate its merits. I copy one sentence out of the letter he sent in answer to mine:—

"'For Southey I have, as well as you, great respect, and when he will let me, great admiration; but he is a most provoking fellow, and at least as conceited as his neighbour Wordsworth. I cannot just trust you with his Roderick; but I shall be extremely happy to talk over that and other kindred subjects with you, for I am every way disposed to give Southey a lavish allowance of praise, and few things would give me greater pleasure than to find he had afforded me a fair opportunity. But I must do my duty according to my own apprehensions of it.'

"I supped with him last night, but there was so many people that I got but little conversation with him, but what we had was solely about you and Wordsworth. I suppose you have heard what a crushing review he has given the latter. I still found him persisting in his first asseveration, that it was heavy; but what was my pleasure to find that he had only got to the seventeenth division. I assured him he had the marrow of the thing to come at as yet, and in that I was joined by Mr. Alison. There was at the same time a Lady M—— joined us at the instant; short as her remark was, it seemed to make more impression on Jeffrey than all our arguments:—'Oh, I do love Southey!' that was all.

"I have no room to tell you more. But I beg that you will not do any thing, nor publish any thing that will nettle Jeffrey for the present, knowing as you do how omnipotent he is with the fashionable world, and seemingly so well disposed toward you.

"I am ever your's most truly,

"JAMES HOGG.

"I wish the Notes may be safe enough. I never looked at them. I wish these large quartos were all in hell burning."

The reader will be as much amused as I was with poor Hogg's earnest desire that I would not say any thing which might tend to frustrate his friendly intentions.

But what success the Shepherd met
Is to the world a secret yet.

There can be no reason, however, for withholding what was said in my reply of the crushing review which had been given to Mr. Wordsworth's poem:—"He crush the Excursion!! Tell him he might as easily crush Skiddaw!"

PREFACE

TO

• THE TENTH VOLUME,

BEGINNING

WITH "THE POET'S PILGRIMAGE," AND ENDING
WITH THE "VISION OF JUDGEMENT."

Soon after the publication of the Vision of Judgement, the Reverend S. Tillbrook, B.D., at that time Fellow of Peterhouse, and an old acquaintance of mine, published a pamphlet entitled,

"HISTORICAL AND CRITICAL REMARKS

UPON

THE MODERN HEXAMETERS,

AND UPON

MR. SOUTHEY'S VISION OF JUDGEMENT.

'The Hexameter Verse I grant to be a gentleman of an ancient house (so is many an English beggar), yet this clime of ours he cannot thrive in; our speech is too craggy for him to set his plough in; he goes twitching and hopping like a man running upon quagmires, up the hill in one syllable and down the dale in another, retaining no part of that strictly smooth gait which he vaunts himself with among the Greeks and Latins.'—THOMAS NASH.

The following extracts comprize the most important of Mr. Tillbrook's animadversions:—

"The Laureate says that 'if it be difficult to reconcile the public to a new tune in verse, it is plainly impossible to reconcile them to a new pronunciation.' But why not attempt to teach this tune on new principles? Why leave the public without a guide to the accents and divisions of the Georgian hexameter? This should have been done either by—borrowing from the Latin rules—adopting those of the early prosodians,—or by inventing a new metronome. It is difficult to recommend, much more to establish, any theoretical attempt upon individual authority, because practical experience is the best and ultimate test of success. After repeated trials the enterprize in question has uniformly failed, and experience has shown that all modern imitations of the epic are unworthy of becoming denizens among our English metres. The system attempted by the Laureate is professedly an imitation of the ancient systems; but every copy is good or bad as it resembles or differs from its original. In defence of his enterprize, Mr. Southey should not have contented himself with a bare exposition of the measures of his verse, but should have actually noted the cæsuras, accented the syllables, and divided the feet. In matters of rhythm and sound the untried ear cannot always catch the precise meaning of the musician or poet, especially where an original air is turned into a variation; and this seems precisely the case between the modernized and original epic, the difference acknowledged by the Laureate being the variation alluded to.

"A table exhibiting the varieties which Mr. S. has adopted, and their agreement or disagreement with the legitimate hexameter, should have been drawn out. Critical experience has long ago selected and established certain canons for the iambic, sapphic, alcaic, and other metres; and Greek or Latin verses constructed according to these laws invariably excel both in rhythm and melody.—There are in the Vision of Judgement parts which may charm and delight, but they do so from no metrical effect. The reader (notwithstanding the Laureate's caution) soon finds himself in a tangled path, and gets bewildered for want of those guides which lead him smoothly through the Siege of Troy. But if he travel far with the Muse of modern epic, he will have little running, frequent haltings, some stumbling and jostling, and now and then find the good lady gaping, or sitting cross-legged in the midst of a barbarous rabble of monosyllabic particles.

"But it will be easier to show the comparative and probable sources of excellence or failure in the composition of the modern hexameter, by an analysis of the Greek and Latin languages, compared as to their literal and syllabic relations. To effect this, four separate tables have been drawn, containing the component parts and totals of eight verses of herametric dimensions, taken severally from the Iliad, Æneid, Vision of Judgement, and from a poem by Schiller. The divisions are calculated to show the totals of words, syllables, consonants, vowels, diphthongs, letters, and variety of final syllables. It will be seen from this tabular exposition that the Greek and Latin are nearly analogous, except that the balance of polysyllables inclines to the former. The diphthongs are more and the consonants fewer, and the total of letters and words also is less with the Greek. The conclusion therefore is, that the euphony, and syllabic power of speech, must likewise be on the side of the Greeks.

"In the English scale the number of monosyllables is five times as great as in either of the two ancient languages, and more than twice as great as in the German. The English consonants are very nearly double those of the Greek or Latin, and the total number of words bears nearly the same ratio both to the Greek and Latin, viz. two to one. By necessity of grammar, a large proportion of these words consists of monosyllables and expletives. Neither the consonants in the German, nor the total of letters, is so numerous as in the English, and the same relation holds between the final varieties of these two languages.

"It has been before remarked that the Teutonic hexameter may be rendered somewhat superior to the English. This superiority is in a great measure to be attributed to the smaller aggregate of consonants and monosyllables which distinguish the German vocabulary. But the unprejudiced reader will draw what inferences he pleases from the comparative powers of each language, and regulate his decision according to the apparent truth or falsehood of the whole of the argument and evidence.

"Excludat jurgia Finis."

"In taking leave of this question, the Writer again assures Mr. Southey of his high regard both for the private and literary life of the Laureate of the present age. The pen which has traced these Remarks, if it be not that of a ready writer, would fain be considered as that of a humble critic, actuated by no other motives than those of friendly discussions, and a desire to preserve the Epic Muse of Greece and Latin free from the barbarities of modern imitation.

"It is against the metre—the metrical association and arrangement,—against the innovation, not the innovator, that the writer protests; the merits or demerits therefore of the Vision of Judgement, as a poem, he leaves to abler reviewers and to posterity. It will be read and admired by a few persons, just as the attempts of other Hexametrists have been. The experiments of Tassino, Sidney, and Spenser, produced a short-lived sensation, which perished with the sympathetic caprice of the times. The reputation of Mr. Southey may, even in the Georgian age, produce a parallel effect, but independent of the probable causes of the failure already stated, the poem itself, being an occasional one, is on that account also more liable to forgetfulness.

"Via trita, via tuta, is therefore as good a password for the aspirant who would climb Parnassus, as for the humble pilgrim who plods along the beaten path of Prose. There is no necessity, indeed no apology, for attempting to revive those misshapen forms of Poetry,—those 'immodulata poemata,' which have long ago been laid to rest, shrouded in cobwebs and buried in the dust. Ennius may be pardoned his imaginary metempsychosis, his Somnia Pythagorea, and assumption of the title, 'Alter Homerus;' but the world would be loth now-a-days to allow the same privileges to an English Poet.

"Had there been any good chance of imitating the classic hexameter, surely he (who by distinction among our Poets was called 'divine;) must have succeeded in the enterprise. Spenser however relinquished the hopeless task; and it is to be regretted that his example, in this respect at least, has not acted preventively upon his worthy successor.

"In the farrago of metrical trash which has been extracted from the modern Hexametrists of different countries, what is there worthy of example or remembrance either in the subjects or execution of their performances? Human nature is indeed so fickle in her intellectual operations, that the most absurd and impracticable speculations have ever found partisans ready to advocate their truth, and embark in the execution of them. But the career of such preposterous enterprizes can neither be prosperous nor long. To wage war against the opinions of the wise and experienced, is to challenge the fate of poor Dick Tinto, who, after all his ill-spent time and labour, found himself 'patronized by one or two of those judicious persons who make a virtue of being singular and of pitching their own opinions against those of the world in matters of taste and criticism.' Ever since the Republic of Letters was established, innovators of one kind or other have endeavoured to supplant the sterling writers, not only of Greece and Rome, but of every civilized country. But when ingenuity or imitation can be foisted upon true scholarship, as the representative of original genius, the taste of the public must either be sadly perverted to relish what is bad, or be already satiated with that which is good.

"There can now be little, or rather no honour conferred upon our own legitimate Muse, by an attempt to naturalize a bastard race of metre, which has been banished from the most enlightened countries of Europe. Within the last two centuries, literature, arms, and commerce have extended our vernacular tongue over a vast portion of the globe, and it is spreading still further. On this, if on no other account, it behoves the guardians of our native quarry to see that it maintains its proper excellence, and to recommend, as worthy of imitation, only such standard works of art or science, as may have received the repeated sanction of the scholar and critic. The arts are naturally imitative; they will, however, sometimes, from mistaken judgement or self-confidence, undertake to copy that which is inimitable. We cannot, under any colouring or disguise, mistake the Muse of modern hexameter, for the original Calliope of Homer or Virgil.

"In the preface to the Vision of Judgement Mr. Southey assures us that a desire to realize one of the hopes of his youth was one among the leading causes of his enterprize: to this motive might have been superadded the conscientious discharge of an official duty, and the public expression of his loyalty and attachment to the reigning sovereign. With these, or such like considerations, the imaginary apotheosis of our late revered monarch seems to have co-operated in the plan and execution of a poem, which cannot fail of giving offence to many serious and well-meaning persons. To dive into the mysteries of heaven, and to pronounce upon the eternal condition of departed kings or others, is unquestionably a bold, if not a presumptuous undertaking. But when this is carried on under the bias of political feelings, there is greater danger of its becoming erroneous, or digressing into what some might call impiety. It must, however, be remembered, that the 'Vision of Judgement,' is neither more nor less than a poet's dream. Objections of a similar kind might apply to Dante or Milton, and to the subjects of their great labours, and in short to all scriptural themes. It would be difficult, perhaps, to determine in what manner the scenes of the Vision of Judgement could have been unobjectionably portrayed. But there is no reason why a gentleman and scholar like Mr. Southey (who cannot, any more than the rest of the world, be deemed infallible) should be loaded with abuse which would have been hardly justifiable had he published a series of poems as licentious as many of recent notoriety. No wonder, therefore, that the offended pride of the Laureate turns in disgust from the counsel of such unworthy rivals. When the civilities of learning cease to be cherished, admonition will become nauseous, and criticism will lose half its usefulness. It is, however, to be hoped, that no dispassionate inquirer will be ranked, even by the Laureate, among the Duncery of the Georgian age. At all events the Writer of the present remarks had rather accept an humble place among those whom King James has styled 'the docile bairnes of knowledge.' The Writer's stock in trade as a critic is poor and homely; a little recollection of the rules of prosody, accent, and rhythm, imprinted upon early memory by rod or ferula; an Etonian master and grammar — remnants of scanning and proving — an ordinary pair of ears, and lungs no better than those of other folks. These scanty materials have been exercised in the examination of the 'Vision of Judgement,' and conclusions very different from those of its author have been deduced. And when the reader has perused the following eulogy by the Laureate upon the excellence of our blank verse, he will surely ask himself why that gentleman did not apply it in the composition of a poem, which, from the nature of its argument, embraced the terrible and sublime as well as the tender and pathetic. 'Take our blank verse for all in all, in all its gradations from the elaborate rhythm of Milton, down to its loosest structure in the early dramatists, and I believe that there is no measure comparable to it, either in our own or any other language, for might, and majesty, and flexibility, and compass.' A host of authors might be brought in support of this panegyric upon English blank verse; but as it is against the modern hexametrists that the writer has waged a somewhat long (though as he trusts a friendly) warfare, he will now draw his last shaft from the quiver of honest old Puttenham, and when he has shot it, will hang up his bow and shake hands with the Laureate. 'Now, peradventure, with us Englishmen, it be somewhat too late to admit a new invention of feete and times, that our forefathers never used, nor ever observed till this day, either in their measures or in their pronunciation, and perchance will seem in us a presumptuous part to attempt; considering also it would be hard to find many men to like one man's choice, in the limitation of times and quantities of words, with which not one, but every eare, is to be pleased and made a particular judge; being most truly said that a multitude, or commonality, is hard to please and easy to offend. And therefore I intend not to proceed any further in this curiositye, than to shew the small subtilty that any other hath yet done, and not by imitation but by observation; not to the intent to have it put in execution in our vulgar Poesie, but to be pleasantly scanned upon, as are all novelties so frivolous and ridiculous as it.'

After thanking Mr. Tillbrook for sending me his pamphlet. and for explaining what I should else have been sorry to notice, that it contained no intimation of the personal acquaintance and mutual goodwill which had so long subsisted between us, I addressed to him the following cursory remarks in reply to his observations.

"The greater part of your Treatise is employed in very ably and pleasantly supplying the deficiencies of my Preface, in points wherein it was necessarily deficient because I was out of reach of materials. The remarks which are directed against my own hexameters appear to me altogether ill-founded. You try the measure by Greek and Latin prosody: you might as well try me by the Laws of Solon, or the Twelve Tables. I have distinctly stated that the English hexameter is not constructed upon those canons, but bears the same relation to the ancient, that our heroic line does to the iambic verse. I have explained the principle of adaptation which I had chosen, and by that principle the measure ought to be judged.

"You bring forward arguments which are derived from music. But it by no means follows that a principle which holds good in music, should therefore be applicable to metre. The arts of music and poetry are essentially distinct, and I have had opportunities of observing that very skilful musicians may be as utterly without ear for metre, as I am myself without ear for music. If these arguments were valid, they would apply to the German hexameter as well as to the English; but the measure is as firmly established among the Germans as blank verse is with us, and having been sanctioned by the practice of their best poets, can never become obsolete so long as the works of Voss, and Göethe, and Schiller are remembered, that is, as long as the language lasts.

"Twice you have remarked upon the length of the verse as occasioning a difficulty in reading it aloud. Surely you have taken up this argument with little consideration, because it lay upon the surface. It is doubly fallacious: first, upon your own principle; for if the English verse is not isochronous with the Latin, it must be shorter; and secondly, because the breath is regulated in reading by the length of the sentence, not by that of the verse.

"Why did you bring against my trochee in the fifth place, an argument just as applicable to the spondaic verse, and which, indeed, is only saying that a versifier who writes without any regard to effect, may produce very bad verses? You might as well object to the Alexandrine that it admits of twelve monosyllables. And how is it that you, who know Glaramara so well, should have made me answerable for a vowel dropt at the press?

"You have dealt fairly in not selecting single lines, which taken singly would be unfavourable specimens: but methinks you should have exhibited one extract of sufficient length to show the effect of the measure. I certainly think that any paragraph of the poem containing from ten lines upward would confute all the reasoning which you have advanced, or which any one could adduce against the experiment.

"But I have done. It is a question de gustibus, and therefore interminable. The proof of the pudding must be in the eating; and not all the reasoning in the world will ever persuade any one that the pudding which he dislikes is a good pudding, or that the pudding which pleases his palate and agrees with his stomach can be a bad one. I am glad that I have made the experiment, and quite satisfied with the result. The critics who write and who talk are with you; so I dare say are the whole posse of schoolmasters. The women, the young poets, and the docile bairns are with me. "

"I thank you for speaking kindly and considerately concerning the subject of the Vision, and remain,

"My dear Sir,

"Yours very truly,

"ROBERT SOUTHEY.

PREFACE.

EARLY in July, 1793, I happened to fall in conversation, at Oxford, with an old schoolfellow upon the story of Joan of Arc, and it then struck me as being singularly well adapted for a poem. The long vacation commenced immediately afterwards. As soon as I reached home I formed the outline of a plan, and wrote about three hundred lines. The remainder of the month was passed in travelling, and I was too much engaged with new scenes and circumstances to proceed, even in thought, with what had been broken off. In August I went to visit my old schoolfellow, Mr. Grosvenor Bedford, who, at that time, resided with his parents at Brixton Causeway, about four miles on the Surrey side of the metropolis. There, the day after completing my nineteenth year, I resumed the undertaking, and there, in six weeks from that day, finished what I called an Epic Poem in twelve books.

My progress would not have been so rapid had it not been for the opportunity of retirement which I enjoyed there, and the encouragement that I received. In those days London had not extended in that direction farther than Kennington, beyond which place the scene changed suddenly, and there was an air and appearance of country which might now be sought in vain at a far greater distance from town. There was nothing indeed to remind one that London was so near, except the smoke which overhung it. Mr. Bedford's residence was situated upon the edge of a common, on which shady lanes opened leading to the neighbouring villages (for such they were then) of Camberwell, Dulwich, and Clapham, and to Norwood. The view in front was bounded by the Surrey hills. Its size and structure showed it to be one of those good houses built in the early part of the last century by persons who, having realized a respectable fortune in trade, were wise enough to be contented with it, and retire to pass the evening of their lives in the enjoyment of leisure and tranquillity. Tranquil indeed the place was, for the neighbourhood did not extend beyond half a dozen families, and the London style and habits of visiting had not obtained among them. Uncle Toby himself might have enjoyed his rood and a half of ground there, and not have had it known. A forecourt separated the house from the foot-path and the road in front; behind, there was a large and well-stocked garden, with other spacious premises, in which utility and ornament were in some degree combined. At the extremity of the garden, and under the shade of four lofty linden trees, was a summer-house looking on an ornamented grass-plot, and fitted up as a conveniently habitable room. That summer-house was allotted to me, and there my mornings were passed at the desk. Whether it exists now or not I am ignorant. The property has long since passed into other hands. The common is inclosed and divided by rectangular hedges and gates; rows of brick houses have supplanted the clumps of oaks and elms; the brows of the Surrey hills bear a parapet of modern villas, and the face of the whole district is changed.

I was not a little proud of my performance. Young poets are, or at least used to be, as ambitious of producing an epic poem, as stage-stricken youths of figuring in Romeo or Hamlet. It had been the earliest of my day-dreams. I had begun many such; but this was the first which had been completed, and I was too young and too ardent to perceive or suspect that the execution was as crude as the design. In the course of the autumn I transcribed it fairly from the first draught, making no other alterations or corrections of any kind than such as suggested themselves in the act of transcription. Upon showing it to the friend in conversation with whom the design had originated, he said, "I am glad you have written this: it will serve as a store where you will find good passages for better poems." His opinion of it was more judicious than mine; but what there was good in it or promising, would not have been transplantable.

Toward the close of 1794, it was announced as to be published by subscription in a quarto volume, price one guinea. Shortly afterwards I became acquainted with my fellow-townsmen, Mr. Joseph Cottle, who had recently commenced business as a bookseller in our native city of Bristol. One evening I read to him part of the poem, without any thought of making a proposal concerning it, or expectation of receiving one. He, however, offered me fifty guineas for the copyright, and fifty copies for my subscribers, which was more than the list amounted to; and the offer was accepted as promptly as it was made. It can rarely happen that a young author should meet with a bookseller as inexperienced and as ardent as himself, and it would be still more extraordinary if such mutual indiscretion did not bring with it cause for regret to both. But this transaction was the commencement of an intimacy which has continued, without the slightest shade of displeasure at any time, on either side, to the present day.

At that time, few books were printed in the country, and it was seldom indeed that a quarto volume issued from a provincial press. A font of new types was ordered for what was intended to be the handsomest book that Bristol had ever yet sent forth; and when the paper arrived, and the printer was ready to commence his operations, nothing had been done toward preparing the poem for the press, except that a few verbal alterations had been made. I was not, however, without misgivings, and when the first proof-sheet was brought me, the more glaring faults of the composition stared me in the face. But the sight of a well-printed page, which was to be set off with all the advantages that fine waste paper and hot-pressing could impart, put me in spirits, and I went to work with good-will. About half the first book was left in its original state; the rest of the poem was re-cast and re-composed while the printing went on. This occupied six months. I corrected the concluding sheet of the poem, left the Preface in the publisher's hands, and departed for Lisbon by way of Coruña and Madrid.

The Preface was written with as little discretion as had been shown in publishing the work itself. It stated how rapidly the poem had been produced, and that it had been almost re-composed during its progress through the press. This was not said as taking merit for haste and temerity, nor to excuse its faults,—only to account for them. But here I was liable to be misapprehended, and likely to be misrepresented. The public indeed care neither for explanations nor excuses; and such particulars might not unfitly be deemed unbecoming in a young man, though they may be excused and even expected from an old author, who, at the close of a long career, looks upon himself as belonging to the past. Omitting these passages, and the specification of what Mr. Coleridge had written in the second book (which was withdrawn in the next edition), the remainder of the Preface is here subjoined. It states the little which I had been able to collect concerning the subject of the poem, gives what was then my own view of Joan of Arc's character and history, and expresses with overweening confidence the opinions which the writer entertained concerning those poets whom it was his ambition not to imitate, but to follow. . . It cannot be necessary to say, that some of those opinions have been modified, and others completely changed, as he grew older.

ORIGINAL PREFACE.

The history of Joan of Arc is as mysterious as it is remarkable. That she believed herself inspired, few will deny; that she was inspired, no one will venture to assert; and it is difficult to believe that she was herself imposed upon by Charles and Du-nois. That she discovered the King when he disguised himself among the courtiers to deceive her, and that, as a proof of her mission, she demanded a sword from a tomb in the church of St. Catherine, are facts in which all historians agree. If this had been done by collusion, the Maid must have known herself an impostor, and with that knowledge could not have performed the enterprise she undertook. Enthusiasm, and that of no common kind, was necessary, to enable a young maiden at once to assume the profession of arms, to lead her troops to battle, to fight among the foremost, and to subdue with an inferior force an enemy then believed invincible. It is not possible that one who felt herself the puppet of a party could have performed these things. The artifices of a court could not have persuaded her that she discovered Charles in disguise; nor could they have prompted her to demand the sword which they might have hidden, without discovering the deceit. The Maid then was not knowingly an impostor; nor could she have been the instrument of the court; and to say that she believed herself inspired, will neither account for her singling out the King, or prophetically claiming the sword. After crowning Charles, she declared that her mission was accomplished, and demanded leave to retire. Enthusiasm would not have ceased here; and if they who imposed on her could persuade her still to go with their armies, they could still have continued her delusion.

This mysteriousness renders the story of Joan of Arc peculiarly fit for poetry. The aid of angels and devils is not necessary to raise her above mankind; she has no gods to lackey her, and inspire her with courage, and heal her wounds: the Maid of Orleans acts wholly from the workings of her own mind, from the deep feeling of inspiration. The palpable agency of superior powers would destroy the obscurity of her character, and sink her to the mere heroine of a fairy tale.

The alterations which I have made in the history are few and trifling. The death of Salisbury is placed later, and of the Talbots earlier than they occurred. As the battle of Patay is the concluding action of the Poem, I have given it all the previous solemnity of a settled engagement. Whatever appears miraculous is asserted in history, and my authorities will be found in the notes.

It is the common fault of Epic Poems, that we feel little interest for the heroes they celebrate. The national vanity of a Greek or a Roman might have been gratified by the renown of Achilles or Æneas; but to engage the unprejudiced, there must be more of human feelings than is generally to be found in the character of a warrior. From this objection, the Odyssey alone may be excepted. Ulysses appears as the father and the husband, and the affections are enlisted on his side. The judgement must applaud the well-digested plan and splendid execution of the Iliad, but the heart always bears testimony to the merit of the Odyssey: it is the poem of nature, and its personages inspire love rather than command admiration. The good herdsman Eumæus is worth a thousand heroes. Homer is, indeed, the best of poets, for he is at once dignified and simple; but Pope has disguised him in finery, and Cowper has stripped him naked.

There are few readers who do not prefer Turnus to Æneas: a fugitive, suspected of treason, who negligently left his wife, seduced Dido, deserted her, and then forcibly took Lavinia from her betrothed husband. What avails a man's piety to the gods, if in all his dealings with men he prove himself a villain? If we represent Dely as commanding a bad action, this is not exculpating the man, but criminating the God.

The ill chosen subjects of Lucan and Statius have prevented them from acquiring the popularity they would otherwise have merited, yet in detached parts, the former of these is perhaps unequalled, certainly unexcelled. I do not scruple to prefer Statius to Virgil: with inferior taste, he appears to me to possess a richer and more powerful imagination; his images are strongly conceived, and clearly painted, and the force of his language, while it makes the reader feel, proves that the author felt himself.

The power of story is strikingly exemplified in the Italian heroic poets. They please universally, even in translations, when little but the story remains. In proportioning his characters, Tasso has erred; Godfrey is the hero of the poem, Rinaldo of the poet, and Tancred of the reader. Secondary characters should not be introduced, like Gyas and Cloanthus, merely to fill a possession; neither should they be so prominent as to throw the principal into shade.

The lawless magic of Ariosto, and the singular theme as well as the singular excellence of Milton, render it impossible to deduce any rules of epic poetry from these authors. So likewise with Spenser, the favourite of my childhood, from whose frequent perusal I have always found increased delight.

Against the machinery of Camoens, a heavier charge must be brought than that of profaneness or incongruity. His floating island is but a floating brothel, and no beauty can make atonement for licentiousness. From this accusation, none but a translator would attempt to justify him; but Camoens had the most able of translators. The Lusiad, though excellent in parts, is uninteresting as a whole: it is read with little emotion, and remembered with little pleasure. But it was composed in the anguish of disappointed hopes, in the fatigues of war, and in a country far from all he loved; and we should not forget, that as the poet of Portugal was among the most unfortunate of men, so he should be ranked among the most respectable. Neither his own country or Spain has yet produced his equal: his heart was broken by calamity, but the spirit of integrity and independence never forsook Camoens.

I have endeavoured to avoid what appears to me the common fault of epic poems, and to render the Maid of Orleans interesting. With this intent I have given her, not the passion of love, but the remembrance of subdued affection, a lingering of human feelings not inconsistent with the enthusiasm and holiness of her character.

The multitude of obscure epic writers copy with the most gross servility their ancient models. If a tempest occurs, some envious spirit procures it from the God of the winds or the God of the sea. Is there a town besieged? the eyes of the hero are opened, and he beholds the powers of Heaven assisting in the attack; an angel is at hand to heal his wounds, and the leader of the enemy in his last combat is seized with the sudden cowardice of Hector. Even Tasso is too often an imitator. But notwithstanding the censure of a satirist, the name of Tasso will still be ranked among the best heroic poets. Perhaps Boileau only condemned him for the sake of an antithesis; it is with such writers, as with those who affect point in their conversation, they will always sacrifice truth to the gratification of their vanity.

I have avoided what seems useless and wearying in other poems, and my readers will find no descriptions of armour, no muster-rolls, no geographical catalogues, lion, tiger, bull, bear, and boar smiles, Phæbuses or Auroras. And where in battle I have particularized the death of an individual, it is not, I hope, like the common lists of killed and wounded.

It has been established as a necessary rule for the epic that the subject should be national. To this rule I have acted in direct opposition, and chosen for the subject of my poem the defeat of the English. If there be any readers who can wish success to an unjust cause, because their country was engaged in it, I desire not their approbation.

In Millin's National Antiquities of France, I find that M. Laverdy was, in 1791, occupied in collecting whatever has been written concerning the Maid of Orleans. I have anxiously looked for his work, but it is probable, considering the tumults of the intervening period, that it has not been accomplished. Of the various productions to the memory of Joan of Arc, I have only collected a few titles, and, if report may be trusted, need not fear a heavier condemnation than to be deemed equally bad. A regular canon of St. Euverte has written what is said to be a very bad poem, entitled the Modern Amazon. There is a prose tragedy called La Pucelle d'Orléans, variously attributed to Benserade, to Boyer, and to Menardière. The abbé Daubignac published a prose tragedy with the same title in 1642. There is one under the name of Jean Baruel of 1581, and another printed anonymously at Rouen 1606. Among the manuscripts of the queen of Sweden in the Vatican, is a dramatic piece in verse called Le Mystère du Siège d'Orléans. In these modern times, says Millin, all Paris has run to the theatre of Nicolet to see a pantomime entitled Le Fameux Siège de la Pucelle d'Orléans. I may add, that, after the publication of this poem, a pantomime upon the same subject was brought forward at Covent-Garden Theatre, in which the heroine, like Don Juan, was carried off by devils and precipitated alive into hell. I mention it, because the feelings of the audience revolted at such a catastrophe, and, after a few nights, an angel was introduced to rescue her.

But among the number of worthless poems upon this subject, there are two which are unfortunately notorious,—the Pucelles of Chapelain and Voltaire. I have had patience to peruse the first, and never have been guilty of looking into the second; it is well said by George Herbert,

Make not thy sport abuses, for the fly
That feeds on dung is coloured thereby.

On the eighth of May, the anniversary of its deliverance, an annual fête is held at Orleans; and monuments have been erected there and at Rouen to the memory of the Maid. Her family was ennobled by Charles; but it should not be forgotten in the history of this monarch, that in the hour of misfortune he abandoned to her fate the woman who had saved his kingdom.

Bristol, November, 1795.

The poem thus crudely conceived, rashly prefaced, and prematurely hurried into the world, was nevertheless favourably received, owing chiefly to adventitious circumstances. A work of the same class, with as much power and fewer faults, if it were published now, would attract little or no attention. One thing which contributed to bring it into immediate notice was, that no poem of equal pretension had appeared for many years, except Glover's Athenaid, which, notwithstanding the reputation of his Leonidas, had been utterly neglected. But the chief cause of its favourable reception was, that it was written in a republican spirit, such as may easily be accounted for in a youth whose notions of liberty were taken from the Greek and Roman writers, and who was ignorant enough of history and of human nature to believe, that a happier order of things had commenced with the independence of the United States, and would be accelerated by the French Revolution. Such opinions were then as unpopular in England as they deserved to be; but they were cherished by most of the critical journals, and conciliated for me the good-will of some of the most influential writers who were at that time engaged in periodical literature, though I was personally unknown to them. They bestowed upon the poem abundant praise, passed over most of its manifold faults, and noticed others with indulgence. Miss Seward wrote some verses upon it in a strain of the highest eulogy and the bitterest invective; they were sent to the Morning Chronicle, and the editor (Mr. Perry) accompanied their insertion with a vindication of the opinions which she had so vehemently denounced. Miss Seward was then in high reputation; the sincerity of her praise was proved by the severity of her censure, and nothing could have been more serviceable to a young author than her notice thus indignantly but also thus generously bestowed. The approbation of the reviewers served as a passport for the poem to America, and it was reprinted there while I was revising it for a second edition.

A work, in which the author and the bookseller had engaged with equal imprudence, thus proved beneficial to both. It made me so advantageously known as a poet, that no subsequent hostility on the part of the reviews could pull down the reputation which had been raised by their good offices. Before that hostility took its determined character, the charge of being a hasty and careless writer was frequently brought against me. Yet to have been six months correcting what was written in six weeks, was some indication of patient industry; and of this the second edition gave farther evidence. Taking for a second motto the words of Erasmus, Ut homines ita libros, indies seipsis meliores fieri oportet, I spared no pains to render the poem less faulty both in its construction and composition; I wrote a new beginning, threw out much of what had remained of the original draught, altered more, and endeavoured from all the materials which I had means of consulting, to make myself better acquainted with the manners and circumstances of the fifteenth century. Thus the second edition differed almost as much from the first, as that from the copy which was originally intended for publication. Less extensive alterations were made in two subsequent editions; the fifth was only a reprint of the fourth; by that time I had become fully sensible of its great and numerous faults, and requested the reader to remember, as the only apology which could be offered for them, that the poem was written at the age of nineteen, and published at one-and-twenty. My intention then was, to take no farther pains in correcting a work of which the inherent defects were incorrigible, and I did not look into it again for many years.

But now, when about to perform what at my age may almost be called the testamentary task of revising, in all likelihood for the last time, those works by which it was my youthful ambition "to be for ever known," and part whereof I dare believe has been "so written to aftertimes as they should not willingly let it die," it appeared proper that this poem through which the author had been first made known to the public, two-and-forty years ago, should lead the way; and the thought that it was ~~once~~ more to pass through the press under my own inspection, induced a feeling in some respects resembling that with which it had been first delivered to the printer, . . . and yet how different! For not in hope and ardour, nor with the impossible intention of rendering it what it might have been had it been planned and executed in middle life, did I resolve to correct it once more throughout; but for the purpose of making it more consistent with itself in diction, and less inconsistent in other things with the well-weighed opinions of my maturer years. The faults of effort, which may generally be regarded as hopeful indications in a juvenile writer, have been mostly left as they were. The faults of language which remained from the first edition have been removed, so that in this respect the whole is sufficiently in keeping. And for those which expressed the political prejudices of a young man who had too little knowledge to suspect his own ignorance, they have either been expunged, or altered, or such substitutions have been made for them as harmonize with the pervading spirit of the poem, and are nevertheless in accord with those opinions which the author has maintained for thirty years through good and evil report, in the maturity of his judgement as well as in the sincerity of his heart.

TO EDITH SOUTHEY.

EDITH ! I brought thee late a humble gift.
The songs of earlier youth ; it was a wreath
With many an unripe blossom garlanded
And many a weed, yet mingled with some flowers
Which will not wither. 'Dearest ! now I bring
A worthier offering ; thou wilt prize it well,
For well thou know'st amid what painful cares
My solace was in this : and though to me
There is no music in the hollowness
Of common praise, yet well content am I
Now to look back upon my youth's green prime,
Nor idly, nor unprofitably past,
Imping in such adventurous essay
The wing, and strengthening it for steadier flight.

JOAN OF ARC.

THE FIRST BOOK.

THERE was high feasting held at Vaucouleur,
For old Sir Robert had a famous guest,
The Bastard Orleans¹ ; and the festive hours, the noble duke of Orleanaunce, more glad to be his bastarde, with a meane livyng, than the lawful sonne of that coward cuckolde Cawny, with his four thousand crownes." The judges much marvelled at his bolde answer, and his mother's coyns detested him for shamyng of his mother, and his father's supposed kinne rejoiced in gaining the patrimony and possessions. Charles duke of Orleanaunce herying of this judgment, took hym into his family, and gave hym greate offices and fees, which he well deserved, for (during his captivite) he defended his landes, expulsed the Englishmen, and in conclusion, procured his deliverance. — Hall, f. 104.

There can be no doubt that Shakespeare had this anecdote in his mind when he wrote the first scene wherein the bastard Falconbridge is introduced.

When the duke of Orleans was so villainously assassinated by order of the duke of Burgundy, the murder was thought at first to have been perpetrated by Sir Aubert de Cauny, says Monstrellet (Johnes's translation, vol. i. p. 198.), from the great hatred he bore the duke for having carried off his wife ; but the truth was soon known who were the guilty persons, and that Sir Aubert was perfectly innocent of the crime. Marietta d'Engulen was the name of the adulteress.

"On rapporte que la duchesse d'Orléans, Valentine de Milan, princesse célébré par son esprit et par son courage, ayant à la nouvelle de la morte sanglante de son époux, rassemblé toute sa maison et les principaux seigneurs de son parti, leur adressa ces paroles : ' Qui de vous marchera le premier pour venger la mort du frère de son Roy ? ' Frappé de terreur, chacun gardait un morne silence. Indigné de voir que personne ne répondît à ce noble appel, le petit Jean d'Orléans (Dunois), alors âgé de six ans et demi, s'avança tout à coup au milieu de l'assemblée, et s'écria

¹ "La wes duke of Orleana murdered in Paris, by Jhon duke of Burgoyne, was owner of the castle of Concy, on the frontiers of Fraunce toward Arthoys, whereof he made constable the lord of Cauny, a man not so wise as his wife was faire, and yet she was not so faire, but she was as well beloved of the duke of Orleana, as of her husband. Betwene the duke and her husband (I cannot tell who was father), she conceived a child, and brought furthe a prety boye called Jhon, whiche child beyng of the age of one yere, the duke deceased, and not long after the mother and the lord of Cawny ended their lives. The next of kynne to the lord Cawny chalenged the inheritance, which was worth foure thousande crownes a yere, alledgyng that the boye was a bastard : and the kynred of the mother's side, for to save her honesty, it plainly denied. In conclusion, this matter was in contention before the presydenes of the parliament of Paris, and there hang in controversie till the child came to the age of eight yeres old. At whiche tyme it was demanded of hym openly whose sonne he was ; his frendes of his mother's side advertised hym to require a day, to be advysed of so great an answer, whiche he asked, and to hym it was granted. In the mean season, his said frendes perswaded him to claime his inheritance as sonne to the lorde of Cawny, whiche was an honorable livyng, and an auncient patrimony, affirming that if he said contrary, he not only slaudered his mother, shamed hymself, and stained his bloud, but also should have no livyng, nor any thing to take to. The scholemaster thinking that his disciple had well learned his lesson, and would reherse it according to his instruction, brought hym before the Judges at the dale assigned, and when the question was repeted to hym againe, he boldly answered, " My harte geveeth me, and my tonge telleth me, that I am the sonne of

Cheer'd with the Trobadour's sweet minstrelsy,¹
 Pass'd gaily at his hospitable board.
 But not to share the hospitable board
 And hear sweet minstrelsy, Dunois had sought
 Sir Robert's hall; he came to rouse Lorraine,
 And glean what force the wasting war had left
 For one last effort. Little had the war
 Left in Lorraine, but age, and youth unripe
 For slaughter yet, and widows, and young maids
 Of widow'd loves. And now with his great guest
 The Lord of Vaucouleur sat communing
 On what might profit France, and found no hope,
 Despairing of their country, when he heard
 An old man, and a maid awaited him
 In the castle-hall. He knew the old man well,
 His vassal Claude; and at his bidding Claude
 Approach'd, and after meet obeisance made,
 Bespoke Sir Robert.

"Good my Lord, I come.

With a strange tale; I pray you pardon me
 If it should seem impertinent, and like d'une voix animée: 'Ce sera moy, madame, et je me monstreray digne d'estre son fils.' Depuis ce moment, Valentine oubliant la naissance illégitime de ce jeune prince, avait conçu pour lui une affection vraiment maternelle. On lui avait entendu dire au lit de la mort, et par une espèce de présentiment de la grandeur future de ce héros, 'Qu'il lui avoit esté emblé, et qu'il n'y avoit nul de ses enfans qui fust si bien taillé à venger la mort de son père.' Cette ardeur de vengeance l'entraîna même d'abord trop loin, et c'est à peu près l'unique reproche qu'on puisse faire à la jeunesse de ce guerrier. Il se vanta quelquefois, dans la première moitié de sa vie d'avoir immolé de sa main dix mille Bourguignons aux mânes de son père.' — Le Brun de Charmettes, T. i. 99.

² The following account of Joan of Arc is extracted from a history of the siege of Orleans, "prise de mot à mot, sans aucun changement de langage, d'un vieil exemplaire écrit a la main en parchemin, et trouvé en la maison de la dicte ville d'Orleans." — Troyes, 1621.

"Or en ce temps avoit une jeune fille au pais de Lorraine, agée de dix-huit ans ou environ, nommée Janne, natifue d'un paroisse nommée Domppe, fille d'un Laboureur nommé
 Jacques Tart; qui jamais n'avoit fait autre chose que garder les bestes aux champs, a la quelle, ainsi qu'elle disoit, avoit esté revelé que Dieu vouloit qu'elle alast devers le Roi
 Charles septiesme, pour luy aider et le conseiller a recouvrer son royaume et ses villes et places que les Anglois avoient conquises en ses pays. La quelle revelation elle n'osa dire ses pere, et mere, pource qu'elle sçavoit bien que jamais n'eussent consenty qu'elle y fust allée; et le persuada tant qu'il la mena devers un gentelhomme nommé Messire Robert de Baudricourt, qui pour lors estoit Capitaine de la ville ou

An old man's weakness. But, in truth, this Maid
 Hath with such boding thoughts impress'd my heart,
 I think I could not longer sleep in peace
 Gainsaying what she sought.² She saith that God
 Bids her go drive the Englishmen from France!
 Her parents mock at her, and call her crazed,
 And father Regnier says she is possess'd; . .
 But I, who know that never thought of ill
 Found entrance in her heart, . . for, good my Lord,
 From her first birth-day she hath been to me
 As mine own child, . . and I am an old man,
 Who have seen many moon-struck in my time,
 And some who were by evil Spirits vex'd, . .
 I, Sirs, do think that there is more in this.
 And who can tell but, in these perillous times,
 It may please God, . . but hear the Maid yourselves,
 For if, as I believe, this is of Heaven,
 My silly speech doth wrong it."

While he spake,

Curious they mark'd the Damsel. She appear'd
 Of eighteen years³; there was no bloom of youth

chateau de Vaucouleur, qui est assez prochain de la: auquel elle pria tres instantment qu'il la fist mener devers le Roy de France, en leur disant qu'il estoit tres necessaire qu'elle parlast a luy pour le bien de son royaume, et que elle luy feroit grand secours et aide a recouvrer son dict royaume, et que Dieu le vouloit ainsi, et que il luy avoit esté revelé par plusieurs fois. Des quelles parolles il ne faisoit que rire et se moquer et la reputoit incensee: toutes fois elle persevera
 tant et si longuement qu'il luy bailla un gentelhomme, nommé
 Ville Robert, et quelque nombre de gens, les quels la men-nerent devers le Roy que pour lors estoit a Chinon."

³ This agrees with the account of her age given by Holinshed, who calls her "a young wench of an eightene years old; of favour was she counted likesome, of person stronglie made and manlie, of courage great, hardie, and stout withall;
 an understander of counsels though she were not at them,
 greet semblance of chastitie, both of bodie and behaviour,
 the name of Jesus in hir mouth about all her businesses, humble, obedient, and fasting divers days in the weeke."
 — Holmeshead, 600.

De Serres speaks thus of her, "A young maiden named
 Joan of Arc, born in a village upon the Marches of Barre called Dompierre, neere to Vaucouleurs, of the age of eightene or twenty years, issued from base parents, her father was named James of Arc, and her mother Isabel, poore countrie folkes, who had brought her up to keep their cattell.
 She said with great boldnesse that she had a revelation how to succour the king, how he might be able to chase the English from Orleans, and after that to cause the king to be crowned at Rheims, and to put him fully and wholly in possession of his realme.

"After she had delivered this to her father, mother, and their neighbours, she presumed to go to the lord of Baudricourt, provost of Vaucouleurs; she boldly delivered unto him, after an extraordinary manner, all these great mysteries, as much wished for of all men as not hoped for: especially coming from the mouth of a poore countrie maide, whom they might with more reason beleve to be possessed of some melancholy humour, than divinely inspired; being the instrument of so many excellent remedies, in so desperat a season, after the vaine striving of so great and famous personages. At the first he mocked and reproved her, but having heard her with more patience, and judging by her temperate discourse and modest countenance that she spoke not idly, in the end he resolves to present her to the king for his discharge. So she arrives at Chinon the sixt day of May, attired like a man.

"She had a modest countenance, sweet, civil, and resolute; her discourse was temperate, reasonable, and retired,

Upon her cheek, yet had the lovellest hues
Of health with lesser fascination fix'd
The gazer's eye; for wan the Maiden was,
Of saintly paleness, and there seem'd to dwell
In the strong beauties of her countenance
Something that was not earthly.

"I have heard
Of this your niece's malady," replied
The Lord of Vaucouleur, "that she frequents
The loneliest haunts and deepest solitude,
Estranged from human kind and human cares
With loathing like to madness. It were best
To place her with some pious sisterhood,
Who duly morn and eve for her soul's health
Soliciting Heaven, may likeliest remedy
The stricken mind, or frenzied or possess'd."

So as Sir Robert ceased, the Maiden cried,
"I am not mad. Possess'd indeed I am!
The hand of God is strong upon my soul,
And I have wrestled vainly with the Lord,
And stubbornly, I fear me. I can save
This country, Sir! I can deliver France!
Yea... I must save the country!... God is in me;
I speak not, think not, feel not of myself;
He knew and sanctified me ere my birth;
He to the nations hath ordained me;
And whither He shall send me, I must go;
And whatsoever He commands, that I must speak;
And whatsoever is His will, that I must do;
And I must put away all fear of man,
Lest He in wrath confound me."

At the first
With pity or with scorn Dunois had heard
The maid inspired; but now he in his heart
Felt that misgiving which precedes belief
In what was disbelieved and scoff'd at late
For folly. "Damsel!" said the Chief, "methinks
It would be wisely done to doubt this call,
Haply of some ill Spirit prompting thee
To self-destruction."

"Doubt!" the Maid exclaimed,
"It were as easy when I gaze around
On all this fair variety of things,
Green fields and tufted woods, and the blue depth
Of heaven, and yonder glorious sun, to doubt
Creating wisdom! When in the evening gale
I breathe the mingled odours of the spring,
And hear the wild wood melody, and hear
The populous air vocal with insect life,
To doubt God's goodness! There are feelings, Chief,
Which cannot lie; and I have oftentimes
Felt in the midnight silence of my soul
The call of God."

They listen'd to the Maid,
And they almost believed. Then spake Dunois, her actions cold, shewing great chastity. Having spoken to the king, or noblemen with whom she was to negotiate, she presently retired to her lodging with an old woman that guided her, without vanity, affectation, babbling or courtly flatteries. These are the manners which the Original attributes to her."

Edward Grimeston, the translator, calls her in the margin,
"Joane the Virgin, or rather Witch."

"Then the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Before I formed thee in the belly, I knew thee; and before thou

"Wilt thou go with me, Maiden, to the King,
And there announce thy mission?" thus he said,
For thoughts of politic craftiness arose
Within him, and his faith, yet unconfirm'd,
Determined to prompt action. She replied,
"Therefore I sought the Lord of Vaucouleur,
That with such credence as prevents delay,
He to the King might send me. Now beseech you Speed our departure!"

Then Dunois address'd
Sir Robert, "Fare thee well, my friend and host!
It were ill done to linger here when Heaven
Vouchsafes such strange assistance. Let what force
Lorraine can raise to Chinon follow us;
And with the tidings of this holy Maid,
Sent by the Lord, fill thou the country; soon
Therewith shall France awake as from the sleep
Of death. Now Maid! depart we at thy will."

"God's blessing go with ye!" exclaimed old Claude,
"Good Angels guard my girl!" and as he spake
The tears stream'd fast adown his aged cheeks.
"And if I do not live to see thee more,
As sure I think I shall not, yet sometimes
Remember thine old Uncle. I have loved thee
Even from thy childhood Joan! and I shall lose
The comfort of mine age in losing thee.
But God be with thee, Child!"

Nor was the Maid,
Though all subdued of soul, untroubled now
In that sad parting; but she calm'd herself,
Painfully keeping down her heart, and said,
"Comfort thyself, my Uncle, with the thought
Of what I am, and for what enterprise
Chosen from among the people. Oh! be sure
I shall remember thee, in whom I found
A parent's love, when parents were unkind!
And when the ominous broodings of my soul
Were scoff'd and made a mock of by all else,
Thou for thy love didst hear me and believe.
Shall I forget these things?"... By this Dunois
Had arm'd, the steeds stood ready at the gate.
But then she fell upon the old man's neck
And cried, "Pray for me! I shall need thy prayers!
Pray for me, that I fall not in my hour!"
Thereat awhile, as if some awful thought
Had overpower'd her, on his neck she hung;
Then rising with flush'd cheek and kindling-eye,
"Farewell!" quoth she, "and live in hope! Anon
Thou shalt hear tidings to rejoice thy heart,
Tidings of joy for all, but most for thee!
Be this thy comfort!" The old man received
Her last embrace, and weeping like a child,
Scarcely through tears could see them on their steeds
Spring up, and go their way.

So on they went,

camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee, and I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations.

Then said I, Ah, Lord God, behold I cannot speak, for I am a child.

But the Lord said unto me, Say not I am a child, for thou shalt go to all that I shall send thee, and whatsoever I command thee, thou shalt speak.

Thou therefore gird up thy loins, and arise, and speak unto them all that I command thee: be not dismayed at their faces, lest I confound thee before them." — Jeremiah, chap. i.

And now along the mountain's winding path
Upward they journey'd slow, and now they paused
And gazed where o'er the plain the stately towers
Of Vaucouleur arose, in distance seen,
Dark and distinct; below its castled height,
Through fair and fertile pastures, the deep Meuse
Roll'd glittering on. Domremy's cottages
Gleam'd in the sun hard by, white cottages,
That in the evening traveller's weary mind
Had waken'd thoughts of comfort and of home,
Making him yearn for rest. But on one spot,
One little spot, the Virgin's eye was fix'd,
Her native Arc; embower'd the hamlet lay
Upon the forest edge, whose ancient woods,
With all their infinite varieties,
Now form'd a mass of shade. The distant plain
Rose on the horizon rich with pleasant groves,
And vineyards in the greenest hue of spring,
And streams now hidden on their winding way,
Now issuing forth in light.

The Maiden gazed
Till all grew dim upon her dizzy eye.
"Oh what a blessed world were this!" she cried,
"But that the great and honourable men
Have seized the earth, and of the heritage
Which God, the Sire of all, to all had given,
Disherited their brethren! Happy those
Who in the after-days shall live when Time
Hath spoken, and the multitude of years
Taught wisdom to mankind! . . . Unhappy France!
Fiercer than evening wolves thy bitter foes
Rush o'er the land, and desolate, and kill;
Long has the widow's and the orphan's groan
Accused Heaven's justice; — but the hour is come!
God hath inclined his ear, hath heard the voice
Of mourning, and his anger is gone forth."

1 "But as for the mighty man he had the earth, and the honourable man dwelt in it.

Days should speak, and multitude of years should teach wisdom." — Job.

2 While the English and French contend for dominion, sovereignty and life itself, men's goods in France were violently taken by the license of war, churches spoiled, men every where murdered or wounded, others put to death or tortured, matrons ravished, maids forcibly drawn from out their parents' arms to be deflowered; towns daily taken, daily spoiled, daily defaced, the riches of the inhabitants carried whither the conquerors think good; houses and villages round about set on fire, no kind of cruelty is left unpractised upon the miserable French, omitting many hundred kind of other calamities which all at once oppressed them. Add hereunto that the commonwealth, being destitute of the help of laws (which for the most part are mute in times of war and mutiny), floateth up and down without any anchorage at right or justice. Neither was England herself void of these mischiefs, who every day heard the news of her valiant children's funerals, slain in perpetual skirmishes and bickerings, her general wealth continually ebbing and wained, so that the evils seemed almost equal, and the whole western world echoed the groans and sighs of either nation's quarrels, being the common argument of speech and compassion through Christendom." — Speed.

3 When Montaigne saw it in 1580, the front of the house was covered with paintings representing the history of the Maid. He says, "Ses descendants furent annoblis par faveur du Roi, et nous monstrent les armes que le Roi leur donna,

Then said the Son of Orleans, "Holy Maid!
Fain would I know, if blameless I may seek Such knowledge, how the heavenly call was heard
First in thy waken'd soul; nor deem in me
Aught idly curious, if of thy past life
I ask the story. In the hour of age,
If haply I survive to see this realm
Deliver'd, precious then will be the thought
That I have known the delegated Maid,
And heard from her the wondrous ways of Heaven."

"A simple tale," the mission'd Maid replied;
"Yet may it well employ the journeying hour,
And pleasant is the memory of the past."

"See'st thou, Sir Chief, where yonder forest skirts
The Meuse, that in its winding mazes shows,
As on the farther bank, the distant towers
Of Vaucouleur? there in the hamlet Arc
My father's dwelling stands; a lowly hut,
Yet nought of needful comfort did it lack,
For in Lorraine there lived no kinder Lord
Than old Sir Robert, and my father Jaques
In flocks and herds was rich; a toiling man,
Intent on worldly gains, one in whose heart
Affection had no root. I never knew
A parent's love; for harsh my mother was,
And deem'd the care which infancy demands
Irksome, and ill-repaid. Severe they were,
And would have made me fear them; but my soul
Possess'd the germ of inborn fortitude,
And stubbornly I bore unkind rebuke
And angry chastisement. Yet was the voice
That spake in tones of tenderness most sweet
To my young heart; how have I felt it leap
With transport, when my Uncle Claude approach'd!

qui sont d'azur à un' espée droite couronnée et poigné d'or, et deux fleurs de lis d'or au côté de ladite espée; de quy un receveur de Vaucouleur donna un escusson peint à M. de Casels. Le devant de la maisonnette où elle naquit est toute peinte de ses gestes; mais l'age en a fort corrompu la peinture. Il y a aussi un arbre le long d'une vigne qu'on nomme l'arbre de la Pucelle, qui n'a nulle autre chose à remercier." — Voyages de Montaigne, t. p. 17.

"Ce n'était qu'une maisonnette; et cependant elle a subsisté jusqu'à nos jours, grâce au zèle national du maire et des habitants de Domremy, qui pendant les dernières années du gouvernement impérial, voyant qu'on refusait de leur allouer la somme nécessaire pour son entretien, y suppléèrent par une souscription volontaire; tant le respect et la vénération que les vertus inspirent, peuvent quelquefois prolonger la durée des monuments les plus simples et les plus fragiles." — Le Brun de Charmettes, T. I. 244.

It appears, however, that whatever might be the respect and veneration of the inhabitants for this illustrious heroine and martyr, they allowed the cottage in which she was born to be villainously desecrated, very soon after their national feeling had been thus praised. The author, whose book was published only in the second year (1817) after the overthrow of the Imperial Government, adds the following note to this passage: — "Depuis l'époque où ce passage a été écrit, il paraît que les choses sont fort changées. On lit ce qui suit dans le Narrateur de la Meuse: 'Les chambres où logèrent cette héroïne et ses parents sont converties en étables; des vils animaux occupent l'emplacement du lit de Jeanne d'Arc, son armoire vermoulue renferme des ustensiles d'écurie.'"

For he would take me on his knee, and tell
Such wondrous tales as childhood loves to hear,
Listening with eager eyes and open lips
Devoutly in attention. Good old man !
Oh ! if I ever pour'd a prayer to Heaven
Unhallow'd by the grateful thought of him,
Methinks the righteous winds would scatter it !
He was a parent to me, and his home
Was mine, when in advancing years I found
No peace, no comfort in my father's house.
With him I pass'd the pleasant evening hours,
By day I drove my father's flock afield, !
And this was happiness.

"Amid these wilds
Often to summer pasture have I driven
The flock ; and well I know these woodland wilds,
And every bosom'd vale, and valley stream
Is dear to memory. I have laid me down
Beside yon valley stream, that up the ascent
Scarcely sends the sound of waters now, and watch'd
The beck roll glittering to the noon-tide sun,
And listened to its ceaseless murmuring,
Till all was hush'd and tranquil in my soul,
Fill'd with a strange and undefined delight
That passed across the mind like summer clouds
Over the vale at eve : their fleeting hues
The traveller cannot trace with memory's eye,
Yet he remembers well how fair they were,
How beautiful.

"In solitude and peace
Here I grew up, amid the loveliest scenes
Of unpolluted nature. Sweet it was,
As the white mists of morning roll'd away,
To see the upland's wooded heights appear
Dark in the early dawn, and mark the slope
With purple-flowers glowing, as the sun illumed
Their golden glory ; with his deepening light ;
Pleasant at noon beside the vocal brook
To lay me down, and watch the floating clouds,
And shape to fancy's wild similitudes
Their ever-varying forms ; and oh how sweet !
To drive my flock at evening to the fold,
And hasten to our little hut, and hear
The voice of kindness bid me welcome home.

"Amid the village playmates of my youth
Was one whom ripen years approved a friend.
A gentle maid was my poor Madelon ;
I loved her as a sister, and long time
Her undivided tenderness possess'd,
Until a better and a holier tie
Gave her one nearer friend ; and then my heart
Partook her happiness, for never lived
A happier pair than Arnaud and his wife.

"Lorraine was call'd to arms, and with her youth,
Went Arnaud to the war. The morn was fair,

¹ "People found out a nest of miracles in her education," says old Fuller, "that so lion-like a spirit should be bred among sheep like David."

² It is said that when Linneus was in England he was more struck with the splendid appearance of the furze in blossom, than with any other of our native plants.—Mrs. Bray's Letters, i. 316.

³ "O Death, how bitter is the remembrance of thee to a man

Bright shone the sun, the birds sung cheerfully,
And all the fields seem'd joyous in the spring ;
But to Domremi wretched was that day,
For there was lamentation, and the voice
Of anguish, and the deeper agony
That spake not. Never can my heart forget
The feelings that shot through me, when the horn
Gave its last call, and through the cottage gate
The banner moved, and from the clinging arms
Which hung on them, as for a last embrace,
Sons, brethren, husbands, went.

"More frequent now
Sought I the converse of poor Madelon,
For now she needed Friendship's soothing voice.
All the long summer did she live in hope
Of tidings from the war ; and as at eve
She with her mother by the cottage door
Sat in the sunshine, if a traveller
Appear'd at distance coming o'er the brow,
Her eye was on him, and it might be seen
By the flush'd cheek what thoughts were in her heart,
And by the deadly paleness which ensued,
How her heart died within her. So the days
And weeks and months pass'd on ; and when the leaves
Fell in the autumn, a most painful hope
That reason own'd not, that with expectation
Did never cheer her as she rose at morn,
Still linger'd in her heart, and still at night
Made disappointment dreadful. Winter came,
But Arnaud never from the war return'd,
He far away had perish'd ; and when late
The tidings of his certain death arrived,
Sore with long anguish underneath that blow
She sunk. Then would she sit and think all day
Upon the past, and talk of happiness
That never could return, as though she found
Best solace in the thoughts which minister'd
To sorrow ; and she loved to see the sun
Go down, because another day was gone,
And then she might retire to solitude
And wakeful recollections, or perchance
To sleep more wearying far than wakefulness,
Dreams of his safety and return, and starts
Of agony ; so neither night nor day
Could she find rest, but pined and pined away.

"DEATH ! to the happy thou art terrible ;
But how the wretched love to think of thee,
Oh thou true comforter, the friend of all
Who have no friend beside ! By the sick bed
Of Madelon I sat, when sure she felt
The hour of her deliverance drawing near ;
I saw her eye kindle with heavenly hope,
I had her latest look of earthly love,
I felt her hand's last pressure. . . . Son of Orleans !
I would not wish to live to know that hour,
When I could think upon a dear friend dead, that liveth at rest in his possessions, unto the man that hath nothing to vex him, and that hath prosperity in all things ; yea unto him that is yet able to receive meat !

"O Death, acceptable is thy sentence unto the needy, and unto him whose strength faileth, that is now in the last age, and is vexed with all things, and to him that despaireth, and hath lost patience !" — Ecclesiasticus, xii. 1, 2.

And weep not; but they are not bitter tears, . . .
Not painful now; for Christ hath risen, first fruits
Of them that slept; and we shall meet again,
Meet, not again to part: the Grave hath lost
Its victory.

"I remember as her bier
Went to the grave, a lark sprung up aloft,
And soar'd amid the sunshine, carolling
So full of joy, that to the mourner's ear
More mournfully than dirge or passing bell.
The joyous carol came, and made us feel
That of the multitude of beings, none
But man was wretched.

"Then my soul awoke,
For it had slumber'd long in happiness,
And never feeling misery, never thought
What others suffer. I, as best I might,
Solaced the keen regret of Elinor;
And much my cares avail'd, and much her son's,
On whom, the only comfort of her age,
She center'd now her love. A younger birth,
Aged nearly as myself was Theodore,
An ardent youth, who with the kindest care
Had sooth'd his sister's sorrow. We had knelt
By her death-bed together, and no bond
In closer union knits two human hearts
Than fellowship in grief.

"It chanced as once
Beside the fire of Elinor I sat,
The night was comfortless, the loud blast howl'd,
And as we drew around the social hearth,
We heard the rain beat hard. Driven by the storm
A warrior mark'd our distant taper's light;
We heapt the fire, and spread the friendly board.
'Tis a rude night;' the stranger cried: 'safe housed
Pleasant it is to hear the pelting rain.
I too could be content to dwell in peace,
Resting my head upon the lap of love,
But that my country calls. When the winds roar,
Remember sometimes what a soldier suffers,
And think on Conrade.'

"Theodore replied,
'Success go with thee! Something we have known
Of war, and tasted its calamity;
And I am well content to dwell in peace,
Albeit inglorious, thanking the good God
Who made me to be happy.'

"Did that God,"
Cried Conrade, 'form thy heart for happiness,
When Desolation royally careers
Over thy wretched country? Did that God
Form thee for Peace when Slaughter is abroad.
When her brooks run with blood, and Rape, and Murder,

¹ Dreadful indeed must have been the miseries of the French from vulgar plunderers, when the manners of the highest classes were marked by hideous grossness and vices that may not be uttered.

"Of acts so ill examples are not good."

Sir William Alexander.

Yes, it may be right to justify the saying in the text by an extract from the notes to Andrew's History of Great Britain:
"Agriicola quilibet, sponsum juvenem acquisitus, ac in victis alicujus viri nobilis et præpotentis habitans, crudeli-tissime vexabatur. Nempe nunquam in ejus domum

Stalk through her flaming towns? Live thou in peace,
Young man! my heart is human: I must feel
For what my brethren suffer.' While he spake
Such mingled passions character'd his face
Of fierce and terrible benevolence,
That I did tremble as I listen'd to him.
And in my heart tumultuous thoughts arose
Of high achievements, indistinct, and wild,
And vast, . . . yet such they were as made me pant
As though by some divinity possess'd.

"But is there not some duty due to those
We love?" said Theodore; 'Is there an employ
More righteous than to cheer declining age,
And thus with filial tenderness repay
Parental care?'

"Hard is it," Conrade cried,
Ay, hard indeed to part from those we love;
And I have suffer'd that severest pang.
I have left an aged mother; I have left
One upon whom my heart has fasten'd all
Its dearest, best affections. Should I live
Till France shall see the blessed hour of peace,
I shall return; my heart will be content,
My duties then will have been well discharged,
And I may then be happy. There are those Who deem such thoughts the fancies of a mind
Strict beyond measure, and were well content,
If I should soften down my rigid nature
Even to inglorious ease, to honour me.
But pure of heart and high in self-esteem
I must be honour'd by myself: all else,
The breath of Fame, is as the unsteady wind
Worthless.'

"So saying from his belt he took
The encumbering sword. I held it, listening to him,
And witless what I did, half from the sheath
Drew forth its glittering blade. I gazed upon it,
And shuddering, as I touch'd its edge, exclaim'd
How horrible it is with the keen sword
To gore the finely-fibred human frame!
I could not strike a lamb.

"He answer'd me,
"Maiden, thou sayest well. I could not strike
A lamb! . . . But when the merciless invader
Spare not grey age, and mocks the infant's shriek
As it doth writhe upon his cursed lance,
And forces to his foul embrace the wife
Even where her slaughter'd husband bleeds to death,
Almighty God! I should not be a man
If I did let one weak and pitiful feeling
Make mine arm impotent to cleave him down.
Think well of this, young man! he cried, and took
The hand of Theodore; 'think well of this;

*irruens iste optimus, magnâ comitante catervâ, pretium ingens redemptionis exigeret, ac si non protinus solveret colonus, istum miserum in magna arca protrudens, venuste ac teneræ uxori suæ (super ipsam arcam prostratâ) vim vir nobilis adferret; voce exclamans horrenda, 'Audine Rustice!
jamjam, super hanc arcam constipratur dilecta tua sponsa!
atque peracto hoc scelere nefando relinquetur (horresco referens) suffocatione expirans maritus, nisi magno pretio sponsa nuper vitata liberationem ejus redimeret.'—J. de Paris.*

Let us add to this the detestable history of a great commander under Charles VII. of France, the bastard of Bour-

As you are human, as you hope to live
In peace, amid the dearest joys of home,
Think well of this ! You have a tender mother ;
As you do wish that she may die in peace,
As you would even to madness agonize
To hear this maiden call on you in vain
For help, and see her dragg'd, and hear her scream
In the blood-reeking soldier's lustful grasp,
Think that there are such horrors ! that even now,
Some city flames, and haply, as in Roan,

bon, who (after having committed the most execrable crimes during a series of years with impunity), was drowned in 1441, by the constable Richemont (a treacherous assassin himself, but a mirror of justice when compared to some of his contemporaries), on its being proved against him "Quod super ipsum maritum vi prostratum, uxori, frustra repugnanti, vim adulerat. Ensuite il avoit fait battre et découper le mari, tant que c'étoit pitié à voir." — Mém. de Richemont.

"The Prince of Wales was about a month, and not longer, before the city of Lymoges, and he did not assault it, but always continued mining. When the miners of the prince had finished their work, they said to him, 'Sir, we will throw down a great part of the wall into the moat whenever it shall please you, so that you may enter into the city at your ease, without danger.' These words greatly pleased the prince, who said to them, 'I chuse that your work should be manifested to-morrow at the hour of day-break.' Then the miners set fire to their mines the next morning as the prince had commanded, and overthrew a great pane of the wall, which filled the moat where it had fallen. The English saw all this very willingly, and they were there all armed and ready to enter into the town; those who were on foot could enter at their ease, and they entered and ran to the gate, and beat it to the earth, and all the barriers also; for there was no defence, and all this was done so suddenly, that the people of the town were not upon their guard. And then you might have seen the prince, the duke of Lancaster, the count of Canterbury, the count of Pembroke, Messire Guischart Dangle, and all the other chiefs and their people who entered in; and ruffians on foot who were prepared to do mischief, and to run through the town, and to kill men and women and children, and so they had been commanded to do. There was a full pitiful sight, for men and women and children cast themselves on their knees before the prince and cried 'mercy!' but he was so enflamed with so great rage, that he heard them not; neither man nor woman would he hear, but they were all put to the sword wherever they were found, and these people had not been guilty. I know not how they could have no pity upon poor people, who had never been powerful enough to do any treason. There was no heart so hard in the city of Lymoges which had any remembrance of God, that did not lament the great mischief that was there; for more than three thousand men and women and children were put to death that day; God has their souls, for indeed they were martyred. In entering the town a party of the English went to the palace of the bishop and found him there, and took him and led him before the prince, who looked at him with a murderous look (Jelonnesment), and the best word that he could say to him was that his head should be cut off, and then he made him be taken from his presence." — I. 235.

The crime which the people of Lymoges had committed was that of surrendering when they had been besieged by the duke of Berry, and in consequence turning French. And this crime was thus punished at a period when no versatility of conduct was thought dishonourable. The phrases tourner Anglois — tourner François — retourner Anglois, occur repeatedly in Froissart. I should add, that of all the heroes of this period the Black Prince was the most generous and the most humane.

Some famish'd babe on his dead mother's breast
Yet hangs and pulls for food !² . . . Woe be to those
By whom the evil comes ! And woe to him, . .
For little less his guilt, . . who dwells in peace,
When every arm is needed for the strife !

"When we had all betaken us to rest,
Sleepless I lay, and in my mind revolved
The high-soul'd warrior's speech. Then Madelon
Rose in remembrance; over her the grave

After the English had taken the town of Montreuil, the seigneur de Guillery, who commanded there, retired to the castle; and Henry V. threatened, unless he surrendered, to hang eleven gentlemen, taken in the town. These poor men intreated the governor to comply, for the sake of saving their lives, letting him at the same time know how impossible it was that his defence could be of any avail. He was not to be persuaded; and when they saw this, and knew that they must die, some of them requested that they might first see their wives and their friends. This was allowed: là y eut de piteux regrets au prendre congé, says Pierre de l'Anin, and on the following morning they were executed as Henry had threatened. The governor held out for fifteen days, and then yielded by a capitulation which secured himself. — (Coll. des Mémoires, t. v. p. 456.)

In the whole history of these dreadful times I remember but one man whom the cruelty of the age had not contaminated, and that was the Portuguese hero Nuno Alvares Pereira, a man who appears to me to have been a perfect example of patriotism, heroism, and every noble and lovely quality above all others of any age or country.

Atrocious, however, as these instances are, they seem as nothing when compared to the atrocities which the French exercised upon each other. When Soissons was captured by Charles VI. (1414) in person, "in regard to the destruction committed by the king's army (says Monstrelet), it cannot be estimated; for after they had plundered all the inhabitants, and their dwellings, they despoiled the churches and monasteries. They even took and robbed the most part of the sacred shrines of many bodies of saints, which they stripped of all the precious stones, gold and silver, together with many other jewels and holy things appertaining to the aforesaid churches. There is not a Christian but would have shuddered at the atrocious excesses committed by the soldiery in Soissons; married women violated before their husbands; young damsels in the presence of their parents and relatives; holy nuns, gentlewomen of all ranks, of whom there were many in the town; all, or the greater part, were violated against their wills by divers nobles and others, who after having satiated their own brutal passions, delivered them over without mercy to their servants; and there is no remembrance of such disorder and havoc being done by Christians, considering the many persons of high rank that were present, and who made no efforts to check them. There were also many gentlemen in the king's army who had relations in the town, as well secular as churchmen; but the disorder was not the less on that account." — Vol. iv. p. 31.

What a national contrast is there between the manner in which the English and French have conducted their civil wars ! Even in the wars of the Fronde, when all parties were alike thoroughly unprincipled, cruelties were committed on both sides which it might have been thought nothing but the strong feelings of a perverted religious principle could have given birth to.

² Holinshed says, speaking of the siege of Roan, "If I should rehearse how deerle dogs, rats, mice, and cats were sold within the towne, and how greedilie they were by the poore people eaten and devoured, and how the people dailie died for fault of food, and young infants laie sucking in the streets on their mother's breasts, being dead starved for hunger, the reader might lament their extreme miseries." — p. 566.

Had closed; her sorrows were not register'd
In the rolls of fame; but when the tears run down
The widow's cheek, shall not her cry be heard
In Heaven against the oppressor? will not God
In sunder smite the unmerciful, and break
The sceptre of the wicked? ¹ . . . Thoughts like these Possess'd my soul, till at the break of day
I slept; nor did my heated brain repose
Even then; for visions, sent, as I believe,
From the Most-High, arose. A high-tower'd town
Hemm'd in and girt with enemies, I saw,
Where Famine on a heap of carcases,
Half envious of the unutterable feast,
Mark'd the gorged raven clog his beak with gore.
I turn'd me then to the besieger's camp,
And there was revelry: a loud lewd laugh
Burst on mine ear, and I beheld the chiefs
Sit at their feast, and plan the work of death.
My soul grew sick within me; I look'd up,
Reproaching Heaven, . . . lo! from the clouds an arm
As of the avenging angel was put forth,
And from his hand a sword, like lightning, fell.

"From that night I could feel my burthen'd soul
Heaving beneath incumbent Deity.
I sat in silence, musing on the days
To come, unheeding and unseeing all
Around me, in that dreaminess of thought
When every bodily sense is as it slept,
And the mind alone is wakeful. I have heard
Strange voices in the evening wind; strange forms
Dimly discover'd throng'd the twilight air.
The neighbours wonder'd at the sudden change,
They call'd me crazed; and my dear Uncle too,
Would sit and gaze upon me wistfully,
A heaviness upon his aged brow,
And in his eye such sorrow, that my heart
Sometimes misgave me. I had told him all
The mighty future labouring in my breast,
But that the hour, methought, not yet was come.

"At length I heard of Orleans, by the foe
Walled in from human help: thither all thoughts
All hopes were turn'd; that bulwark beaten down,
All were the invaders. Then my troubled soul
Grew more disturb'd, and shunning every eye,
I loved to wander where the woodland shade

"The Lord will not be slack till he have smitten in sunder the loins of the unmerciful, till he have taken away the multitude of the proud, and broken the sceptre of the unrighteous." — Ecclesiasticus.

² In the Journal of Paris in the reigns of Charles VI. and VII. it is asserted that the Maid of Orleans, in answer to an interrogatory of the doctors, whether she had ever assisted at the assemblies held at the Fountain of the Fairies near Dompierre, round which the evil spirits dance, confessed that she had often repaired to a beautiful fountain in the county of Lorraine, which she named the good Fountain of the Fairies of our Lord. — From the notes to the English version of Le Grand's Religieuses.

³ Being asked whether she had ever seen any fairies, she answered no; but that one of her god-mothers pretended to have seen some at the Fairy-tree, near the village of Dompierre. — Rapin.

Was deepest, there on mightiest deeds to brood
Of shadowy vastness, such as made my heart
Throb loud: anon I paus'd, and in a state
Of half expectance, listen'd to the wind.

"There is a fountain in the forest call'd
The Fountain of the Fairies²: when a child
With a delightful wonder I have heard
Tales of the Elfin tribe who on its banks
Hold midnight revelry. An ancient oak,
The goodliest of the forest, grows beside;
Alone it stands, upon a green grass plat,
By the woods bounded like some little Isle.
It ever hath been deem'd their favourite tree,
They love to lie and rock upon its leaves,³
And bask in moonshine. Here the Woodman leads
His boy, and shewing him the green-sward mark'd
With darker circlets, says their midnight dance
Hath traced the rings, and bids him spare the tree.
Fancy had cast a spell upon the place
Which made it holy; and the villagers
Would say that never evil thing approach'd
Unpunish'd there. The strange and fearful pleasure
Which fill'd me by that solitary spring,
Ceased not in riper years; and now it woke Deeper delight, and more mysterious awe.

"A blessed spot! Oh how my soul enjoy'd
Its holy quietness, with what delight
Escaping from mankind I hasten'd there
To solitude and freedom! Thitherward
On a spring eve I had betaken me,
And there I sat, and mark'd the deep red clouds
Gather before the wind . . . the rising wind,
Whose sudden gusts, each wilder than the last,
Appear'd to rock my senses. Soon the night
Darken'd around, and the large rain-drops fell
Heavy; anon tempestuously the gale
Swept o'er the wood. Methought the thunder-shower
Fell with refreshing coolness on my head,
And the hoarse dash of waters, and the rush
Of winds that mingled with the forest roar,
Made a wild music. On a rock I sat,
The glory of the tempest fill'd my soul;
And when the thunders peal'd, and the long flash
Hung durable in heaven, and on my sight
Spread the grey forest, memory, thought, were gone,⁴

⁴ "In this representation which I made to place myself near to Christ (says St. Teresa), there would come suddenly upon me, without either expectation or any preparation on my part, such an evident feeling of the presence of God, as that I could by no means doubt, but that either he was within me, or else I all engulfed in him. This was not in the manner of a vision, but I think they call it Mystical Theology; and it suspends the soul in such sort, that she seems to be wholly out of herself. The Will is in act of loving, the Memory seems to be in a manner lost, the understanding, in my opinion, discourses not; and although it be not lost, yet it works not as I was saying, but remains as it were amazed to consider how much it understands." — Life of St. Teresa written by herself.

Teresa was well acquainted with the feelings of enthusiasm. I had, however, described the sensations of the Maid of Orleans before I had met with the life of the saint.

All sense of self annihilate, I seem'd
Diffused into the scene.

"At length a light
Approach'd the spring; I saw my Uncle Claude;
His grey locks dripping with the midnight storm,
He came, and caught me in his arms, and cried,
'My God! my child is safe!'

"I felt his words
Pierce in my heart; my soul was overcharged;
I fell upon his neck and told him all;
God was within me, as I felt, I spake,
And he believed.

"Ay, Chieftain! and the world
Shall soon believe my mission; for the Lord
Will raise up indignation and pour on't
His wrath, and they shall perish who oppress."¹

JOAN OF ARC.

THE SECOND BOOK.

And now beneath the horizon westering slow
Had sunk the orb of day: o'er all the vale
A purple softness spread, save where some tree
Its lengthen'd shadow stretch'd, or winding stream
Mirror'd the light of Heaven, still traced distinct
When twilight dimly shrouded all beside.
A grateful coolness freshen'd the calm air,
And the hoarse grasshoppers their evening song
Sung shrill and ceaseless², as the dews of night
Descended. On their way the travellers wend,
Cheering the road with converse, till at length
They mark a cottage lamp whose steady light
Shone through the lattice; thitherward they turn:
There came an old man forth; his thin grey locks
Moved to the breeze and on his wither'd face
The characters of age were written deep.
Them, louting low with rustic courtesy,
He welcomed in; on the white-ember'd hearth
Heap'd up fresh fuel, then with friendly care

¹ "Raise up indignation, and pour out wrath, and let them perish who oppress the people!"—Ecclesiasticus, xxxvi.

² The epithets shrill and hoarse will not appear incongruous to one who has attended to the grasshopper's chirp. Gazæus has characterised the sound by a word certainly accurate, in his tale of a grasshopper who perched upon St. Francis's finger, and sung the praise of God and the wonders of his own body in his vernacular tongue, St. Francis and all the grasshoppers listening with equal ecstacy.

Cicada

Canebat (ut sic offeram) cicadicè.

Pia Hilari Anglicani Gazæi.

Perhaps he remembered two lines in the Zantoneilla of the Macaronic poet,

*Sentis an quantæ cicigant Cigale,
Quæ mihi rumpunt cicigando testam.*

The marginal note says, "Cicigare, vox cicadæ vel cigalæ."

St. Francis laboured much in the conversion of animals. In the fine series of pictures representing his life, lately painted for the new Franciscan convent at Madrid, I recollect

Spread out his homely board, and fill'd the bowl
With the red produce of the vine that arch'd
His evening seat; they of the plain repast
Partook, and quaff'd the pure and pleasant draught.

"Strangers, your fare is homely," said their Host,
"But such it is as we poor countrymen
Earn with our toil, in faith ye are welcome to it!
I too have borne a lance in younger days;
And would that I were young again to meet
These haughty English in the field of fight;
Such as I was when on the fatal plain
Of Agincourt I met them."

"Wert thou then
A sharer in that dreadful day's defeat?"
Exclaim'd the Bastard: "Didst thou know the Lord
Of Orleans?"

"Know him?" cried the veteran,
"I saw him ere the bloody fight began
Riding from rank to rank, his beaver up,
The long lance quivering in his mighty grasp.
His eye was wrathful to an enemy,
But for his countrymen it had a smile
Would win all hearts. Looking at thee, Sir Knight,
Methinks I see him now; such was his eye,
Gentle in peace, and such his manly brow."

"No tongue but speaketh honour of that name!"
Exclaim'd Dunois. "Strangers and countrymen
Alike revered the good and gallant Chief.
His vassals like a father loved their Lord;
His gates stood open to the traveller;
The pilgrim when he saw his towers rejoiced,
For he had heard in other lands the fame
Of Orleans. . . And he lives a prisoner still!
Losing all hope because my arm so long
Hath fail'd to win his liberty!"

He turn'd

His head away, hiding the burning shame
Which flush'd his face. "But he shall live, Dunois,"
The mission'd Maid replied; "but he shall live
To hear good tidings; hear of liberty,
Of his own liberty, by his brother's arm
Achieved in well-won battle. He shall live
Happy, the memory of his prison'd years³

seeing him preach to a congregation of birds. Gazæus has a poem upon his instructing a ewe. His advice to her is somewhat curious:

*Vide ne arietes, neve in obvios ruas;
Cave devovendos foscuculos altaribus
Vel ore laceres, vel bifurcato pede,
Male feriatis felis instar, proterras.*

There is another upon his converting two lambs, whose prayers were more acceptable to God, Marot! says he, than your psalms. If the nun, who took care of them in his absence, was inclined to lie a-bed—

*Frater Agnus hanc beæ beæ suo
Devotus excitabat.
O agne jam non agne sed doctor bone!*

³ The Maid declared upon her trial, that God loved the duke of Orleans, and that she had received more revelations concerning him, than any person living, except the king.—Rapin.

Orleans, during his long captivity, "had learnt to court the fair ladies of England in their native strains." Among the

Shall heighten all his joys, and his grey hairs
Go to the grave in peace."

"I would fain live
To see that day," replied their aged host:

"How would my heart leap to behold again
The gallant generous chieftain! I fought by him,
When all our hopes of victory were lost,
And down his batter'd arms the blood stream'd fast
From many a wound. Like wolves they hemm'd us in,
Fierce in unhoped-for conquest: all around
Our dead and dying countrymen lay heap'd;
Yet still he strove; . . I wonder'd at his valour!
There was not one who on that fatal day
Fought traveller."

"Fatal was that day to France,"
Exclaim'd the Bastard: "there Alençon fell,
Valiant in vain; there D'Albert, whose mad pride
Brought the whole ruin on. There fell Brabant,
Vaudemont, and Marie, and Bar and Faquenbergh,
Our noblest warriors; the determin'd foe

Harleian MSS. is a collection of "love poems, roundels and songs," composed by the French prince during his confinement.

² This was the usual method of marshalling the bowmen. At Cressy "the archers stood in manner of an herse, about two hundred in front and but forty in depth, which is undoubtedly the best way of embattalling archers, especially when the enemy is very numerous, as at this time: for by the breadth of the front the extension of the enemies front is matched; and by reason of the thinness in flank, the arrows do more certain execution, being more likely to reach home."
— Barnes.

The victory at Poitiers is chiefly attributed to the herse of archers. After mentioning the conduct and courage of the English leaders in that battle, Barnes says, "but all this courage had been thrown away to no purpose, had it not been seconded by the extraordinary gallantry of the English archers, who behaved themselves that day with wonderful constancy, alacrity, and resolution. So that by their means, in a manner, all the French battails received their first foil, being by the barbed arrows so galled and terrified, that they were easily opened to the men of arms."

"Without all question, the guns which are used now-a-days are neither so terrible in battle, nor do such execution, nor work such confusion as arrows can do: for bullets being not seen only hurt when they hit, but arrows enrage the horse, and break the array, and terrify all that behold them in the bodies of their neighbours. Not to say that every archer can shoot thrice to a gunner's once, and that whole squadrons of bows may let fly at one time, when only one or two files of musqueteers can discharge at one once. Also, that whereas guns are useless when your pikes join, because they only do execution point blank, the arrows which will kill at random, may do good service even behind your men of arms. And it is notorious, that at the famous battle of Lepanto, the Turkish bows did more mischief than the Christian artillery. Besides it is not the least observable, that whereas the weakest may use guns as well as the strongest, in those days your lusty and tall yeomen were chosen for the bow, whose hose being fastened with one point, and their jackets long and easy to shoot

Fought for revenge, not hoping victory,
Desperately brave; ranks fell on ranks before them;
The prisoners of that shameful day out-summ'd
Their conquerors!"¹

"Yet believe not," Bertram cried,
"That cowardice disgraced thy countrymen!
They by their leaders' arrogance led on
With heedless fury, found all numbers vain,
All effort fruitless there; and badst thou seen,
Skilful as brave, how Henry's ready eye
Lost not a thicket, not a hillock's aid;
From his hersed bowmen how the arrows flew?²
Thick as the snow-flakes and with lightning force;
Thou wouldst have known such soldiers, such a chief,
Could never be subdued.

"But when the field
Was won, and they who had escaped the fight
Had yielded up their arms, it was foul work
To turn on the defenceless prisoners
The cruel sword of conquest."³ Girt around in, they had their limbs at full liberty, so that they might easily draw bows of great strength, and shoot arrows of a yard long beside the head." — Joshua Barnes.

³ During the heat of the combat, when the English had gained the upper hand, and made several prisoners, news was brought to king Henry that the French were attacking his rear, and had already captured the greater part of his baggage and sumpter-horses. This was indeed true, for Robinet de Bournonville, Riffart de Clamasse, Yaumbart d'Azincourt, and some other men at arms, with about six hundred peasants, had fallen upon and taken great part of the king's baggage, and a number of horses, while the guard was occupied in the battle. This distressed the king very much, for he saw that though the French army had been routed, they were collecting on different parts of the plain in large bodies, and he was afraid they would resume the battle: he therefore caused instant proclamation to be made by sound of trumpet, that every one should put his prisoners to death, to prevent them from aiding the enemy, should the combat be renewed. This caused an instantaneous and general massacre of the French prisoners, occasioned by the disgraceful conduct of Robinet de Bournonville, Yaumbart d'Azincourt, and the others, who were afterwards punished for it, and imprisoned a very long time by duke John of Burgundy, notwithstanding they had made a present to the count de Charolois of a most precious sword, ornamented with diamonds, that had belonged to the king of England. They had taken this sword, with other rich jewels, from king Henry's baggage, and had made this present, that in case they should at any time be called to an account for what they had done, the count might stand their friend. — Montreuil, vol. iv. p. 180.

When the king of England had on this Saturday begun his march towards Calais, many of the French returned to the field of battle, where the bodies had been turned over more than once, some to seek for their lords, and carry them to their own countries for burial, others to pillage what the English had left. King Henry's army had only taken gold, silver, rich dresses, helmets, and what was of value, for which reason the greater part of the armour was untouched, and on the dead bodies; but it did not long remain thus, for it was very soon stripped off, and even the shirts and all other parts of their dress were carried away by the peasants of the adjoining villages.

The bodies were left exposed as naked as when they came into the world. On the Saturday, Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, the corpses of many princes were well washed and raised, namely, the dukes of Brabant, Bar, and Alençon, the counts de Nevers, de Blamont, de Vaudemont, de Faulquemberge, the lord de Dampierre, Admiral sir Charles d'Al. breth, constable, and buried in the church of the Friars Minors

I to their mercy had surrender'd me,
When lo ! I heard the dreadful cry of death.
Not as amid the fray, when man met man,
And in fair combat gave the mortal blow ;
Here the poor captives, weaponless and bound,
Saw their stern victors draw again the sword,
And groan'd and strove in vain to free their hands,

And bade them think upon their plighted faith,
And pray'd for mercy in the name of God,
In vain : the King had bade them massacre,
And in their helpless prisoners' naked breasts
They drove the weapon. Then I look'd for death,
And at that moment death was terrible, . .
For the heat of fight was over ; of my home
I thought, and of my wife and little ones
In bitterness of heart. But the brave man,
To whom the chance of war had made me thrall,
Had pity, loosed my hands, and bade me fly.
It was the will of Heaven that I should live
Childless and old to think upon the past,
And wish that I had perish'd !"

The old man
Wept as he spake. "Ye may perhaps have heard
Of the hard siege that Roan so long endur'd.
I dwelt there, strangers ; I had then a wife,
And I had children tenderly beloved,
Who I did hope should cheer me in old age

at Hesdin. Others were carried by their servants, some to their own countries, and others to different churches. All who were recognised were taken away, and buried in the churches of their manors.

When Philippe count de Charolois heard of the unfortunate and melancholy disaster of the French, he was in great grief ; more especially for the death of his two uncles, the duke of Brabant and count de Nevers. Moved by compassion, he caused all that had remained exposed on the field of battle to be interred, and commissioned the abbot de Rous-sianville and the baillif of Alre to have it done. They measured out a square of twenty-five yards, wherein were dug three trenches twelve feet wide, in which were buried, by an account kept, five thousand eight hundred men. It was not known how many had been carried away by their friends, nor what number of the wounded had died in hospitals, towns, villages, and even in the adjacent woods ; but, as I have before said, it must have been very great.

This square was consecrated as a burying-ground by the bishop of Guines, at the command and as procurator of Louis de Luxembourg, bishop of Therouanne. It was surrounded by a strong edge of thorns, to prevent wolves or dogs from entering it, and tearing up and devouring the bodies.

In consequence of this sad event, some learned clerk of the realm made the following verses :

A chief by dolorous mischance oppress'd,
A prince who rules by arbitrary will,
A royal house by discord sore distress'd,
A council prejudiced and partial still,
Subjects by prodigality brought low,
Will fill the land with beggars, well we trow.
Nobles made noble in dame Nature's spite,
A timorous clergy feag, and truth conceal ;
While humble commoners forego their right,
And the harsh yoke of proud oppression feel :
Thus, while the people mourn, the public woe
Will fill the land with beggars, well we trow.
Ah feeble woe ! whose impotent commands
The very vassals boldly dare despise :

And close mine eyes. The tale of misery
May-hap were tedious, or I could relate
Much of that dreadful time."

The Maid replied,
Wishing of that devoted town to hear.
Thus then the veteran :

"So by Heaven preserved,
From the disastrous plain of Agincourt !
I speeded homewards, and abode in peace.
Henry, as wise as brave, had back to England²
Led his victorious army ; well aware
That France was mighty, that her warlike sons,
Impatient of a foreigner's command,
Might rise impetuous, and with multitudes
Tread down the invaders. Wisely he return'd,
For our proud barons in their private broils
Wasted the strength of France. I dwelt at home,
And with the little I possess'd content,
Lived happily. A pleasant sight it was
To see my children, as at eve I sat
Beneath the vine, come clustering round my knee,
That they might hear again the oft-told tale
Of the dangers I had past ; their little eyes
Would with such anxious eagerness attend
The tale of life preserved, as made me feel
Life's value. My poor children ! a hard fate
Had they ! But oft and bitterly I wish
That God had to his mercy taken me

Ah, helpless monarch ! whose enervate hands
And wavering counsels dare no high emprise,
Thy hapless reign will cause our tears to flow,
And fill the land with beggars, well we trow.

Johnes's Monstrelet, vol. iv. p. 195.

According to Pierre de Fenin, the English did not bury their own dead ; but their loss was so small that this is very unlikely. He says, "Après cette douloureuse journée, et que toutes les deux parties se furent retirées, Louys de Luxembourg, qui estoit Evesque de Terouanne, fit faire en la place où la bataille avoit esté donnée plusieurs charniers, où il fit assembler tous les morts d'un coste et d'autre, et là les fit enterrer ; puis il bénit la place, et la fit enclore de fortes hayes tout autour, pour la garantir du bestial."

After the battle of Agincourt Henry lodged at Maisoncelle ; "le lendemain au matin il en deslogea, et alla passer tout au milieu des morts qui avoient esté tuez en ce combat ; là il s'arresta grand espace de temps, et tirèrent ses gens encor des prisonniers hors du nombre des morts, qu'il emmenèrent avec eux." — Colt. des Mémoires, t. v. p. 384.

¹ Perhaps one consequence of the victory at Agincourt is not generally known. Immediately on his return Henry sent his legates to the council of Constance : "At this council, by the assent of all nations there present, it was authorised and ordained, that England should obtaine the name of a nation, and should be said one of the five nations that owe their devotion to the church of Rome, which thing untill that time men of other nations, for envy, had delayed and letted." — Stowe, Elmhams.

² Henry judged, that by fomenting the troubles of France, he should procure more certain and lasting advantages than by means of his arms. The truth is, by pushing the French vigorously, he ran the risk of uniting them all against him ; in which case, his advantages, probably, would have been inconsiderable ; but by granting them some respite, he gave them opportunity to destroy one another : therefore, contrary to every one's expectation, he laid aside his military affairs for near eighteen months, and betook himself entirely to negotiation, which afforded him the prospect of less doubtful advantages. — Rapin.

In childhood, for it is a heavy lot
To linger out old age in loneliness !

" Ah me ! when war the masters of mankind,
Woe to the poor man ! if he sow his field,
He shall not reap the harvest ; if he see
His offspring rise around, his boding heart
Aches at the thought that they are multiplied
To the sword ! Again from England the fierce foe
Came on our ravaged coasts. In battle bold,
Merciless in conquest, their victorious King
Swept like the desolating tempest round.
Dambieres submits ; on Caen's subjected wall
The flag of England waved. Roan still remain'd,
Embattled Roan, bulwark of Normandy ;
Nor unresisted round her massy walls
Pitch'd they their camp. I need not tell, Sir Knight,
How oft and boldly on the invading host
We burst with fierce assault impetuous forth,
For many were the warlike sons of Roan.¹
One gallant Citizen was famed o'er all
For daring hardihood pre-eminent,
Blanchard. He, gathering round his countrymen,
With his own courage kindling every breast,
Had made them vow before Almighty God²
Never to yield them to the usurping foe.

¹ " Yet although the armie was strong without, there lacked not within both hardie captains and manfull soldiers, and as for people, they had more than enough : for as it is written by some that had good cause to know the truth, and no occasion to erre from the same, there were in the cite at the time of the siege 310,000 persons. Dailie were issues made out of the cite at diverse gates, sometime to the losse of the one partie and sometimes of the other, as chances of warre in such adventures happen." — Holinshed, 566.

" Thus was the faire cite of Rouen compassed about with enemies, both by water and land, having neither comfort nor aid of king, dolphin, or duke. — Holinshed, 566.

King Henry of England marched a most powerful army, accompanied by a large train of artillery and warlike stores, in the month of June, before the noble and potent town of Rouen, to prevent the inhabitants and garrison from being supplied with new corn. The van of his army arrived there at midnight, that the garrison might not make any sally against them. The king was lodged at the Carthusian convent ; the duke of Gloucester was quartered before the gate of St. Hilzire ; the duke of Clarence at the gate of Caen ; the earl of Warwick at that of Martinville ; the duke of Exeter and earl of Dorset at that of Beauvalle : in front of the gate of the castle were the lord marshall and Sir John de Cornwall. At the gate leading to Normandy were posted the

Before the God of Hosts we made the vow :
And we had baffled the besieging power,
Had not the patient enemy drawn around
His wide intrenchments. From the watch-tower's top
In vain with fearful hearts along the Seine
We strain'd the eye, and every distant wave
Which in the sun-beam glitter'd, fondly thought
The white sail of supply. Alas ! no more
The white sail rose upon our aching sight ;
For guarded was the Seine, and our stern foe
Had made a league with Famine.³ How my heart
Sunk in me when at night I carried home
The scanty pittance of to-morrow's meal !
You know not, strangers, what it is to see
The asking eye of hunger !

" Still we strove,
Expecting aid ; nor longer force to force,
Valour to valour, in the fight opposed,
But to the exasperate patience of the foe,
Desperate endurance.⁴ Though with Christian zeal
Ursino would have pour'd the balm of peace
Into our wounds, Ambition's ear, best pleased
With the war's clamour and the groan of death,
Was deaf to prayer. Day after day pass'd on ;
We heard no voice of comfort. From the walls
Could we behold their savage Irish Kerns,⁵

earls of Huntingdon, Salisbury, Kyme, and the lord Neville, son to the earl of Westmoreland. On the hill fronting St. Catherine's were others of the English barons. Before the English could fortify their quarters, many sallies were made on them, and several severe skirmishes passed on both sides. But the English, so soon as they could, dug deep ditches between the town and them, on the top of which they planted a thick edge of thorns, so that they could not otherwise be annoyed than by cannon shot and arrows. They also built a jette on the banks of the Seine, about a cannon shot distant from the town, to which they fastened their chains, one of them half a foot under the water, another level with it, and a third two feet above the stream, so that no boats could bring provision to the town, nor could any escape from it that way. They likewise dug deep galleries of communication from one quarter to another, which completely sheltered them in them from cannon or other warlike machines." — Monstrelet, vol. v. p. 40.

⁴ " After he had prosecuted the siege of this place for some time, the cardinal Ursino repaired to his camp, and endeavoured to persuade him to moderate his terms, and agree to an equitable peace ; but the king's reply plainly evinced his determination of availing himself of the present situation of public affairs ; ' Do you not see,' said he, ' that God has brought me higher, as it were by the hand ? The throne of France may be said to be vacant ; I have a good title to that crown ; the whole kingdom is involved in the utmost disorder and confusion ; few are willing, and still fewer are able, to resist me. Can I have a more convincing proof of the interposition of heaven in my favour, and that the Supreme Ruler of all things has decreed that I should ascend the throne of France ? ' " — Hist. of England, by Hugh Clarendon.

The king of England had in his army numbers of Irish, the greater part of whom were on foot, having only a stocking

Ruffians half-clothed half-human, half-baptized,¹
Come with their spoil, mingling their hideous shouts
With moan of weary flocks, and piteous low
Of kine sore-laden, in the mirthful camp
Scattering abundance; while the loathliest food
We prized above all price; while in our streets
The dying groan of hunger, and the cries
Of famishing infants echoed . . . and we heard,
With the strange selfishness of misery,
We heard, and heeded not.

"Thou wouldst have deem'd
Roan must have fallen an easy sacrifice,
Young warrior! hadst thou seen our meagre limbs
And pale and shrunken cheeks, and hollow eyes;
Yet still we struggled bravely! Blanchard still Spoke of the obdurate temper of the foe,
Of Harfleur's wretched people driven out²
Houseless and destitute, while that stern King
Knelt at the altar³, and with impious prayer
Gave God the glory, even while the blood
That he had shed was reeking up to Heaven.
He bade us think what mercy they had found
Who yielded on the plain of Agincourt,
And what the gallant sons of Caen, by him,
In cold blood slaughter'd⁴: then his scanty food
Sharing with the most wretched, he would bid us
Bear with our miseries manfully.

"Thus press'd,
Lest all should perish thus, our chiefs decreed
Women and children, the infirm and old,
All who were useless in the work of war,
Should forth and take their fortune. Ah, that makes
The joys and sorrows of the distant years
Like a half-remember'd dream, yet on my heart and shoe on one leg and foot, with the other quite naked. They had targets, short javelins, and a strange sort of knives. Those who were on horseback had no saddles, but rode excellently well on small mountain horses, and were mounted on such paniers as are used by the carriers of corn in parts of France. They were, however, miserably accoutred in comparison with the English, and without any arms that could much hurt the French whenever they might meet them.

"These Irish made frequent excursions during the siege over Normandy, and did infinite mischiefs, carrying back to their camps large booties. Those on foot took men, and even children from the cradle, with beds and furniture, and placing them on cows, drove all these things before them, for they were often met thus by the French." — Monstrelet, v. p. 42.

The book from which this extract is taken wants the title. The title of the second part is, A Prospect of the most famous Parts of the World. Printed for William Humble, in Pope's Head Place. 1646.

² "Some writing of this yeelding up of Harfleur, doo in like sort make mention of the distresse whereto the people, then expelled out of their habitations, were driven: inasomuch as parents with their children, young maids, and old folke went out of the towne gates with heave harts (God wot), as put to their present shifts to seek them a new abode." — Holinshed, 530.

This act of barbarity was perpetrated by Henry, that he Leaves deep impress'd the horrors of that hour.

Then as our widow-wives clung round our necks,
And the deep sob of anguish interrupted
The prayer of parting, even the pious priest
As he implored his God to strengthen us,
And told us we should meet again in Heaven,
He groan'd and curs'd in bitterness of heart⁵
That merciless King. The wretched crowd pass'd on;
My wife . . . my children . . . through the gates they pass'd,

Then the gates closed . . . Would I were in my grave
That I might lose remembrance!

"What is man

That he can hear the groan of wretchedness
And feel no fleshly pang! Why did the All-Good
Create these warrior scourges of mankind,
These who delight in slaughter? I did think
There was not on this earth a heart so hard
Could hear a famish'd woman ask for food,
And feel no pity. As the outcast train
Drew near, relentless Henry bade his troops
Drive back the miserable multitude.⁶
They drove them to the walls; . . . it was the depth
Of winter, . . . we had no relief to grant.
The aged ones groan'd to our foe in vain,
The mother pleaded for her dying child,
And they felt no remorse!"

The mother and her babes! . . . and yet no lightning might people the town with English inhabitants. "This doth Anglorum prælia report, saying (not without good ground I believe), as followeth:

"Tum flentes tenera cum prole parentes
Virgineusque chorus veteres liquere penates:
Tum populus cunctus de portis Gallicis exit
Mœstus, inarmatus, vacuus, miser, æger, inopsque,
Utque novas sedes querat migrare coactus:
Oppidulo belli potiuntur jure Britanni!" — Holinshed.

There is a way of telling truth so as to convey falsehood. After the capture of Harfleur, Stowe says, "all the soldiers and inhabitants, both of the towne and towers, were suffered to go freely, unharmed, whither they would." 348. Henry's conduct was the same at Caen: he "commanded all women and children to be avoyded out of the towne, and so the towne was inhabited of new possessors." — Stowe.

³ Before Henry took possession of Harfleur, he went barefooted to the church to give God thanks. — De Serres.

⁶ "A great number of poor sille creatures were put out of the gates, which were by the Englishmen that kept the trenches beaten and driven back again to the same gates, which they found closed and shut against them, and so they laie betweene the wals of the citie and the trenches of the enemies, still crying for help and releefe for lack whereof great numbers of them dallie died." — Holinshed.

⁷ At this period, a priest of a tolerable age, and of clear un-

And he replied in mockery. On the wall
I stood and watch'd the miserable outcasts,
And every moment thought that Henry's heart,
Hard as it was, would melt. All night I stood, . .

derstanding, was deputed, by those besieged in Rouen, to the king of France and his council. On his arrival at Paris, he caused to be explained, by an Augustin doctor, named Eustace de la Paville, in presence of the king and his ministers, the miserable situation of the besieged. He took for his text, "Domine, quid faciemus?" and harangued upon it very ably and eloquently. When he had finished, the priest addressed the king, saying, "Most excellent prince and lord, I am enjoined by the inhabitants of Rouen to make loud complaints against you, and against you duke of Burgundy, who govern the king, for the oppressions they suffer from the English. They make known to you by me, that if, from want of being succoured by you, they are forced to become subjects to the king of England, you will not have in all the world more bitter enemies; and if they can, they will destroy you and your whole congregation." With these or with similar words did this priest address the king and his council. After he had been well received and entertained, and the duke of Burgundy had promised to provide succour for the town of Rouen as speedily as possible, he returned the best way he could to carry this news to the besieged.—Monstrelet, vol. v. p. 54.

One of the deputed citizens, "showing himself more rash than wise, more arrogant than learned, took upon him to show wherein the glorie of victorie consisted; advising the king not to show his manhood in farnishing a multitude of poore simple and innocent people, but rather suffer such miserable wretches as lay betwixt the walls of the citie and the trenches of his siege, to passe through the camp, that theie might get their living in other places; then if he durst manfully assault the place, and by force subdue it, he should win both worldlie fame, and merit great meed from the hands of Almighty God, for having compassion of the poore, needie, and indigent people. When this orator had said, the king with a fierce countenance and bold spirit, reproved them for their malapert presumption, in that they should seeme to go about to teach him what belouged to the dutie of a conqueror, and therefore since it appeared that the same was unknown to them, he declared that the goddesse of battell called Bellona had three hand-maidens, ever of necessitie attending upon her, as Blood, Fire, and Famine, and whereas it lay in his choice to use them all three, he had appointed onlie the meekest maid of those three damselfs to punish them of that citie till they were brought to reason. This answer put the French ambassador in a great studelesmus much at his excellent wit and hawtnesse of courage." — Holinshed.

While the court resided at Beauvais, four gentlemen and four citizens of Rouen were sent to lay before the king and council their miserable state; they told them that thousands of persons were already dead with hunger within their town; and that from the beginning of October, they had been forced to live on horses, dogs, cats, mice and rats, and other things unfit for human creatures. They had nevertheless driven full twelve thousand poor people, men, women and children, out of the place, the greater part of whom had perished wretchedly in the ditches of the town. That it had been frequently necessary to draw up in baskets new-born children from mothers who had been brought to bed in these ditches, to have them baptised, and they were afterwards returned to their mothers; many, however, had perished without christening

On all the busy turmoil of the world
I look'd with strange indifference; bearing want
With the sick patience of a mind worn out.
Nor when the traitor yielded up our town
Aught heeded I as through our ruin'd streets,
Through putrid heaps of famish'd carcasses,
The pomp of triumph pass'd. One pang alone
I felt, when by that cruel King's command

—all which things were grievous and pitiful to be related. They then added, "To you our Lord and king, and to you noble duke of Burgundy, the loyal inhabitants of Rouen have before made known their distress; they now again inform you how much they are suffering for you, to which you have not yet provided any remedy according to your promises. We are sent to you for the last time, to announce to you, on the part of the besieged, that if within a few days they are not relieved, they shall surrender themselves and their town to the English king, and thenceforward renounce all allegiance, faith, and service, which they have sworn to you." The king, duke, and council, courteously replied, that the king's forces were not as yet adequate to raise the siege, which they were exceedingly sorry for; but, with God's pleasure, they should very soon be relieved. The deputies asked by what time; the duke answered, before the fourth day after Christmas. They then returned to their town with difficulty, from the great danger of being taken by the besiegers, and related all that had passed.

The besieged now suffered the greatest distress; and it is impossible to recount the miseries of the common people from famine: it was afterwards known that upwards of fifty thousand had perished of hunger. Some, when they saw meat carried through the street, in despair ran to seize it, and so doing, allowed themselves to be severely beaten, and even wounded. During the space of three months no provisions were seen in the markets, but every thing was sold secretly: and what before the siege was worth a farthing, was sold for twenty, thirty, or even forty; but those prices were too high for the common people, and hence the great mortality I have mentioned. — Monstrelet, vol. v. p. 61.

² Roan was betrayed by its Burgundian governor Bouthellier. During the siege fifty thousand men perished through fatigue, want, and the use of unwholesome provisions.

The gallant Blanchard died¹: calmly he died,
And as he bow'd beneath the axe, thank'd God
That he had done his duty.

"I survive,
A solitary, friendless, wretched one,
Knowing no joy save in the certain hope
That I shall soon be gather'd to my sires,
And soon repose, there where the wicked cease²
From troubling, and the weary are at rest."

"And happy," cried the delegated Maid,
And happy they who in that holy faith
Bow meekly to the rod! A little while
Shall they endure the proud man's contumely,
The injustice of the great: a little while
Though shelterless they feel the wintry wind,
The wind shall whistle o'er their turf-grown grave,
And all be peace below. But woe to those,
Woe to the Mighty Ones who send abroad
Their ministers of death, and give to Fury
The flaming firebrand; these indeed shall live

⁴ "When all things necessary were prepared for the conveyance of the dead king into England, his body was laid in a chariot, which was drawn by four great horses: and above the dead corpse, they laid a figure made of boiled hides, or leather representing his person, as near to the semblance of him as could be devised, painted curiously to the similitude of a living creature; upon whose head was set an imperial diadem of gold and precious stones, on his body a purple robe furred with ermine, and in his right hand he held a sceptre royal, and in his left hand a ball of gold, with a cross fixed thereon. And in this manner adorned, was this figure laid in a bed in the said chariot, with his visage uncovered towards the heaven: and the coverture of his bed was red silk beaten with gold; and besides that, when the body should passe through any good towne, a canopy of marvellous great value was borne over the chariot by men of great worship. In this manner, accompanied of the king of Scots and of all princes, lords, and knights of his house, he was brought from Roane to Abville, where the corpse was set in the church of Saint Ulfrane. From Abville he was brought to Hedin, and from thence to Monstreuil, so to Bulloigne, and so to Calice. In all this journey were many men about the chariot clothed all in white, which bare in their hands torches burning: after whome followed all the household servants in blacke, and after them came the princes, lords, and estates of the king's blood, adorned in vestures of mourning; and after all this, from the said corpse the distance of two English myles, followed the queene of England right honourably accompanied. In this manner they entered Calice." — Sower.

"At about a league distant followed the queen, with a numerous attendance. From Calais they embarked for Dover, and passing through Canterbury and Rochester, arrived at London on Martinmas-day.

"When the funeral approached London, fifteen bishops dressed in pontificalibus, several mitred abbots and churchmen, with a multitude of persons of all ranks, came out to meet it. The churchmen chanted the service for the dead as it passed over London bridge, through Lombard street, to St. Paul's cathedral. Near the car were the relations of the late king, uttering loud lamentations. On the collar of the

Go to his grave. The long procession pass'd
Slowly from town to town, and when I heard
The deep-toned dirge, and saw the banners wave

first horse that drew the car were emblazoned the ancient arms of England; on that of the second, the arms of France and England quartered the same as he bore during his lifetime; on that of the third, the arms of France simply; on that of the fourth horse were painted the arms of the noble king Arthur, whom no one could conquer: they were three crowns or, on a shield azure.

"When the funeral service had been royally performed in the cathedral, the body was carried to be interred at Westminster abbey with his ancestors. At this funeral, and in regard to every thing concerning it, greater pomp and expense were made than had been done for two hundred years at the interment of any king of England; and even now as much honour and reverence is daily paid to his tomb, as if it were certain he was a saint in Paradise.

"Thus ended the life of king Henry in the flower of his age, for when he died he was but forty years old. He was very wise and able in every business he undertook, and of a determined character. During the seven or eight years he ruled in France, he made greater conquests than any of his predecessors had done: it is true he was so feared by his princes and captains, that none dared to disobey his orders, however nearly related to him, more especially his English subjects. In this state of obedience were his subjects of France and England in general; and the principal cause was, that if any person transgressed his ordinances, he had him instantly punished without favour or mercy." — Monstrelet, vol. v. p. 37b.

"A noble knight of Picardy used a joking expression to his herald respecting king Henry, which was afterwards often repeated. Sir Sarraasin d'Arly, uncle to the Vidame of Amiens, who might be about sixty years of age, resided in the castle of Achere, which he had had with his wife, sister to the lord d'Offemont, near to Pas in Artois. He was laid up with the gout, but very eager in his inquiries after news of what was going on. One day his pousuivant, named Haurenas, of the same age as himself, and who had long served him, returned from making the usual inquiries; and on Sir Sarraasin questioning him and asking him if he had heard any particulars of the death of the king of England, he said that he had, and had even seen his corpse at Abbeville, in the church of St. Ulfran; and then related how he was attired, nearly as has been before described. The knight then asked him on his faith if he had diligently observed him? On his answering that he had, 'Now, on thy oath, tell me,' added Sir Sarraasin, 'if he had his boots on?' 'No, my lord, by my faith he had not.' The knight then cried out, 'Haurenas, my good friend, never believe me if he has not left them in France!' This expression set the company a laughing, and then they talked of other matters." — Monstrelet, vol. v. p. 377.

JOAN OF ARC.

THE THIRD BOOK.

FAIR^d dawn'd the morning, and the early sun
 Pour'd on the latticed cot a cheerful gleam,
 And up the travellers rose, and on their way
 Hasten'd, their dangerous way¹, through fertile tracks
 Laid waste by war. They pass'd the Auxerrois;
 The autumnal rains had beaten to the earth²
 The unreap'd harvest; from the village church
 No even-song bell was heard; the shepherd's dog
 Prey'd on the scatter'd flock, for there was now
 No hand to feed him, and upon the hearth
 Where he had slumber'd at his master's feet
 Weeds grew and reptiles crawl'd. Or if they found
 Sometimes a welcome, those who welcomed them
 Were old and helpless creatures, lingering there
 Where they were born, and where they wish'd to die,

The place being all that they had left to love.
 They pass'd the Yonne, they pass'd the rapid Loire,
 Still urging on their way with cautious speed,
 Shunning Auxerre, and Bar's embattled wall,
 And Romorantin's towers.

So journeying on,
 Fast by a spring, which welling at his feet
 With many a winking crept along the mead,
 A Knight they saw, who there at his repast
 Let the west wind play round his ungirt brow.
 Approaching near, the Bastard recognis'd
 That faithful friend of Orleans, the brave chief
 Du Chastel; and their mutual greeting pass'd,

"Ils partirent, passèrent par l'Auxerrois sans obstacle quoique les Anglois en fussent les maîtres, traversèrent plusieurs rivières à la nage, entrèrent dans les pays de la domination du roi, où les parties ennemies couroient de tous côtés, sans en rencontrer aucune: arrivèrent heureusement à Chinon où le Roi étoit, et lui donnèrent avis de leur arrivée et du sujet qui les amenoit. Tout le monde fut extrêmement surpris d'un si long voyage fait avec tant de bonheur." — P. Daniel.

² Nil Gallia perturbatus, nil spoliatus, nil egentius esset; sed neque cum milite melius agebatur, qui tametsi gaudebat prædâ, interim tamen cruciäbatur passim, dum uterque rex civitates suas factionis principes in fide retinere studeret. Igitur jam cadum satietas utrumque populum ceperat, jamque tot damna utrinque illata erant, ut quisque generatim se oppressum, laceratum, perditum ingemisceret, dolore summo angeretur, disrumperetur, cruciaretur, ac per id animi quamvis obstinatissimi ad pacem inclinarentur. Simul urgebat ad hoc rerum omnium inopia; passim enim agri devastati inculti manebant, cum præsertim homines pro vitâ tuendâ, non arva colere sed bello servire necessariâ cogerentur. Ita tot urgentibus malis, neuter a pace abhorrebat, sed alter ab altero cum aut petere, vel admittere turpe putabat." — Polydore Vergil.

The effect of this contest upon England was scarcely less

They on the streamlet's mossy bank reclined
 Beside him, and his frugal fare partook,
 And drank the running waters.

"Art thou bound
 For the Court, Dunois?" exclaimed the aged Knight:
 "I thought thou hadst been far away, shut up
 In Orleans, where her valliant sons the siege Right loyally endure!"

"I left the town,"
 Dunois replied, "thinking that my prompt speed
 Might seize the enemy's stores, and with fresh force
 Re-enter. Falstolfe's better fate prevail'd,³
 And from the field of shame my maddening horse
 Bore me, an arrow having pierced his flank.
 Worn out and faint with that day's dangerous toll,
 My deep wounds bleeding, vainly with weak hand
 I check'd the powerless rein. Nor aught avail'd
 When heal'd at length, defeated and alone
 Again to enter Orleans. In Lorraine
 I sought to raise new powers, and now return'd
 With strangest and most unexpected aid
 Sent by high Heaven, I seek the Court, and thence
 To that beleaguer'd town shall lead such force,
 That the proud English in their fields of blood Shall perish."

"I too," Tanneguy reply'd,
 "In the field of battle once again perchance
 May serve my royal Master; in his cause
 My youth adventur'd much, nor can my age
 Find better close than in the clang of arms
 To die for him whom I have lived to serve.⁴
 Thou art for the Court. Son of the Chief I loved!
 Be wise by my experience. He who seeks Court-favour, ventures like a boy who leans

ruinous. "In the last year of the victorious Henry V. there was not a sufficient number of gentlemen left in England to carry on the business of civil government."

"But if the victories of Henry were so fatal to the population of his country, the defeats and disasters of the succeeding reign were still more destructive. In the 25th year of this war, the instructions given to the cardinal of Winchester and other plenipotentiaries appointed to treat about a peace, authorise them to represent to those of France "that there haan been moo men slayne in these wars for the title and claime of the coronne of France, of oon nacion and other, than been at this daye in both landys, and so much christiene blode shed, that it is to grette a sorow and an orroure to think or here it." — Henry. Rymer's Fœdera.

³ Dunois was wounded in the battle of Herrings, or Rouvral Saint-Denis.

⁴ Tanneguy du Châtel had saved the life of Charles when Paris was seized by the Burgundians. Lisle Adam a man noted for ferocity, even in that age, was admitted at midnight into the city with eight hundred horse. The partisans of Burgundy were under arms to assist them, and a dreadful slaughter of the Armagnacs ensued. Du Châtel, then governor of the Bastille, being unable to restrain the tumult, ran to the Louvre, and carried away the Dauphin in his shirt, in order to secure him in his fortress." — Rapin.

 That grow upon the sides of rocks, where they
 Who reach their fruit adventure must so far
 As to hazard their deep downfall." — Daniel.

A banish'd man, Dunols¹ ! so to appease
Richemont, who jealous of the royal ear,
With midnight murder leagues, and down the Loire
Sends the black carcass of his strangled foe.²
Now confident of strength, at the King's feet

"On the Wednesday before mentioned, they sent one named Seas de Courteheuze, valet de chambre to the king, and one of their accomplices, to the duke of Orleans, who had gone to visit the queen of France at an hotel which she had lately purchased from Montagu, grand master of the king's household, situated very near the Porte Barbette. She had lain in there of a child, which had died shortly after its birth, and had not then accomplished the days of her purification.

"Seas, on his seeing the duke, said, by way of deceiving him, 'My lord, the king sends for you, and you must instantly hasten to him, for he has business of great importance to you and him, which he must communicate to you.' The duke, on hearing this message, was eager to obey the king's orders, although the monarch knew nothing of the matter, and immediately mounted his mule, attended by two esquires on one horse, and four or five valets on foot, who followed behind bearing torches; but his other attendants made no haste to follow him. He had made this visit in a private manner, notwithstanding at this time he had within the city of Paris six hundred knights and esquires of his retinue, and at his expense.

"On his arrival at the Porte Barbette, the eighteen men, all well and secretly armed, were waiting for him, and were lying in ambush under shelter of a penthouse. The night was pretty dark, and as they sallied out against him, one cried out, 'Put him to death!' and gave him such a blow on the wrist with his battle-axe as severed it from his arm.

"The duke, astonished at this attack, cried out, 'I am the duke of Orleans!' when the assassins, continuing their blows, answered, 'You are the person we were looking for.' So many rushed on him that he was struck off his mule, and his skull was split that his brains were dashed on the pavement. They turned him over and over, and massacred him that he was very soon completely dead. A young esquire, a German by birth, who had been his page, was murdered with him: seeing his master struck to the ground, he threw himself on his body to protect him, but in vain, and he suffered for his generous courage. The horse which carried the two esquires that preceded the duke, seeing so many armed men advance,

He stabs the King's best friends, and then demands,
As with a conqueror's imperious tone,
The post of honour. Son of that good Duke
Whose death my arm avenged³, may all thy days
Be happy: serve thy country in the field,

began to snort, and when he passed them set out on a gallop, so that it was some time before he could be checked.

"When the esquires had stopped their horse, they saw their lord's mule following them full gallop: having caught him, they fancied the duke must have fallen, and were bringing it back by the bridle; but on their arrival where their lord lay, they were menaced by the assassins, that if they did not instantly depart they should share his fate. Seeing their lord had been thus basely murdered, they hastened to the hotel of the queen, crying out, 'Murder!' Those who had killed the duke, in their turn, bawled out, 'Fire!' and they had arranged their plan that while some were assassinating the duke, others were to set fire to their lodgings. Some mounted on horseback, and the rest on foot made off as they could, throwing behind them broken glass and sharp points of iron to prevent their being pursued.

"Report said that many of them went the back way to the hôtel d'Artois, to their master the duke of Burgundy, who had commanded them to do this deed, as he afterwards publicly confessed, to inform him of the success of their murder; when instantly afterward they withdrew to places of safety.

"The chief of these assassins, and the conductor of the business, was one called Rollet d'Auctonville, a Norman, whom the duke of Orleans had a little before deprived of his office of commissioner of taxes, which the king had given to him at the request of the late duke of Burgundy: from that time the said Rollet had been considering how he could revenge himself on the duke of Orleans. His other accomplices were William Courteheuze and Seas Courteheuze, before mentioned, from the country of Guines, John de la Motte, and others, to the amount of eighteen.

"Within half an hour the household of the duke of Orleans, hearing of this horrid murder, made loud complaints, and with great crowds of nobles and others hastened to the fatal spot, where they found him lying dead in the street. His knight and esquires, and in general all his dependants, made grievous lamentations, seeing him thus wounded and disfigured. With many groans they raised the body and carried it to the hotel of the lord de Rieux, marshal of France, which was hard by; and shortly afterward the body was covered with a white pall, and conveyed most honourably to the Guillemins, where it lay, as being the nearest church to where the murder had been committed.

"Soon afterward the king of Sicily, and many other princes, knights and esquires, having heard of this foul murder of the only brother of the king of France, came with many tears to visit the body. It was put into a leaden coffin, and the monks of the church, with all the late duke's household, watched it all night, saying prayers, and singing psalms over it. On the morrow his servants found the hand which had been cut off, and collected much of the brains that had been scattered over the street, all of which were inclosed in a leaden case and placed by the coffin.

"The whole of the princes who were at Paris, except the king and his children, namely, the king of Sicily, the dukes of Berry, Burgundy and Bourbon, the marquis du Pont, the counts de Nevors, de Clermont, de Vendôme, de St. Pol, de Dammartin, the constable of France, and several others, having assembled with a large body of the clergy and nobles, and a multitude of the citizens of Paris, went in a body to the church of the Guillemins. Then the principal officers of the late duke's household took the body and bore it out of the church, with a great number of lighted torches carried by the esquires of the defunct. On each side of the body were in due order, uttering groans and shedding tears, the king of Sicily, the dukes of Berry, Burgundy, and Bourbon, each

But in the hour of peace amid thy friends
Dwell thou without ambition."

So he spake.

But when the Bastard told his wondrous tale,
How interposing Heaven had its high aid
Vouchsafed to France, the old man's eyes flash'd fire,
And rising from the bank, his ready steed
That grazed beside he mounted. "Farewell friend,
And thou, the Delegate of Heaven!" he cried.
"I go to do my part, and we shall meet
At Orleans." Saying thus, he spur'd away.

holding a corner of the pall. After the body followed the other princes, the clergy and barons, according to their ranks, recommending his soul to his Creator; and thus they proceeded with it to the church of the Cistercians. When a most solemn service had been performed, the body was interred in a beautiful chapel he himself had founded and built. After the service all the princes, and others who had attended it, returned to their homes." — Monstrelet, vol. i. p. 192.

"About four o'clock on the 12th day of June, the populace of Paris rose to the amount of about sixty thousand, fearing (as they said) that the prisoners would be set at liberty, although the new provost of Paris and other lords assured them to the contrary. They were armed with old mallets, hatchets, staves and other disorderly weapons, and paraded through the streets shouting, 'Long live the king and the duke of Burgundy!' toward the different prisons in Paris, namely, the Palace, St. Magliore, St. Martin des Champs, the Chatelet, the Temple, and to other places wherein any prisoners were confined. They forced open all their doors, and killed Chepier and Chepiere, with the whole of the prisoners, to the amount of sixteen hundred or thereabouts, the principal of whom were the count de Armagnac, constable of France, master Henry de Marle, chancellor to the king, the bishops of Coutances, of Bayeux, of Evreux, of Senlis, of Saintes, the count de Grand-Pre, Raymonnet de la Guerre, the abbot de St. Conille de Compiegne, sir Hector de Chartres, sir Enguerrand de Marcolnet, Charlot Poupert, master of the king's wardrobe, the members of the courts of justice and of the treasury, and in general all they could find: among the number were several even of the Burgundian party confined for debt.

"In this massacre several women were killed, and left on the spot where they had been put to death. This cruel butchery lasted until ten o'clock in the morning of the following day. Those confined in the grand Chatelet, having arms, defended themselves valiantly, and slew many of the populace; but on the morrow, by means of fire and smoke, they were conquered, and the mob made many of them leap from the battlements of the towers, when they were received on the points of the spears of those in the streets, and cruelly mangled. At this dreadful business were present the new provost of Paris, sir John de Luxembourg, the lord de Fosseaux, the lord de l'Isle-Adam, the vidame of Amiens, the lord de Chevreuse, the lord de Chastellus, the lord de Cohen, sir James de Harcourt, sir Edmond de Lombers, the lord d'Artois, and others, to the amount of upward of a thousand combatants, armed and on horseback, ready to defend the murderers should there be any necessity. Many were shocked and astonished at such cruel conduct; but they dared not say any thing except, 'Well, my boys!' The bodies of the constable, the chancellor, and of Raymonnet de la Guerre were stripped naked, tied together with a cord, and dragged for three days by the blackguards of Paris through the streets; the body of the constable had the breadth of two fingers of his skin cut off crosswise, like to a bend in heraldry, by way of derision: and they were thus publicly exposed quite naked to the sight of all; on the fourth day they were dragged out of Paris on a hurdle, and buried with the others in a ditch called la Louviere.

They journey on their way till Chignon's towers
Rose on the distant view; the royal seat
Of Charles, while Paris with her servile sons,
A headstrong, mutable, ferocious race,
Bow'd to the invader's yoke; City even then
Above all Cities noted for dire deeds!
Yet doom'd to be the scene of blacker guilt,
Opprobrium more enduring, crimes that call'd
For heavier vengeance, than in those dark days
When the Burgundian faction fill'd thy streets
With carnage. Twice hast thou since then been made

"Notwithstanding the great lords after this took much pains to pacify the populace, and remonstrated with them, that they ought to allow the king's justice to take its regular course against offenders, they would not desist, but went in great crowds to the houses of such as had favoured the Armagnacs, or of those whom they disliked, and killed them without mercy, carrying away all they could find. In these times it was enough if one man hated another at Paris, of whatever rank he might be, Burgundian or not, to say, 'There goes an Armagnac,' and he was instantly put to death without further inquiry being made." — Monstrelet, vol. v. p. 20.

"To add to the tribulations of these times the Parisians again assembled in great numbers, as they had before done, and went to all the prisons in Paris, broke into them, and put to death full three hundred prisoners, many of whom had been confined there since the last butchery. In the number of those murdered were sir James de Mommor, and Sir Louis de Corail, chamberlain to the king, with many nobles and churchmen. They then went to the lower court of the bastille of St. Anthony, and demanded that six prisoners, whom they named, should be given up to them, or they would attack the place: in fact, they began to pull down the wall of the gate, when the duke of Burgundy, who lodged near the bastille, vexed to the heart at such proceedings, to avoid worse, ordered the prisoners to be delivered to them, if any of their leaders would promise that they should be conducted to the Chatelet prison, and suffered to be punished according to their deserts by the king's court of justice. Upon this they all departed, and by way of glossing over their promise, they led the prisoners near to the Chatelet, when they put them to death, and stripped them naked. They then divided into several large companies and paraded the streets of Paris, entering the houses of many who had been Armagnacs, plundering and murdering all without mercy. In like manner as before, when they met any person they disliked, he was slain instantly; and their principal leader was Cappeluche, the hangman of the city of Paris.

"The duke of Burgundy, alarmed at these insurrections, sent for some of the chief citizens, with whom he remonstrated on the consequences these disturbances might have. The citizens excused themselves from being any way concerned, and said they were much grieved to witness them: they added, they were all of the lowest rank, and had thus risen to pillage the more wealthy; and they required the duke to provide a remedy by employing these men in his wars. It was then proclaimed, in the names of the king and the duke of Burgundy, under pain of death, that no person should tumultuously assemble, nor any more murders or pillage take place; but that such as had of late risen in the insurrection should prepare themselves to march to the sieges of Montlehery and Marcoussin, now held by the king's enemies. The commonalty made reply, that they would cheerfully do so if they had proper captains appointed to lead them.

"Within a few days, to avoid similar tumults in Paris, six thousand of the populace were sent to Montlehery under the command of the lord de Cohen, sir Walter de Ruppes and sir Walter Raillart, with a certain number of men at arms, and store of cannon and ammunition sufficient for a siege. These

A horror and a warning to all lands;
When kingly power conspired with papal craft
To plot and perpetrate that massacre,
Which neither change of kalendar, nor lapse
Of time, shall hide from memory, or efface;
And when in more enlighten'd days, . . so deem'd,
So vaunted, . . the astonish'd nations saw
A people, to their own devices left,
Therefore as by judicial frenzy stricken,
Lawless and godless, fill the whole wide realm
With terror, and with wickedness and woe, . .
A more astounding judgement than when Heaven
Shower'd on the cities of the accursed plain
Its fire and sulphur down.

In Paris now
The Invader triumph'd. On an infant's head
Had Bedford placed the crown of Charlemagne.
And factious nobles bow'd the subject knee,
And own'd an English infant for their King,
False to their own liege Lord.

"Beloved of Heaven,"
Then said the Son of Orleans to the Maid,
"Lo these the walls of Chinon, this the abode
Of Charles our monarch. Here in revelry
He of his armies vanquish'd, his fair towns
Subdued, hears careless and prolongs the dance.
And little marvel I that to the cares
Of empire still he turns the unwilling ear,
For loss on loss, defeat upon defeat,
His strong holds taken, and his bravest Chiefs
Or slain or captured, and the hopes of youth
All blasted have subdued the royal mind
Undisciplined in Fortitude's stern school.
So may thy voice arouse his sleeping virtue!"

knights led them to Montlehery, where they made a sharp attack on the Dauphinois within the castle.

"The Duke of Burgundy, after their departure, arrested several of their accomplices, and the principal movers of the late insurrection, some of whom he caused to be beheaded, others to be hanged or drowned in the Seine; even their leader Cappeluche, the hangman, was beheaded in the market-place. When news of this was carried to the Parisians who had been sent to Montlehery, they marched back to Paris to raise another rebellion, but the gates were closed against them, so that they were forced to return to the siege."

Monstrelet, vol. v. p. 47.

To what is it owing that four centuries should have made so little difference in the character of the Parisians?

"Charles, in despair of collecting an army which should dare to approach the enemy's entrenchments, not only gave the city of Orleans for lost, but began to entertain a very dismal prospect with regard to the general state of his affairs. He saw that the country in which he had hitherto, with great difficulty, subsisted, would be laid entirely open to the invasion of a powerful and victorious enemy, and he already entertained thoughts of retiring with the remains of his forces into Languedoc and Dauphiny, and defending himself as long as possible in those remote provinces. But it was fortunate for this good prince, that as he lay under the dominion of the fair, the women whom he consulted had the spirit to support his sinking resolution in this desperate extremity. Mary of Anjou, his queen, a princess of great merit and prudence, vehemently opposed this measure, which she foresaw would discourage all his partizans, and serve as a general signal for deserting a prince who scorned himself to despair of success; his mistress too, the fair Agnes Sorrel, who lived in entire amity with the queen, seconded all her remonstrances." — Hume.

The mission'd Maid replied, "Do thou, Dunois,
Announce my mission to the royal ear.
I on the river's winding bank the while
Will roam, collecting for the interview
My thoughts, though firm, yet troubled. Who

Achievements of great import will perforce

On the banks of Vienne
Devious the Damsel turn'd, while through the gate
The Son of Orleans press'd with hasty step
To seek the King. Him from the public view
He found secluded with his blameless Queen,
And his partaker of the unlawful bed,
The lofty-minded Agnes.

"Son of Orleans!"
So as he enter'd cried the haughty fair,
Thou art well come to witness the disgrace,
The weak, unmanly, base despondency
Of this thy Sovereign Liege. He will retreat
To distant Dauphiny¹, and fly the war!
Go then, unworthy of thy rank! retreat
To distant Dauphiny, and fly the war,
Recreant from battle! I will not partake
A fugitive's fate; when thou hast lost thy crown
Thou loest Agnes. — Do'st not blush, Dunois!
To bleed in combat for a Prince like this,
Fit only like the Merovingian race
On a May morning deck'd with flowers², to mount
His gay-bedizen'd car, and ride abroad
And make the multitude a holiday.
Go, Charles! and hide thee in a woman's garb,
And these long locks will not disgrace thee then!"³

"L'on fait honneur à la belle Agnès Sorrel, Demoiselle de Touraine, maîtresse de ce Prince, d'avoir beaucoup contribué à l'encourager en cette occasion. On lui fait cet honneur principalement au sujet d'un quatrain rapporté par Saint Gelais, comme ayant été fait par le Roi François I. à l'honneur de cette Demoiselle.

"Plus de louange et d'honneur tu mérites,
La cause étant de France recouvrer.
Que ce que peut dedans un Cloître couvrir Claustré Nonnain, ou bien dévot Hermite." — P. Daniel.

"Here in this first race you shall see our kings but once a year, the first day of May, in their chariots deckt with flowers and greens, and drawn by four oxen. Whoso hath occasion to treat with them let him seek them in their chambers, amidst their delights. Let him talk of any matters of state, he shall be sent to the Maire." — De Serres.

Fuller calls this race "a chain of idle kings, well linked together, who gave themselves over to pleasure privately, never coming abroad, but only on May-day they showed themselves to the people, riding in a chariot, adorned with flowers, and drawn with oxen, slow cattle, but good enough for so lazy a luggage." — Holy Warre.

"Ces Rois hideux en longue barbe epousee,
En longs cheveux, ornes, presse sur presse,
De chaînes d'or et de carquois graves,
Hauts dans un char en triomphe eleves,
Une fois l'an se feront voir en pompe
Enfies d'un fard qui le vulgaire trompe." — Ronsard.

"Long hair was peculiar to the kings in the first ages of the French monarchy. When Fredegonda had murthered Clovis and thrown him into the river, the fisherman who found his body knew it by the long hair." — Macray.

"Nay, Agnes!" Charles replied, "reproach me not! I have enough of sorrow. Look around, See this fair country ravaged by the foe, My strong holds taken, and my bravest friends Fallen in the field, or captives far away. Dead is the Douglas; cold thy gallant heart, Illustrious Buchan! ye from Scotland's hills, Not flinching of your old ally distress'd, Came to thy succour; in his cause ye fought, For him ye perish'd. Rash impetuous Narbonne! Thy mangled corse waves to the winds of Heaven.¹ Cold, Gravelle, is thy sinewy arm in death; Fallen is Ventadour; silent in the grave Rambouillet sleeps. Bretagne's unfaithful chief Leagues with my foes; and Richemont², or in arms Defies my weak controul, or from my side, A friend more dreaded than the enemy, Scares my best servants with the assassin's sword. Soon must beleagu'rd Orleans fall. — But now A truce to these sad thoughts! We are not yet So utterly despoil'd but we can spread The friendly board, and giving ther, Dunois, Such welcome as befits thy father's son, Win from our public cares a day for joy.

Dunois replied, "So may thy future years Pass from misfortune free, as all these ills Shall vanish like a vision of the night! I come to thee the joyful messenger Of aid from Heaven; for Heaven hath delegated A humble Maiden to deliver France. That holy Maiden asks an audience now; And when she promises miraculous things, I feel it is not possible to hear And disbelieve."

I should have smiled, Dunois," the King replied; "But thy known worth, and the tried loyalty Of thy father's house, compel me even to this To lend a serious ear. A woman sent To rescue us, when all our strength hath fall'd! A humble Maiden to deliver France! One whom it were not possible to hear, And disbelieve!.. Dunois, ill now be seems Aught wild and hazardous. And yet our state Being what it is, by miracle alone Deliverance can be hoped for. Is my person Known to this woman?"

"That it cannot be, Unless it be by miracle made known," Dunois replied; "for she hath never left Her native hamlet in Lorraine till now."

"Here then," rejoind'd the King, "we have a test Easy, and safe withal. Abide thou here; And hither by a speedy messenger Summon the Prophetess. Upon the throne Let some one take his seat and personate My presence, while I mingle in the train. If she indeed be by the Spirit moved, That Spirit, certes, will direct her eyes To the true Prince whom she is sent to serve; But if she prove, as likeliest we must deem, One by her own imaginations crazed, Thus falling and convinced, she may return Unblamed to her obscurity, and we Be spared the shame of farther loss incur'd By credulous faith. Well might the English scoff,³ If on a frantic woman we should rest Our last reliance." Thus the King resolved, And with a faith half-faltering at the proof, Dunois dispatch'd a messenger, to seek Beside the banks of Vienne, the mission'd Maid.

At a later period the custom seems to have become general. Pasquier says, "lors de mon jeune age nul n'estoit tondû, fors les moines. Advint par mesadventure que le roy François premier de ce nom, ayant esté fortuitement blessé à la teste d'un tizon, par le capitaine Lorges, sieur de Montgoumery, les medecins furent d'avis de la tondre. Depuis il ne porta plus longs cheveux, estant le premier de nos roys, qui par un sinistre augure degenera de ceste venerable ancienneté. Sur son exemple, les princes premierement, puis les gentilhommes, et finalement tous les subjects se voulurent former, il ne fut pas que les Prestres ne se messent de ceste partie. Sur la plus grande partie du regne de François premier, et devant, chacun portoit longue chevelure, et barbe ras, où maintenant chacun est tondû, et porte longue barbe."

connétable, jointe à sa fermeté naturelle, lui donna moyen de tenir la main à l'observation des ordonnances publiées par le roi pour la discipline militaire; et les exemples de sévérité qu'il fit à cet égard, lui firent donner le surnom de justicier. Étant devenu duc de Bretagne, quelques Seigneurs de sa Cour lui conseillèrent de se démettre de sa charge de connétable, comme d'une dignité qui étoit au-dessous de lui. Il ne la voulut pas, et il faisoit porter devant lui deux épées, l'une la pointe en haut, en qualité de duc de Bretagne, et l'autre dans le fourreau la pointe en bas, comme connétable de France. Son motif pour conserver la charge de connétable, étoit, disoit-il, d'honorer dans sa vieillesse une charge qui l'avoit honoré lui-même dans un âge moins avancé. On le peut compter au nombre des plus grands capitaines que la France ait eus à son service. Il avoit beaucoup de religion, il étoit libéral, aumônier, bienfaisant, et on ne peut guères lui reprocher que la hauteur et la violence dont il usa envers les trois ministres."

³ "Yet in the preceding year 1428, the English women had concerned themselves somewhat curiously in the affairs of their rulers. 'There was one Mistress Stokes with divers others stout women of London, of good reckoning, well-apparelled, came openly to the upper parliament, and delivered letters to the duke of Gloucester, and to the archbishops, and to the other lords there present, containing matter of rebuke and sharp reprehension of the duke of Gloucester, because he would not deliver his wife Jaqueline out of her grievous imprisonment, being then held prisoner by the Duke of Burgundy, suffering her there to remain so unkindly, and for his public keeping by him another adulteress, contrary to the law of God, and the honourable estate of matrimony.'"—Stowe.

Soon is the court convened : the jewell'd crown
Shines on a courtier's head. Amid the train
The Monarch undistinguish'd takes his place,
Expectant of the event. The Virgin comes,
And as the Bastard led her to the throne,
Quick glancing o'er the mimic Majesty,
With gesture and with look like one inspired
She fix'd her eye on Charles : " 'Thou art the King !"
Then in a tone that thrill'd all hearts, pursued ;
" I come the appointed Minister of Heaven,
To wield a sword before whose fated edge,
Far, far from Orleans shall the English wolves
Speed their disastrous flight. Monarch of France !
Send thou the tidings over all the realm,
Great tidings of deliverance and of joy ;
The Maid is come, the mission'd Maid, whose hand
Shall in the consecrated walls of Rheims

¹ Of this I may say with Scudery,

“ O merveille estonnante, et difficile à croire ! —
Mais que nous rapportons sur la foy de l'Histoire.”

Alaric, l. ii.

“ The matter (says De Serres) was found ridiculous both by the king and his council, yet must they make some trill. The king takes upon him the habit of a countrinan to be disguised: this maid (being brought into the chamber) goes directly to the king in this attire, and salutes him with so modest a countenance, as if she had been bred up in court all her life. They telling her that she was mistaken, she assured them it was the king, although she had never seen him. She begins to deliver unto him this new charge, which, she says, she had received from the God of Heaven; so as she turned the eyes and minds of all men upon her.”

² The anointing was a ceremony of much political and mystical importance. "King Henry III. of England, being desirous to know what was wrought in a king by his unction, consulted by letter about it with that great scholler of the age, Robert Grossetest, bishop of Lincoln, who answered him thus: — ' Quod autem in fine literæ vestræ nobis mandastis videlicet quod iuthmaremus quid unctionis sacramentum videretur adijcere regiæ dignitati, cum multi sint reges qui nullatenus unctionis munera decorarent, non est nostræ modestiatis complere hoc. Tamen non ignoramus quod regalis iunctio signum est prerogativæ susceptionis septiformis doni Sacratissimi Pneumatis, quod septiformi munere tuncetur res inunctus præminentiis non unctis regibus omnes regias et regimius sui actiones dirigere; ut videlicet non communiter sed eminenter et heroicè dono Timoris se primò, et deinceps, quantum in ipso est, suo regimini subiectos, ab omni cohibeat illicito; dono Pietatis defendat aulventat et subveniri faciat vidue, pupillo, et generaliter omni oppresso; dono Scientiæ leges iustas ad regnum iustè regendum ponat, positas observet et observari faciat, erroneas destruat; dono Fortitudinis omnia regno adversantia repellat et pro salute republicæ mortem non timeat. Ad prædicta autem præcellenter agenda dono Concilii decoretur, quo artificialitè et scientificè ordo huius mundi sensibilis edocetur; deinde dono Intellectus, quo cætus Angelicè ordo dinoscitur. Tandem verò dono Sapientie, quo ad dilucidam cognitionem Dei pertingitur, ut ad exemplar ordinis mundi et ordinis angelicè secundum leges

In wonder mute

The courtiers heard. Astonish'd Charles exclaim'd,
 " This is indeed the agency of Heaven !
 Hard, Maiden, were I of belief," he said,
 " Did I not now, with full and confirm'd faith,
 Receive thee as a Prophetess raised up
 For our deliverance. Therefore, not in doubt
 Of Providence or thee do I delay
 At once to marshal our brave countrymen
 Beneath thy banner ; but to satisfy
 Those who at distance from this most clear proof
 Might hear and disbelieve, or yield at best
 A cold assent. These fully to confirm,
 And more to make thy calling manifest,
 Forthwith with all due speed I will convene
 The Doctors of Theology³, wise men,

"And some ther have conceived this anointing of such efficacy, that, as in baptisme all former sinnes are washt away, so also by this unction, as we see in that of Polyuctus patriarch of Constantiuple, who doubted not but that the emperor John Tzimiscus was cleerd, before Heaven, of the death of Phocas, thro' his being anointed emperor."

Selden's Titles of Honour.

The legend of the Ampulla made this ceremony peculiarly important in France. I quote the miracle from Desmarests. Clovis is on his knees waiting to be anointed by St. Remigius.

" Cependant le prelat attend les huiles saintes.
 Un Diacre ouvre la porte, et fait un vain effort ;
 La foule impenetrable empêche son abord.
 Du Pontife sacré la douce impatience,
 Des mains et de la voix veut en vain qu'il s'avance.
 Nul ne peut disputer, par la force des bras,
 De tant de corps pressés l'immobile ramas.
 Le prince humble, à genoux, languissoit dans l'attente,
 Alors qu'une clarté paroissoit plus éclatante,
 Esteint tous autres feux par sa vive splendeur,
 Et répand dans le temple une divine odeur.
 Dans un air lumineux une Colombe vole,
 En son bec de corail tenant une fiole.
 Elle apporte au prelat ce vase précieux,
 Plein d'un baume sacré, rare présent des Cieux."—Clotius.

"Guillermus Brito says that the devil brake the viol of oil which Remigius held in his hand ready to anoint Clovis, and that the oil being so spilt, he obtained by prayer a supply of it from heaven." — Selden.

3 « Ces paroles ainsi par elle dictées, la fist le roy remener honorablement en son logis, et assemble son grand conseil, au quel furent plusieurs prelatz, chevaliers, euevques et chieffs de guerre, avecques aucuns docteurs en theologie en loix et en decret, qui tous ensemble adviserent qu'elle seroit interroguée par les docteurs, pour essayer si en elle se trouveroit evidente raison de pouvoir accomplir ce qu'elle disoit. Mais les docteurs la troverent de tant honneste contenance, et tant sage en ses paroles, que leur revelation faicte, on en tient tres grande conte.

“ Diverses interrogations luy furent faictes par plusieurs docteurs et autres gens de grand estat, a quoy elle respondit moult bien, et par especial a un docteur Jacobin, qui luy dist, que si Dieu vouloit que les Anglois s'en allassent, qu'il ne falloit point de armes ; a quoy elle respondit, qu'elle ne vou-

Well pleased the Maiden heard. Her the King leads
From the disbanding throng, meantime to dwell
With Mary. Watchful for her Lord's return
She sat with Agnes; Agnes proud of heart,
Majestically fair, whose large full eye,
Or flashing anger, or with scornful scowl,
Too oft deform'd her beauty. Yet with her
The lawless idol of the Monarch's heart,
The Queen, obedient to her husband's will,
Dwelt meekly in accord. With them the Maid
Was left to sojourn; by the gentle Queen
With cordial affability received;
By Agnes courteously, whose outward show
Of graciousness concealed an inward awe,
For while she hoped and trusted through her means
Charles should be re-establish'd in his realm,
She felt rebuked before her.

Through the land
Meantime the King's convoking voice went forth,
And from their palaces and monasteries
The theologians came, men who had grown
In midnight studies grey; Prelates and Priests
And Doctors: teachers grave and with great names,
Seraphic, Subtle, or Irrefragable,
By their admiring scholars dignified.

They met convened at Chinon, to the place
Of judgement, in St. Katharine's fane assign'd.
The floor with many a monumental stone
Was spread, and brass-enscultur'd effigies
Of holy abbots honour'd in their day,
Now to the grave gone down. The branching arms
Of many a ponderous pillar met aloft,
Wreath'd on the roof emboss'd. Through storied panes
Of high-arch'd windows came the tintured light;
Pure water in a font beneath reflects
The many-colour'd rays; around that font
The fathers stand, and there with rites ordain'd
And signs symbolic strew the hallowing salt,
Wherewith the limpid water, consecrate,
So taught the Church, became a spell approved
Against the fiends of Satan's fallen crew;
A licit spell of mightier potency
Than e'er the hell-hags taught in Thessaly;
Or they who sitting on the rifed grave,
By the blue tomb-fire's lurid light dim seen,
Share with the Ghouls their banquet.

This perform'd,
The Maid is summon'd. Round the sacred font,
Mark'd with the mystic tonsure and enrobed

Jeûs que peu de gens qui combattroient, et Dieu donneroit la victoire.—History of the Siege of Orleans. Troyes, 1621.

In the "Gesta Joanne Gallice" of Valerandus Varianus, one of the counsellors makes a speech of seventy lines upon the wickedness of women, mentioning Helen, Beersheba, Samhramis, Dalilah, Messalina, &c. as examples. The council are influenced by his opinion, and the maid, to prove her mission, challenges any one of them to a single combat.

In sacred vesture, a venerable train,
They stand. The delegated Maid obeys
Their summons. As she came, a blush suffused
Her pallid cheek, such as might well besecm
One mindful still of maiden modesty,
Though to her mission true. Before the train
In reverent silence waiting their sage will,
With half-averted eye she stood composed.
So have I seen a single snow-drop rise
Amid the russet leaves that hide the earth
In early spring, so seen the gently bend
In modest loveliness alone amid
The waste of winter.

By the Maiden's side
The Son of Orleans stood, prepared to vouch
That when on Charles the Maiden's eye had fix'd,
As led by power miraculous, no fraud,
Nor juggling artifice of secret sign
Dissembled inspiration. As he stood
Steadily viewing the mysterious rites,
Thus to the attentive Maid the President
Severely spake.

"If any fiend of Hell
Lurk in thy bosom, so to prompt the vaunt
Of inspiration, and to mock the power
Of God and holy Church, thus by the virtue
Of water hallowed in the name of God
Adjure I that foul spirit to depart
From his deluded prey."

Slowly he spake
And sprinkled water on the Virgin's face.
Indignant at the unworthy charge the Maid
Felt her cheek flush, but soon, the transient glow
Fading, she answer'd meek.

"Most holy Sires,
Ye reverend Fathers of the Christian Church,
Most catholic! I stand before you here
A poor weak woman; of the grace vouchsafed,
How far unworthy, conscious; yet though mean,
Innocent of fraud, and call'd by Heaven to be
Its minister of aid. Strange voices heard,
The dark and shadowing visions of the night,
And feelings which I may not dare to doubt,
These portents make me certain of the God
Within me: He who to these eyes reveal'd
My royal Master, mingled with the crowd
And never seen till then. Such evidence
Given to my mission thus, and thus confirm'd
By public attestation, more to say,
Methinks, would little boot, . . . and less become A silly Maid."

"Thou speakest," said the Priest,
"Of dark and shadowing visions of the night.
Canst thou remember, Maid, what vision first
Seem'd more than fancy's shaping? From such tale,
Minutely told with accurate circumstance,
Some judgement might be form'd."

The Maid replied:

"Quâ me stultitiâ, quâ me levitate notandam
Creditis a patres? armis si forsitan, inquit,
Acta minus videar, stricto procurrere ferro
Annuitis; hæc nostri sint prima pericula martis.
Si cuique vis tanta animo, descendat in aequæ
Planiciem pugne; mihi si victoria cedat
Credite victrici; noster si vicisti hostis
Compede vinceta abeam, et cunctis sim fabula sæclis."

"Amid the mountain vallies I had driven
My father's flock. The eve was drawing on,
When by a sudden storm surprised, I sought
A chapel's neighbouring shelter; ruin'd now,
But I remember when its vesper bell
Was heard among the hills, a pleasant sound,
That made me pause upon my homeward road,
Awakening in me comfortable thoughts
Of holiness. The unsparing soldiery
Had sack'd the hamlet near, and none was left
Duly at sacred seasons to attend
St. Agnes' chapel.¹ In the desolate pile
I drove my flock, with no irreverent thoughts,
Nor mindless that the place on which I trod
Was holy ground. It was a fearful night!
Devoutly to the virgin Saint I pray'd,
Then heap'd the wither'd leaves which autumn winds
Had drifted in, and laid me down upon them,
And sure I think I slept. But so it was
That, in the dead of night, Saint Agnes stood
Before mine eyes, such and so beautiful
As when, amid the house of wickedness,
The Power whom with such fervent love she served

The exclamation of St. Agnes at the stake should not be omitted here. "Then Agnes, in the midst of the flames, stretching out her hands, prayed unto the Lord, saying, 'I bless thee, O Almighty Father! who permittest me to come unto thee fearless even in the flames. For behold! what I have believed, I see; what I have hoped, I possess; what I have desired, I embrace. Therefore I confess thee with my lips, I desire thee with my heart, with my inmost entrails; I come to thee, the living and the true God;' The whole passage as it stands in the 'Acta Sanctorum,' is very fine. 'Tunc Vicarius Aspasius nomine, jussit in conspectu omnium ignem copiosum accendi, et in medium eam præcepit jactari flammæ. Quod cum fuisset impletum, statim in duas partes divisæ sunt flammæ, et hinc atque illinc seditiosos populos exurebant, ipsam autem B. Agnen penitus in nullo continebat incendium. Eo magis hoc non virtutibus divinis, sed mæfelicis deputant, dabant fœritus inter se populi, et infinitos clamores ad cælum. Tunc B. Agnes expandens manus suas in medio ignis his verbis orationem fudit ad Dominum: Omnipotens, adorande, colende, tremende, Pater Domini nostri Jesu Christi, benedico te quia per filium tuum unigenitum evasi minas hominum impiorum et spurcitias diaboli impolluta transivi. Ecce et nunc per Spiritum Sanctum rore cœlesti perfusa sum; focus juxta me moritur, flamma dividitur, et ardor incendii hujus ad eos a quibus ministratur, refunditur. Benedico te, Pater omnipotens, qui etiam per flammam, intrepidam me ad te venire permitti.

Vell'd her with ~~glory~~.² And I saw her point
To the moss-grown altar, and the crucifix
Half hid by weeds and grass; . . . and then I thought
I could have wither'd armies with a look,
For from the present Saint such divine power
I felt infused. . . . 'Twas but a dream perhaps:
And yet methought that when a louder peal
Burst o'er the roof, and all was left again
Utterly dark, the bodily sense was clear
And accurate in every circumstance
Of time and place."

Attentive to her words

Thus the Priest answer'd:

"Brethren, ye have heard
The woman's tale. Behoves us now to ask
Whether of holy Church a duteous child
Before our court appears, so not unlike
Heaven might vouchsafe its gracious miracle;
Or misbelieving heretic, whose thoughts,
Erring and vain, easily might stray beyond
All reason, and conceit strange dreams and signs
Impossible. Say, woman, from thy youth
Hast thou, as rightly mother Church demands,

Ecce jam quod credidi video, quod speravi jam teneo, quod concupivi complector. Te igitur labia confiteor, te corde, te totis visceribus concupisco. Ecce ad te venio vivum et verum Deum." — Acta Sanct. tom. ii. p. 352. Jan. 21. Vita S. Agnetis. Auct. S. Ambrosio.

They have a legend in Cornwall that St. Agnes "escaped out of the prison at Rome, and taking shipping, landed at St. Piran Arwothall, from whence she travelled on foot to what is now her own parish. But being several times tempted by the Devil on her way, as often as she turned about to rebuke him, she turned him into a stone, and indeed there are still to be seen on the Dowry, between St. Piran and St. Agnes, several large moor stones, pitched on end, in a straight line, about a quarter of a mile distant one from the other, doubtless put there on some remarkable account. There lived then in that part of the country a famous Wrath, or Giant, by name Bolster, of that ilk. He got hold of the Saint, and obliged her to gather up the stones on his domain; she carried them in three apron-fuls to the top of the hill, and made with them three great heaps, from which the hill is now called, sometimes Carne Breanich, sometimes St. Agnes' Beacon. At last this Giant, or Wrath, attempted to seduce her; she pretended to yield, provided he would fill a hole which she showed him with his blood: he agreed to this, not knowing that the hole opened into the sea; she thus cunningly bled him to death, and then tumbled him over the cliff. This they still call the Wrath's Hole. It is on the top of the cliff, not far from St. Agnes' chapel and well; and, enlarging as it goes downward, opens into a cave fretted in by the sea, and, from the nature of the stone, streaked all over with bright red streaks like blood. After this she lived some time here, and then died, having first built her chapel and her well. The water of this well is excellent; and the pavement, they tell you, is coloured with her own blood, and the more you rub it the more it shows, — such being, indeed, the nature of the stone. She likewise left the mark of her foot on a rock, not far from it, still called St. Agnes' foot, which they tell you will fit a foot of any size; and indeed it is large enough so to do. These monkish stories caused a great resort here in former days, and many cures are pretended to have been done by the water of this well, so blest by her miraculous blood." — Potwhele's History of Cornwall, i. 176, 177. — N.

St. Agnes, St. Catharine, and St. Margaret, were the saints more particularly revered by the Maid of Orleans.

Confess'd at stated times thy secret sins,
And, from the priestly power conferr'd by Heaven,
Sought absolution ? ”

“ Father,” she replied,
“ The forms of worship in mine earlier years
Waked my young mind to artificial awe,
And made me fear my God. Warm with the glow
Of health and exercise, whene'er I pass'd
The threshold of the house of prayer, I felt
A cold damp chill me ; I beheld the tapers
That with a pale and feeble glimmering
Dimm'd the noon-light ; I heard the solemn mass,
And with strange feelings and mysterious dread
Telling my beads, gave to the mystic prayers
Devoutest meaning. Often when I saw
The pictured flames writhe round a penanced soul,
I knelt in fear before the Crucifix,
And wept and pray'd, and trembled, and adored
A God of Terrors. But in ~~later~~ years,
When as my soul grew strong in solitude,
I saw the eternal energy pervade
The boundless range of nature, with the sun
Pour life and radiance from his flaming path,
And on the lowliest flowret of the field
The kindly dew-drops shed. And then I felt
That he who form'd this goodly frame of things
Must needs be good, and with a FATHER'S name
I call'd on him, and from my burthen'd heart
Pour'd out the yearnings of unmingled love.
Methinks it is not strange then, that I fled
The house of prayer, and made the lonely grove
My temple, at the foot of some old oak
Watching the little tribes that had their world
Within its mossy bark ; or laid me down
Beside the rivulet whose murmuring
Was silence to my soul¹, and mark'd the swarm
Whose light-edged shadows on the bedded sand
Mirror'd their mazy sports, . . the insect hum,
The flow of waters, and the song of birds
Making a holy music to mine ear :
Oh ! 'was it strange, if for such scenes as these,
Such deep devoutness, such intense delight
Of quiet adoration, I forsook
The house of worship ? strange that when I felt
How God had made my spirit quick to feel
And love what'er was beautiful and good,
And from aught evil and deform'd to shrink
Even as with instinct ; . . father ! was it strange
That in my heart I had no thought of sin
And did not need forgiveness ? ”

As she spake
The Doctors stood astonish'd, and some while
They listen'd still in wonder. But at length
A Monk replied,
“ Woman, thou seem'st to scorn
The ordinances of our holy Church ;
And, if I rightly understand thy words,
Nature, thou say'st, taught thee in solitude
Thy feelings of religion, and that now
Masses and absolution and the use
Of the holy wafer, are to thee unknown.
But how could Nature teach thee true religion,
Deprived of these ? Nature doth lead to sin,

But 'tis the Priest alone can teach remorse,
Can bid St. Peter ope the gates of Heaven,
And from the penal fires of purgatory
Set the soul free. Could Nature teach thee this ?
Or tell thee that St. Peter holds the keys,
And that his successors' unbounded power
Extends o'er either world ? Although thy life
Of sin were free, if of this holy truth
Ignorant, thy soul in liquid flames must rue
Its error.”

Thus he spake ; applauding looks
Went round. Nor dubious to reply the Maid
Was silent.

“ Fathers of the holy Church,
If on these points abstruse a simple maid
Like me should err, impute not you the crime
To self-will'd reason, vaunting its own strength
Above eternal wisdom. True it is
That for long time I have not heard the sound
Of mass high-chaunted, nor with trembling lips
Partook the holy wafer. yet the birds
Who to the matin ray prelude pour'd
Their joyous song, methought did warble forth
Sweeter thanksgiving to Religion's ear
In their wild melody of happiness,
Than ever rung along the high-arch'd roofs
Of man ; . . yet never from the bending vine
Pluck'd I its ripen'd clusters thanklessly,
Or of that God unmindful, who bestow'd
The bloodless banquet. Ye have told me, Sirs,
That Nature only teaches man to sin !
If it be sin to seek the wounded lamb,
To bind its wounds, and bathe them with my tears,
This is what Nature taught ! No, Fathers, no !
It is not Nature that doth lead to sin :
Nature is all benevolence, all love,
All beauty ! In the greenwood's quiet shade
There is no vice that to the indignant cheek
Bids the red current rush ; no misery there ;
No wretched mother, who with pallid face
And famine-fulen hangs o'er her hungry babes,
With such a look, so wan, so woe-begone,
As shall one day, with damning eloquence,
Against the oppressor plead ! . . . Nature teach sin !
Oh blasphemy against the Holy One,
Who made us in the image of Himself,
Who made us all for happiness and love,
Infinite happiness, infinite love,
Partakers of his own eternity.”

Solemn and slow the reverend Priest replied,
“ Much, woman, do I doubt that all-wise Heaven
Would thus vouchsafe its gracious miracles
(On one fore-doom'd to misery ; for so doom'd
Is that deluded one, who, of the mass
Unheeding, and the Church's saving power,
Deems nature sinless. Therefore, mark me well !
Brethren, I would propose this woman try
The holy ordeal.* Let her, bound and search'd,
Lest haply in her clothes should be conceal'd
Some holy relic so profaned, be cast
In some deep pond ; there if she float, no doubt
The fiend upholds, but if at once she sink,
It is a sign that Providence displays
Her free from witchcraft. This done, let her walk
Blindfold and bare o'er ploughshares heated red,

¹ “ Thro' the scene are faintly heard
Sounds that are silence to the mind.”—Charles Lloyd.

And o'er these past her naked arm immerse
In scalding water. If from these she come
Unhurt, to holy father of the church,
Most blessed Pope, we then refer the cause
For judgement: and this Chief, the Son of Orleans,
Who comes to vouch the royal person known
By her miraculous power, shall pass with her
The sacred trial."

"Grace of God!" exclaimed
The astonish'd Bastard; "plunge me in the pool,
O'er red-hot ploughshares make me skip to please
Your dotard fancies! Fathers of the church,
Where is your gravity? what! elder-like
Would ye this fairer than Susannah eye?
Ye call for ordeals; and I too demand
The noblest ordeal, on the English host
By victory to approve her mission sent
From favouring Heaven. To the Pope refer
For judgement! Know ye not that France even now Stands tottering on destruction?"

Starting then
With a wild look, the mission'd Maid exclaimed,
"The sword of God is here! the grave shall speak
To manifest me!"

Even as she spake,
A pale blue flame rose from the trophied tomb
Beside her: and within that house of death
A sound of arms was heard, as if below
A warrior, buried in his armour, stirr'd.

"Hear ye?" the Damsel cried; "these are the arms
Which shall flash terror o'er the hostile host.
These, in the presence of our Lord the King,
And of the assembled people, I will take
Here from the sepulchre, where many an age,
They, incorruptible, have lain conceal'd,
For me reserved, the Delegate of Heaven."

Recovering from amaze, the Priest replied:
"Thou art indeed the Delegate of Heaven!
What thou hast said surely thou shalt perform.
We ratify thy mission. Go in peace."

JOAN OF ARC.

THE FOURTH BOOK.

The feast was spread, the sparkling bowl went round,
And in the assembled court the minstrel harp'd
A song of other days. Suddenly they heard
The horn's loud blast. "This is no time for cares; Feast ye the messenger without!" cried Charles:
"Enough hath of the wearying day been given
To the public weal."

Obedient to the King
The guard invites the way-worn messenger.
"Nay, I will see the monarch," he replied,
"And he must hear my tidings; duty-urged,
I have for many a long league hasten'd on,
Not thus to be repell'd." Then with strong arm

Removing him who barr'd his onward way,
The hall he enter'd.

"King of France! I come
From Orleans, speedy and effectual aid
Demanding for her gallant garrison,
Faithful to thee, though thinn'd in many a fight,
And now so pressed by want. Rouse thou thyself,
And with the spirit that becomes a King
Responsive to his people's loyalty,
Bring succour to the brave who in thy cause
Abide the extremity of war."

He said,
And from the hall departing, in amaze
At his audacious bearing left the court.
The King exclaimed, "but little need to send
Quick succour to this gallant garrison,
If to the English half so firm a front
They bear in battle!"

"In the field, my liege," Dunois replied, "yon Knight hath serv'd thee well.
Him have I seen the foremost of the fight,
Wielding so manfully his battle-axe,
That wheresoe'er he turn'd, the affrighted foe
Let fall their palsied arms with powerless stroke,
Desperate of safety. I do marvel much
That he is here: Orleans must be hard press'd
To send the bravest of her garrison,
On such Commission."

Swift the Maid exclaimed,
"I tell thee, Chief, that there the English wolves
Shall never raise their yells of victory!
The will of God defends those fated walls,
And resting in full faith on that high will,
I mock their efforts. But the night draws on;
Retire we to repose. To-morrow's sun,
Breaking the darkness of the sepulchre,
Shall on that armour gleam, through many an age
There for this great emergency reserved."
She said, and rising from the board, retired.

Meantime the herald's brazen voice proclaim'd
Coming solemnity, and far and wide
Spread the glad tidings. Then all labour ceased
The ploughman from the unfinish'd furrow hastes
The armourer's anvil beats no more the din
Of future slaughter. Through the thronging streets
The buzz of asking wonder hums along.

On to St. Katharine's sacred fane they go;
The holy fathers with the imaged cross
Leading the long procession. Next, as one
Suppliant for mercy to the King of kings,
And grateful for the benefits of Heaven,
The Monarch pass'd, and by his side the Maid;
Her lovely limbs robed in a snow-white vest,
Wistless that every eye on her was bent,
With stately step she moved; her labouring soul
To high thoughts elevate; and gazing round
With a full eye, that of the circling throng
And of the visible world unseeing, seem'd
Fix'd upon objects seen by none beside.
Near her the warlike Son of Orleans came
Pre-eminent. He, newing his young frame
With exercise robust, had scaled the cliff,
And plunging in the river's full-swoln stream,
Stemm'd with broad breast its current; so his form,

Sinewy and firm, and fit for deeds of arms,
 Tower'd above the throng effeminate.
 No dainty bath had from his hardy limbs
 Effaced the hauberk's honourable marks;¹
 His helmet bore of hostile steel the dints
 Many and deep; upon his pictured shield
 A Lion vainly struggled in the toils,
 Whilst by his side the cub with pious rage
 Assail'd the huntsman. Tremouille followed them,
 Proud of the favour of a Prince who seem'd
 Given up to vain delights; conspicuous he
 In arms with azure and with gold anneal'd,
 Gaudily graceful, by no hostile blade
 Defaced, nor e'er with hostile blood stain'd;
 Trimly accoutred court-habilliments,
 Gay lady-dazzling armour, fit to adorn
 Tourney, or tilt, the gorgeous pageantry
 Of mimic warfare. After him there came
 A train of courtiers, summer flies that sport
 In the sunbeam of favour, insects sprung
 From the court dunghill, greedy blood-suckers,
 The foul corruption-gender'd swarm of state.

As o'er some flowery field the busy bees
 Fill with their happy hum the fragrant air,
 A grateful music to the traveller,
 Who in the shade of some wide-spreading tree
 Rests on his way awhile; or like the sound
 Of many waters down some far-off steep
 Holding their endless course, the murmur rose
 Of admiration. Every gazing eye
 Dwelt on the Prophetess; of all beside,
 The long procession and the gorgeous train,
 Though glittering they with gold and sparkling gems,

² Such is the legend of St. Katharine, princess of Alexandria, whose story has been pictured upon sign-posts and in churches, but whose memory has been preserved in this country longer by the ale-house than by the altar. The most extravagant perhaps of Dryden's plays is upon this subject. In the first edition I had, ignorantly, represented Katharine as dying upon the wheel, and the description of her sufferings was far too minute. Dryden has committed the last fault in a far greater degree; the old martyrologies particularize no cruelties more revolting to the reader than he has detailed in the speech of Maximin when he orders her to execution.

From a passage in the Jerusalem Conquistada it should seem that St. Katharine was miraculously betrothed to her heavenly spouse. As the crusaders approach Jerusalem, they visit the holy places on their way;

"Qual visita el lugar con llanto tierno,
 Donde la hermosa virgen Caterina
 Se desposó con el Esposo eterno,
 La Angelica Rachel siendo madrina;
 Aquel Esposo, que el nevado nevierno
 Se cubrió con escarcha matutina,
 El que tiene los ojos de palomas
 Y del labio de lirio vierte aromas." — Lope de Vega.

The marginal note adds, "La Virgen fue Madrina en los desposorios de Caterina y Christo."

Of St. Margaret, the other favourite saint of the maid, I find recorded by Bergomensis, that she called the pagan prefect an impudent dog, that she was thrown into a dungeon,

And their rich plumes high waving to the air,
 Heedless.

The consecrated dome they reach,
 Rear'd to St. Katharine's holy memory.
 Her tale the altar told; how Maximin,
 His raised lip kindled with a savage smile,
 In such deep fury bade the tender'd wheel
 Rend her life piecemeal, that the very face
 Of the hard executioner relax'd
 With pity; calm she heard, no drop of blood
 Forsook her cheek, her steady eye was turn'd
 Heaven-ward, and hope and meekest plety
 Beam'd in that patient look. Nor vain her trust,
 For lo! the Angel of the Lord descends
 And crumbles with his fiery touch the wheel!
 One glance of holy triumph Katharine cast,
 Then bow'd her to the sword of martyrdom.²

Her eye averting from the pictured tale,
 The delegated damsel knelt and pour'd
 To Heaven her earnest prayer.

A trophied tomb
 Stood near the altar where some warrior slept
 The sleep of death beneath. A massy stone
 And rude-ensculptured effigy o'erlaid
 The sepulchre. In silent wonderment
 The expectant multitude with eager eye
 Gaze, listening as the mattock's heavy stroke
 Invades the tomb's repose; the heavy stroke
 Sounds hollow; over the high-vaulted roof
 Roll the repeated echoes: soon the day
 Dawns on the grave's long night, the slant sunbeam
 Falls on the arms inscribed, the crested helm,
 The bauldrick, and the shield, and sacred sword.³

where a horrible dragon swallowed her, that she crossed herself, upon which the dragon immediately burst and she came out safe, and that she saw the devil standing in the corner like a black man, and seized him and threw him down.

Absurd as this legend is, it once occasioned a very extraordinary murder. A young Lombard after hearing it, prayed so earnestly for an opportunity of fighting with the devil like St. Margaret, that he went into the fields in full expectation that his desire would be gratified. A hideous old dumb woman came by: he mistook her for the tempter; her inarticulate noises confirmed him in this opinion, and he knocked her down and trampled upon her. The poor wretch died of her bruises, but a miracle was wrought to save her murderer, in consideration that his madness was a pious madness, and before she died she spoke to excuse the mistake. This tale is told in that strange collection of ludicrous stories upon religious subjects, the Pia Hilaria. The authority referred to, is Petr. Rausani Hist., lib. xxxv.

Roland, or rather Orlando, for it is Ariosto who has immortalized him, was buried with Durindana at his side, and his horn Olifant at his feet. Charlemain also had his good sword Joyeuse buried with him. He was placed in his sepulchre on a golden throne, crowned and habited in his imperial robes, though a cilice was pext his skin; one hand held a globe of gold, the other rested on the Gospels, which were lying on his knees. His shield and sceptre were hung opposite to him, on the side of the sepulchre, which was filled with perfumes and spices, and then closed. Tizana was buried with the Cid, no living man being worthy to wield

A sound of awe-repress'd astonishment
Rose from the crowd. The delegated Maid,
Over her robes the hallowed breast-plate threw,
Self-fitted to her form : on her helm'd head
The white plumes nod, majestically slow ;
She lifts the buckler and the sacred sword,
Gleaming portentous light.

The wondering crowd
Raise their loud shout of transport. "God of Heaven,"
The Maid exclaim'd, "Father all merciful !
Devoted to whose holy will, I wield
The sword of vengeance ; go before our host !
All-just avenger of the innocent,
Be thou our Champion ! God of Peace, preserve
Those whom no lust of glory leads to arms."

She ceased, and with an eager hush the crowd
Still listen'd ! a brief while throughout the dome
Deep silence dwelt ; then with a sudden burst
Devout and full, they raised the choral hymn,
"Thee Lord we praise, our God !" the throng without
Catch the strange tidings, join the hymn of joy,
And thundering transport peals along the heaven.

As through the parting crowd the Virgin pass'd,
He who from Orleans on the yesternight
Demanded succour, clasp'd with warmth her hand,
And with a bosom-thrilling voice exclaim'd,
"Ill-omen'd Maid ! victim of thine own worth,
Devoted for this king-curs'd realm of France,
Ill-omen'd Maid, I pity thee !" so saying,
He turn'd into the crowd. At his strange words
Disturb'd, the warlike Virgin pass'd along,
And much revolving in her troubled mind,
Retrod the court.

And now the horn announced
The ready banquet ; they partook the feast,¹
Then rose and in the cooling water cleansed
Their hands, and seated at the board again
Enjoy'd the bowl, or scented high with spice,
Or flavour'd with the fragrant summer fruit,
Or luscious with metheglin mingled rich.²
Meantime the Trouveur struck the harp ; he sung
Of Lancelot Du Lake, the truest Knight
That ever loved fair Lady ; and the youth
Of Cornwall³ underneath whose maiden sword
The strength of Ireland fell ; and he who struck that sword with which the Campeador, even after death, had triumphed ; and which had been miraculously half drawn from the scabbard to avenge the insult offered by a Jew to his corpse.

² " Il y avait plusieurs sortes de ces vins préparés qu'on

The dolorous stroke⁴, the blameless and the brave,
Who died beneath a brother's erring arm.
Ye have not perish'd, Chiefs of Carduel !
The songs of earlier years embalm your fame ;
And haply yet some Poet shall arise,
Like that divinest Tuscan⁵, and enwreathe
The immortal garland for himself and you.

The harp still rung beneath the high-arch'd roof,
And listening eager to the favourite lay,
The guests sat silent, when into the hall
The Messenger from that besieged town,
Re-enter'd. "It is pleasant, King of France,"
Said he, "to sit and hear the harper's song ;
Far other music hear the men of Orleans !
Famine is there ; and there the imploring cry
Of Hunger ceases not."

"Insolent man !"
Exclaim'd the Monarch, "cease to interrupt
Our hour of festival ; it is not thine
To instruct me in my duty."

Of reproof
Careless, the stranger to the minstrel cried,
"Why harpest thou of good King Arthur's fame
Amid these walls ? Virtue and genius love
That lofty lay. Hast thou no loose lewd tale
To pamper and provoke the appetite ?
Such should procure thee worthy recompence !
Or rather sing thou of that wealthy Lord,
Who took the ewe lamb from the poor man's bosom,
That was to him even as a daughter ! Charles,
This parable would I tell, prophet-like,
And look at thee and say, 'Thou art the man !'"

He said, and with a quick and troubled step
Withdrew. Astonish'd at his daring guise,
The guests sat heedless of the lay awhile,
Pondering his words mysterious, till at length
The Court dispersed. Retiring from the hall,
Charles and the delegated damsel sought
The inner palace. There the gentle Queen
Awaited them : with her Joan lov'd to pass
Her intervals of rest ; for she had won
The Virgin's heart by her mild melancholy,
The calm and duteous patience that deplored
A husband's cold half-love. To her she told
With what strange words the messenger from Orleans
Had roused uneasy wonder in her mind ;

servait après les viandes. 1. les Vins cuits, qui sont encore en usage dans quelques provinces, et qui ont conservé le même nom. 2. Ceux auxquels on ajoutait le suc de quelque fruit, tels que le Moré, fait avec du jus de mûre. 3. Ceux qu'on assaisonnait avec du miel, comme le Nectar, le Medow, &c. 4. Ceux où l'on faisait infuser des plantes médicinales ou aromatiques, et qui prenaient leur nom de ces plantes, Vins d'Absinthe, de Myrthe, d'Aloës, &c. Le Romain de Flirumont les appelle Vins herbes. 5. Enfin ceux dans lesquels, outre le miel, il entraient des épices. On appelait ces derniers du nom général de Piments. C'étaient les plus estimés de tous. Nos auteurs n'en parlent qu'avec délices. Il eût manqué quelque chose à une fête ou à un repas, si on n'y eût point servi du Piment : et l'on en donnait même aux moines dans les couvents à certains de l'année."—Le Grand.

⁵ Ariosto.

For on her ear yet vibrated his voice,
When, lo! again he came, and at the door
Stood scowling round.

"Why dost thou haunt me thus?"
The monarch cried. "Is there no place secure
From thy rude violence? Unmanner'd man,
I know thee not!"

"Then learn to know me, Charles!"
Solemnly he replied; "read well my face,
That thou may'st know it on that dreadful day,
When at the Throne of God I shall demand
His justice on thee!" Turning from the King,
To Agnes as she enter'd, in a tone
More low, more mournfully severe, he cried,
"Dost thou too know me not?"

She glanced on him,
And pale and breathless hid her head convulsed
In the Maid's bosom.

"King of France!" he said,
"She loved me, and by mutual word and will
We were betroth'd, when, in unhappy hour,
I left her, as in fealty bound, to fight
Thy battles. In mine absence thou didst come
To tempt her then unspotted purity...
For pure she was: . . . Alas! these courtly robes
Hide not the indelible stain of infamy!
Thou canst not with thy golden belt put on
An honourable name! O lost to me,
And to thyself, for ever, ever lost,
My poor polluted Agnes! . . . Charles, that faith
Almost is shaken, which should be henceforth
My only hope: thou hast thy wicked will,
While I the victim of her guilt and thine,
Though meriting alike from her and thee
Far other guerdon, hear about with me
A wound for which this earth affords no balm,
And doubt Heaven's justice."

So he said, and frown'd
Austere as he who at Mahommed's door
Knock'd loud and frequent, at whose dreadful mien
Stricken with terror, all beholders fled.
Even the prophet almost terrified,
Scarcely could bear his presence; for he knew
That this was the Death-Angel AZRAEL,
And that his hour was come. Conscious of guilt
The Monarch sat, nor could endure to face
His bosom-probing frown. The Maid of Arc
Meantime had read his features, and she cried,
"I know thee, Conrade!" Rising from her seat,
She took his hand, for he stood motionless,
Gazing on Agnes now with steady eye,
Severe though calm: him from the Court she drew,
And to the river side resisting not,

1 "Du proverbe Bonne renommée vaut mieux que ceinture dorée.

"Lisant un arrêt ancien qui est encores pour le jourd'huy inséré aux registres du Chastelet de Paris, j'estimay qu'en ce proverbe il y avoit une notable sentence, et une longue anciennoté tout ensemble. Car par arrest qui est du 24 de Juin 1420, il est porté en termes exprés que defences sont faites à toutes femmes amoureuses, filles de joye, et pallardes, de ne porter robes à collets renvrez, queues, ne ceintures dorées, boutonnieres à leurs chaperons, sur peine de confiscation, et amende, et que les huisiers de parlement, commissaires et sergents du Chastelet qui les trouveroient, eussent à les mener prisonnières.

Both sad and silent, led; till at the last
As from a dream awaking, Conrade look'd
Full on the Maid, and falling on her neck,
He wept.

"I know thee, Damsel!" he exclaim'd;
"Dost thou remember that tempestuous night,
When I, a weather-beaten traveller, sought
Your hospitable door? ah me! I then
Was happy! you too sojourn'd then in peace.
Fool that I was! I blamed such happiness,
Arraign'd it as a guilty selfish sloth,
Unhappily prevailing, so I fear me,
Or why art thou at Chinon?"

Him the Maid
Answering, address'd, "I do remember well,
That night; for then the holy Spirit first,
Waked by thy words, possess'd me."

Conrade cried,
"Poor Malden, thou wert happy! thou hadst lived
Blessing and blest, if I had never stray'd,
Needlessly rigid from my peaceful path.
And thou hast left thy home then, and obey'd
The feverish fancies of an ardent brain!
And hast thou left him too, the youth whose eye
For ever glancing on thee, spake so well
Affection's eloquent tale?"

So as he said,
Rush'd the warm purple to the Virgin's cheek.
"I am alone," she answer'd, "for this realm
Devoted." Nor to answer more the Maid
Endured, for many a melancholy thought
Throng'd on her aching memory. Her mind's eye
Beheld Domremi and the fields of Arc:
Her burthen'd heart was full, such grief she felt
Yet such sweet solacing of self-applause
As cheers a banish'd Patriot's lonely hours
When fancy pictures to him all he loved,
Till the big tear-drop rushes o'er its orb,
And drowns the soft enchantment.

With a look
That spake solicitous wonder, Conrade eyed
The silent Maid; nor would the Maid repress
The thoughts that swell'd within her, or from him
Hide her soul's workings. "Twas on the last day
Before I left Domremi; eve had closed,
I sat beside the brook, my soul was full,
As if inebriate with Divinity.
Then Conrade! I beheld a ruffian herd
Circle a flailing pile, where at the stake
A woman stood: the iron bruised her breast,
And round her limbs half-garmented, the fire
Curl'd its fierce flakes. I saw her countenance,
I knew MYSELF." Then, in a tone subdued

"Au surplus (je diray ecy en passant) à la même volonté que ceux qui donneront cet arrest eussent tourné la chance, et que non seulement ces ceintures dorées, mais en toutes autres dorures, et affiquets, ils eussent fait defences à toutes femmes d'honneur d'emporter, sur peine d'estre declarées putains; car il n'y auroit point plus prompt moyen que cesteuy, pour bannir le superfluité et bombance des dames."
— Paquier.

2 "Hæc igitur Janna Fulcella virgo, cum magnam gloriam in armis esset adpta, et regnum Francorum magnâ ex parte perditum, e manibus Anglorum pugnando eripulset, in suâ florente ætate constituta, non solum se morituram, sed et genus suæ mortis cunctis prædixit." — Bergomensis.

Of calmness, "There are moments when the soul
From her own impulse with strange dread recoils,
Suspicious of herself; but with a full
And perfect faith I know this vision sent
From Heaven, and feel of its unerring truth,
As that God liveth, that I live myself,
The feeling that deceives not."

By the hand
Her Conrade held and cried, "Ill-fated Maid,
That I have torn thee from affection's breast,
My soul will groan in anguish. Thou wilt serve
Like me, the worthless Court, and having served,
In the hour of ill abandon'd, thou wilt curse
The duty that deluded. Of the world
Fatigued, and loathing at my fellow-men,
I shall be seen no more. There is a path...¹
The eagle hath not mark'd it, the young wolf
Knows not its hidden windings: I have trod
That path, and found a melancholy den,
Fit place for penitence and hopeless woe,
Where sepulchred, the ghost of what he was,
Conrade may pass his few and evil days,
Waiting the wish'd-for summons to lay down
His weary load of life."

But then the Maid
Fix'd on the warrior her reproving eye;
"I pass'd the fertile Auxerois," she said,
"The vines had spread their interwoven shoots
Over the unpruned vineyards, and the grape
Rotted beneath the leaves; for there was none
To tread the vintage, and the birds of Heaven
Had had their fill. I saw the cattle start
As they did hear the loud alarm bell,²
And with a piteous moaning vainly seek
To fly the coming slaughterers. I look'd back
Upon the cottage where I had partaken
The peasant's meal... and saw it wrapt in flames.
And then I thank'd my God that I had burst
The ties, strong as they are, which bind us down
To selfish happiness, and on this earth
Was as a pilgrim... Conrade! rouse thyself!
Cast the weak nature off!³ A time like this
Is not for gentler feelings, for the glow
Of love, the overflowings of the heart.
There is oppression in thy country, Conrade!
There is a cause, a holy cause, that needs
The brave man's aid. Live for it, and enjoy
Earth's noblest recompense, thine own esteem;
Or die in that good cause, and thy reward
Shall sure be found in Heaven."

He answer'd not,

¹ "There is a path which no fowl knoweth, and which the vulture's eye hath not seen; the lion's whelps have not trodden it, nor the fierce lion passed by it." — Job, xxviii. 7, 8.

² "In sooth the estate of France was then most miserable. There appeared nothing but a horrible face, confusion, poverty, desolation, solitariness and fears. The lean and bare labourers in the country did terrify even thieves themselves, who had nothing left them to spoil but the carcases of these poor miserable creatures, wandering up and down like ghosts drawn out of their graves. The least farms and hamlets were fortified by these robbers, English, Bourguignons and French, every one striving to do his worst: all men of war were well agreed to spoil the countryman and merchant. Even the cattell, accustomed to the larum bell, the sign of

But, pressing to his heart the Virgin's hand,
Hasten'd across the plain. She with dim eyes
For gushing tears obscured them, follow'd him
Till lost in distance. With a weight of thought
Opprest, along the poplar-planted Vienne
Awhile she wander'd, then upon the bank
She laid her down, and watch'd the tranquil stream
Flow with a quiet murmuring, by the clouds
Of evening purpled. The perpetual flow,
The ceaseless murmuring, lull'd her to such dreams
As memory in her melancholy mood
Loves best. The wonted scenes of Arc arose;
She saw the forest brook, the weed that waved
Its long green tresses in the stream, the crag
Which overbrow'd the spring, and that old yew
Which through the bare and rifted rock had forced
Its twisted trunk, the berries cheerful red
Starring its gloomy green. Her pleasant home
She saw, and those who made that home so dear,
Her lov'd lost friends. The mingled feelings fill'd
Her eyes, when from behind a voice was heard,
"O Lady! canst thou tell me where to find
The Maid whom Heaven hath sent to rescue
France?"

Thrill'd by the well-known tones, she started up,
And fell upon the neck of Theodore.

"Have I then found thee!" cried the impassioned youth;

"Henceforth we part no more; but where thou goest
Thither go I. Beloved! in the front
Of battle thou shalt find me at thy side;
And in the breach this breast shall be thy shield
And rampart. Oh, ungenerous! Why from me
Conceal the inspiration? why from me
Hide thy miraculous purpose? Am I then
So all unworthy that thou shouldst set forth
Beneath another's guidance?"

Thus he cried,
Mingling reproach with tenderness, yet still
Clasping in warm embrace the maid beloved.
She of her bidding and futurity
Awhile forgetful, patient of the embrace,
With silent tears of joy bedew'd his neck.
At length, "I hope," she cried, "thou art not come
With heavier fault and breach of nearer tie!
How did thy mother spare thee, . . . thou alone
The stay and comfort of her widowed age?
Did she upon thy parting steps bestow
Her free-will blessing, or hast thou set forth,
Which Heaven forbid, unlicensed, and unblest?"

the enemy's approach, would run home of themselves without any guide by this accustomed misery.

⁴ "O my people, hear my word: make you ready to the battle, and in those evils be even as pilgrims upon the earth." — 2 Esdras, xvi. 40.

⁵ "Let go from thee mortal thoughts, cast away the burdens of man, put off now the weak nature,

"And set aside the thoughts that are most heavy unto thee, and haste thee to flee from these times." — 2 Esdras, xiv. 14, 15.

"Oh, surely not unblest!" the youth replied:
Yet conscious of his unrepented fault,
With countenance flush'd, and faltering in reply:
"She wept at my departure, she would fain
Have turn'd me from my purpose, and my heart
Perhaps had fail'd me, if it had not glow'd
With ardour like thine own; the sacred fire
With which thy bosom burns had kindled me;
High in prophetic hope, I bade her place
Her trust in Heaven; I bade her look to hear
Good tidings soon of glorious victory;
I told her I should soon return, . . . return
With thee, and thou wouldst be to her old age
What Madelon had been."

As thus he spake,
Warm with the imaginary bliss, he clasp'd
The dear one closer to his yearning heart.
But the devoted Virgin in his arms
Started and shudder'd, for the flaming pile
Flash'd on remembrance now, and on her soul
The whole terrific vision rose again.
A death-like paleness at the dreadful thought
Wither'd her cheek; cold damps suffused her brow,
And falling on the neck of Theodore,
Feeble and faint she hung. His eager eye
Concentrating all the anguish of the soul,
And strain'd in anxious love, gazed fearfully
With wondering anguish; till ennobling thoughts
Of her high mission roused her, and her soul
Collected, and she spake.

"My Theodore,
Thou hast done ill to quit thy mother's home!
Alone and aged she will weep for thee,
Wasting her little that is left of life
In anguish. Now go back again to Arc,
And cheer her wintry hours of widowhood,
And love my memory there."

Swift she exclaim'd,
"Nay, Maid! the pang of parting is o'erpast,
And my dear mother looks for the glad hour
When we shall both return. Amid the war
How many an arm will seek thy single life,
How many a sword and spear! . . . I will go with thee
And spread the guardian shield!"

"Nay," she replied,
"I shall not need thy succour in the war.
Me, Heaven, if so seem good to its high will,
Will save. I shall be happier, Theodore,
Thinking that thou dost sojourn safe at home
And make thy mother happy."

The youth's cheek
A rapid blush disorder'd. "Oh! the court
Is pleasant then, and thou wouldst fain forget
A humble villager, who only boasts
The treasure of the heart!"

She look'd at him
With a reproaching eye of tenderness:
"Injurious man! devoted for this realm,
I go a willing victim. The dark veil
Hath been withdrawn for me, and I have seen
The fearful features of Futurity.
Yes, Theodore, I shall redeem my country,
Abandoning for it the joys of life,
Yea, life itself!" Then on his neck she fell,

"Digna minus misero, non meliore viro." — Ovid.

And with a faltering voice, "Return to Arc!
I do not tell thee there are other maids
As fair; for thou wilt love my memory,
Hallowing to me the temple of thy heart.
Worthy a happier, not a better love,
My Theodore!" — Then, pressing his pale lips,
A last and holy kiss the Virgin fix'd,
And fled across the plain.

She reach'd the court
Breathless. The mingled movements of her mind
Shook every fibre. Sad and sick at heart,
Fain to her lonely chamber's solitude
The Maiden had retired; but her the King
Met on the threshold. He of the late scene
Forgetful and his crime, as cheerful seem'd
As though there had not been a God in Heaven!
"Enter the hall," he said, "the masquers there
Join in the dance. Why, Maiden, art thou sad?
Has that rude madman shook thy gentle frame
With his strange speeches?"

Ere the Maid replied,
The Son of Orleans came with joyful speed,
Poising his massy javelin. "Thou hast roused
The sleeping virtue of the sons of France,
They crowd around the standard," cried the chief.
"Our brethren pent in Orleans, every moment
Gaze from the watch-tower with the sickening eye
Of expectation."

Then the King exclaim'd,
"O chosen by Heaven! defer one day thy march,
That humbled at the altar we may join
The general prayer. Be these our holy rites
To-morrow's task; — to-night for merriment!"

The Maid replied, "The wretched ones in Orleans,
In fear and hunger and expiring hope,
Await my succour, and my prayers would plead
In Heaven against me, did they waste one hour
When active duty calls. For this night's mirth
Hold me excused; in truth I am not fit
For merriment; a heavy charge is on me,
And I must put away all mortal thoughts."
Her heart was full, and pausing, she repress'd
The unbidden anguish. "Lo! they crowd around
The standard! Thou, Dunois, the chosen troops
Marshal in speed, for early with the dawn
We march to rescue Orleans from the foe."

JOAN OF ARC.

THE FIFTH BOOK.

SCARCE had the early dawn from Chinon's towers
Made visible the mist that curl'd along
The river's winding way, when from her couch
The martial Maid arose. She mail'd her limbs;
The white plumes nodded o'er her helmeted head;
She girt the sacred falchion by her side,
And, like a youth who from his mother's arms,
For his first field impatient, breaks away,
Poising the lance went forth.

* *Esdra*s, xiv. 14.

Twelve hundred men,

Rearing in order'd ranks their glittering spears,
Await her coming. Terrible in arms
Before them tower'd Dunols, his manly face
O'er-shadow'd by the helmet's iron cheeks.
The assembled court gazed on the marshall'd train,
And at the gate the aged prelate stood
To pour his blessing on the chosen host.
And now a soft and solemn symphony
Was heard, and chanting high the hallow'd hymn,
From the near convent came the vestal maids.
A holy banner, woven by virgin hands,
Snow-white they bore. A mingled sentiment
Of awe and eager ardour for the fight,
Thrill'd through the army, as the reverend man
Took the white standard, and with heaven-ward eye
Call'd on the God of Justice, blessing it.
The Maid, her brows in reverence unhelm'd,
Her dark hair floating on the morning gale,
Knelt to his prayer, and stretching forth her hand
Received the mystic banner. From the host
A loud and universal shout burst forth,
As rising from the ground, upon her brow
She placed the plumed casque, and waved on high
The banner'd lilies. On their way they march,
And dim in distance, soon the towers of Chinon
Fade from the eye reverted.

The sixth sun,

Purpling the sky with his dilated light,
Sunk westering; when embosom'd in the depth
Of that old forest, which for many a league
Shadow'd the hills and vales of Orleans, they pitch their tents. The hum of occupation
Sounds ceaseless. Waving to the evening gale
The streamers flutter; and ascending slow
Beneath the foliage of the forest trees,
With many a light hue tinged, the curling smoke
Melts in the impurpled air. Leaving her tent,
The martial Maiden wander'd through the wood;
There, by a streamlet, on the mossy bank
Reclined, she saw a damsel, her long locks
With willow wreathed; upon her lap there lay
A dark-hair'd man, listening the while she sung
Sad ditties, and enwreathed to bind his brow
The melancholy garland. At the sound,
Of one in arms approaching, she had fled;
But Conrade, looking upward, recognized
The Maid of Arc. "Nay, fear not, Isabel,"
Said he, "for this is one of gentle kind,
Whom even the wretched need not fear to love."

So saying, he arose and took her hand,
And press'd it to his bosom. "My weak heart,
Though school'd by wrongs to loath at human kind,
Will beat, rebellious to its own resolves.
Come hither, outcast one! and call her friend,
And she will be thy friend more readily
Because thou art unhappy."

Isabel

Saw a tear starting in the virgin's eye,
And glancing upon Conrade, she too wept,
Walling his wilder'd senses.

"Mission'd Maid!"

The warrior cried, "be happy! for thy power
Can make this sufferer so. From Orleans driven,
Orphan'd by war, and of her only friend

Bereft, I found her wandering in the wilds,
Worn out with want and wretchedness. Thou, Joan,
Wilt his beloved to the youth restore;
And trust me, Maid! the miserable feel
When they on others bestow happiness,
Their happiest consolation."

She replied,

Pressing the damsel's hand, in the mild tone
Of equal friendship, solacing her cares.
"Soon shall we enter Orleans," said the Maid;
A few hours in her dream of victory
England shall triumph, then to be awak'd
By the loud thunder of Almighty wrath!
Irk some meantime the busy camp to me
A solitary woman. Isabel,
Wert thou the while companion of my tent,
Lightlier the time would pass. Return with me;
I may not long be absent."

So she spake.

The wanderer in half-utter'd words express'd
Grateful assent. "Art thou astonish'd, then,
That one though powerful is benevolent?
In truth thou well mayest wonder!" Conrade cried.
But little cause to love the mighty ones
Hath the low cottager; for with its shade
Too oft doth Power, a death-dew-dropping tree,
Blast every herb beneath its baleful boughs!
Tell thou thy sufferings, Isabel! Relate
How warr'd the chieftains, and the people died.
The mission'd Virgin hath not heard thy woes;
And pleasant to mine ear the twice-told tale
Of sorrow."

Gazing on the martial Maid

She read her wish, and spake. "A wanderer now,
Friendless and hopeless, still I love to think
Upon my native home, and call to mind
Each haunt of careless youth; the woodbined wall,
The jessamine that round the straw-roof'd cot
Its fragrant branches wreathed, beneath whose shade
I wont to sit and watch the setting sun,
And hear the thrush's song. Nor far remote,
As o'er the subject landscape round I gazed,
The towers of Yenville rose upon the view.
A foreign master holds my father's home!
I, far away, remember the past years,
And weep."

Two brethren form'd our family

Humble we were, and happy; honest toil
Procured our homely sustenance; our herds
Duly at morn and evening to my hand
Gave their full stores; the vineyard we had rear'd
Purpled its clusters in the southern sun,
And, plenteous produce of my father's toil,
The yellow harvest billow'd o'er the plain.
How cheerfully around the blazing hearth
When all the labour of the day was done,
We pass'd the evening hours; for they would sing
Or merry roundelay, or ditty sad
Of maid forsaken and the willow weed,
Or of the doughty Paladins of France
Some warlike fit, the while my spinning wheel
A fitting music made.

Thus long we lived,

And happy. To a neighbouring youth my hand
In holy wedlock soon to be consign'd
Was plight'd: my poor Francis!" Here she paused,

And here she wept awhile.

"We did not think
The desolating stream of war would reach
To us; but soon as with the whirlwind's speed
Ruin rush'd round us.¹ Mehun, Clery, fell,
The banner'd Leopard waved on Gergeau's wall;
Baugenci yielded; soon the foe approach'd
The towers of Yenville.

Fatal was the hour
To me and mine: for from the wall, alas!
The rusty sword was taken, and the shield
Which long had moulder'd on the mouldering nail,
To meet the war repair'd. No more was heard
The ballad, or the merry roundelay;
The clattering hammer's clank, the grating file,
Harsh sounded through the day a dismal din:
I never shall forget their mournful sound!

"My father stood encircling his old limbs
In long-forgotten arms. 'Come, boys,' he cried,
I did not think that this grey head again
Should bear the helmet's weight; but in the field
Better to bravely die a soldier's death,
Than here be tamely butcher'd. Isabel,
Go to the abbey! if we should survive,
We soon shall meet again; if not, my child,
There is a better world!"

In broken words,
Lifting his eyes to Heaven, my father breathed
His blessing on me. As they went away,
My brethren gazed on me and wrung my hand
In silence, for they loved their sister well.
From the near cottage Francis join'd the troop.
Then did I look on our forsaken home,
And almost sob my very soul away;
For all my hopes of happiness were fled,
Even like a dream!"

"Perish these mighty ones,"
Cried Conrade, "these who let destruction loose,
Who walk elated o'er their fields of fame,
And count the thousands that lie slaughter'd there,
And with the bodies of the innocent, rear

Their pyramid of glory! perish these,
The epitome of all the pestilent plagues
That Egypt knew! who sent their locust swarms
O'er ravaged realms, and bid the brooks run blood.
Fear and Destruction go before their path,
And Famine dogs their footsteps. God of Justice,
Let not the innocent blood cry out in vain!"

Thus while he spake, the murmur of the camp
Rose on their ear; first like the distant sound
When the full-follaged forest to the storm
Shakes its hoarse head; anon with louder din;
And through the opening glade gleam'd many a fire.
The Virgin's tent they enter'd; there the board
Was spread, the wanderer of the fare partook,
Then thus her tale renew'd:—

"Slow o'er the hill
Whose rising head conceal'd our cot I pass'd,
Yet on my journey paused awhile, and gazed
And wept; for often had I crost the hill
With cheerful step, and seen the rising smoke
Of hospitable fire; alas! no smoke
Curl'd o'er its melancholy chimneys now!
Orleans I reach'd. There in the suburbs stood
The abbey; and ere long I learnt the fall
Of Yenville.

On a day, a soldier ask'd
For Isabel. Scarce could my faltering feet
Support me. It was Francis, and alone...
The sole survivor of that company!

"And soon the foes approach'd: impending war
Soon sadden'd Orleans.² There the bravest chiefs
Assembl'd: Thouars, Coarase, Chabannes,
And the Sire Chapelle³, in succes-ful war
Since wounded to the death; and that good Knight
Giresme of Rhodes, who in a better cause
Can never wield the crucifix that hilts
His hallowed sword⁴; and Xaintrailles ransom'd now,
And Fayette late released, and that young Duke⁵
Who at Verneuil, senseless with many a wound,
Fell prisoner, and La Hire⁶, the merriest man

"these ancient barons affected rather to be styled by the name of sire than baron, and the baron of Coucy carried to that purpose this rithme in his device:

Je ne suis roy ne prince aussi,
Je suis le sire de Coucy."

⁴ "At the creation of a knight of Rhodes a sword, with a cross for the hilt, was delivered to him in token that his valour must defend religion. No bastard could be a knight hospitaller, from whose order that of Rhodes was formed, except a bastard to a prince, there being honour in that dishonour, as there is light in the very spots of the moon."—*Fuller's

⁶ "In the late warres in France between king Henry the fifth of England and Charles the seventh of France, the French
armie being in distresse, one captain La Hire, a Frenchman, was sent to declare unto the said French king the estate and affairs of the warre, and how for want of victuals, money, and other necessaries, the French had lost divers townes and battles to the English. The French king being disposed to use his capitaine familiarly, shewed him such things as himself was delighted in, as his buildings, his banquetts, faire ladies, &c. and then asked the captaine how hee liked them: 'Trust me, sir,' quoth the captaine, speaking his mind freely, 'I did

¹ "To succeed in the siege of Orleans, the English first secured the neighbouring places, which might otherwise have annoyed the besiegers. The months of August and September were spent in this work. During that space they took Mehun, Baugenci, Gergeau, Clery, Sully, Jenville, and some other small towns, and at last appeared before Orleans on the 12th of October."—Rapin.

² "The French king used every expedient to supply the city with a garrison and provisions, and enable it to maintain a long and obstinate siege. The lord of Gaucour, a brave and experienced captain, was appointed governor. Many officers of distinction threw themselves into the place. The troops which they conducted were inured to war, and were determined to make the most obstinate resistance: and even the inhabitants, disciplined by the long continuance of hostilities, were well qualified in their own defence, to second the efforts of the most veteran forces. The eyes of all Europe were turned towards this scene; where, it was reasonably supposed, the French were to make their last stand for maintaining the independence of their monarchy, and the rights of their sovereign."—Hume.

³ This title was not discriminately used by the French. Chapelle is sometimes styled le sire, and sometimes gentilhomme de Beaune, by Daniel. The same title was applied to the Almighty, and to princes; and Selden observes from Pasquier,

That ever yet did win his soldiers' love,
And over all for hardihood renown'd
The Bastard Orleans.

These within the town
Expect the foe. Twelve hundred chosen men
Well tried in war, uprear the guardian shield
Beneath their banners. Dreadful was the sight
Of preparation. The wide suburbs stretch'd
Along the pleasant borders of the Loire,
Late throng'd with multitudes, now feel the hand
Of ruin. These preventive care destroys,
Lest England, shelter'd by the friendly walls,
Securely should approach. The monasteries
Fell in the general waste. The holy monks
Unwillingly their long-acustom'd haunts
Abandon, haunts where every gloomy nook
Call'd to awaken'd memory some trace
Of vision seen, or sound miraculous.
Trembling and terrified, their noiseless cells,
For the rude uproar of a world unknown,
The nuns desert: their abbess, more composed,
Collects her maids around, and tells her beads,
And pours the timid prayer of piety.
The pioneers, by day and night employ'd,
Throw up the violated earth, to impede
The foe: the hollow chambers of the dead
Echoed beneath their stroke. The brazen tomb
Which late recorded death, in the furnace cast
Is made to inflict it now. Sad sight it was
To see so wide a waste; the aged ones
Hanging their heads, and weeping as they went
O'er the fallen dwellings of their happier years;
The stern and sullen silence of the men
Musing on vengeance: and but ill repress,
The mother's fears as to her breast she clasp'd,
Her ill-doom'd infant. Soon the suburbs lay
One ample ruin¹; whence the stones were borne
Within the town to serve in its defence.

"And now without the walls the desolate space
Appear'd, a rough and melancholy waste,
With upturn pavements and foundations deep
Of many a ruin'd dwelling. Nor within Less dreary was the scene; at evening hour
No more the merry viol's note was heard;²
No more the aged matron at her door

never know any prince that more delighted himself with his losses, than you doe with yours." — Stowe.

"La Hire trouva ung chapelain auquel il dit qu'il luy donast hastivement l'absolution: et le chapelain luy dit qu'il confessast ses pesches. La Hire luy respondit qu'il n'aueroit pas loisir, car il falloit promptement frapper sur l'ennemy, et qu'il avoit faict ce que gens de guerre ont accoustumé de faire. Et lors La Hire fit sa prière à Dieu en disant en son Gascon, les mains jointes: — 'Dieu, je te prie que tu faces aujourd'huy pour La Hire autant que tu voudrois que La Hire fist pour toy, se il estoit Dieu, et que tu fusnes La Hire.' Et il cuidoit tres bien prier et dire." — Chronique sans titre. Le Brun des Charmettes, t. i. p. 102.

There is an English epitaph, borrowed from these words of the French captain.

"They pulled down all the most considerable buildings in the suburbs, and among the rest twelve churches and several monasteries; that the English might not make use of them in carrying on the siege." — Rapin. Monstrelet.

"The instrument which most frequently served for an accompaniment to the harp, and which disputed the pre-emi-

Humm'd cheery to her spinning wheel, and saw
Her children dancing to the roundelay.
The chieftains strengthening still the ancient walls,
Survey them every where with prying eye;
The eager youth in anxious preparation
Practise the arts of war; silent and stern,
With the hurrying restlessness of fear, they urge
Their gloomy labours. In the city dwelt
An utter silence of all pleasant sounds,
But all day long the armourer's beat was heard,
And all night long it echoed.

Soon the foe
Led to our walls the siege: as on they move
The clarions clangor, and the cheerful life,
Accordant to the thund'ring drum's deep sound,
Direct their measured march. Before the ranks
Salisbury was seen, Salisbury, so long the scourge
Of France; and Talbot towered by his side,
Talbot, at whose dread name the froward child
Clings mute and trembling to his nurse's breast.
Suffolk was there, and Hungerford, and Scales,
And Fastolfe, victor in the frequent fight.
Dark as the autumnal storm they roll'd along,
A countless host! From the high tower I mark'd
The dreadful scene; I saw the iron gleam
Of javelins sparkling to the noontide sun,
Their banners tossing to the troubled gale,
And . . fearful music . . heard upon the wind
The modulated step of multitudes.

"There in the midst, shuddering with fear, I saw
The dreadful stores of death; tremendous roll'd
Over rough roads the harsh wheels; the brazen tubes
Flash'd in the sun their fearful splendour far,
And last the loaded waggons creak'd along.

"Nor were our chieftains, whilst their care procured
Human defence, neglectful to implore
That heavenly aid, deprived of which the strength
Of man is weakness. Bearing through our streets
The precious relics of the holy dead,
The monks and nuns pour'd many an earnest prayer,
Devoutly join'd by all. Saint Aignan's shrine
Was throng'd by supplicants, the general voice
Call'd on Saint Aignan's name³ again to save
His people, as of yore, before he pass'd

nence with it in the early times of music in France, was the viol; and indeed, when reduced to four strings, and stripped of the frets with which viols of all kinds seem to have been furnished till the 16th century, it still holds the first place among treble instruments, under the denomination of violin.

The viol played with a bow, and wholly different from the vielle, whose tones are produced by the friction of a wheel, which indeed performs the part of a bow, was very early in favour with the inhabitants of France. — Burney's History of Music.

³ St. Aignan was the tutelary saint of Orleans. He had miraculously been chosen bishop of that city when Attila besieged it. "Comme les citoyens effrayez eurent recours a leur prelat, luy, sans se soucier pour le salut de siens, sortit de la ville et parla a Attila. Mais ne l'ayant pu flechir, il se mit en prieres, fit faire des processions, et porter par les rues les reliques des saints. Un prestre s'estant mocqué, disant, que cela n'avoit de rien profité aux autres villes, tomba roide mort sur la place, portant par ce moyen la peine de son insolente temerité. Apres toutes ces choses, il commanda aux habitants de voir si le secours n'arrivoit point; ayant été re-

Into the fulness of eternal rest ;
When by the Spirit to the lingering camp
Of Ætius borne, he brought the timely aid,
And Attila with all his multitudes
Far off retreated to their field of shame."

And now Dunols, for he had seen the camp
Well order'd, enter'd. "One night more in peace
England shall rest," he cried, "ere yet the storm
Burst on her guilty head ! then their proud vaunts
Forgotten, or remember'd to their shame,
Vainly her chiefs shall curse the hour when first
They pitch'd their tents round Orleans."

"Of that siege,"

The maid of Arc replied, "gladly I hear
The detail. Isabel proceed ! for soon
Destined to rescue this devoted town,
The tale of all the ills she hath endured
I listen, sorrowing for the past, and feel
Joy and contentment in the merciful task
For which I am sent forth."

Thus spake the Maid,
And Isabel pursued. "And now more near
The hostile host advancing pitch their tents.
Unnumber'd streamers wave, and clamorous shouts,
Anticipating conquest, rend the air
With universal uproar. From their camp
A herald came ; his garb emblazon'd o'er
With leopards and the lilies of our realm,
Foul shame to France ! The summons of the foe
He brought."

The Bastard interrupting cried,
"I was with Gaucour and the assembled chiefs,
When by his office privileged and proud
That herald spake, as certain of success
As he had made a league with Victory.
'Nobles of France rebellious ! from the chief
Of you victorious host, the mighty Earl
Of Salisbury, now there in place of him
Your Regent John of Bedford : In his name
I come, and in our sovereign Lord the King's,
Henry. Ye know full well our master's claim,
Incontrovertible to this good realm,
By right descent, and solemnly confirm'd
By your great monarch and our mighty king
Fifth Henry, in the treaty ratified
At Troyes¹, wherein your monarch did disclaim
All future right and title to this crown,
His own exempted, for his son and heirs
Down to the end of time. This sign'd and seal'd
At the holy altar, and by nuptial knot
Of Henry and your princess, gives the realm,
Charles dead and Henry, to his infant son
Henry of Windsor. Who then dares oppose

My Master's title, in the face of God,
Of wilful perjury, most atrocious crime,
Stands guilty, and of flat rebellion 'gainst
The Lord's anointed. He at Paris crown'd
With loud acclaim of duteous multitudes,
Thus speaks by me. Deliver up your town
To Salisbury, and yield yourselves and arms,
So shall your lives be safe : and such his grace,
If of your free accord to him you pay
Due homage as your sovereign lord and King,
Your rich estates, your houses shall be safe,
And you in favour stand, as is the Duke,
Philip of Burgundy. But . . mark me well !
If obstinately wilful, you persist
To scorn his proffer'd mercy, not one stone
Upon another of this wretched town
Shall then be left ; and when the English host
Triumphant in the dust have trod the towers
Of Orleans, who survive the dreadful war
Shall die like traitors by the hangman's hand.
Ye men of France, remember Caen and Roan !"

"He ceased : nor Gaucour for a moment paused
To form reply.

"Herald ! to all thy vaunts
Of English sovereignty let this suffice
For answer : France will only own as King
Her own legitimate Lord. On Charles's brow,
Transmitted through a long and good descent,
The crown remains. We know no homage due
To English robbers, and disclaim the peace
Inglorious made at Troyes by factious men
Hostile to France. Thy master's proffer'd grace
Meets the contempt it merits. Herald, ! s,
Be sure we shall remember Caen and Roan !
Go tell the mighty Earl of Salisbury,
That as like Blanchard, Gaucour dares his power,
Like Blanchard, he can brave his cruelty,
And triumph by enduring. Speak I well,
Ye men of Orleans ?"

Never did I hear
A shout so universal as ensued
Of approbation. The assembled host
As with one voice pour'd forth their loyalty,
And struck their sounding shields ; and walls and towers,
Echoed the loud uproar. The herald went.
The work of war began.

A fearful scene,"
Cried Isabel. "The iron storm of death
Clash'd in the sky ; the mighty engines hurl'd
Huge stones which shook the ground where'er they fell.
Then was there heard at once the clasp of arms,
The thundering cannons, and the soldier's shout, perdu que non, il se remet en prières, et puis leur fait mesme commandement : mais n'apperevant point encore de secours, pour la troisieme fois il se prosterna a terre, les yeux et l'esprit vers le Ciel. Se sentant exaucé, il fait monter a la guerre, et lui rapporte-t-on que l'on ne voyoit rien sinon une grosse nuée de poussiere, il assure que c'estoit le secours d'Ætius et de Teudo Roy des Goths, lesquels tardans a se montrer a l'armee d'Attila, S. Aignau fut divinement transporte en leur camp, et les advertit que tout estoit perdu, s'ils attendoient au lendemain. Ils parurent aussi-tost, et forcerent Attila de lever si hâtivement le siege, que plusieurs des siens se noyèrent dans la Loire, d'autres s'entreteurent avec regret d'avoir perdu la ville. Et non contents de cette victoire, le pour-suivirent si vivement avec le Roy Merovee, qui se vint joindre a'eux, qu'ils le delrent en bataille rangée pres de Châlons, jonchant la campagne de 180,000 cadavres." — Le Nouveau Parterre des Fleurs des Vies des Saints. ¹ "By the treaty of Troyes, Charles was to remain in quiet possession of the royal dignity and revenues. After his death the crown, with all its rights and dominions, devolved to Henry and his heirs. The inbecility of Charles was so great that he could not appear in public, so that the queen and Burgunday swore for him." — Rapin.

The female's shriek, the affrighted infant's cry,
The groan of death . . . discord of dreadful sounds
That jarr'd the soul.

Nor while the encircling foe
Leager'd the walls of Orleans, idly slept
Our friends: for winning down the Loire its way
The frequent vessel with provision fraught,
And men, and all the artillery of death,
Cheer'd us with welcome succour. At the bridge
These safely landed mock'd the foeman's force.
This to prevent, Salisbury, their watchful chief,¹
A mighty work prepares. Around our walls,
Encircling walls he builds, surrounding thus
The city. Firm'd with massiest buttresses,
At equal distance, sixty forts protect
The English lines. But chief where in the town
The six great avenues meet in the midst,²
Six castles there he rear'd impregnable,
With deep-dug moats and bridges drawn aloft,
Where over the strong gate suspended hung
The dread portcullis. Thence the gunner's eye
From his safe shelter could with ease survey
Intended sally, or approaching aid,
And point destruction.

It were long to tell

¹ "The besiegers received succours in the very beginning of the siege, but the earl of Salisbury, who considered this enterprise as a decisive action for the king his master, and his own reputation, omitted nothing to deprive the besieged of that advantage. He run up round the city sixty forts. How great soever this work might be, nothing could divert him from it, since the success of the siege entirely depended upon it. If vain would be have pursued his attack, if the enemies could constantly introduce fresh supplies. Besides, the season, now far advanced, suggested to him, that he would be forced to pass the winter in the camp, and during that time be liable to many insults. Among the sixty forts, there were six much stronger than the rest upon the six principal avenues of the city. The French could before with ease introduce convoys into the place, and had made frequent use of that advantage. But after these forts were built, it was with extreme difficulty that they could, now and then, give some assistance to the besieged. Upon these six redoubts the general erected batteries, which thundered against the walls." — Rapin.

² Rheims had six principal streets meeting thus in one centre where the cathedral stood.

⁵ Drayton enumerates these among the English preparations for war;

"The engineer provided the petard
To break the strong portcullis, and the balls
Of wild-fire devised to throw from far
To burn to ground their palaces and halls."

And at the siege of Harfleur he says,

And tedious, how in many a bold assault
The men of Orleans sallied on their foes;
How after difficult fight the enemy
Possess'd the Tournelles³, and the embattled tower
That shadows from the bridge the subject Loire;
Though numbering now three thousand daring men,
Frequent and fierce the garrison repell'd
Their far out-numbering foes. From every aid
Included, they in Orleans groan'd beneath
All ills accumulate. The shatter'd roofs
Allow'd the dews of might free passage there;
And ever and anon the ponderous stone,
Ruining where'er it fell, with hideous crash
Came like an earthquake⁴, startling from his sleep
The affrighted soldier. From the brazen slings
The wild-fire balls hiss'd through the midnight sky:⁵
And often their huge engines cast among us
The dead and loathsome cattle of their camp,
As though our enemies, to their deadly league
Forcing the common air, would make us breathe
Poisonous pollution.⁶ Through the streets were seen,
The frequent fire, and heaps of dead, in haste
Piled up and streaming to infected Heaven.
For ever the incessant storm of death
Pours down, and crowded in unwholesome vaults⁷

"I do command that particular care be had, advising the gunners to have half butts with water and vinegar, as is accustomed, with bonnets and old sails, and wet mantels to defend fire, that as often is thrown.

⁶ Thus at the siege of Thion sur l'escault. "Ceux de lost leur gectoient par leur engins chevaux mors et autres bestes mortes et puantes, pour les empuantir, dont ilz estoient la dedans en moult grant destresse. Car l'air estoit fort et chaill ainsel comme en plein este, et de ce furent plus constrains que de nulle autre chose. Si considerent finablement entre eulx que celle messaise ilz ne pourraient longement endurer ne souffrir, tant leur estoit la punaisie abominable." — Froissart, i. 38.

This was an evil which sometimes annoyed the besieging army. At Dan "pour la puantise des bestes que lon troit en lost, et des chevaux qui estoient mors, l'air estoit tout corrompu, dont moult de chevaliers et escuyers en estoient malades et melencolieux, et se y alloient les plusieurs, refreschir a Bruges et ailleurs pour eviter ce mauvais air." — Froissart, i. 175.

⁷ At Thion sur l'escault, "La fist le duc charier grant folson d'engins de Cambray et de Douay, et en y eut six moult grans, le duc les fist lever devant la forteresse. Lesquels engins gectoient nuit et jour grosses pierres et mangonneaux

The wretched females hide, not idle there,
Wasting the hours in tears, but all employ'd,
Or to provide the hungry soldier's meal,
Or tear their garments to bind up his wounds :
A sad equality of wretchedness !

" Now came the worst of ills, for Famine came :
The provident hand deals out its scanty dole,
Yielding so little a supply to life
As but protracted death. The loathliest food

The dog is slain, that at his master's feet
Howling with hunger lay ; with jealous fear,
Hating a rival's look, the husband hides

And . . . horrible to tell ! . . . where, thrown aside,
There lay unburied in the open streets

" O peaceful scenes of childhood ! pleasant fields !
Haunts of mine infancy, where I have stray'd
Tracing the brook along its winding way,
Or pluck'd the primrose, or with giddy speed
Chaced the gay butterfly from flower to flower !
O days in vain remember'd ! how my soul,
Sick with calamity, and the sore ills
Of hunger, dwelt on you and on my home !
Thinking of you amid the waste of war,
I could in bitterness have cursed the great
Who made me what I was, a helpless one,
Orphan'd, and wanting bread ! "

" And be they curst ! "
Conrade exclaim'd, his dark eye flashing rage ;
" And be they curst ! O groves and woodland shades,
How blest indeed were you, if the iron rod
Should one day from Oppression's hand be wrench'd
By everlasting Justice ! Come that hour,
When in the Sun the Angel of the Lord ²
Shall stand and cry to all the fowls of Heaven,
' Gather ye to the supper of your God,
That ye may eat the flesh of mighty men,
Of captains, and of kings ! ' Then shall be peace. "

" And now, lest all should perish," she pursued,
" The women and the infirm must from the town
Go forth and seek their fate.

¹ Scudery has a most ingenious idea of the effects of famine : during the blockade of Rome by the Goths, he makes the inhabitants first eat one another, and then eat themselves.

La rage se meslant à leurs douleurs extrêmes,
Ils se mangent l'un l'autre, ils se mangent eux-mêmes.

Alaric.

Fulter expresses the want of food pithily. " The siege grew long, and victuals short. " *

² " And I saw an Angel standing in the sun ; and he cried with a loud voice, saying to all the fowls that fly in the midst of heaven, Come and gather yourselves together unto the supper of the great God :

I will not now
Recall the moment, when on my poor Francis
With a long look I hung. At dead of night,
Made mute by fear, we mount the secret bark,
And glide adown the stream with silent oars :
Thus thrown upon the mercy of mankind,
I wandered reckless where, till wearied out,
And cold at heart, I laid me down to die ;
So by this warrior found. Him I had known
And loved, for all loved Conrade who had known him ;
Nor did I feel so pressing the hard hand
Of want in Orleans, ere he parted thence
On perilous envoy. For of his small fare " —

" Of this enough," said Conrade ; " Holy Maid !
One duty yet awaits me to perform.
Orleans her envoy sent me, to demand
Aid from her idle sovereign. Willingly
Did I achieve the hazardous enterprize,
For rumour had already made me fear
The ill that hath fallen on me. It remains,
Ere I do banish me from human kind,
That I re-enter Orleans, and announce
Thy march. 'Tis night, and hark ! how dead a silence !
Fit hour to tread so perilous a path ! "

So saying, Conrade from the tent went forth.

JOAN OF ARC.

THE SIXTH BOOK.

THE night was calm, and many a moving cloud
Shadow'd the moon. Along the forest glade
With swift foot Conrade pass'd, and now had reach'd
The plain, where whilome by the pleasant Loire,
Cheer'd with the song, the rustics had beheld
The day go down upon their merriment :
No song of peace now echoed on its banks.
There tents were pitch'd, and there the sentinel,
Slow pacing on his sullen rounds, beheld
The frequent corpse roll down the tainted stream. *
Conrade with wider sweep pursued his way,
Shunning the camp, now hush'd in sleep and still.

" That ye may eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses, and of them that sit on them. " — Revelation, xix. 17, 18.

A similar passage occurs in Ezekiel.

" And thou, son of man, thus saith the Lord God, speak unto every feathered fowl, and to every beast of the field.
Assemble yourselves, and come ; gather yourselves on every side to my sacrifice that I do sacrifice for you, even a great sacrifice upon the mountains of Israel, that ye may eat flesh and drink blood.

" Ye shall eat the flesh of the mighty, and drink the blood of the princes of the earth, of rams, of lambs, and of goats, of bullocks, all of them fatlings of Bashan.

" And ye shall eat fat till ye be full, and drink blood till ye be drunken, of my sacrifice which I have sacrificed for you.

" Thus ye shall be filled at my table with horses and chariots, with mighty men, and with all men of war, saith the Lord God. " — Ezekiel, xxxix. 17, &c.

And now no sound was heard save of the Loire,
Murmuring along. The noise of coming feet
Alarm'd him; nearer drew the rapid steps
As of pursuit; anon . . the clash of arms!
That instant breaking through a rifted cloud
The moonlight show'd, where two with force combined
Prest on a single foe, who, warding still
Their swords, retreated in unequal fight,
As he would make the city. Hastening
With timely help to save him, Conrade sped.
One with an unexpected stroke he slew;
The other fled: "Now let us speed our best,
Frenchman!" he cried. On to the Loire they ran,
And making way with practised arms across,
Ere long in safety gain'd the opposite shore.

"Whence art thou?" cried the warrior; "and on what Commission'd!"

"Is it not the voice of Conrade?"
Francis replied; "and dost thou bring to us
Tidings of succour? Oh! that it had come
A few hours earlier! Isabel is gone!"

"Nay, she is safe," cried Conrade; "her I found
Bewilder'd in the forest, and consign'd her
To the protection of the holy Maid,
Whom Heaven hath sent to rescue us. Now say
Wherefore alone? A fugitive from Orleans,
Or sent on dangerous service from the town!"

"There is no food in Orleans," he replied,
"Scarce a meal more. The assembled chiefs resolve,
If thou shouldst bring no tidings of near aid,
To cut their way to safety, or by death
Prevent the pang of famine.¹ One they sought
Who venturing to the English lines should spy
Where best to venture on this desperate chance;
And I believing all I loved was lost
Offer'd myself."

So saying, they approach'd
The gate. The sentinel, soon as he heard
Thitherward footsteps, with uplifted lance
Challenged the darkling travellers. At their voice
He drew the strong bolts back, and cautiously
Open'd the wicket. To the careful chiefs
Who sat in midnight council, they were led,
And Conrade thus address'd them:

"Sirs, the Lord,
In this our utmost need, hath sent us aid.
A holy Maid hath been raised up by Heaven;
Her mission is by miracles confirm'd,
And hither with twelve hundred chosen men,
Led by Dunois, she comes. I am myself
A witness to the truth of what I tell;
And by to-morrow's noon, before these walls
Her banner will be seen."

Thereat the chiefs
Were fill'd with wonder and with joy, by doubt
Little repress'd. "Open the granaries!"

¹ Fuller calls this "resolving rather to lose their lives by wholesale on the point of the sword, than to retail them out by famine."

² "It was the belief of the Mexicans, that at the conclusion of one of their centuries the sun and earth would be destroyed.

Xaintrallies exclaim'd; "give we to all the host
With hands unsparing now a plenteous meal;
To-morrow we are safe! for Heaven all-just
Hath seen our sufferings and decreed their end.
Let the glad tidings echo through the town!
God is with us!"

"Be not too confident,"
Graville replied, "in this miraculous aid.
Some frantic woman this who gives belief
To idle dreams, and with her madness then Infects the simple! That Dunois is there,
Leading in arms twelve hundred chosen men,
Affords a better hope; yet lavish not
Our stores, lest in the enterprise he fail,
And Orleans then be fain to bear the yoke
Of England!"

"Chief! I tell thee," Conrade cried,
"I did myself behold the sepulchre,
Fulfilling what she spake, give up those arms
Which surely for no common end the grave
Through many an age hath held inviolate.
She is the Prophetess of the Most High,
And will deliver Orleans!"

Gaucour then,
"Be it as thou hast said. For I must think,
That surely to no vulgar tale these chiefs
Would yield a light belief; and our poor stores
Must speedily, ye know, be clean consumed.
Spread then the joyful tidings through the troops
That God hath, to deliver the oppress'd,
As in old time, raised up a Prophetess,
And the belief itself will make them fight
With irresistible courage."

Thus the chief,
And what he said seem'd good. The men of Orleans,
Long by their foemen bay'd, such transport felt,
As when the Mexicans², with eager eye
Gazing to Huixachtla's distant top,
On that last night, doubtful if ever morn
Again shall cheer them, mark the mystic fire
Flame on the breast of some brave prisoner,
A dreadful altar. As they see the blaze
Beaming on Iztapalapan's near towers,
Or on Tezcuco's calm lake flash'd far,
Songs of thanksgiving and the shout of joy
Wake the loud echo; the glad husband tears
The mantling aloe from his consort's face,
And children, now deliver'd from the dread
Of everlasting darkness, look abroad,
Hail the good omen, and expect the sun
Uninjur'd still to run his flaming race.

While thus in Orleans hope had banished sleep,
The Maiden's host perform'd their evening prayer,
And in the forest took their rest secure.
And now the morning came. At earliest dawn
Lightly upstarting and bedight in arms,
The Bastard moved along, with provident eye
Marshalling the troops. All high in hope they march;
And now the sun shot from the southern sky

On the last night of every century they extinguished all their fires, covered the faces of the women and children, and expected the end of the world. The kindling of the sacred fire on the mountain of Huixachtla was believed an omen of their safety." — Clavigero.

His midnight radiance, when afar they hear
The hum of men, and see the distant towers
Of Orleans, and the bulwarks of the foe,
And many a streamer wantoning in air.
These as they saw, and thought of all the ills
Their brethren had endured, closely pent there
For many a month, such ardour for the fight
Burnt in each bosom, as young Ali felt
Then when Mohammed of the assembled tribe
Ask'd who would be his Vizir. Fierce in faith,
Forth from the race of Hashem step'd the youth,
"Prophet of God! lo . . . I will be the man!"
And well did Ali merit that high post,
Victorious upon Beder's fertile vale,
And on mount Ohud, and before the walls
Of Chalbar, when down-cleaving to the chest
His giant foe, he grasp'd the massy gate,
Shook with strong arm and tore it from the fort,
And lifted it in air, portentous shield!

"Behold the towers of Orleans," cried Dunois.
"Lo! this the vale where on the banks of Loire,
Of yore, at close of day the rustic band
Danced to the roundelay. In younger years
As oft I glided down the silver stream,
Frequent upon the lifted oar I paused,
Listening the sound of far-off merriment.
There wave the hostile banners! martial Maid,
Give thou the signal! . . . let us fall upon
These merciless invaders, who have sack'd
Village and town, and made the hamlet haunts
Silent, or hearing but the widow's groan.
Give but the signal, Maiden!"

Her dark eye
Fix'd sadly on the foe, the holy Maid
Answer'd him: "Ere the avenging sword be drawn,
And slaughter be let loose, befits us send
Some peaceful messenger, who shall make known
The will of Heaven: so timely warn'd, our foes
Haply may yet repent, and quit in peace
Besieged Orleans, for I fain would spare
The bloody price of victory."

So she said;
And as she spake, a soldier from the ranks
Came forward. "I will be thy messenger,
O Prophetess! and to the English camp
Will bear thy bidding."

"Go," the Virgin cried;
"Say to the Lord of Salisbury, and the chiefs
Of England, Suffolk, Fastolfe, Talbot, Scates,
Invaders of the country, say, thus says
THE MAID OF ORLEANS: 'With your troops retire
In peace. Of every captured town the keys
Restore to Charles; so bloodless you may seek
Your native island; for the God of Hosts
Thus hath decreed. To Charles the rightful heir,
By long descent and by the willing choice
Of dutious subjects, hath the Lord assign'd
The kingdom. In His name the Virgin comes
Arm'd with the sword, yet not of mercy void.
Depart in peace: for ere the morrow dawns,
Victorious upon yonder wall shall wave

Her holy banner.' " To the English camp
Fearless the herald went.

At mid-day meal,
With all the dissonance of boisterous mirth,
The British chiefs caroused and quaff'd the bowl,
When by the sentinel conducted there
The Maiden's herald came.

"Chiefs," he began,
"Salisbury, and ye the representatives
Of the English King, usurper of this realm,
To ye the leaders of the English host
I come, no welcome messenger. Thus saith
THE MAID OF ORLEANS: 'With your troops retire
In peace. Of every captured town the keys
Restore to Charles; so bloodless you may seek
Your native island; for the God of Hosts
Thus hath decreed. To Charles the rightful heir,
By long descent and by the willing choice
Of dutious subjects, hath the Lord assign'd
The kingdom. In His name the Virgin comes,
Arm'd with the sword, yet not of mercy void.
Depart in peace: for ere the morrow dawns,
Victorious upon yonder wall shall wave
Her holy banner.' "

Wonder made a pause;
To this a laugh succeeds. "What!" Fastolfe cried,
"A virgin warrior hath your monarch sent
To save devoted Orleans? By the rood,
I thank his grace. If she be young and fair,
No worthless prize, my lords! Go, tell your Maid,
Joyful we wait her coming."

There was one
Among the English chiefs who had grown old
In arms, yet had not age unnerved his limbs,
But from the flexible nimbleness of youth
To unyielding stiffness braced them. One who saw Him seated at the board, might well have deem'd
That Talbot with his whole collected might Wielded the sword in war, for on his neck
The veins were full¹, and every muscle bore
The character of strength. He his stern eye
Fix'd on the herald, and before he spake
His silence threaten'd.²

"Get thee gone!" exclaimed
The indignant chief: "away! nor think to scare
With girlish phantasies the English host
That scorns your bravest warriors. Hie thee thence,
And tell this girl she may expect to meet
The mockery of the camp!"

"Nay, scare her not,"
Replied their chief; "go, tell this Maid of Orleans,
That Salisbury longs to meet her in the fight.
Nor let her fear that cords or iron chains
Shall gail her tender limbs; for I myself
Will be her prison, and ——"

"Contemptuous man!
No more!" the herald cried, as to his cheek
Rush'd the red anger: "bearing words of peace
And timely warning came I to your camp;
And here have been with insolent ribaldry
Received. Bear witness, chieftains! that the French,
Free from blood-guiltiness, shall meet the war."

² "Son silence menace." — Le Moigne.

"And who art thou?" cried Suffolk, and his eye
Grew fierce and wrath-inflamed: "What fool art thou,
Who at this woman's bidding comest to brave
The host of England? Thou shalt have thy meed!"
Then turning to the sentinel he cried,
"Prepare a stake! and let the men of Orleans,
And let this woman who believes her name
May privilege her herald, see the fire
Consume him.¹ Plant a stake! for by my God
He shall be kalendered of this new faith
First martyr."

As he spake, a sudden flush
Came o'er the herald's cheek, and his heart beat
With quicker action; but the sudden flush,
Nature's instinctive impulse, faded soon
To such a steady hue as spake the soul
Roused up with all its powers, and unsubdued,
And strengthen'd for endurance. Through the camp,
Soon as the tidings spread, a shout arose,
A hideous shout, more savage than the howl
Of midnight wolves, around him as they throng'd,
To gaze upon their victim. He pass'd on;
And as they led him to the appointed place
Look'd round, as though forgetful of himself,
And cried aloud, "Oh! woe it is to think
So many men shall never see the sun
Go down! Ye English mothers mourn ye now!
Daughters of England weep! for hard of heart
Still your mad leaders urge this impious war;
And for their folly and their wickedness,
Your sons, your husbands, by the sword must fall.
Long-suffering is the Lord, and slow to wrath,
But heavy are his judgements!"

He who spake
Was young and comely; had his cheek been pale
With dread, and had his eye look'd fearfully,
Sure he had won compassion; but the blood
Gave now a livelier meaning to his cheek,

"The letter she sent to Suffolk was received with scorn, and the trumpeter that brought it commanded to be burnt, against the law of nations, saith a French author, but erroneously, for his coming was not warranted by the authority of any lawful prince, but from a private maid, how highly soever self-pretended, who had neither estate to keep, nor commission to send a trumpeter."—Fulter's Profane State.

² De Serres says, "The trumpeter was ready to be burnt in the sight of the besieged."

³ "Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself, as he that putteth it off."—1 Kings, xx. 11.

⁴ "A ripa fluminis Halys venimus ad Goukuthoy; inde Choron; post in The Ke Thiol. Hic multa didicimus a monachis Turcicis, quos Dervis vocant, qui eo loco insignem habent ædem, de heroe quodam Chederle summa corporis atque animi fortitudine, quem eundem fuisse cum nostro D. As with a prophet's look and prophet's voice
He rais'd his ominous warning: they who heard
Wonder'd, and they who rear'd the stake perform'd
With half-unwilling hands their slacken'd toil,
And doubted what might follow.

Not unseen
Rear'd they the stake, and piled around the wood;
In sight of Orleans and the Maiden's host,²
Had Suffolk's arrogant fierceness bade the work
Of death be done. The Maiden's host beheld;
At once in eager wrath they rais'd the loud
And general clamour, "Lead us to the foe!"
"Not upon us, O God!" the Maid exclaim'd,
"Not upon us cry out the innocent blood!"
And bade the signal sound. In the English camp
The clarion and the trumpet's blare was heard;
In haste they seize their arms, in haste they form,
Some by bold words seeking to hide their fear
Even from themselves, some silently in prayer,
For much their hearts misgave them.

But the rage
Of Suffolk swell'd within him. "Speed your work!"
Exclaim'd the injurious earl; "kindle the pile,
That France may see the fire, and in defeat
Feel aggravated shame!"

And now they bound
The herald to the stake: he cried aloud,
And fix'd his eye on Suffolk, "Let not him
Who girdeth on his harness boast himself
As he that puts it off!"³ They come; they come!
God and the Maid!"

The host of France approach'd
And Suffolk eagerly beheld the fire
Brought near the pile; when suddenly a shout
Toward Orleans call'd his eye, and thence he saw
A man-at-arms upon a barded steed
Come thundering on.

As when Chederles comes⁴

præstantissimo, qui similiter ejusdem aquæ haustu mortalitatem exuerit, divagari, gaudentem præliis, adesse in bello melioribus, aut si qui ejus opem imploraverint, cujuscunque tandem sint religionis."—Bushequins.

"The Persians say, that Alexander coming to understand, that in the mountain of Kaf there was a great cave, very black and dark, wherein ran the water of immortality, would needs take a journey thither. But being afraid to lose his way in the cave, and considering with himself that he had committed a great oversight in leaving the more aged in cities and fortified places, and keeping about his person only young people, such as were not able to advise him, he ordered to be brought to him some old man, whose counsel he might follow in the adventure he was then upon. There were in the whole army but two brothers, named Chidder and Elias, who had brought their father along with them, and this good old man had his sons go and tell Alexander, that to go through with the design he had undertaken, his only way were to take a mare that had a colt at her heels, and to ride upon her into the cave, and leave the colt at the entrance of it, and the mare would infallibly bring him back again to the same place without any trouble. Alexander thought the advice so good, that he would not take any other person with him in that journey but those two brothers, leaving the rest of his retinue at the entrance of the cave. He advanced so far that he came to a gate, so well polished, that notwithstanding the great darkness, it gave light enough to let him see there was a bird fastened thereto. The bird asked Alexander what he would have? he made answer that he looked for the Water of immortality. The bird asked him, what

To aid the Moslem on his deathless horse,
Swaying the sword with such resistless arm,
Such mightiest force, as he had newly quaff'd
The hidden waters of eternal youth,
Till with the copious draught of life and strength
Inebriate ; such, so fierce, so terrible,
Came Conrade through the camp. Aright, aleft,
The affrighted foemen scatter from his spear ;
Onward he comes, and now the circling throng
Fly from the stake, and now he checks his course,
And cut's the herald's bonds, and bids him live
To arm, and fight, and conquer.

"Haste thee hence
To Orleans," cried the warrior. "Tell the chiefs
There is confusion in the English camp.
Bid them come forth." On Conrade's steed the youth
Leapt up, and hasten'd onward. He the while Turn'd to the war.

Like two conflicting clouds,
Pregnant with thunder, moved the hostile hosts.
Then man met man, then on the batter'd shield
Rung the loud lance, and through the darken'd sky
Fast fell the arrowy storm. Amid his foes
The Bastard's arm dealt irresistibly
The strokes of death ; and by his side the Maid
Led the fierce fight, the Maid, though all unused
To such rude conflict, now inspired by Heaven,
Flashing her flaming falchion through the troops,
That like the thunderbolt, where'er it fell,
Scatter'd the trembling ranks. The Saracen,
Though arm'd from Cashbin or Damascus, wields
A weaker sword ; nor might that magic blade
Compare with this, which Orliana saw
Flame in the ruffian Ardan's robber hand,
When, sick and cold as death, she turn'd away
Her dizzy eyes, lest they should see the fall
Of her own Amadis. Nor plated shield,
Nor the strong hauberk, nor the crested casque,
Stay that descending sword. Dreadful she moved,

was done in the world ? Mischief enough, replies Alexander, since there is no vice or sin but reigns there. Whereupon the bird getting loose and flying away, the gate opened and Alexander saw an Angel sitting, with a trumpet in his hand, holding it as if he were going to put it to his mouth. Alexander asked him his name. The Angel made answer his name was Raphael, and that he only staid for a command from God to blow the trumpet, and to call the dead to judgement. Which having said, he asks Alexander who he was ? I am Alexander, replied he, and I seek the Water of Immortality. The Angel gave him a stone and said to him, go thy ways, and look for another stone of the same weight with this, and then thou shalt find Immortality. Whereupon Alexander asked how long he had to live ? The Angel said to him, till such time as the heaven and the earth which encompass thee be turned to iron. Alexander being come out of the cave, sought a long time, and not meeting with any stone just of the same weight with the other, he put one into the balance which he thought came very near it, and finding but very little difference, he added thereto a little earth, which made the scales even ; it being God's intention to shew Alexander thereby, that he was not to expect immortality till he himself were put into the earth. At last Alexander having one day a fall off his horse in the barren ground of Ghur, they laid him upon the coat he wore over his armour, and covered him with his buckler to keep off the heat of the sun. Then, he began to comprehend the prophecy of the Angel, and was satisfied the hour of his death was at hand ; accordingly he died.

Like as the Angel of the Lord went forth
And smote his army, when the Assyrian king,
Haughty of Hamath and Sepharvaim fallen,
Blasphemed the God of Israel.

Yet the fight
Hung doubtful, where exempling hardest deeds,
Salisbury struck down the foe, and Fastolfe strove,
And in the hottest doings of the war
Towered Talbot. He, remembering the past day
When from his name the affrighted sons of France
Fled trembling, all astonish'd at their force
And wontless valour, rages round the field
Dreadful in anger : yet in every man
Meeting a foe fearless, and in the faith
Of Heaven's assistance firm.

The clang of arms
Reaches the walls of Orleans. For the war
Prepared, and confident of victory,
Forth speed the troops. Not when afar exhaled
The hungry raven snuffs the steam of blood
That from some carcass-cover'd field of fame
Taints the pure air, flies he more eagerly
To feed upon the slain, than the Orleanites,
Impatient now for many an ill endured
In the long siege, to wreak upon their foes
Due vengeance. Then more fearful grew the fray ;
The swords that late flash'd to the evening sun
Now quench'd in blood their radiance.

O'er the host
Howl'd a deep wind that ominous of storms
Roll'd on the lurid clouds. The blacken'd night
Frown'd, and the thunder from the troubled sky
Roar'd hollow. Javelins clash'd and bucklers rang ;
Shield prest on shield ; loud on the helmet jarr'd
The ponderous battle axe ; the frequent groan
Of death commingling with the storm was heard,
And the shrill shriek of fear. Even such a storm
Before the walls of Chartres quell'd the pride
Of the third Edward, when the heavy hail

"They add to this fable, that the two brothers Chidder and Elias drunk of the water of immortality, and that they are still living but invisible, Elias upon the earth and Chidder in the water ; wherein the latter hath so great power, that those who are in danger of being destroyed by water, if they earnestly pray, vowing an offering to him, and firmly believing that he can relieve them, shall escape the danger."

Ambassador's Travels.

"Khidir and Ehas occupy a distinguished place in the legion of prophets. The name of the first signifies verdant, alluding to the power which he possessed of producing, wherever he trod, the most beautiful and enchanting verdure. These two are regarded as the protectors and tutelary gods of travellers ; the former upon the sea, the latter upon the land ; and they are thought to be incessantly employed in promoting these salutary objects. In their rapid and uniform courses, they are believed to meet once a year at Mme, in the environs of Mecca, the day on which the pilgrims are assembled." — D' Osson's History of the Ottoman Empire.

"Now does the day grow blacker than before,
The swords that glistened late, in purple gore
Now all disdain'd, their former brightness lose.

May's Edward III.

And again, Book 7.

The glittering swords that shone so bright of late
Are quickly all disdain'd with purple gore.

Smote down his soldiers, and the conqueror heard
Gon in the tempest, and remembered then
With a remorseful sense of Christian fear
What misery he had caused, and in the name
Of blessed Mary vowed a vow of peace.¹

Lo! where the holy banner waved aloft,
The lambent lightnings play. Irradiate round,
As with a blaze of glory, o'er the field
It stream'd miraculous splendour. Then their hearts
Sunk, and the English trembled; with such fear
Possess'd, as when the Canaanites beheld
The sun stand still on Gibeon, at the voice
Of that king-conquering warrior, he who smote
The country of the hills, and of the south,
From Baal-gad to Hahak, and their chiefs,
Even as the Lord commanded. Swift they fled
From that portentous banner, and the sword
Of France; though Talbot with vain valiancy
Yet urged the war, and stemm'd alone the tide
Of battle. Even their leaders felt dismay;
Fastolfe fled first, and Salisbury in the rout
Mingled, and all impatient of defeat,
Borne backward Talbot turns. Then echoed loud
The cry of conquest, deeper grew the storm
And darkness, hovering o'er on raven wing,
Brooded the field of death.

Nor in the camp
Deem themselves safe the trembling fugitives;
On to the forts they haste. Bewilder'd there
Amid the moats by fear and the thick gloom
Of more than midnight darkness, plunge the troops,
Crush'd by fast following numbers who partake
The death they give. As swoln with vernal snows
A mountain torrent hurries on its way,
Till at the brink of some abrupt descent
Arrived, with deafening clamour down it falls;
Thus borne along, tumultuously the troops
Driven by the force behind them, plunge amid
The liquid death. Then rose the dreadful cries
More dreadful, and the dash of breaking waters
That to the passing lightning as they broke
Open'd their depth.

Nor of the host so late
Exultant in the pride of long success,
A remnant had escaped, had not their chief,
Slow as he moved unwilling from the field,
What most might profit the defeated rank;
Bethought him. He, when he had gain'd the fort

Car il cheoit si grosses pierres que elles tuoient hommes et chevaux, et en furent les plus hardis tous esbahis. Adonques regarda le roy Dangleterre devers leglise de Nostre Dame de Chartres, et se voua et rendit devotement a Nostre Dame, et promist, et confessa si comme il dist depuis quil se accorderoit a la paix." — Froissart.

"But while he lodged there (before Chartres), his army making a horrible spoil of the whole country, there chanced an occasion, as the work of Heaven, which suddenly quailed his ambitious design to ruin France; for behold a horrible and extraordinary tempest of hail, thunder, and lightning,

Named from St. John, there kindled up on high
The guiding fire. Not unobserved it rose;
The watchful guards on Tournelles, and the pile
Of that proud city in remembrance fond Call'd London, light their beacons. Soon the fires
Flame on the summit of the circling forts
Which with their moats and crenellated walls,
Included Orleans. Far across the plain
They cast a lurid splendour; to the troops
Grateful, as to the way-worn traveller,
Wandering with parch'd feet o'er Arabian sands,
The far-seen cistern; he for many a league
Travelling the trackless desolate, where heaved
With tempest swell the desert billows round,
Pauses, and shudders at his perils past,
Then wild with joy speeds on to taste the wave
So long bewail'd.

Swift as the affrighted herd
Scud o'er the plain, when rattling thunder-cracks
Upon the bolted lightning follow close,
The English hasten to their sheltering forts,
Even there of safety doubtful, still appall'd
And trembling, as the pilgrim who by night
On his way wilder'd, to the wolf's deep howl
Hears the wood echo, when from close pursuit
Escaped, the topmost branch of some tall tree
He grasps close clinging, still of the wild beast
Fearful, his teeth jar, and the cold sweat stands
Upon his clammy limbs.

Nor now the Maid
Greedy of vengeance presses the pursuit.
She bids the trumpet of retreat resound;
A welcome note to the affrighted foe
Blew that loud blast, whereat obediently
The French, though eager on the invaders' heads
To wreak their wrath, stay their victorious sword.

Loud is the cry of conquest as they turn
To Orleans. There what few to guard the town
Unwilling had remain'd, haste forth to meet
The triumph. Many a blazing torch they held,
Which raised aloft amid the midnight storm
Flash'd far a festive light. The Maid advanced;
Deep through the sky the hollow thunders roll'd;²
Innocuous lightnings round the hallowed banner
Wreath'd their red radiance.

Through the city gate
Then as the laden convoy pass'd was heard
The shout of exultation; and such joy

fell with such violence as many horses and men in the army perished, as if that God had stretched forth his hand from heaven to stay his course." — De Serres.

² The circumstance of the Maid's entering Orleans at midnight in a storm of thunder and lightning is historically true.

"The Englishmen perceiving that they within could not long continue for want of vitails and powder, kept not their watch so diligently as they were accustomed, nor scoured not the country environed as they before had ordained. Whiche negligence the citizens shut in perceiving, sent word thereof to the French capitaines, which with Pucelle in the dedde tyme of the night, and in a greete rayne and thundre, with all their vitails and artillery entered into the cite."

Hall, ff. 127.

Shakspeare also notices this storm. Striking as the circumstance is, Chaplain has omitted it.

The men of Orleans at that welcome sight
Possess'd, as when from Bactria late subdued,
The mighty Macedonian led his troops
Amid the Sogdian desert, where no stream
Wastes on the wild its fertilizing waves.
Fearful alike to pause, or to proceed;
Scorch'd by the sun that o'er their morning march
Steam'd his hot vapours, heart-subdued, and faint;
Such joy as then they felt, when from the heights
Burst the soul-gladdening sound, for thence was seen
The evening sun silvering the fertile vale,
Where Oxus roll'd below.

Clamours of joy
Echo along the streets of Orleans, wont
Long time to hear the infant's feeble cry,
The mother's frantic shriek, or the dread sound,
When from the cannon burst its stores of death.
Far flames the fire of joy on ruin'd piles
And high heap'd carcasses, whence scared away
From his abhorred men, on clattering wing
Rose the night-raven slow.

In the English forts
Sad was the scene. There all the livelong night
Steal in the straggling fugitives; as when
Past is the storm, and o'er the azure sky
Serenely shines the sun, with every breeze
The waving branches drop their gather'd rain,
Renewing the remembrance of the storm.

JOAN OF ARC.

THE SEVENTH BOOK.

Strong were the English forts¹, by daily toil
Of thousands rear'd on high, when to ensure
His meditated conquest Salisbury
Resolved from Orleans to shut out all means
Of human succour. Round the city stretch'd
Their line continuous, massy as the wall
Ers't by the fearful Roman on the bounds
Of Caledonia raised, when soul-enslaved
The race degenerate fear'd the car-borne chiefs
Who moved from Morven down.

Broad battlements
Crested the bulwark, and safe standing place

¹ The patience and perseverance of a besieging army in those ages appear almost incredible to us now. The camp of Ferdinand before Granada swelled into a city. Edward III. made a market town before Calais. Upon the Captain's refusal to surrender, says Barnes, "he began to entrench himself strongly about the city, setting his own tent directly against the chief gates at which he intended to enter; then he placed bastions between the town and the river, and set out regular streets, and reared up decent buildings of strong timber between the trenches, which he covered with thatch, reed, broom and skins. Thus he encompassed the whole town of Calais, from Ralsan on the north-west side to Courgain on the north-east, all along by Sangate, at Port and Fort de Nicolay, commonly by the English called Newland-bridge, down by Hammes, Cologne and Marké; so that his camp looked like a spacious city, and was usually by strangers, that came thither to market, called New Calais. For

For archer or for man-at-arms was there.
The frequent buttress at just distance rose
Declining from its base, and sixty forts
Seem'd in their strength to render all secure.
But loftier and massier than the rest,
As though of some large castle each the keep,
Stood six square fortresses with turrets flank'd,
Piles of unequal'd strength, though now deem'd weak
'Gainst puiſſance more than mortal. Safely thence
The skilful Bowman, entering with his eye
The city, might, himself the while unseen
Through the long opening aim his winged death.
Loire's waves diverted fill'd the deep-dug moat
Circling the whole; a bulwark vast it was
As that which round their camp and stranded ships
The Achæans raised, a common sepulchre
Of thousands slaughter'd, and the doom'd death place
Of many a chief, when Priam's virtuous son
Assail'd them, then in hope, with favouring Jove.

But cowering now amid their sheltering forts
Trembled the invading host. Their leader's care
In anxious vigilance prepares to ward
The assault expected. Rightly he ares
The Maid's intent, but vainly did he seek
To kindle in their breasts the wonted flame
Of valour; for, by prodigies unmann'd,
They wait the morn. The soldiers' pride was gone;
The blood was on their swords, their bucklers lay
Defiled and unrepair'd, they sharpen'd not
Their blunted spears, the affrighted archer's hand
Relax'd not his bent bow. To them, confused
With fears of unknown danger, the long night
Was dreadful, but more dreadful dawn'd the day.

The morning came; the martial Maid arose;
Lovely in arms she moved. Around the gate,
Eager again for conquest, throng the troops.
High tower'd the Son of Orleans, in his strength
Poising the ponderous spear. His batter'd shield,
Witnessing the fierce fray of yesternight,
Hung on his sinewy arm.

"Maiden of Arc,"

So as he spake approaching, cried the chief,
"Well hast thou proved thy mission, ~~as~~ by words
And miracles attested when dismay'd
The grave theologists dismiss'd their doubts,
So in the field of battle now confirm'd.
Yon well-fenced forts protect the fugitives,
And seem as in their strength they mock'd our force.

this prince's reputation for justice was so great, that to his markets (which he held in his camp twice every week, viz. on Tuesdays and Saturdays for flesh, fish, bread, wine and ale, with cloth and all other necessities,) there came not only his friends and allies from England, Flanders and Aquitain, but even many of king Philip's subjects and confederates conveyed thither their cattle and other commodities to be sold."

Urbem oculis, discitque locos caussaque locorum."
Silius Italicus, xii. 567.

Nec laudavit equum, nit-de nec cassidis altam
Compit adornavitque jubam."

Statius.

Yet must they fall."

"And fall they shall!" replied The Maid of Orleans. "Ere the sun be set The lily on that shattered wall shall wave Triumphant. — Men of France! ye have fought well On yon blood-reeking plain. Your humbled foes Lurk trembling now behind their massy walls. Wolves that have ravaged the neglected flock! The Shepherd — the Great Shepherd is arisen! Ye fly! yet shall not ye by flight escape His vengeance. Men of Orleans! it were vain By words to waken wrath within your breasts. Look round! Your holy buildings and your homes — Ruins that choke the way! your populous town — One open sepulchre! who is there here That does not mourn a friend, a brother slain, A parent famished, . . . or his dear loved wife Torn from his bosom . . . outcast . . . broken-hearted . . . Cast on the mercy of mankind?"

She ceased;

A cry of indignation from the host Burst forth, and all impatient for the war Demand the signal. These Dunois arrays In four battalions. Xaintrailles, tried in war, Commands the first; Xaintrailles, who oftentimes Defeated, oft a prisoner, and as oft Released for ransom, both with friend and foe Growing repute of active hardihood, And martial skill obtained; so erst from earth Anteus vaunting in his giant bulk, When grasped by force Herculean, down he fell Vanquish'd, anon uprose more fierce for war.

Gaucour the second battle led, true friend And faithful servant of the imprison'd Duke; In counsel provident, in action prompt, Collected always, always self-control'd, He from the soldiers' confidence and love Prompter obedience gain'd, than ever fear Forced from the heart reluctant.

The third band Alençon leads. On Verneuil's fatal field The day when Buchan and the Douglas died, Wounded and senseless with the loss of blood, He fell, and there being found, was borne away

1 " Ipsam, Menalia puerum cum vidit in umbrâ,
Dianam, tenero signantem granina passu,
Ignovisse ferunt comiti, Dictæque tela
Ipsam, et Amyclæas humeris aptasse pharetras.

Statius, IV. 256.

2 Gladdisdale must be the sir William Gladdisdale of Shakespear. Stowe calls him William Gladesdale.

It is proper to remark that I have introduced no fictitious names among the killed. They may all be found in the various histories.

3 " Neque enim solis excussa lacertis
Lanceæ, sed tenso balistæ turbine rapta,
Haud, unum contenta latus transire, quiescit;
Sed pandens perque arma viam, perque ossa, relicta
Morte, fugit: superest telo, post vulnora, cursus."

Lucan. III.

Vegetius says, that the balista discharged darts with such rapidity and violence, that nothing could resist their force. This engine was used particularly to discharge darts of a sur-

A prisoner, in the lils of that defeat Participant, partaking not the shame:
But for his rank and high desert, the King Had ransom'd him, doom'd now to meet the foe With better fortune.

O'er the last presides The bastard son of Orleans, great in arms. His prowess knew the foes, and his fair fame Acknowledged, since before his stripling arm Flew Warwick; Warwick, he whose wide renown Greece knew and Antioch and the holy soil Of Palestine, since there in arms he went On gallant pilgrimage; yet by Dunois Baffled, and yielding him the conqueror's praise. And by his side the martial Maiden pass'd, Lovely in arms as that Arcadian boy Parthenopæus¹, when the war of beasts Disdaining, he to cope with men went forth, Bearing the bow and those Dictæan shafts Diana gave, when she the youth's fair form Saw, soften'd, and forgave the mother's fault.

Loup's was the nearest fort. Here Gladdisdale² Commands the English, who as the enemy Moved to the assault, from bow and arbalist Their shafts and quarrels shower'd. Nor did they use Hand-weapons only and hand-engines here, Nor by the arm alone, or bow-string sped The missile flew, but driven by the strain'd force Of the balista³, in one body spent Stay'd not; through arms and men it made its way, And leaving death behind, still held its course By many a death unclogg'd. With rapid march Onward the assailants came, and now they reach'd Where by the bayle's embattled wall⁴ in arms The knights of England stood. There Poyneys shook His lance, and Gladdisdale his heavy mace For the death-blow prepared. Alençon here, And here the Bastard came, and by the Maid, That daring man who to the English host Then insolent of many a conquest gain'd, Had borne her bidding. A rude coat of mail Unhosed, unhooded, as of lowly line⁵ He wore, though here amid the high-born chiefs Pre-eminent for prowess. On his head prising length and weight, and often many small ones together. Its form was not unlike that of a broken bow; it had two arms, but strait and not curve like those of a cross-bow of which the whole acting force consists in bending the bow. That of the balista as well as of the catapulta, lies in its cords.—Rollin.

4 " The bayle or lists was a space on the outside of the ditch, surrounded by strong palisades, and sometimes by a low embattled wall. In the attack of fortresses, as the range of the machines then in use did not exceed the distance of four stadia, the besiegers did not carry on their approaches by means of trenches, but begun their operations above ground with the attack of the bayle or lists, where many feats of chivalry were performed by the knights and men at arms, who considered the assault of that work as particularly belonging to them, the weight of their armour preventing them from scaling the walls. As this part was attacked by the knights and men at arms, it was also defended by those of the same rank in the place, whence many single combats were fought here. This was at the first investing of the place." — Groce.

5 In France only persons of a certain estate, called un fief de hauberc, were permitted to wear a hauberk, which was the ar-

A black plume shadow'd the rude-featured helm.¹
Then was the war of men, when front to front
They rear'd the hostile hand, for low the wall
Where an assallant's upward-driven spear
Might reach his enemy.

As Alençon moved,
On his crown-crested helm² with ponderous blow
Fell Gladdisdale's huge mace. Back he recoil'd
Astounded; soon recovering, his sharp lance
Thrust on the warrior's shield: there fast-infix'd,
Nor could Alençon the deep-driven spear
Recover, nor the foeman from his grasp
Wrench the contended weapon. Fierce again
He lifts the mace, that on the ashen hilt
Fell full; it shiver'd, and the Frenchman held
A pointless truncheon. Where the Bastard fought,
The spear of Poynings, through his plated mail
Pierced, and against the iron fence beneath³
Blunted its point. Again he thrust the spear;
At once Dunois on his broad buckler met
The unarming stroke, and aim'd with better hap
His javelin. Through his sword-arm did it pierce
Maugre the mail: hot from the streaming wound
He pluck'd the weapon forth, and in his breast
Clean through the hauberk drove.

But there the wrr
Raged fiercest where the martial Maiden moved
A minister of wrath; for thither throng'd
The bravest champions of the adverse host.
And on her either side two warriors stood
Protecting her, and aiming at her foes
Watchful their weapons, of themselves the while Little regarding: on the one side he
Who to the English had her bidding borne;
Firmly he stood, untired and undismay'd,
Though many a spear against his burgonet
Was thrust, and on his arm the buckler hung

mour of a knight. Esquires might only wear a simple coat of mail without the hood and hose. Had this aristocratic distinction consisted in the ornamental part of the arms alone, it would not have been objectionable. In the enlightened and free states of Greece, every soldier was well provided with defensive arms. In Rome, a civic wreath was the reward of him who should save the life of a citizen. But to use the words of Dr. Gillies, "the miserable peasants of modern Europe are exposed without defence as without remorse, by the ambition of men, whom the Greeks would have styled tyrants."

¹ "The burgonet, which represented the shape of the head and features.

² "Earls and dukes frequently wore their coronets on the crests of their helmets. At the battle of Agincourt Henry wore "a bright helmet, whereupon was set a crowne of gold, repleate with pearle and precious stones, marvellous rich." — Stowe.

³ A breast-plate was sometimes worn under the hauberk.

The nature of this barrier has been explained in a previous note. The possibility of leaping upon it is exemplified in the following adventure, which is characteristic of the period in which it happened (1370).

"At that time there was done an extraordinary feat of arms by a Scotch knight, named sir John Assueton, being one of those men of arms of Scotland, who had now entered king Edward's pay. This man left his rank with his spear in his hand, his page riding behind him, and went towards the barriers of Noyon, where he alighted, saying, 'Here, hold my horse, and stir not from hence;' and so he came to the barriers. There were there at that time sir John de Roys, and

Heavy, thick-bristled with the hostile shafts,
Even like a porcupine when in his rage
Roused, he collects within him all his force,
Himself a quiver. On the other hand
Compelling with him to protect the Maid,
Conrade maintain'd the fight; at all points arm'd,
A jazerant of double mail he wore,
Its weight in little time had wearied one
Of common strength; but unencumber'd he
And unfatigued, alertly moved in it,
And wielded with both hands a battle-axe,
Which gave no second stroke; for where it fell,
Not the strong buckler nor the plated mail
Might save, nor crested casque. On Molyn's head,
As at the Maid he aim'd his javelin,
Forceful it fell, and shiver'd with the blow
The iron helm, and to his brain-pan drove
The fragments. At his full the enemy,
Stricken with instantaneous fear, gave way.
That instant Conrade, with an active bound,
Sprung on the battlements⁴; and there he stood,
Keeping the ascent. The herald and the Maid
Follow'd, and soon the exulting cry of France
Along the lists was heard, as there they saw
Her banner planted. Gladdisdale beheld,
And hastened from his well-defended post,
That where immediate danger more required
There he might take his stand; against the Maid
He bent his way, and hoped one happy blow
Might end at once the new-raised hopes of France,
And by her death, to the English arms their old
Ascendancy restore. Nor did not Joan
Armed his purpose, but with lifted shield
Prepared she stood, and poised her sparkling spear.
The English chief came on; he raised his mace;
With circling force the iron weight swung high,⁵
And Gladdisdale with his collected strength

sir Lancelot de Lorris, with ten or twelve more, who all wondered what this knight designed to do. He for his part being close at the barriers said unto them, 'Gentlemen, I am come hither to visit you, and because I see you will not come forth of your barriers to me, I will come in to you, if I may, and prove my knighthood against you. Win me if you can.' And with that he leaped over the bars, and began to lay about him like a lion, he at them and they at him; so that he alone fought thus against them all for near the space of an hour, and hurt several of them. And all the while those of the town beheld with much delight from the walls and their garret windows his great activity, strength and courage; but they offered not to do him any hurt, as they might very easily have done, if they had been minded to cast stones or darts at him: but the French knights charged them to the contrary, saying 'how they should let them alone to deal with him.' When matters had continued thus about an hour, the Scotch page came to the barriers with his master's horse in his hand, and said in his language, 'Sir, pray come away, it is high time for you to leave off now: for the army is marched off out of sight.' The knight heard his man, and then gave two or three terrible strokes about him to clear the way, and so, armed as he was, he leaped back again over the barriers and mounted his horse, having not received any hurt; and turning to the Frenchman, said, 'Adieu, sirs! I thank you for my diversion.' And with that he rode after his man upon the spur towards the army." — Joshua Barnes, p. 801.

⁴ "Le massue est une forte courroie pour tenir l'arme et l'empêcher de glisser, et d'autres trois chaînons de fer, auxquels pend un

Impell'd the blow. The man of lowly line
That instant rush'd between, and rear'd his shield
And met the broken stroke, and thrust his lance
Clean through the gorget of the English knight.
A gallant man, of no ignoble line,
Was Gladdisdale. His sires had lived in peace;
They heap'd the hospitable hearth, they spread
The feast, their vassals loved them, and afar
The traveller told their fame. In peace they died,
And to their ancient burial-place were borne
With book and bell, torches, and funeral chaunt;
And duly for their souls the neighbouring monks
The solemn office sung. Now far away
Their offspring falls, the last of all his race,
Slain in a foreign land, and doom'd to share
A common grave.

Then terror seized the host,
Their chieftain dead. And lo! where on the wall,
Maintain'd of late by Gladdisdale so well,
The Son of Orleans stands, and sways around
His falchion, keeping thus at bay the foe,
Till on the battlements his comrades climb
And raise the shout of conquest. Then appall'd
The English fled: nor fled they unpursued.
For mingling with the foremost fugitives,
The gallant Conrade rush'd; and with the throng
The knights of France together o'er the bridge
Press'd forward. Nor the garrison within
Durst let the ponderous portcullis fall,
For in the entrance of the fort the fight
Raged fiercely, and together through the gate
The vanquish'd English and their eager foes
Pass'd in the flying conflict.

Well I deem
And wisely did the heroic Spaniard act
At Vera-Cruz, when he his yet sound ships
Dismantling, left no spot where treacherous fear
Might still with wild and wistful eye look back:
For knowing no retreat, his desperate troops
In conquest sought their safety; victors hence
At Tlascala, and o'er the Cholulans,
And by Otompan, on that bloody field
When Mexico her patriot thousands pour'd,
Fierce in vain valour, on their dreadful foes.
There was a portal in the English fort boulet peasant huit livres. Il n'y a pas d'homme aujourd'hui capable de manier une telle arme. — Le Grand.

The arms of the Medici family "are romantically referred to Averardo de Medici, a commander under Charlemagne, who for his valour in destroying the gigantic plunderer Mugello, by whom the surrounding country was laid waste, was honoured with the privilege of bearing for his arms six palle or balls, as characteristic of the iron balls that hung from the mace of his fierce antagonist, the impression of which remained on his shield." — Roscoe.

Scudery enumerates the mace among the instruments of war, in a passage whose concluding line may vie with any bathos of sir Richard Blackmore.

"La confusion se fait de toutes parts
Pierres, piques, espieux, masser, flèches et dards,
Lances et javelots, sabres et marteaux d'armes,
Dangereuses instruments des guerriers alarmes."

Alaric.

1 "Vitruvius observes, in treating upon fortified walls, that near the towers the walls should be cut within side the breadth of the tower, and that the ways broke in this manner should

Which open'd on the wall¹; a speedier path
In the hour of safety, whence the soldier's eye
Might overlook the river's pleasant course.
Fierce in the gate-way rag'd the deadly war;
For there the Maiden strove, and Conrade there,
And he of lowly line, braver than whom Fought not in that day's battle. Of success
Desperate, for from above the garrison
(Lest upon friend and enemy alike
The indiscriminating blow should light,)
Could give no aid, the English of that way
Bethought them; by that egress they forsook
St. Loup's, and the Orleansites with shouts of joy
Beheld the Virgin's banner on its height
In triumph planted. Swift along the wall
The English haste to St. John's neighbouring fort,
Flying with fearful speed. Nor from pursuit
The victors ceased, but with the fugitives
Mingled and waged the war; and combatants,
Lock'd in each other's grasp, together fell Precipitate.

But foremost of the French,
Dealing destruction, Conrade made his way
Along the wall, and to the nearest fort
Came in pursuit; nor did not then the chief
What most might serve bethink him; but he took
His stand in the portal, and first looking back,
Lifted his voice aloud; three times he raised,
Cheering and calling on his countrymen,
That voice o'er all the uproar heard afar,
Then to the strife address himself, assail'd
By numerous foes, who clamorously now
Menaced his single person. He the while
Stood firm, not vainly confident, or rash,
But in his vantage more than his own strength
Trusting; for narrow was the portal way,
To one alone fit passage, from above
Not overbrow'd by jutting parapet,²
Whence aught might crush him. He in double mail
Was arm'd; a massy burgonet, well tried
In many a hard-fought field, helming his head;
And fenced with iron plates, a buckler broad
Hung from his neck. Nor to dislodge the chief
Could the English bring their numbers, for the way
By upward steps presented from the fort

only be joined and continued by beams laid upon the two extremities, without being made fast with iron; that in case the enemy should make himself master of any part of the wall, the besieged might remove this wooden bridge, and thereby prevent his passage to the other parts of the wall and into the towers." — Rollin.

The precaution recommended by Vitruvius had not been observed in the construction of the English walls. On each side of every tower, a small door opened upon the wall; and the garrison of one tower are represented in the poem as flying by this way from one to shelter themselves in the other. With the enterprising spirit and the defensive arms of chivalry, the subsequent events will not be found to exceed probability.

² The machicolation: a projection over the gate-way of a town or castle, contrived for letting fall great weights, scalding water, &c. on the heads of any assailants who might have got close to the gate. "Machecollare, or machecoulare," says Coke, "is to make a warlike device over a gate or other passage like to a grate, through which scalding water, or ponderous or offensive things, may be cast upon the assailants."

A narrow ascent, where one alone could meet
The war. Yet were they of their numbers proud,
Though useless numbers were in that strait path,
Save by assault unceasing to out-last
A single warrior, who at length must sink
Fatigued with slaughter, and by toil foredone Succumb.

There was amid the garrison
A gallant knight who at Verneuil had fought,
And good renown for feats of arms achieved
Had gain'd in that day's victory. For him
His countrymen made way, and he his lance
Thrust upward against Conrade, who perceived
The intent, and as the weapon touch'd his shield
Smote with his battle-axe the ashen shaft;
Then plucking from the shield the severed head,
He threw it back.¹ With wary bend the foe
Shrunk from the flying death; yet not in vain
From that strong hand the fate-fraught weapon flew:
Full on the corslet of a meaner man.²
It fell, and pierced him where the heaving lungs,
In vital play distended, to the heart
Roll back their brighten'd tide: from the deep wound
The red blood gush'd; prone on the steps he fell,
And in the strong convulsive grasp of death
Grasp'd his long pike. Of unrecorded name
The soldier died; and yet he left behind
One who then never said her daily prayers
Of him forgetful; who to every tale
Of the distant war lending an eager ear,
Grew pale and trembled. At her cottage door
The wretched one shall sit, and with fix'd eye
Gaze on the path, where on his parting steps
Her last look hung. Nor ever shall she know
Her husband dead, but cherishing a hope,
Whose falsehood inwardly she knows too well,
Feel life itself with that false hope decay;
And wake at night from miserable dreams
Of his return, and weeping o'er her babe,
Too surely think that soon that fatherless child
Must of its mother also be bereft.

Dropping his broken spear, the exasperate knight
Drew forth the sword, and up the steps advanced,
Like one who disregarded in his strength
The enemy's vantage, destined to abide
That rashness dearly. Conrade stood prepared,
Held forth his buckler, and his battle-axe
Uplifted. Where the buckler was beneath
Rounded, the falchion struck, a bootless blow
To pierce its plated folds; more forcefully
Full on his crested helm the battle-axe
Descended, driving in both crest and crown;
From the knight's eyes at that death-stroke, the blood

Started; with blood the chambers of the brain
Were fill'd; his breast-plate with convulsive throes
Heaved as he fell. Victorious, he the prize
At many a tournament had borne away
In mimic war; happy, if so content
With bloodless glory, he had never left
The mansion of his sires.

But terrified
The English stood, nor durst adventure now
Near that death-doing foe. Amid their host
Was one who well could from the stubborn yew
Send his sharp shafts; well skill'd in wood-craft he,
Even as the merry outlaws who their haunts
In Sherwood held, and bade their bugles rouse
The sleeping stag, ere on the web-woven grass
The dew-drops sparkled to the rising sun.
He safe in distance at the warrior aim'd
The feather'd dart; with force he drew the bow;
Loud on his bracer struck the sounding string,
And swift and strong the well-fledged arrow flew.
It pierced the shield, and reach'd, but reach'd in vain,
The breast-plate: while he fitted to the bow
A second arrow, Conrade raised his voice,
Shouting for timely succour to secure
The entrance he had gain'd. Nor was the call
Unheard, nor unobey'd; responsive shouts
Announced assistance nigh; the Orleanites
From St. Loup's captured fort along the wall
Sped to support him; cheering was the sound
Of their near footsteps to the chief; he drew
His falchion forth, and down the steps he went.
Then terror seized the English, for their foes
Press'd thro' the open portal, and the sword
Of Conrade was among them making way.
Not to the Trojans when their ships were lost
More dreadful the Rutlian hero seem'd,
Then hoping well to right himself in arms;
Nor with more fury through the streets of Paris
Rush'd the fierce king of Sarza, Rodomont,
Clad in his dragon mail.

Like some tall rock,
Around whose billow-beaten foot the waves
Spend their vain force, unshaken Conrade stood,
When drawing courage from despair the foe
Renew'd the contest. Through the throng he hew'd
His way unhurt amid the arrowy shower,
Though on his shield and helm the darts fell fast,
As the scar'd leaves that from the trembling tree
The autumnal whirlwind shakes. Nor did he pause
Till to the gate he came, and with strong hand
Seized on the massy bolts. Thesc as he drew,
Full on his helm a weighty English sword
Descended; swift he turn'd to wreak his wrath,
When lo! the assailant gasping on the ground,

¹ I have met with one instance in English history, and only one, of throwing the spear after the manner of the ancients. It is in Stowe's chronicle. "1442. The 30th of January, a challenge was done in Smithfield within lists, before the king; the one sir Philip de Beawse of Arragon a knight, and the other an esquire of the king's house called John Ausley or Astley. These coming to the fields, took their tents, and there was the knight's sonne made knight by the king, and so brought again to his father's tent. Then the heraldis of armes called them by name to doe their battel, and so they came both, all armed, with their weapons; the knight came with his sword drawn, and the esquire with his speare. The esquire cast his speare against the knight, but the knight avoiding it with his sword, cast it to the ground. Then the esquire took his axe and went against the knight suddenly, on whom he stroke many strokes, hard and sore upon his basenet, and on his hand, and made him loose and let fall his axe to the ground, and brast up his limbes three times, and caught his dagger and would have smitten him in the face, for to have slaine him in the field; and then the king cried Hoo, and so they were departed and went to their tents, and the king dubbed John Astley knight for his vallant torney, and the knight of Arragon offered his armes at Windsor."

² The corslet was chiefly worn by pikemen.

Cleft by the Maiden's falchion; she herself
To the foe opposing with her herald's aid,
For they alone, following the adventurous steps
Of Conrade, still kept pace as he advanced,
Shielded him while with eager hand he drew
The bolts: the gate turn'd slow; forth leapt the chief,
And shiver'd with his battle-axe the chains
That held on high the bridge: down fell the bridge
Rebounding; the victorious troops rush'd in;
And from their walls the Orleanites with shouts
And tears of joy beheld on Fort St. John
The lilies wave.

"On to Fort London! on!"

Cried Conrade; "Xaintrailles! while the day endures
Once more advance to certain victory!
Force ye the lists, and fill the moat, and bring
The battering-ram against their gates and walls.
Anon I shall be with you." Thus he said;
Then to the damsel. "Maid of Arc! awhile
Let thou and I withdraw, and by short rest
Renew our strength." So saying he his helm
Unlaced, and in the Loire's near flowing stream,
Cool'd his hot face. The maid her head unhelm'd,
And stooping to the stream, reflected there

¹ This woman, who is always respectfully named in French history, had her punishment both in herself and in her child.

"This fair Agnes had been five years in the service of the queen, during which she had enjoyed all the pleasures of life, in wearing rich clothes, furred robes, golden chains, and precious stones; and it was commonly reported that the king often visited her, and maintained her in a state of concubinage, for the people are more inclined to speak ill than well of their superiors.

"The affection the king showed her was as much for her gaiety of temper, pleasing manners, and agreeable conversation, as for her beauty. She was so beautiful that she was called the Fairest of the Fair, and the Lady of Beauty, as well on account of her personal charms, as because the king had given her for life the castle of Beaufort, near Paris. She was very charitable, and most liberal in her alms, which she distributed among such churches as were out of repair, and to beggars. It is true that Agnes had a daughter who lived but a short time, which she said was the king's, and gave it to him as the proper father; but the king always excused himself as not having any claim to it. She may indeed have called in help, for the matter was variously talked of.

"At length she was seized with a bowel complaint, and was a long time ill, during which she was very contrite, and sincerely repented of her sins. She often remembered Mary Magdalene, who had been a great sinner, and devoutly invoked God and the Virgin Mary to her aid like a true Catholic: after she had received the sacraments, she called for her book of prayers, in which she had written with her own hand the verses of St. Bernard to repeat them. She then made many gifts, (which were put down in writing, that her executors might fulfil them, with the other articles of her will,) which, including alms and the payment of her servants, might amount to nearly sixty thousand crowns.

"Her executors were Jacques Cœur, councillor and master of the wardrobe to the king, master Robert Poitevin, physician, and master Stephen Chevalier, treasurer to the king, who was to take the lead in the fulfilment of her will, should it be his gracious pleasure.

"The fair Agnes, perceiving that she was daily growing weaker, said to the lord de la Trimouille, the lady of the seneschal of Poitou, and one of the king's equerries called Gouffier, in the presence of all her damsels, that our fragile life was but a stinking ordure,

Saw her white plumage stain'd with human blood!
Shuddering she saw, but soon her steady soul
Collected: on the banks she laid her down,
Freely awhile resplending, for her breath
Still panted from the fight: silent they lay,
And gratefully the cooling breezes bathed
Their throbbing temples.

Eve was drawing on

The sun-beams on the gently-waving stream
Danced sparkling. Lost in thought the warrior lay,
Then as if waking from a dream he said,
"Maiden of Arc! at such an hour as this,
Beneath the o'er-arching forest's chequer'd shade,
With that lost woman have I wander'd on,
Talking of years of happiness to come!
Oh! hours for ever fled! delightful hopes
Of the unsuspecting heart! I do believe
If Agnes on a worthier one had fix'd
Her love, that though my heart had nurst till death
Its sorrows, I had never on her choice
Cast one upbraiding . . . but to stoop to him!
A harlot! . . . an adulteress!"¹

In his eye

Fierce anger flash'd; anon of what she was

"She then required that her confessor would give her absolution from all her sins and wickedness, conformable to an absolution, which was, as she said, at Loches, which the confessor, on her assurance, complied with. After this she uttered a loud shriek, and called on the mercy of God and the support of the blessed Virgin Mary, and gave up the ghost on Monday, the 9th day of February, in the year 1449, about six o'clock in the afternoon. Her body was opened, and her heart interred in the church of the said abbey, to which she had been a most liberal benefactress; and her body was conveyed with many honours to Loches, where it was interred in the collegiate church of our Lady, to which also she had made many handsome donations and several foundations. May God have mercy on her soul, and admit it into Paradise." — Monstrelet, vol. ix. p. 97.

"On the 13th day of June, the seneschal of Normandy, count of Maulevrier, and son to the late Sir Pierre de Breze, killed at the battle of Montleher, went to the village of Romiers, near Dourdan, which belonged to him, for the sake of hunting. He took with him his lady, the princess Charlotte of France, natural daughter of the late King Charles VII. by Agnes Sorol. After the chase, when they were returned to Romiers to sup and lodge, the seneschal retired to a single-bedded room for the night; his lady retired also to another chamber, when moved by her disorderly passions (as the husband said) she called to her a gentleman from Poitou, named Pierre de la Vegne, who was head huntsman to the seneschal, and made him lie with her. This was told to the seneschal by the master of his household, called Pierre l'Apothicaire; when he instantly arose, and taking his sword, broke open the door of the chamber where his lady and the huntsman were in bed. The huntsman started up in his shirt, and the seneschal gave him first a severe blow with his sword on the head, and then thrust it through his body, and killed him on the spot. This done, he went into an adjoining room where his children lay, and finding his wife hid under the coverlid of their bed, dragged her thence by the arm along the ground, and struck her between the shoulders with his sword. On her raising herself on her knees, he ran his sword through her breast, and she fell down dead. He sent her body for interment to the abbey of Couleus, where her obsequies were performed, and he caused the huntsman to be buried in the garden of the house wherein he had been killed." — Monstrelet, vol. ii. p. 233.

Ere the contagious vices of the court
Polluted her, he thought. "Oh, happy age!"
He cried, "when all the family of man
Freely enjoy'd their goodly heritage,
And only bow'd the knee in prayer to God!
Calm flow'd the unruffled stream of years along,
Till o'er the peaceful rustic's head the hair
Grew grey in full of time. Then he would sit
Beneath the coetaneous oak, while round,
Sons, grandsons and their offspring join'd to form
The blameless merriment; and learnt of him
What time to yoke the oxen to the plow,
What hollow moanings of the western wind
Foretell the storm, and in what lurid clouds
The embryo lightning lies. Well pleased, he taught,
A heart smile glowing on his aged cheek,
Mild as the summer sun's decaying light.
Thus quietly the stream of life flow'd on,
Till in the shoreless ocean lost at length.
Around the bed of death his numerous race
Listen'd, in no unprofitable grief,
His last advice, and caught his latest sigh:
And when he died, as he had fallen asleep,
In his own ground, and underneath the tree
Which, planted at his birth, with him had grown,
And flourish'd in its strength when he decay'd,
They delved the narrow house: where oft at eve
Their children's children gathered round to hear
The example of his life and death impress'd.
Maiden! and such the evening of my days
Fondly I hoped; and would that I had lived
In those old times!, or till some better age
Slumber'd unborn; for this is a hard race,
An evil generation; nor by day
Nor in the night have respite from their cares
And wretchedness. But I shall be at rest
Soon, in that better world of peace and love
Where evil is not: in that better world,
Joan! we shall meet, and he too will be there,
Thy Theodore."

Soothed by his words, the Maid
Had listen'd sadly, till at that loved name
She wept. "Nay, Maid!" he cried, "I did not think
To wake a tear; . . . yet pleasant is thy grief!
Thou know'st not what it is, around thy heart
To have a false one wreath in yiper folds.
But to the battle! in the clang of arms,
We win forgetfulness."

Then from the bank
He sprung, and helm'd his head. The Maid arose
Bidding awhile adieu to gentle thoughts.
On to the fort they speed, whose name recall'd
England's proud capital to the English host
Now half subdued, anticipating death,
And vainly wishing they from her white cliffs

² The heart of Bruce was, by his own dying will, entrusted to Douglas to bear it to Jerusalem. This is one of the finest stories in the whole age of chivalrous history. Douglas shattered the heart in a golden case, and wore it round his neck; he landed in Spain on his way, and stooped to assist the

Had never spread the sail. Cold terror creeps
Through every nerve: already they look round
With haggard eyes, as seeking where to fly,
Though Talbot there presided, with their chief,
The dauntless Salisbury.

"Soldiers tried in arms!
Thus, hoping to revive with gallant speech
Their courage, Salisbury spake; "brave countrymen,
Victorious in so many a hard-fought fight,
What . . . shrink ye now dismay'd? Oh call to mind
The plains of Agincourt, where vanquish'd France
Fled with her thousands from your fathers' arms?
Have ye forgotten how our English swords,
On that illustrious day before Verneuil,
Cut down the flower of all their chivalry?
Then was that noble heart of Douglas pierced,²
Bold Buchan bit the earth, and Narbonne died,
And this Alençon, boaster as he is,
Cried mercy to his conqueror. Shall I speak
Of our victorious banner on the walls
Of Yenville and Baugenci triumphing:
And of that later hour of victory
When Clermont and the Bastard plied their spurs?
Shame! shame! that beaten boy is here in arms,
And ye will fly before the fugitives. . .
Fly from a woman! from a frantic girl!
Who with her empty mummeries tries to blast
Your courage; or if miracles she bring,
Aid of the Devil! Who is there among you
False to his country, . . . to his former fame,
To your old leader who so many a time
Hath led ye on to glory?"

From the host
There came a heartless shout; then Talbot's cheek
Grew red with indignation. "Earl!" said he,
Addressing Salisbury: "there is no hope
From these white-liver'd dastards, and this fort
Will fall an easy conquest. We must out
And gain the Tournelles, better fortified,
Fit to endure a siege: that hope in view,
Cow'd as they are, the men from very fear
May gather what will do for this poor turn
The work of courage."

Bravely thus he spake,
Advising well, and Salisbury replied:
"Rightly thou say'st. But, Talbot, could we reach
The sorceress in the battle, one sure blow
Might give us back, this hour, the mastery
So marvellously lost: nor difficult
To meet the wench, for from the battlements
I have beheld her foremost in attack,
Playing right valiantly the soldier's part.
In her the enemy have their strength, with her
Their strength would fall. And had we her but once
Within arm-stroke, witch though she be, methinks

Castilians against the Moors, — probably during the siege of Algeiras. There, in the heat of action, he took the heart from his neck, and cast it into the thick of the enemy, exclaiming, as Barbour has it,

"Now pass thou forth before
As thou wast wont in fight to be,
And I shall follow, or else die."

In this action he perished, and from that time the bloody heart has been borne by the family.

Her devilry could neither blunt the edge
Of thy good sword, or mine."

Thus communed they,
And through the host the gladdening tidings ran,
That they should seek the Tournelles. Then their hearts

Gather'd new strength, placing on those strong walls
Dependence; oh vain hope! for neither wall,
Nor moat, nor fort, can save, if fear within Palsy the soldier's arm.

Them issuing forth,
As from the river's banks they pass'd along,
The Maid beheld. "Lo! Conrade!" she exclaim'd,
"The foe advance to meet us... look! they lower
The bridge! and now they rush upon the troops...
A gallant onset! Dost thou mark the man
Who all this day has by our side endured
The hottest conflict? Often I beheld
His feats with wonder, but his prowess now
Makes all his actions in the former fight
Seem as of no account: knowest thou him?
There is not one amid the host of France,
Of fairer promise."

"He," the chief replied,
"Wretched and prodigal of life, achieves
The exploits of despair; a gallant youth,
Widow'd like me of hope, and but for whom
I had been seen among mankind no more.
Maiden! with me thy comrade in the war,
His arm is vow'd to heaven. Lo! where he stands
Bearing the battle's brunt!"

Nor paused they now
In further converse, to the perilous fray
Speeding, not unobserved; for Salisbury saw
And call'd on Talbot. Six, the bravest knights
And sworn with them, against the virgin's life
Address'd their course. She by the herald's side
Now urged the war, when on her white-plumed helm
The hostile falchion fell. On high she lifts
That hallowed sword, which in the tomb for her
Age after age, by miracle reserved,
Had lain, which time itself could not corrode,
How then might shield, or breast-plate, or close mail
Retund its edge? Beneath that edge her foe
Fell; and the knight who to avenge him came,
Smitten by Conrade's battle-axe, was fell'd
Upon his dying friend. With Talbot here
The daring herald urged unequal fight:
For like some oak that in its rooted strength
Defies the storm, the undaunted Earl endured
His quick assault. The herald round him wheels
Rapidly, now on this side, now on that,
With many a feign'd and many a frustrate aim
Flashing his falchion; now, as he perceives
With wary eye the Earl's intended stroke,
Bending, or leaping, lithe of limb, aside,
Then quick and agile in assault again.
Ill-fated man! one deed of glory more
Shall with the short-lived lightning's splendour grace
This thy death-day; for SLAUGHTER even now
Stands o'er thy loom of life, and lifts his sword.

Upon her shield the martial Maid received
An English warrior's blow, and in his side,
Beneath the arm upraised, in prompt return
Pierced him: that instant Salisbury sped his sword,

Which glancing from her helm fell on the folds
That arm'd her neck, and making there its way,
Stain'd with her blood its edge. The herald saw,
And turn'd from Talbot, heedless of himself,
And lifting up his falchion, all his force
Concenter'd. On the breast of Salisbury
It fell, and cleft his mail, and thro' the plate
Beneath it drove, and in his heart's-blood plung'd.
Lo! as he struck the mighty Talbot came,
And smote his helmet: slant the weapon fell;
The strings gave way, the helmet dropt, the Earl
Repeated on that head disarm'd his blow;
Too late to interpose the Maiden saw,
And in that miserable moment knew
Her Theodore.

Him Conrade too had seen,
And from a foe whom he had beaten down
Turn'd terrible in vengeance. Front to front
They stood, and each for the death-blow prepared
His angry might. At once their weapons fell,
The Frenchman's battle-axe, and the good sword
Of Talbot. He, stunn'd by the weighty blow,
Sunk senseless, by his followers from the field
Convey'd with timely speed: nor had his blade
Fallen vainly on the Frenchman's crested helm
Tho' weak to wound; for from his eyes the fire
Sparkled, and back recoiling with the blow,
He in the Maiden's arms astounded fell.

But now their troops all captainless confused,
Fear seized the English. Not with more dismay
When o'er wild Caffraria's wooded hills
Echoes the lion's roar, the timid herd
Fly the death-boding sound. The forts they seek,
Now reckless which, so from that battle's rage
A present refuge. On their flying ranks
The victors press, and mark their course with blood.

But loud the trumpet of retreat resounds,
For now the westerling sun with many a hue
Streak'd the gay clouds.

"Dunois!" the Maiden cried;
"Form now around yon stronger pile the siege
There for the night encamping." So she said.
The chiefs to Orleans for their needful food,
And enginery to batter that huge pile,
Dismiss'd a troop, and round the Tournelles led
The host beleaguering. There they pitch their tents,
And plant their engines for the morrow's war,
Then to their meal, and o'er the cheerful bowl
Recount the tale of danger; soon to rest
Betaking them, for now the night drew on.

JOAN OF ARC.

THE EIGHTH BOOK.

Now was the noon of night, and all was still,
Save where the sentinel paced on his rounds
Humming a broken song. Along the camp
High flames the frequent fire. The Frenchmen there,
On the bare earth extended, rest their limbs
Fatigued, their spears lay by them, and the shield

Pillow'd the helmed head ! ; secure they slept,
And busy in their dreams they fought again
The fight of yesterday.

But not to Joan,
But not to her, most wretched, came thy aid,
Soothe of sorrows, Sleep ! no more her pulse,
Amid the battle's tumult throbbing fast,
Allow'd no pause for thought. With clasp'd hands now
And with fix'd eyes she sat, and in her mind
The spectres of the days departed rose,
A melancholy train ! Upon the gale
The raven's croak was heard ; she started then,
And passing through the camp with hasty step
She sought the field of blood.

The night was calm ;
Nor ever clearer welkin canopied
Chaldea, while the watchful shepherd's eye
Survey'd the host of heaven, and mark'd them rise
Successive, and successively decay,
Lost in the stream of light, as lesser springs
Amid Euphrates' current. The high wall
Cast a deep shadow, and the Maiden's feet
Stumbled o'er carcasses and broken arms ;
And sometimes did she hear the heavy groan
Of one yet struggling in the pangs of death.
She reach'd the spot where Theodore was slain
Before fort London's gate ; but vainly there
Sought she the youth, on every clay-cold face
Gazing with such a look as though she fear'd
The thing she sought.² And much she marvel'd then,
For there the victim of his vengeful arm,
And close beside where he himself had fallen,
Known by the buckler's blazon'd heraldry,
Salisbury lay dead. So as the Virgin stood
Looking around the plain, she mark'd a man
Pass slowly on, as burthen'd. Him to aid
She sped, and soon with unnumber'd speed
Overtaking, thus bespake him : " Dost thou bear
Some slaughter'd friend ? or is it one whose wounds
Leave yet a hope of life ? Oh ! if he lives,
I will with earnest prayer petition heaven
To shed its healing on him ! "

So she said,
And as she spake stretch'd forth her careful hands
To ease the burthen. " Warrior ! " he replied,
" Thanks for thy proffer'd aid : but he hath ceased
To suffer, and my strength may well suffice
To bear him hence for burial. Fare thee well !
The night is far advanced ; thou to the camp
Return : it fits not darkling thus to stray."

" Conrade ! " the Maid exclaim'd, for well she knew
His voice : — With that she fell upon his neck
And cried, " my Theodore ! . . . But wherefore thus Through the dead midnight dost thou bear his corpse ? "

" Peace, Maiden ! " Conrade cried, " collect thy soul !
He is but gone before thee to that world
Whither thou soon must follow ! Yesternorn,

" Il n'est rien de si doux, pour des cœurs pleins de gloire,
Que la paisible nuit qui suit une victoire,
Dormir sur un trophée, est un charmant repos,
Et le champ de bataille est le lit d'un héros."

Scudery. Alaric.

The night after a battle is certainly more agreeable than

Ere yet from Orleans to the war we went,
He pour'd his tale of sorrow on mine ear.
' Lo, Conrade, where she moves ! beloved Maid !
Devoted for the realm of France she goes,
Abandoning for this the joys of life,
Yea . . . life itself ! Yet on my heart her words
Vibrate. If she must perish in the war,
I will not live to bear the thought that I
Perhaps might have preserved her. I will go
In secret to protect her. If I fail, . . .
And trust me I have little love of life, . . .
Do thou in secret bear me from the field,
Lest haply I might meet her wandering eye
A mangled corpse. She must not know my fate.
Do this last act of friendship, and in the stream
Cast me, . . . she then may think of Theodore
Without a pang.' Maiden, I vow'd with him
To take our place in battle by thy side,
And make thy safety our peculiar care.
And now I hoped thou hadst not seen him fall."
Saying thus he laid the body on the ground.
With steady eye the wretched Maiden view'd
That life-left tenement : his batter'd arms
Were with the night-dews damp ; his brown hair clung
Gore-clotted in the wound, and one loose lock Play'd o'er his cheek's black paleness.³ " Gallant youth ! "

She cried, " I would to God the hour were come
When I might meet thee in the bowers of bliss !
No, Theodore ! the sport of winds and waves
Thy body shall not float adown the stream !
Bear him with me to Orleans, there to rest
In holy ground, where priests may say their prayers
And hymn the requiem to his parted soul.
So will not Elinor in bitterness
Lament that no dear friend to her dead child
Paid the last office."

From the earth they lift
Their mournful burthen, and along the plain
Pass with slow footsteps to the city gate.
The obedient centinel, knowing Conrade's voice,
Admits them at that hour, and on they go,
Till in the neighbouring abbey's porch arrived
They rest the lifeless load.

Loud rings the bell ;
The awaken'd porter turns the heavy door.
To him the Virgin ! " Father, from the slain
On yonder field, a dear-loved friend we bring Hither for Christian sepulture : chant ye
The requiem to his soul : to-morrow eve
I will return, and in the narrow house
Will see him laid to rest." The father knew
The Prophetess, and humbly bow'd assent.

Now from the city, o'er the shadowy plain,
Backward they bend their way From silent thoughts
The Maid awakening cried, " There was a time,
When thinking on my closing hour of life,
Though with a mind resolved, some natural fears the night before one. A soldier may use his shield for a pillow, but he must be very ingenious to sleep upon a trophy.

² " With a dumb silence seeming that it fears
The thing it went about to effectuate." — Daniel.

³ " Noire paleur." — Le Moine. St. Louis, liv. xvi.

Shook my weak frame : but now the happy hour,
When this emancipated soul shall burst
The cumbrous fetters of mortality,
I look for wishfully. Conrade ! my friend,
This wounded heart would feel another pang
Shouldst thou forsake me."

"Joan!" the chief replied,
"Along the weary pilgrimage of life
Together will we journey, and beguile
The painful way with hope, . . . such hope as fix'd
On heavenly things, brings with it no deceit,
Lays up no food for sorrow, and endures
From disappointment safe."

Thus communing
They reach'd the camp, yet hush'd; there separating,
Each in the post allotted, restless waits
The day-break.

Morning came: dim through the shade
The twilight glimmers; soon the brightening clouds
Imbibe the rays, and o'er the landscape spread
The dewy light. The soldiers from the earth
Arise invigorate, and each his food
Receives, impatient to renew the war.
Dunois his javelin to the Tournelles points,
"Soldiers of France! behold your foes are there!"
As when a band of hunters, round the den
Of some wolf-monster, point their spears, elate
In hope of conquest and the future feast,
When on the hospitable board their spoil
Shall smoke, and they, as foaming bows go round,
Tell to their guests their exploits in the chase;

² "The outermost walls enclosing towns or fortresses were commonly perpendicular, or had a very small external talus. They were flanked by semi-circular, polygonal, or square towers, commonly about forty or fifty yards distant from each other. Within were steps to mount the terre-pleine of the walls or rampart, which were always defended by an embattled or crenellated parapet." — Grose.

The fortifications of the middle ages differed in this respect from those of the ancients. When the besiegers had gained the summit of the wall, the descent on the other side was safe and easy. But "the ancients did not generally support their walls on the inside with earth in the manner of the talus or slope, which made the attacks more dangerous. For though the enemy had gained some footing upon them, he could not assure himself of taking the city. It was necessary to get down, and to make use of some of the ladders by which he had mounted; and that descent exposed the soldier to very great danger." — Rollin.

³ "The pavis, or pavache, was a large shield, or rather a portable mantelet, capable of covering a man from head to foot, and probably of sufficient thickness to resist the missile weapons then in use. These were in sieges carried by servants, whose business it was to cover their masters with them, whilst they, with their bows and arrows, shot at the enemy on the ramparts. As this must have been a service of danger, it was that perhaps which made the office of scutifer honourable. The pavis was rectangular at the bottom, but rounded off above: it was sometimes supported by props." — Grose.

⁴ Mangonel is a term comprehending all the smaller engines.

They with their shouts of exultation make
The forest ring; so elevate of heart,
With such loud clamours for the fierce assault
The French prepare. Nor, keeping now the lists
Dare the disheartened English man to man
Meet the close conflict. From the barbienn,¹
Or from the embattled wall² at random they
Their arrows and their death-fraught enginery
Discharged; meantime the Frenchmen did not cease
With well-directed shafts their loftier foes
To assail: behind the guardian pavis fenced,³
They at the battlements their arrows aim'd.
Showering an iron storm, whilst o'er the bayle,
The bayle now levell'd by victorious France,
The assailants pass'd with all their mangonels;⁴
Or tortoises⁵, beneath whose roofing safe,
They, filling the deep moat, might for the towers
Make fit foundation; or with petraries,
War-wolves, and beugles, and that murderous sling
The matafund, from whence the ponderous stone
Made but one wound of him whom in its way,
It met; no plous hand might then compose
The crush'd and mangled corpse to be conveyed
To where his fathers slept: a dreadful train⁶
Prepared by Salisbury o'er the town besieged
For hurling ruin; but that dreadful train
Must hurl its ruin on the invader's head,
Such retribution righteous heaven decreed.

Nor lie the English trembling, for the fort
Was ably garrison'd. Glacidas, the chief,

⁵ "The tortoise was a machine composed of very strong and solid timber work. The height of it to its highest beam, which sustained the roof, was twelve feet. The base was square, and each of its fronts twenty-five feet. It was covered with a kind of quilted mattress made of raw hides, and prepared with different drugs to prevent its being set on fire by combustibles. This heavy machine was supported upon four wheels, or perhaps upon eight. It was called tortoise from its serving as a very strong covering and defence against the enormous weights thrown down on it; those under it being safe in the same manner as a tortoise under his shell. It was used both to fill up the fosse, and for sapping. It may not be improper to add, that it is believed so enormous a weight could not be moved from place to place on wheels, and that it was pushed forward on rollers. Under these wheels or rollers, the way was laid with strong planks to facilitate its motion, and prevent its sinking into the ground, from whence it would have been very difficult to have removed it. The ancients have observed that the roof had a thicker covering, of hides, hurdles, sea-weed, &c. than the sides, as it was exposed to much greater shocks from the weights thrown upon it by the besieged. It had a door in front, which was drawn up by a chain as far as was necessary, and covered the soldiers at work in filling up the fosse with fascines." — Rollin.

This is the tortoise of the ancients, but that of the middle ages differed from it in nothing material.

⁶ "The besiegers having carried the bayle, brought up their machines, and established themselves in the counterscarp, began under cover of their cats, sows, or tortoises, to drain the ditch, if a wet one, and also to fill it up with hurdles and fascines, and level it for the passage of their moveable towers. Whilst this was doing, the archers, attended by young men carrying shields (pavoises), attempted with their arrows to drive the besieged from the towers and ramparts, being themselves covered by these portable mantelets. The garrison on their part essayed, by the discharge of machines, cross and long bows, to keep the enemy at a distance." — Grose.

A gallant man, sped on from place to place
 Cheering the brave: or if an archer's hand,
 Palsied with fear, shot wide his ill-aim'd shaft,
 Driving him from the ramparts with reproach
 And shame. He bore an arbalist himself,
 A weapon for its sure destructiveness
 Abominated once¹; wherefore of yore
 The assembled fathers of the Christian church
 Pronounced the man accursed whose impious hand
 Should use the murderous engine. Such decrees
 Befitted them as ministers of peace,
 To promulgate, and with a warning voice,
 To cry aloud and spare not, "Woe to them
 Whose hands are full of blood!"

An English king,

The lion-hearted Richard, their decree
 First broke, and rightly was he doom'd to fall
 By that forbidden weapon; since that day
 Frequent in fields of battle, and from far
 To many a good knight bearing his death wound
 From hands unknown. With such an instrument
 Arm'd on the ramparts, Glacidas his eye
 Cast on the assailing host. A keener glance
 Darts not the hawk when from the feather'd tribe
 He marks his prey.

A Frenchman for his aim
 He chose, who kneeling by the trebuchet,
 Charged its long sling with death.² Him Glacidas
 Secure behind the battlements, beheld,
 And strung his bow; then bending on one knee,
 He in the groove the feather'd quarrel placed,³
 And levelling with sure eye, his victim mark'd.
 The bow-string twang'd, swift on its way the dart
 Whizz'd, and it struck, there where the helmet's clasps
 Defend the neck; a weak protection now,
 For through the tube which draws the breath of life
 Pierced the keen shaft; blood down the unwonted way
 Gush'd to the lungs: prone fell the dying man
 Grasping, convulsed, the earth; a hollow groan
 In his throat struggled, and the dews of death
 Stood on his livid cheek. The days of youth
 He had pass'd peaceful, and had known what joys
 Domestic love bestows, the father once
 Of two fair children; in the city hemm'd
 During the siege, he had beheld their cheeks

¹ The cross-bow was for some time laid aside in obedience to a decree of the second Lateran council, held in 1139. "Arma illam mortiferam et Deo odibilium ballistariorum adversus Christianos et Catholicos exercere de cetero sub anathemate prohibemus." This weapon was again introduced into our armies by Richard I., who, being slain with a quarrel shot from one of them, at the siege of the castle of Chalus in Normandy, it was considered as a judgement from heaven inflicted upon him for his impiety. Guillaume le Breton, relating the death of this king, puts the following into the mouth of Atropos:

"Hæc volo, non aliâ Richardum morte perire,
 Ut qui Francigenis ballistas primitus usum
 Tradidit, ipse sui rem primitus experiat,
 Quemque alios docuit in se vim sentiat artia." — Grose.

² From the trebuchet they discharged many stones at once by a sling. It acted by means of a great weight fastened to the short arm of a lever, which being let fall, raised the end of the long arm with a great velocity. A man is represented kneeling to load one of these in an ivory carving, supposed to be of the age of Edward II. — Grose.

Grow pale with famine, and had heard their cries
 For bread. His wife, a broken-hearted one,
 Sunk to the cold grave's quiet, and her babes
 With hunger pined, and follow'd; he survived,
 A miserable man, and heard the shouts
 Of joy in Orleans, when the Maid approach'd,
 As o'er the corpse of his last little one
 He heap'd the unhallowed earth. To him the foe
 Perform'd a friendly part, hastening the hour
 Grief else had soon brought on.

The English chief,

Pointing again his arbalist, let loose
 The string; the quarrel, by that impact driven,
 True to its aim, fled fatal: one it struck
 Dragging a tortoise to the moat, and fix'd
 Deep in his liver; blood and mingled gall
 Flow'd from the wound, and writhing with keen pangs,
 Headlong he fell. He for the wintry hour
 Knew many a merry ballad and quaint tale,
 A man in his small circle well beloved.
 None better knew with prudent hand to guide
 The vine's young tendrils, or at vintage time
 To press the full-swollen clusters; he, heart-glad,
 Taught his young boys the little all he knew,
 Enough for happiness. The English host
 Laid waste his fertile fields: he, to the war,
 By want compell'd, adventured, in his gore
 Now weltering.

Nor the Gallic host remit
 Their eager efforts; some, the watery fence,
 Beneath the tortoise roof'd, with engines apt
 Drain painful⁴; part, laden with wood, throw there
 Their buoyant burthens, labouring so to gain
 Firm footing: some the mangonels supply,
 Or charging with huge stones the murderous sling,⁵
 Or petrury, or in the espringal
 Fix the brass-winged arrows⁶: hoarse around
 The uproar and the din of multitudes
 Arose. Along the ramparts Gargrave went,
 Cheering the English troops; a bow he bore:
 The quiver rattled as he moved along.
 He knew aright to aim his feather'd shafts,
 Well-skill'd to pierce the mottled roebuck's side,
 O'ertaken in his speed. Him passing on,
 A ponderous stone from some huge martinet,⁷

³ Quarrels, or carreaux, were so called from their heads, which were square pyramids of iron.

⁴ The tortoise, &c. and moveable towers having reached the walls, the besiegers under them either began to mine, or batter them with the ram. They also established batteries of ballistas and mangonels on the counterscarp. These were opposed by those of the enemy.

⁵ The matafunda.

⁷ "Le lendemain vindrent deux maistres engingneurs au duc de Normandie, qui dirent que, si on leur vouloit livrer boys et ouvriers, ils feroient quatre eschauffaux et haults que on meneroit aux murs du chasteil, et seroient si haults q'ls surmonteroient les murs. Le duc commanda q'ls le fissent, et fist prendre tous les charpentiers du pays, et payer largement. Si furent faits ces quatre eschauffaux en quatre grosses nefz, mais on y mist longuement et coestrent grans deniers. Si y fist on les gens entrer q'a ceulz du chasteil devoient

Struck : on his breast-plate falling, the huge weight
Shattered the bone, and to his mangled lungs
Drove in the fragments. On the gentle brow
Of a fair hill, wood-circled, stood his home,
A stately mansion, far and wide from whence
The sight ranged unimpeded, and survey'd
Streams, hills, and forests, fair variety !
The traveller knew its hospitable towers,
For open were the gates, and blazed for all
The friendly fire. By glory lured, the youth
Went forth ; and he had bathed his falchion's edge
In many a Frenchman's blood ; now crush'd beneath
The ponderous fragment's force, his lifeless limbs
Lie quivering.

Lo ! towards the levelled moat,
A moving tower the men of Orleans wheel¹
Four stages elevate. Above was hung,
Equalling the walls, a bridge ; in the lower stage
A battering-ram : within a chosen troop
Of archers, through the opening, shot their shafts.²
In the loftiest part was Conrade, so prepared
To mount the rampart ; for, no hunter he,
He loved to see the dappled foresters
Browse fearless on their lair, with friendly eye,
And happy in beholding happiness,
Not meditating death : the bowman's art
Therefore he little knew, nor was he wont
To aim the arrow at the distant foe,
But uprear in close conflict, front to front,
His battle-axe, and break the shield and helm,
First in the war of men. There too the Maid
Awaits, impatient on the wall to wield
Her falchion. Onward moves the heavy tower,

Slow o'er the moat and steady, though the foe
Shower'd there their javelins, aim'd their engines
there,

And from the arbalest the fire-tipt dart
Shot burning through the sky.³ In vain it flamed,
For well with many a reeking hide secured,
Pass'd on the dreadful pile, and now it reach'd
The wall. Below, with forceful impulse driven,
The iron-headed engine swings its stroke,
Then back recoils ; while they within who guide,
In backward step collecting all their strength,
Anon the massy beam with stronger arm
Drive full and fierce. So rolls the swelling sea
Its curly billows to the unmoved foot
Of some huge promontory, whose broad base
Breaks the rough wave ; the shiver'd surge rolls back,
Till, by the coming billow borne, it bursts
Again, and foams with ceaseless violence :
The wanderer, on the sunny cliff outstretch'd,
Harks to the roaring surges, as they rock
His weary senses to forgetfulness.

But nearer danger threatens the invaders now,
For on the ramparts, lower'd from above
The bridge reclines.⁴ An universal shout
Rose from the hostile hosts. The exultant French
Break out in loud rejoicing, whilst the foe
Raise a responsive cry, and call aloud
For speedy succour there, with deafening shout
Cheering their comrades. Not with louder din
The mountain-torrent flings precipitate
Its bulk of waters, though amid the fall
Shatter'd, and dashing silvery from the rock.

combattre. Quant ilz eurent passe la moitie de la riviere, ceulx du chasteel desclinquerent quatre martinetz q'iz avoient faitz nouvellement pour remedier contre lesdits eschauffaulx. Ces quatre martinetz gettoient si grosses pierres et si souvent sur ses eschauffaulx q'iz furent bien tost froissees tant que les gensdarmes et ceulx que les conduisoient ne se peurent dedans garantir. Si se retirerent arriere le plus tost quilz peurent. Et aincois q'iz fussent oultre la riviere lung des eschauffaulx fut enfondre au fons de leau." — Froissart, I. ff. 82.

¹ The following extract from the History of Edward III. by Joshua Barnes contains a full account of these moving towers.

"Now the earl of Darby had layn before Reule more than nine weeks, in which time he had made two vast belfroys or bastilles of massy timber, with three stages or floors ; each of the belfroys running on four huge wheels, bound about with thick hoops of iron ; and the sides and other parts that any ways respected the town were covered with raw hides, thick laid, to defend the engines from fire and shot. In every one of these stages were placed an hundred archers, and between the two bastilles, there were two hundred men with pick-axes and mattocks. From these six stages six hundred archers shot so fiercely all together, that no man could appear at his defence without a sufficient punishment : so that the belfroys being brought upon wheels by the strength of men over a part of the ditch, which was purposely made plain and level by the faggots and earth and stones cast upon them, the two hundred pioneers plyed their work so well under the protection of these engines, that they made a considerable breach through the walls of the town."

² "The archers and cross-bowmen from the upper stories in the moveable towers essayed to drive away the garrison from the parapets, and on a proper opportunity to let fall a bridge, by that means to enter the town. In the bottom story was often a large ram." — Grose.

³ "Against the moveable tower there were many modes of defence. The chief was to break up the ground over which it was to pass, or by undermining it to overthrow it. Attempts were likewise made to set it on fire, to prevent which it was covered with raw hides, or coated over with alum." — Grose.

⁴ These bridges are described by Rollin in the account of the moving towers which he gives from Vegetius : — "The moving towers are made of an assemblage of beams and strong planks, not unlike a house. To secure them against the fires thrown by the besieged, they are covered with raw hides, or with pieces of cloth made of hair. Their height is in proportion to their base. They are sometimes thirty feet square, and sometimes forty or fifty. They are higher than the walls or even towers of the city. They are supported upon several wheels according to mechanic principles, by the means of which the machine is easily made to move, how great soever it may be. The town is in great danger if this tower can approach the walls : for it has stairs from one story to another, and includes different methods of attack. At bottom it has a ram to batter the wall, and on the middle story a draw-bridge, made of two beams with rails of basket-work, which lets down easily upon the wall of a city, when within the reach of it. The besiegers pass upon this bridge, to make themselves masters of the wall. Upon the higher stories are soldiers armed with partisans and misive weapons, who keep a perpetual discharge upon the works. When affairs are in this posture, a place seldom held out long. For what can they hope who have nothing to confide in but the height of their ramparts, when they see others suddenly appear which command them ?"

The towers or belfroys of modern times rarely exceeded three or four stages or stories.

Lo ! on the bridge forth comes the undaunted man,
 Conrade ! the gather'd foes along the wall
 Throng opposite, and on him point their pikes,
 Cresting with armed men the battlements.
 He undismay'd, though on that perilous height,
 Stood firm, and hurl'd his javelin ; the keen point
 Pierced through the destined victim, where his arm
 Join'd the broad breast : a wound which skilful care
 Haply had heal'd ; but, him disabled now
 For farther service, the un pitying throng
 Of his tumultuous comrades from the wall
 Thrust headlong. Nor did Conrade cease to throw
 His deadly javelins fast, for well within
 The tower was stored with weapons, to his hand
 Quickly supplied. Nor did the mission'd Maid
 Rest idle from the combat ; she, secure,
 Amid the keen quarrel, taught the cross-bow's use
 By the willing mind that what it well desires
 Gains aptly ; nor amid the numerous throng,
 Though haply erring from their destin'd mark,
 Sped her sharp arrows frustrate. From the tower
 Ceaseless the bow-strings twang : the knights below,
 Each by his pava's bulwark'd, thither aim'd
 Their darts, and not a dart fell woundless there ;
 So thickly throng'd they stood, and fell as fast
 As when the monarch of the East goes forth
 From Gemna's banks and the proud palaces
 Of Delhi, the wild monsters of the wood
 Die in the blameless warfare : closed within
 The still-contracting circle, their brute force
 Wasting in mutual rage, they perish there,
 Or by each other's fury lacerate,
 The archer's barbed arrow, or the lance
 Of some bold youth of his first exploits vain,
 Rajah or Omrah, in the war of beasts
 Venturous, and learning thus the love of blood.

Shouts of alarm ring now along the wall,
 For now the French their scaling ladders place,
 And bearing high their bucklers, to the assault
 Mount fearless : from above the furious troops
 Fling down such weapons as inventive care
 Or frantic rage supplies : huge stones and beams
 Crush the assailants ; some, thrust from the height,
 Fall living to their death ; tormented some
 And writhing wildly as the liquid lead
 Consumes their flesh, leap desperately down,
 To end their pain by death. Still others mount,
 And by their fellows' fate unterrified,
 Still dare the perilous way. Nor dangerous
 To the English was the fight, though where they stood
 The vantage-place was theirs ; for them amidst
 Fast fled the arrows there ; and brass-wing'd darts,
 There driven resistless from the espringal,

¹ These darts were called viretons, from their whirling about in the air.

² " And here, with leave bespoken to recite a grand fable, though disguised by our best poets, while Brutus on a certain festival day, solemnly kept on that shore where he first landed, was with the people in great jollity and mirth, a crew of these savages breaking in among them, began on the sudden another sort of game than at such a meeting was expected. But at length by many hands overcome, Goe-magog the hugest, in height twelve cubits, is reserved alive, that with him Corineus, who desired nothing more, might try his strength ; whom in a wrestle the giant catching aloft, with a terrible hugg broke three of his ribs : nevertheless

Keeping their impulse even in the wound,
 Whirl as they pierce the victim.¹ Some fall crush'd
 Beneath the ponderous fragment that descends
 The heavier from its height : some the long lance,
 Whizzing impetuous on its viewless way,
 Transfix'd. The cannon ever and anon
 With thunder rent the air ; conflicting shouts
 And war-cries French and English rung around,
 And Saints and Devils were invoked in prayers
 And execrations, Heaven and Hell adjured.

Conrade, meantime, who stood upon the bridge,
 With many a well-aim'd javelin dealing death,
 Made way upon the rampart and advanced
 With wary valour o'er his slaughter'd foes.
 Two youths, the boldest of the English host,
 Essay'd to thrust him from that perilous height ;
 At once they press'd upon him : he, his axe
 Dropping, the dagger drew : one through the throat
 He pierced, and swinging his broad buckler round,
 Struck down his comrade. Even thus unmoved,
 Stood Corineus², the sire of Guendolen,
 When grappling with his monstrous enemy
 He the brute vastness held aloft, and bore,
 And headlong hurl'd, all shatter'd to the sea,
 Down from the rock's high summit. since that day
 Him, hugest of the giants, chronicling,
 Called Langoemagog.

Behold the Maid
 Bounds o'er the bridge, and to the wind displays
 Her hallowed banner. At that welcome sight
 A general shout of acclamation rose,
 And loud, as when the tempest-tossing forest
 Roars to the roaring wind. Then terror seized
 The garrison ; and fired anew with hope,
 The fierce assailants to their prize rush on Resistless. Vainly do their English foes
 Hurl there their beams, and stones, and javelins,
 And fire-brands ; fearless in the escalade,
 The assailants mount, and now upon the wall
 Wage equal battle.

Burning at the sight
 With indignation, Glacidas beheld
 His troops fly scatter'd ; fast on every side
 The foe up-rushing eager to their spoil ;
 The holy standard waving : and the Maid
 Fierce in pursuit. " Speed but this arrow, Heaven !"
 The chief exclaim'd, " and I shall fall content."
 So saying, he his sharpest quarrel chose,
 And fix'd the bow-string, and against the Maid
 Levelling, let loose : her arm was raised on high
 To smite a fugitive ; he glanced aside,
 Shunning her deadly stroke, and thus received
 The chieftain's arrow : through his ribs it pass'd,

Corineus enraged heaving him up by main force, and on his shoulders bearing him to the next high rock, threw him headlong all shattered into the sea, and left his name on the cliff, called ever since Langoemagog, which is to say, the giant's leap." — Milton's Hist. of England.

The expression brute vastness is taken from the same work of Milton, where he relates the death of Morindus. " Well fitted to such a beastial cruelty was his end ; for hearing of a huge monster that from the Irish sea infested the coast, and in the pride of his strength foolishly attempting to set manly valour against a brute vastness, when his weapons were all in vain, by that horrible mouth he was caught up and devoured."

And cleft that vessel whence the purer blood
Through many a branching channel o'er the frame
Meanders.

"Fool!" the exasperate knight exclaim'd,
"Would she had slain thee! thou hast lived too long."
Again he aim'd his arbalist: the string
Struck forceful: swift the erring arrow sped
Guiltless of blood, for lightly o'er the court
Bounded the warrior Virgin. Glacidas
Levell'd his bow again; the fated shaft
Fled true, and difficultly through the mail
Pierced to her neck, and tinged its point with blood.
"She bleeds! she bleeds!" exulting cried the chief;
"The sorceress bleeds! nor all her hellish arts
'Can charm my arrows from their destin'd course."
Ill-fated man! in vain with eager hand
Placing thy feather'd quarrel in its groove,
Dream'st thou of Joan subdued! She from her neck
Plucking the shaft unterrified, exclaim'd,
"This is a favour!" Frenchmen, let us on!
Escape they cannot from the hand of God!"

But Conrade, rolling round his angry eyes,
Beheld the English chieftain as he arm'd
Again the bow: with rapid step he stride;
And Glacidas perceiving his approach,
At him the quarrel turn'd, which vainly sent,
Fell blunted from his buckler. Conrade came
And lifting high the deadly battle-axe,

"The tournelles adjoining to the bridge was kept by Glacidas (one of the most resolute captains among the English), having well encouraged his men to defend themselves and to fight for their lives.

"The skirmish begins at nine of the clock in the morning, and the ladders are planted. A storm of English arrows falls upon our men with such violence as they recoiled.
'How now!' saith the Virgin, 'have we begun so well to end so ill?' let us charge! they are our own, seeing God is on our side.' so every one recovering his forces, flocks about the Virgin. The English double the storm upon the thickest of the troops. The Virgin fighting in the foremost ranks and encouraging her men to do well, was shot through the arm with an arrow; she, nothing amazed, takes the arrow in one hand and her sword in the other, 'This is a favour!' says she, 'let us go on! they cannot escape the hand of GOD!'"

Chapelain has dilated this exclamation of the Maid into a ridiculous speech.

"Quoy! valeureux Guerriers, quoy! dans vostre avantage
Un peu de sang perdu vous fait perdre courage!
Pour moy, je le reputé a supreme bonheur,
Et dans ce petit mal je trouve un grand honneur;
Le succès, bien qu'heureux, n'eust en rien d'honorable,
Si le Ciel n'eust permis un coup si favorable;
Vous n'en verrez pas moins vos bras victorieux,
J'en verray seulement mon nom plus glorieux." — L. iii.

"I can make nothing English of this name. Monstrellet calls him Glacidas and Glacidas. Daniel says the principal leaders of the English were Suffolk, Talbot, Scales, Fastolf, et un nommé Glacidas ou Glacidas, dont le mérite suppléant à la naissance, l'avoit fait parvenir aux premières charges de l'armée.

The importance attached to a second name is well exemplified by an extract in Selden, relating to "the creation of Robert earle of Gloucester natural sonne to King Henry I.
The king having speech with Mabile the sole daughter and heire of Robert Fitz Hayman lord of Gloucester, told her (as it is reported in an old English rithmical story attributed to one Robert of Gloucester), that —

Through pouldron and through shoulder deeply driven
Buried it in his bosom: prone he fell,
The cold air rush'd upon his heaving heart.
One whose low lineage gave no second name
Was Glacidas², a gallant man, and still
His memory in the records of the foe
Survives.

And now dishearten'd at his fall
The vanquish'd English fly towards the gate,
Seeking the inner court³, as yet in hope
To abide a second siege, and with their friends
Find present refuge there. Mistaken men!
The vanquish'd have no friends! defeated thus,
Press'd by pursuit, in vain with eager voice
They call their comrades in the suppliant tones
Of pity now, now with the bitter curse
Of fruitless anger; they indeed within
Fast from the ramparts cast upon the French
Beams, stones, and javelins, . . but the gate is barr'd,
The huge portcullis down!

Then terror seized
Their hopeless hearts: some, furious in despair,
Turn on their foes; fear-palsied some await
The coming death; some drop the useless sword,
And cry for mercy.

Then the Maid of Arc
Took pity on the vanquish'd; and she call'd
Aloud, and cried unto the host of France,
And bade them cease from slaughter. They obey'd

. . . he seold his sone to her spousing avonge,
This maid was ther agen, and withsaid it long.

Selden's Titles of Honor.

³ On entering the outer gate, the next part that presented itself was the outer ballium or bailey, separated from the inner ballium by a strong embattled wall and towered gate.

The delegated Damsel. Some there were
 Apart who communed murmuring, and of those Graville address'd her: "Prophets! our troops
 Are few in number; and to well secure
 These many prisoners such a force demands,
 As should we spare might shortly make us need
 The mercy we bestow; not mercy then,
 Rather to these our soldiers, cruelty.
 Justice to them, to France, and to our king,
 And that regard wise nature hath in each
 Implanted of self-safety, all demand
 Their deaths."

"Foul fall such evil policy!"
 The indignant Maid exclaim'd. "I tell thee, chief,
 God is with us! but God shall hide his face
 From them, short-sighted they, as hard of heart,
 Who disregarding all that mitigates,
 All that ennobles dreadful war, shed blood
 Like water; who in the deceitful scales
 Of worldly wisdom, dare to counterpoise
 The right with the expedient, and resolve
 Without compunction, as the beam inclines
 Held in a faulting or a faithless hand.
 These men shall live to see their homes again,
 Some to be welcomed there with tears of joy
 By those who to the latest hour of life
 Will in their grateful prayers remember us.
 And when that hour shall come to us, that comes
 To all, how gladly should we then exchange
 Renown however splendid, for the thought
 That we have saved one victim from the sword, . .
 If only one, . . who begs for us from Heaven
 That mercy which to others we have shown!"

Turning to Conrade, then she said, "Do thou
 Appoint an escort for the prisoners.
 Thou need'st not be reminded they are men,
 Rather by fortune, or by fate, than choice,
 Brought hither from their homes to work our bale,
 And for their own not less; but yielded thus
 Whom we must neither treat as enemies
 Nor trust as friends, but in safe keeping hold,
 Both for their own security and ours."

She said: when Conrade cast his eyes around,
 And saw from man to man where Francis ran,
 Bidding them spare the vanquish'd; him he hail'd.
 "The Maid hath bade me chuse a leader forth
 To guard the prisoners; thou shalt be the man;
 For thou wilt guard them with due diligence,
 Yet not forgetful of humanity."

Meantime the garrison of that strong-hold,
 Who lest the French should enter, had exposed
 Their comrades to the sword, sustain'd the siege
 In desperate valour. Fast against the walls

The battering-ram was driven; the mangonels
 Plied at the ramparts' fast; the catapults
 Drove there their dreadful darts; the war-wolves there
 Hurl'd their huge stones; and, through the kindled sky,
 The engines shower'd their sheets of liquid fire.¹

"Feel ye not, comrades, how the ramparts shake?"
 Exclaim'd a daring Englishman. "Our foes
 In woman-like compassion, have dismiss'd
 A powerful escort, weakening thus themselves,
 And giving us fair hope, in equal field,
 Of better fortune. Sores here annoy'd,
 And slaughter'd by their engines from afar,
 We perish. Vainly may the soldier boast
 Undaunted courage and the arm of strength,
 If thus pent up, like some wild beast he falls,
 Mark'd for the hunter's arrows. Let us out
 And meet them in the battle, man to man,
 Either to conquer, or at least to die
 A soldier's death."

"Nay, nay . . not so," replied
 One of less hopeful courage. Though they point
 Their engines here, our archers not in vain
 Discharge their quarrels. Let the walls and works
 Still be defended; it will then be time
 To meet them in the battle man to man,
 When these shall fail us."

Scarcely had he said,
 When a huge stone, thrown from some petrary
 Smote him upon the breast, and with dismay
 Fill'd all around; for as it shattered him,
 His blood besprinkled them, and they beheld
 His mangled lungs lie quivering.

"Such the fate
 Of those who trust them to their walls' defence!"
 Again exclaim'd the soldier: "Thus they fall,
 Betray'd by their own fears. Courage alone
 Can save us."

Nor to draw them from the fort
 Now needed eloquence; with one accord
 They bade him lead the onset. Forth they rush'd
 Impetuous. With such fury o'er the plain,
 Swoln by the autumnal tempest, Vega rolls
 His rapid waters, when the gathered storm,
 On the black heights of Hatteril bursting, swells
 The tide of desolation.

Then the Maid
 Spake to the son of Orleans, "Let our troops
 Fall back, so shall the English in pursuit
 Leave this strong fortress, thus an easy prey."
 Time was not for long counsel. From the court,
 Obedient to Dunols, the French retire
 As if at the interruption of their foes
 Dishearten'd; they, with shouts and loud uproar,
 Haste to their fancied conquest: Joan, the while Placing a small but gallant garrison, fast, and in such quantities, that at last the whole court seemed to be one huge fire. Whereupon the excessive heat prevailed so, that it took hold of the roof of a great tower, which was covered with roed, and so began to spread over all the castle.

 Now therefore when these valiant captains within saw, that of necessity they must either submit entirely to the prince's courtesy, or perish by the most merciless of elements, they all together came down and yielded themselves absolutely to his grace." — Joshua Barnes.

¹ When the Black Prince attacked the castle of Romorantin, "there was slain by him an English esquire named Jacob Bernard, wherat the prince was so displeased, that he took his most solemn oath, and swore by his father's soul not to leave the siege, till he had the castle and all within at his mercy. Thed the assault was renewed much hotter than ever, till at last the prince saw there was no likelihood of prevailing that way. Wherefore presently he gave order to raise certain engines, wherewith they cast combustible matter enflamed after the manner of wild fire into the base court so

Bade them secure the gates ; then sallying forth,
With such fierce onset charged them in the rear,
That terror smote the English, and they wish'd
Again that they might hide them in their walls
Rashly abandoned, for now wheeling round
Dund's attack'd their flank. All captainless,
Ill-marshal'd, ill-directed, in vain rage
They waste their furious efforts, falling fast
Before the Maid's good falchion and the arm
Of Conrade : loud was heard the mingled sound
Of arms and men ; the soil, that trampled late
By multitudes, sent up its stifling clouds
Of dust, was miry now with human blood.

On the fort's summit Talbot mark'd the fight,
And calling for his arms impatiently,
Eager to issue forth, was scarce withheld,
For now, dishearten'd and discomfited,
The troops took flight.

Upon the bridge there stood
A strong-built tower, commanding o'er the Loire.
The traveller sometimes linger'd on his way,
Marking the playful tenants of the stream,
Seen in its shadow, stem the sea-ward tide ;
This had the invaders won in hard assault,
Before the delegate of Heaven came forth
And made them fear who never fear'd till then.
Thither the English troops with hasty steps
Retired, not utterly defeated yet,
But mindful of defence : the garrison
Them thus retreating saw, and open threw
Their guarded gates, and on the Gallic host,
Covering their vanquish'd fellows, pour'd their shafts.
Check'd in pursuit they stop. Then Graville cried,
" Ill, Maiden, hast thou done ! those vallant troops
Thy womanish pity has dismiss'd, with us
Conjoin'd might press upon the vanquish'd foe,
Though added thus, and plant the lillied flag Victorious on yon tower."

" Dark-minded man ! "

The Maid of Orleans answer'd, " to act well
Brings with itself an ample recompence.

¹ The oriflamme was a standard erected to denote that no quarter would be given. It is said to have been of red silk, adorned and beaten with very broad and fair lilies of gold, and bordered about with gold and vermilion. Le Moyne has given it a suitable escort :

" Ensuite l'oriflamme ardent et lumineuse,
Marche sur un grand char, dont la forme est affreuse.
Quatre enormes dragons d'un or ombre ecailles,
Et de pourpre, d'azur, et de vert emalles,
Dans quelque occasion que le besoin le porte,
Luy font une pompeuse et formidable escorte
Dans leur terribles yeux des grenas arrondis,
De leur feu, de leur sang, font peur aux plus hardis,
Et si ce feu paroloit allumer leur audace,
Aussi paroloit ce sang animer leur menace.
Le char roulant sous eux, il semble au roulement,
Qu'il les fasse voler avecque sifflement :
Et de la poudre, en l'air, il se fait des fumées
A leur bouches du vent et du bruit animées."

Philip is said by some historians to have erected the Oriflamme at Cressy, where Edward in return raised up his burning dragon, the English signal for no quarter. The Oriflamme was originally used only in wars against the Infidels, for it was a sacred banner, and believed to have been sent from Heaven.

I have not rear'd the Oriflamme of death . . .
Now God forbid ! The banner of the Lord
Is this, and come what will, me it behoves,
Mindful of Him whose minister I am,
To spare the fallen foe : that gracious God
Sends me a messenger of mercy forth,
Sends me to save this ravaged realm of France,
To England friendly as to all the world,
Only to those an enemy, whose lust
Of sway makes them the enemies of man."

She said, and suddenly threw off her helm ;
Her bosom heaved, . . her cheek grew red, . . her eyes
Beam'd with a wilder lustre. " Thou dost deem
That I have illy spared so large a band,
Disabling from pursuit our weaken'd troops ; . .
God is with us ! " she cried . . " God is with us !
Our champion manifest ! "

Even as she spake,
The tower, the bridge, and all its multitudes,
Sunk with a mighty crash.²

Astonishment
Seized on the French ; an universal cry
Of terror burst from them. Crush'd in the fall,
Or by their armour hopelessly weigh'd down,
Or while they piled their unencumber'd arms,
Caught by some sinking wretch, who grasp'd them fast,
Shrieking they sunk, while frequent fragments huge
Fell in the foaming current. From the fort
Talbot beheld, and gnash'd his teeth, and cursed
The more than mortal Virgin ! whilst the towers
Of Orleans echoed to the loud uproar,
And all who heard trembled, and cross'd their breasts,
And as they hasten'd to the city-walls,
Told fearfully their beads.

'Twas now the hour
When o'er the plain the fading rays of eve
Their sober light effuse ; when the lowing herd,
Slow as they move to shelter, draw behind
Their lengthening shadows ; and toward his nest,
As heavily he flaps the dewy air,
The hoarse rook breathes his melancholy note.

² " At this woman's voice amidst the sound of war, the combat grows very hot. Our men, greatly encouraged by the Virgin, run headlong to the bastion and force a point thereof ; then fire and stones ran so violently, as the English being amazed, forsake their defences : some are slain upon the place, some throw themselves down headlong, and fly to the tower upon the bridge. In the end this brave Glacidas abandons this quarter, and retires into the base court upon the bridge, and after him a great number of his soldiers. The bridge greatly shaken with artillery, tried by fire, and overcharged with the weight of this multitude, sinks into the water with a fearful cry, carrying all this multitude with it." — De Serrès.

This circumstance has been magnified into a miracle. " The French, for the most part, draw the institution of the order of St. Michael principally from a purpose that Charles had to make it, after the apparition of the archangel upon Orleans bridge, as the tutelary angel of France assisting against the English in 1428." — Selden's Titles of Honour.

The expressions are somewhat curious in the patent of this ordre de Monsieur St. Michael Archange. Louis XI. instituted it " à la gloire et louange de Dieu nostre createur tout puissant, et reverence de la glorieuse vierge Marie, à l'honneur et reverence de St. Michael, premier chevalier, qui par la querelle de Dieu, bataille contre l'ancien enemy de l'humain lignage, et le fit tresbucher de Ciel."

"Now then, Dunois, for Orleans!" cried the Maid,
 "And give we to the flames these monuments
 Of sorrow and disgrace. The ascending flames
 Will to the dwellers of yon rescued town
 Rise with a joyful splendour, while the foe
 Behold and tremble."

As she spake, they ran
 To burn the forts; they shower their wild fire there,
 And high amid the gloom the ascending flames
 Blaze up¹; then joyful of their finish'd toil
 The host retire. Hush'd is the field of fight
 As the calm'd ocean, when its gentle waves
 Heave slow and silent, wafting tranquilly
 The shatter'd fragments of some midnight wreck.

³ "But the first terrible blow in England given generally to all Orders, was in the Lay Parliament, as it is called, which did wholly Wicliffe, kept in the twelfth year of king Henry the Fourth, wherein the Nobles and Commons assembled, signified to the King, that the temporal possessions of Abbots, Priors, &c. lewdly spent within the Realm, would suffice to find and sustain 150 Earls, 1500 Knights, 6200 Esquires, 100 Hospitals, more than there were. But this motion was maul'd with the king's own hand, who dashed it, personally interposing Himself contrary to that character, which the jealous Clergy had conceived of Him, that coming to the Crown He would be a great enemy to the Church. But though Henry Plantagenet Duke of Lancaster was no friend to the Clergy, perchance to ingratiate himself with the people, yet the same Henry king of England, His interest being altered, to strengthen Him with the considerable power of the Clergy, proved a Patron, yea a Champion to defend them. However we may say, that now the Axe is laid to the root of the tree of Abbeys; and this stroke for the present, though it was so far from hurting the body, that it scarce pierced the bark thereof, yet bare attempts in such matters are important, as putting into people's heads a feasibility of the project formerly conceived altogether impossible.

"Few years after, namely, in the second year of king Henry the Fifth, another shrewd thrust was made at English Abbeys, but it was finely and cleverly put aside by that skillful State-Fencer Henry Chicheley Archbishop of Canterbury. For the former Bill against Abbeys, in full Parliament was revived, when the Archbishop minded king Henry of his undoubted Title to the fair and flourishing kingdom of France. Hereat, that king who was a spark in Himself, was enflamed to that design by this Prelate's persuasion: and his native courage ran fiercely on the project, especially when clapt on with conscience and encouragement from a churchman in the lawfulness thereof. An undertaking of those

Now curl'd, now flashing their long lightnings up
 That made the stars seem pale; less frequent now
 Through the red volumes briefer splendours shot,
 And blacker waves roll'd o'er the darken'd heaven.
 Dismay'd amid the forts which yet remain'd
 The invaders saw, and clamour'd for retreat,
 Deeming that aided by invisible powers
 The Maid went forth to conquer. Not a sound
 Moved on the air but fill'd them with vague dread
 Of unseen dangers; if a sudden blast
 Arose, through every fibre a deep fear
 Crept shivering, and to their expecting minds
 Silence itself was dreadful.⁴ One there was
 Who, learning wisdom in the hour of ill,
 Exclaim'd, "I marvel not that the Most High
 Hath hid his face from England! Wherefore thus,
 Quitting the comforts of domestic life,
 Came we to desolate this goodly land,
 Making the drench'd earth rank with human blood,
 Scatter pollution on the winds of Heaven?
 Oh! that the sepulchre had closed its jaws
 On the proud prelate, that blood-guilty man,
 Who, trembling for the church's ill-got wealth,
 Bade our Fifth Henry claim the crown of France!"⁵ vast dimensions, that the greatest covetousness might spread, and highest ambition reach itself within the bounds thereof. If to promote this project, the Abbeys advanced not only large and liberal, but vast and incredible sums of money, it is no wonder if they were contented to have their nails pared close to the quick thereby to save their fingers. Over goes king Henry into France, with many martial spirits attending him, so that putting the king upon the seeking of a new Crown, kept the Abbots' old Mitres upon their heads; and Monasteries tottering at this time, were (thank a polittick Archbishop) reffixed on the firm foundations, though this proved rather a reprieve than a pardon unto them." — Fulker's Church History, B. vi. p. 302.

"The archbishop of Bourges explained to the king, in the hall of the bishop of Winchester, and in the presence of the dukes of Clarence, Bedford, and Gloucester, brothers to the king, and of the lords of the council, clergy, chivalry and populace, the objects of his embassy. The archbishop spoke first in Latin, and then in the Walloon language, so eloquently and wisely, that both English and French who heard him were greatly surprised. At the conclusion of his harangue he made offers to the king of a large sum of ready money on his marriage with the princess Catherine, but on condition that he would disband the army he had collected at Southampton, and at the adjacent sea-ports, to invade France; and that by these means an eternal peace would be established between the two kingdoms.

"The assembly broke up when the archbishop had ended his speech, and the French ambassadors were kindly entertained at dinner by the king, who then appointed a day for them to receive his answer to their propositions by the mouth of the archbishop of Canterbury.

"In the course of the archbishop's speech, in which he replied, article by article, to what the archbishop of Bourges had offered, he added to some and posited over others of them, so that he was sharply interrupted by the archbishop of Bourges, who exclaimed, 'I did not say so, but such were my words.' The conclusion, however, was, that unless the king of France would give, as a marriage-portion with his daughter, the duchies of Aquitaine, of Normandy, of Anjou, of Tours, the counties of Ponthieu, Maine, and Poitou, and every other part that had formerly belonged to the English monarchs, the king would not desist from his intended invasion of France, but would despoil the whole of that kingdom which had been unjustly detained from him; and that he should depend on

Oh ! that the grave had swallow'd him, ere he Stir'd up the sleeping clain, and sent him forth
 To slaughter ! Sure that holy hermit spake
 The Almighty's bidding¹, who in his career
 Of conquest met the King, and bade him cease
 The work of death, before the wrath divine
 Fell heavy on his head. . . Full soon it fell
 And sunk him to the grave ; . . and soon that wrath
 On us, alike in guilt, alike shall fall ;
 For thousands and ten thousands, by the sword
 Cut off, and sent before the Eternal Judge,
 With all their unrepented crimes upon them,
 Cry out for vengeance ; for the widow's groan,²
 Though here she groan unpitied or unheard,
 Is heard in heaven against us : o'er this land
 For hills of human slain, unsepulchred,
 Steam pestilence, and cloud the blessed sun !
 The wrath of God is on us, . . God hath raised his sword for the accomplishment of the above, and for depriving king Charles of his crown.

" The king avowed what the archbishop had said, and added, that thus, with God's aid, he would act ; and promised it on the word of a king. The archbishop of Bourges then, according to the custom in France, demanded permission to speak, and said, ' O king ! how canst thou, consistently with honour and justice, thus wish to dethrone and iniquitously destroy the most Christian king of the French, our very dear lord, and most excellent of all the kings in christendom. O king ! with all due reverence and respect, dost thou think that he has offered by no such extent of territory, and so large a sum of money with his daughter in marriage, through any fear of thee, thy subjects, or allies ? By no means ; but, moved by pity and his love of peace, he has made these offers to avoid the shedding of innocent blood, and that Christian people may not be overwhelmed in the miseries of war ; for whenever thou shalt make thy promised attempt he will call upon God, the blessed Virgin, and on all the saints, making his appeal to them for the justice of his cause ; and with their aid, and the support of his loyal subjects and faithful allies, thou wilt be driven out of his dominions, or thou wilt be made prisoner, or thou wilt there suffer death by orders of that just king whose ambassadors we are.

" We have now only to intreat of thee that thou wouldst have us safely conducted out of thy realm ; and that thou wouldst write to our said king, under thy hand and seal, the answer which thou hast had given to us."

" The king kindly granted their request ; and the ambassadors, having received handsome presents, returned by way of Dover to Calais, and thence to Paris."

Monstrelet, vol. iv. p. 129.

Within a few days after the expiration of the truce, king Henry, whose preparations were now completed, sent one of his heralds, called Gloucester, to Paris, to deliver letters to the king, of which the contents were as follows.

" To the very noble prince Charles, our cousin and adversary of France, Henry, by the grace of God, king of England and of France. To give to every one what is their due, is a work of inspiration and wise council, very noble prince, our cousin and adversary. The noble kingdoms of England and France were formerly united, now they are divided. At that time it was customary for each person to exalt his name by glorious victories, and by this single virtue to extol the honour of God, to whom holiness belongs, and to give peace to his church, by subjecting in battle the enemies of the public weal ; but alas ! good faith among kindred and brotherly love have been perverted, and Lot persecutes Abraham by human imputation, and Dissention, the mother of Anger, has been raised from the dead.

" We, however, appeal to the sovereign Judge, who is nei-

This Prophetess, and goes before her path ; . .
 Our brethren, vainly valiant, fall beneath them,
 Clogging with gore their weapons, or in the flood
 Whelm'd like the Egyptian tyrant's impious host,
 Mangled and swollen, their blacken'd carcasses
 Float on the tainted current ! We remain,
 For yet our rulers will pursue the war,
 We still remain to perish by the sword,
 Soon to appear before the throne of God,
 Conscious, too late, of folly and of guilt,
 Uninjured, unprovoked, who dared to risk
 The life His goodness gave us, on the chance
 Of war, and in obedience to our chiefs
 Durst disobey our God."

Then terror seized

The troops and late repentance ; and they thought
 The spirits of the mothers and their babes
 Famish'd at Roan sat on the clouds of night,³ ther swayed by prayers nor ⁴gifts from doing right, that we have, from pure affection, done every thing in our power to preserve the peace ; and we must now rely on the sword for regaining what is justly our heritage, and those rights which have from old time belonged to us ; and we feel such assurance in our courage, that we will fight till death in the cause of justice.

" The written law in the book of Deuteronomy ordains, that before any person commences an attack on a city he shall first offer terms of peace ; and although violence has detained from us our rightful inheritances, charity, however, induces us to attempt, by fair means, their recovery ; for should justice be denied us, we may then resort to arms.

" And to avoid having our conscience affected by this matter, we make our personal request to you, and exhort you, by the bowels of Jesus Christ, to follow the dictates of his evangelical doctrine. Friend, restore what thou owest, for such is the will of God to prevent the effusion of the blood of man, who was created in his likeness. Such restitution of rights, cruelly torn from us, and which we have so frequently demanded by our ambassadors, will be agreeable to the supreme God, and secure peace on earth.

" From our love of peace we were inclined to refuse fifty thousand golden crowns lately offered us ; for being more desirous of peace than riches, we have preferred enjoying the patrimony left us by our venerable ancestors, with our very dear cousin Catherine, your noble daughter, to iniquitously multiplying our treasures, and thus disgracing the honour of our crown, which God forbid !

" Given under our privy seal, in our castle of Southampton, the 5th day of the month of August."

Monstrelet, vol. iv. p. 137.

1 " While Henry V. lay at the siege of Dreux, an honest hermit, unknown to him, came and told him the great evils he brought upon christendom by his unjust ambition, who usurped the kingdom of France, against all manner of right, and contrary to the will of God ; wherefore in his holy name he threatened him with a severe and sudden punishment, if he desisted not from his enterprize. Henry took this exhortation either as an idle whimsey, or a suggestion of the Dauphin's, and was but the more confirmed in his design. But the blow soon followed the threatening ; for within some few months after, he was smitten in the fundament with a strange and incurable disease." — Mezurier.

2 . . . " Reseraverat antrum
 Tartareus rector pallens ; utque arma nefanda
 Spectarent, caperentque sui solatia fœti,
 Invisas illuc Libyes emisserat umbras.
 Undique consedère arvis, nigræque coronæ
 Infecere diem, versatilis umbra Jugurthæ,

Circling the forts, to hail with gloomy joy
The hour of vengeance.

Nor the English chiefs
Heard these loud murmurs heedless; counselling
They met despondent. Suffolk, now their chief,
Since Salisbury fell, began.

"It now were vain
Lightly of this our more than mortal foe
To speak contemptuous. She hath vanquish'd us,
Aided by Hell's leagued powers, nor aught avails
Man unassisted 'gainst Infernal powers
To dare the conflict.¹ Were it best remain
Waiting the doubtful aid of Burgundy,
Doubtful and still delay'd? or from this place,
Scene of our shame, retreating as we may,
Yet struggle to preserve the guarded towns
Of the Orleanois?"

He ceased, and with a sigh,
Struggling with pride that heaved his gloomy breast,
Talbot replied, "Our council little boots:
For by their numbers now made bold in fear.²
The soldiers will not fight, they will not heed
Our vain resolves, heart-wither'd by the spells
Of this accursed sorceress. Soon will come
The expected host from England; even now
Perchance the tall bark scuds across the deep
That bears my son: young Talbot comes, he comes
To find his sire disgraced! But soon mine arm,
By vengeance nerved, and shame of such defeat,
Shall from the crest-fall'n courage of yon witch,
Regain its ancient glory. Near the coast
Best is it to retreat, and there expect
The coming succour."

Thus the warrior spake.
Joy ran through all the troops³, as though retreat
Were safety. Silently in order'd ranks
They issue forth, favour'd by the thick clouds
Which mantled o'er the moon. With throbbing hearts
Fearful they speeded on; some in sad thoughts
Of distant England, and now wise too late,
Cursing in bitterness the evil hour
That led them from her shores; some in faint hope
Thinking to see their native land again;
Talbot went musing on his former fame,
Sullen and stern, and feeding on dark thoughts,
And meditating vengeance.

In the walls
Of Orleans, though her habitants with joy
Humbly acknowledged the high aid of Heaven,
Of many a heavy ill and bitter loss
Mindful, such mingled sentiments they felt

Hannibalis ævi Manes, captivæ Syphacis:
Qui nunc eversas secum Carthaginis arces
Ignovère Deis, postquam feralia campi
Prælia Thapsiaci, et Latios vidère furores"

Supplementum Lucani, Lib. III.

I am not conscious of having imitated these lines; but I would not lose the opportunity of quoting so fine a passage from Thomas May, an author to whom I owe some obligations, and who is not remembered as his merits deserve. May himself has imitated Valerius Flaccus in this passage, though he has greatly surpassed him.

"Et pater orantes cæcorum Tartarus umbras,
Nube cavâ, tandem ad meritæ spectacula pugne
Emittit; summi nigrescunt culmina montis."

As one from shipwreck saved, the first warm glow
Of transport past, who contemplates himself
Preserved alone, a solitary wretch,
Possess'd of life indeed, but rest of all
That makes man love to live. The chieftains shared
The social bowl⁴, glad of the town relieved,
And communing of that miraculous Maid,
Who came the saviour of the realm of France,
When vanquish'd in the frequent field of shame
Her bravest warriors trembled.

Joan the while
Fasting and silent to the convent pass'd,
Conrade with her, and Isabel; both mute,
Yet gazing on her oft with anxious eyes,
Looking the consolation that they fear'd
To give a voice to. Now they reach'd the dome:
The glaring torches o'er the house of death
Stream'd a sad splendour. Flowers and funeral herbs
Bedeck'd the bier of Theodore, . . the rue,
The dark green rosemary, and the violet,
That pluck'd like him wither'd in its first bloom.
Dissolved in sorrow, Isabel her grief
Pour'd copiously, and Conrade also wept:
Joan only shed no tears, from her fix'd eye
Intelligence was absent, and she seem'd,
Though listening to the dirge of death, to hear
And comprehend it not, till in the grave, . .
In his last home, . . now Theodore was laid,
And earth to earth upon the coffin thrown;
Then the Maid started at that mortal sound,
And her lip quiver'd, and on Isabel,
Trembling and faint, she leant, and pale as death.

Then in the priest arose an earnest hope,
That weary of the world and sick with woe,
The Maid might dwell with them a virgin vow'd.
"Ah, damsel!" slow he spake, and cross'd his breast,
"Ah, damsel! favour'd as thou art of heaven,
Let not thy soul beneath its sorrow sink
Despondent; Heaven by sorrow disciplines
The froward heart, and chastens whom it loves.
Therefore, companion of thy way of life,
Shall sorrow wean thee from this faithless world,
Where happiness provokes the traveller's chase,
And like the midnight meteor of the marsh
Allures his long and perilous pursuit,
Then leaves him dark and comfortless. O Maid!
Fix thou thine eyes upon that heavenly dawn
Beyond the night of life! Thy race is run,
Thou hast deliver'd Orleans: now perfect
Thyself, accomplish all, and be the child

¹ To some, says Speed, it may appear more honourable to our nation, that they were not to be expelled by a human power, but by a divine, extraordinarily revealing itself.

² "Nec pavidum murmur; consensu audacia crevit,

³ In Rymer's Fœdera are two proclamations, one "contra capitaneos et soldados tergiversantes, incantationibus Puellæ terrificatos;" the other, "de fugitivis ab exercitu quos territorialia Puellæ exanimaverant, arestandis."

⁴ Rosnard remarks,

"Rien n'est meilleur pour l'homme soulager
Après le mal, que le boire et manger."

Of God. Amid these sacred haunts the groan
Of woe is never heard ; these hallow'd roofs
Re-echo only to the pealing quire,
The chanted mass, and virgin's holy hymn,
Celestial sounds ! Secluded here, the soul
Receives a foretaste of her joys to come ;
This is the abode of piety and peace ;
Oh ! be their inmate, Maiden ! Come to rest,
Die to the world, and live espoused to Heaven !"

Then Conrade answered, "Father ! Heaven has call'd
This Maid to active duties."

"Active !" cried
The astonish'd Monk ; "thou dost not know the tolls
This holy warfare asks ; thou dost not know
How powerful the attacks that Satan makes
By sinful Nature added ! Dost thou think
It is an easy task from the fond breast
To root affection out ? to burst the cords
Which grapple to society the heart
Of social man ? to rouse the unwilling spirit,
That, rebel to devotion, faintly pours
The cold lip-worship of the wearying prayer ?
To fear and tremble at Him, yet to love
A God of Terrors ? Maid beloved of Heaven,
Come to this sacred trial ! share with us
The day of penance and the night of prayer !
Humble thyself ; feel thine own worthlessness,
A reptile worm, before thy birth condemn'd
To all the horrors of thy Maker's wrath,
The lot of fallen mankind ! Oh, hither come !
Humble thyself in ashes. So thy name
Shall live amid the blessed host of saints,
And unborn pilgrims at thy hallowed shrine
Pour forth their pious offerings."

"Hear me, father !"
Exclaim'd the awaken'd Maid. "Amid these tombs,
Cold as their clayey tenants, know, my heart
Must never grow to stone ! Chill thou thyself,
And break thy midnight rest, and tell thy beads,
And labour through thy still repeated prayer :
Fear thou thy God of Terrors ; spurn the gifts
He gave, and sepulchre thyself alive !
But far more valued is the vine that bends
Beneath its swelling clusters, than the dark
And joyless ivy, round the cloister's wall
Wreathing its barren arms. For me I know
That I have faithfully obey'd my call,
Confiding not in mine own strength, but His
Who sent me forth to suffer and to do
His will ; and in that faith I shall appear

¹ A lighter kind of helmet.

² The shield was often worn thus. "Among the Frenchmen there was a young lusty esquire of Gascoigne, named William Marchant, who came out among the foremost into the field, well mounted, his shield about his neck, and his spear in his hand." — Barnes.

This is frequently alluded to in romance. "Then the knight of the burning sword stepped forward, and lifting up his arm as if he would strike Cynoccephal on the top of his head, seized with his left hand on the shield, which he pulled to him with so much strength, that plucking it from his neck he brought him to the ground." — Amadis de Grece.

Sometimes the shield was laced to the shoulder.

The shield of the middle ages must not be confounded with

Before the just tribunal of that God
Whom grateful love has taught me to adore !"

Severe she spake, for sorrow in her heart
Had wrought unwonted sternness. From the dome
They pass'd in silence, when with hasty steps
Sent by the chiefs, a messenger they met,
Who, in alarm, the mission'd Virgin sought,
A bearer of ill tidings.

"Holy Maid !"

He said, "they ask thy counsel. Burgundy
Comes in the cause of England, and his troops
Scarce three leagues from the walls, a fearful power, Rest tented for the night."

"Say to the chiefs,
At morn I will be with them," she replied ;
"And to this urgency will give meantime
My nightly thoughts."

So saying on she went
In thoughtful silence. A brief while she mused,
Brief, but sufficing to excite her soul,
As with a power and impulse not its own,
To some great purpose. "Conrade !" then she said,
"I pray thee meet me at the eastern gate
With a swift steed prepared, . . . for I must hence."

Her voice was calm, and Conrade through the gloom
Saw not the flush that witness'd on her cheek
Inward emotion at some thought conceived.
She to her quarters hastily repaired,
There with a light and unplumed casquetel¹
She helm'd her head ; hung from her neck the shield,²

And forth she went. Her Conrade by the gate
Awaited. "May I, Maiden, ask unblamed
Whither this midnight journey ? may I share
The peril ?" cried the warrior. She rejoind'd,
"This, Conrade, must not be. Alone I go.
That impulse of the soul which comes from God
Sends me. But thou of this remain assured,
If aught that I must enterprise required
Associate firmness, thou shouldst be the man,
Best, . . . and only friend !"

So up she sprung
And left him. He beheld the warden close
The gate, and listen'd to her courser's tramp,
Till soon upon his ear the far-off sound
Fell faintly, and was lost.

Swift o'er the vale
Sped the good courser ; eagerly the Maid
Gave the loose rein, and now her speed attain'd that of the ancients. The knight might easily bear his small shield around his neck ; but the Grecian warrior stood protecting his thighs and his legs, his breast also and his shoulders with the body of his broad shield.

Μακρὸς τὴν στήθεσιν καὶ ποσσὶν καὶ ὤμοις ἀσπίδος ὡς περὶ γυνεὶς ἀνελκόμενος. — Tyrtaeus.

But the most convenient shields were used by

"Ceux qu'on voit demeurer dans les lies Alandes,
Qui portent pour pavois, des escailles si grandes,
Que lors qu'il faut camper, le soldat qui s'en sert
En fait comme une hutte, et s'y met à couvert."

Alaric.

The dark encampment. Through the sleeping ranks
Onward she pass'd. The trampling of her steed
Or mingled with the soldier's busy dreams,
Or with vague terrors fill'd his startled sense,
Prompting a secret prayer.

So on she pass'd

To where in loftier shade arose the tent
Of Burgundy: light leaping from her seat
She enter'd.

On the earth the chieftain slept,
His mantle scarf around him; near him hung
His helmet and his shield, and at his side
Within hand-reach his sword. Profound he slept,
Nor heard the coming courier's sounding hoof,
Nor entering footstep. "Burgundy!" she cried,
"What, Burgundy! awake!" He started up
And saw the gleam of arms, and to his sword
Reach'd a quick hand. But what he now beheld
Thrill'd him, for full upon her face the lamp
Cast its deep glare, and in her solemn look
Was an unearthly meaning. Pale she was,
And in her eye a samely lustre beam'd,
And that most calm and holiest confidence
That guilt knows never. "Burgundy, thou seest
THE MAID OF ORLEANS."

As she spake, a voice
Exclaim'd, "Die, sorceress!" and a knight rush'd in,
Whose name by her illustrated yet lives,
Franquet of Arras. With uplifted arm
Furious he came; her buckler broke the blow,
And forth she flashed her sword, and with a stroke
Swift that no eye could ward it, and of strength
No mail might blunt, smote on his neck, his neck
Unfenced, for he in haste aroused had cast
An armet¹ on; restless there she smote,
And to the earth prone fell the headless trunk
Of Franquet.

Then on Burgundy she fix'd
Her eye severe. "Go, chief, and thank thy God
That he with lighter judgements visits thee
Than fell on Sisera, or by Judith's hand
He wrought upon the Assyrian! Thank thy God,
That when his vengeance smote the invading sons
Of England, equal though thou wert in guilt,
Thou hast been spared to work thy penitence
And better deeds atonement."

Thus she spake,
Then issued forth, and bounding on her steed
Sped o'er the plain. Dark on the upland bank
The hedge-row trees distinct and colourless
Rose on the grey horizon, and the Loire
Form'd in its winding way islands of light
Amid the shadowy vale, when now she reach'd
The walls of Orleans.

From the eastern clouds
The sun came forth, as to the assembled chiefs
The Maiden pass'd. Her bending thitherwards
The Bastard met. "New perils threaten us!"
He said, "new toils await us; Burgundy, . . ."

"Fear not for Burgundy!" the Maid replied,
"Him will the Lord direct. Our earliest scouts
Will tell his homeward march. What of the troops

¹ The armet or chapelle de fer was an iron hat, occasionally put on by knights when they retired from the heat of the

Of England?"

"They," the son of Orleans cried,
"By darkness favour'd, fled; yet not by flight
Shall these invaders now escape the arm
Of retribution. Even now our troops,
By battle unfatigued, unsatisfied
With conquest, clamour to pursue the foe."

The delegated Damsel thus replied:

"So let them fly, Dunois! But other work
Than that of battle, now must be perform'd.
We move not in pursuit, till we have paid
The rites of burial to our countrymen,
And hymn'd our gratitude to that All-just
Who gave the victory. Thou, meantime, dispatch
Tidings to Chinon. Let the King set forth,
That crowning him before assembled France,
In Rheims delivered from the enemy,
I may accomplish all."

So said the Maid,
Then to the gate moved on. The assembled troops
Beheld her coming, and they smote their shields,
And with one voice of greeting bleas'd her name
And pray'd her to pursue the flying foe.
She wav'd her hand, and silently they stood,
Attentive while she spake, . . . "Fellows in arms!
We must not speed to joyful victory,
And leave our gallant comrades where they lie,
For dogs, and wolves, and carrion-birds a prey;
Ere we advance, let us discharge to them
The duty that is due."

So said the Maid;
And as she spake, the thirst of battle dies
In every breast, such awe and love pervade
The listening troops. They o'er the coarse-strewn plain
Speed to their sad employment: some dig deep
The house of death; some bear the lifeless load;
Others the while search carefully around,
If haply they may find surviving yet
Some wounded wretches. As they labour thus,
They mark far off the iron-blaze of arms;
See distant standards waving on the air,
And hear the clarion's clang. Then spake the Maid
To Conrade, and she bade him haste to spy
The coming army, or to meet their march
With friendly greeting, or if foes they came
With such array of battle as short space
Allow'd: the warrior sped across the plain,
And soon beheld the banner'd lilies wave.

Their chief was Richemont: he when as he heard
What rites employed the Virgin, straightway bade
His troops assist in burial; they, though grieved
At late arrival, and the expected day
Of conquest past, yet give their willing aid:
They dig the general grave, and thither bear
English or French alike commingled now,
And heap the mound of death.

Amid the plain
There was a little eminence, of old
Raised o'er some honour'd chieftain's narrow house.
His praise the song had ceased to celebrate,
And many an unknown age had the long grass

battle to take breath, and at times when they could not with propriety go unarmed.

Waved o'er that nameless mound, though barren now
Beneath the frequent tread of multitudes
There elevate, the martial Maiden stood,
Her brow unhelm'd, and floating on the wind
Her long dark locks. The silent troops around
Stood thickly throng'd, as o'er the fertile field
Billows the ripen'd corn. The passing breeze
Bore not a murmur from the numerous host,
Such deep attention held them. She began.

"Glory to those who in their country's cause
Fall in the field of battle! Countrymen,
I stand not here to mourn these gallant men,
Our comrades, nor with vain and idle phrase
Of sorrow and compassion, to console
The friends who loved them. They, indeed who fall
Beneath oppression's banner, merit well
Our pity, may the God of Peace and Love
Be merciful to those blood-guilty men
Who came to desolate the realm of France,
To make us bow the knee, and crouch like slaves
Before a foreign master. Give to these,
And to their wives and orphans little-ones
That on their distant fathers' only cry
For aid give these your pity! Wretched men,
Forced or invigled from their homes, or driven
By need and hunger to the trade of blood,
Or if with free and willing mind they came,
Most wretched, for before the eternal throne
Guilt alike in act and will they stand
But our dead comrades for their country fought,
No arts they needed nor the specious bribes
Of promise to allure them to this fight,
His holy warfare! them their parents sent,
And as they raised their streaming eyes to Heaven,
Bade them go forth, and from the Russian sword
Save their grey hairs. them their dear wives sent out,
Fix'd their last kisses on their armed hands!
And bade them in the battle think they fought
For them and for their children. Thus inflamed,
By every milder feeling, they went forth,
They fought, they conquer'd. To this holy ground
The men of Orleans in the days to come
Shall bring their boys, and tell them of the deeds
Their countrymen achiev'd, and bid them learn
Like them to love their country, and like them,
Should usurpation pour again its tide
Of desolation, to step forth and stem
Fearless, the furious torrent. Men of France,
Mourn not for these our comrades! boldly they Fought the good fight, and that eternal One,
Who bade the Angels harbingers His Word
With 'Peace on earth,' reward them. We survive
Honouring their memories to avenge their fall
Upon the unjust invaders. They may drain
Their kingdom's wealth and lavishly expend
Its blood, insanely thinking to subdue
This wide and populous realm; for easier were it
To move the ancient mountains from their base,
Than on a nation knowing its own strength
To force a foreign yoke. France then is safe

My glorious mission soon will be fulfill'd,
My work be done. But oh! remember ye,
And in their generation let your sons
Transmit to theirs the all-concerning truth,
That a great people wrongfully assail'd,
If faithful to themselves, and resolute
In duty to the last, betide what may,
Although no signs be given, no miracles
Vouchsafed as now, no Prophetess ordain'd,
May yet with hope invincible hold on,
Relying on their courage, and their cause,
And the sure course of righteous Providence."

JOAN OF ARC.

THE FIFTH BOOK *

THIS to the martyrs in their country's cause
The Maiden gave their fame, and when she ceased,
Such murmur from the multitude arose,
As when at twilight hour the summer breeze
Moves o'er the daisy vale. There was not one
Who mourn'd with feble sorrow for his friend,
Shun in the light of freedom, or if chance
Remembrance with a tear suffus'd the eye,
The patriot's joy shone through.

And now the rites
Of sepulture perform'd, the hymn to Heaven
They chanted. To the town the Maid return'd,
Dunois, with her, and Richemont, and the man
Conrade, whose converse most the Virgin loved.
They of pursuit and of the future war
Sate communing, when loud the trumpet's voice
Proclaim'd a herald's coming.

"To the Maid,"
Such was his errand, "and to thee, Dunois,
Son of the churl he loved, Du Chastel sends Greeting. The aged warrior hath not spar'd
All active efforts to partake your toil,
And serve his country. And though late arrived,
He shuns not in the fame your arms acquire.
His heart is glad that he is late arrived,
And France preserved thus early. He were here
To join your host, and follow the pursuit,
But Richemont is his foe. To that high Lord
Thus says my master. We, though each to each
Be hostile, are alike the embattled sons
Of our dear country. Therefore do thou join
The conquering troops, and prosecute success;
I will the while assault what garrisons towns
Bedford yet holds in Orleans. One day,
Perhaps the Constable of France may learn
He wrong'd Du Chastel."

As the herald spake,
Richemont's cheek reddend, partly with a sense
Of shame, and partly anger half suppress'd.
"Say to thy master," eagerly he said,

Ostentant parvos, vagitque incerta pulsant
Corda virum armatis insigunt oculus dextris "

Silvius Italicus, xli 887

"Sed contra Censoria pubes
Non ullas voces ducis aut precepta requirit
Sed matres stimulant, natiq; et cara supinas
Tendentum pelmas lacrymantiaq; ora parentum.

"I am the foe of those court parasites
Who poison the King's ear. Him who shall serve
Our country in the field, I hold my friend :
Such may Du Chastel prove."

So said the chief,
And pausing as the herald went his way,
Turn'd to the Virgin : "If I guess aright,
It is not from a friendly tongue's report,
That thou hast heard of me."

Dissembling not
The unwelcome truth, "Yes, chieftain !" she replied,
"Report bespeaks thee haughty, violent,
Suffering no rival, brooking no controul,
And executing by unrighteous means
The judgements of thine own unlawful will."

"But hear me, Maid of Orleans !" he exclaim'd :
"Should the wolf enter thy defenceless flock,
Were it a crime if thy more mighty force
Destroy'd the fell destroyer ? If thy hand
Had slain a ruffian as he burst thy door
Prepared for midnight murder, should'st thou feel
The weight of blood press heavy on thy soul ?
I slew the wolves of state, the murderers
Of thousands. Joan ! when rusted in its sheath
The sword of justice hung, blamest thou the man
That lent his weapon for the righteous deed ?"

Conrade replied, "Nay, Richemont, it were well
To slay the ruffian as he burst thy doors ;
But if he bear the plunder safely thence,
And thou should'st meet him on the future day,
Vengeance must not be thine : there is the law
To punish ; and the law alloweth not,
That the accuser take upon himself
The judge's part ; still less doth it allow
That he should execute upon the accused
Untried, unheard, a sentence, which so given Becomes, whate'er the case, itself a crime."

"Thou hast said wisely," cried the constable ;
"But there are guilty ones above the law,
Men whose black crimes exceed the utmost bound
Of private guilt ; court vermin that buzz round,
And fly-blow the King's ear, and make him waste,
In this most perilous time, his people's wealth
And blood ; immersed one while in sensual sloth,
Headless though ruin threat the realm they rule ;
And now projecting some mad enterprize,
Sending their troops to sure defeat and shame.
These are the men who make the King suspect
His wisest, faithfulest, best counsellors ;
And for themselves and their dependents, seize
All places, and all profits ; and they wrest
To their own ends the statutes of the land,
Or safely break them ; thus, or indolent,
Or active, ruinous alike to France.
Wise thou sayest, warrior, that the Law
Should strike the guilty ; but the voice of Justice
Cries out, and brings conviction as it cries,
Whom the law cannot reach, the dagger should."

The Maid replied, "It seemeth then, O chief,
That reasoning to thine own conviction thus,
Thou standest self-acquitted of all wrong,
Self-justified, yea, self-approved. I ask not

Whether this public zeal hath look'd askaunt
To private ends ; men easily deceive
Others, and oft more easily themselves.
But what if one reasoning as thou hast done
Had in like course proceeded to the act,
One of the people, one of low degree,
In whom the strong desire of public good
Had grown to be his one sole sleepless thought,
A passion, and a madness ; raised as high
Above all sordid motives as thyself :
Beneath such impulses of rivalry
And such ambitious projects, as perforce
Men will impute to thee ? had such a man
Stood forth the self-appointed minister
To execute his own decrees of death,
The law on him had rightfully enforced
That sentence, which the Almighty hath enjoin'd
Of life for life. Thou, chief, art by thy rank
And power exempted from the penalty :
What then hast thou exampled, . . . right and wrong
Confounding thus, and making lawless might
The judge in its own quarrel ? Trust me, chief,
That if a people sorely are oppress'd,
The dreadful hour of overthrow will come
Too surely and too soon ! He best meanwhile
Performs the sage's and the patriot's part,
Who in the ear of rage and faction breathes
The healing words of love."

Thus communed they.
Meantime, all panic-struck and terrified,
The English urge their flight : by other thoughts
Possess'd than when, elate with arrogance,
They dreamt of conquest, and the crown of France
At their disposal. Of their hard fought fields,
Of glory hardly earn'd, and lost with shame,
Of friends and brethren slaughter'd, and the fate
Threatening themselves, they brooded sadly, now
Repentant late and vainly. They whom fear
Erst made obedient to their conquering march,
Rise on them in defeat, while they retire,
Marking their path with ruin, day by day
Leaving the weak and wounded destitute
To the foe's mercy ; thinking of their home,
Though to that far-off prospect scarcely hope
Could raise a sickly eye. Oh then what joy
Inspired anew their bosoms, when, like clouds
Moving in shadows down the distant hill,
They saw their coming succours ! In each heart
Doubt raised a busy tumult ; soon they knew
The English standard, and a general shout
Burst from the joyful ranks : yet came no joy
To Talbot : he, with dark and downward brow,
Mused sternly, till at length aroused to hope
Of vengeance, welcoming his gallant son,
He brake a sullen smile.¹

"Son of my age,
Welcome young Talbot to thy first of fields.
Thy father bids thee welcome, though disgraced,
Baffled, and flying from a woman's arm !
Yea, by my former glories, from a woman !
The scourge of France, the conqueror of men,
Flying before a woman ! Son of Talbot,
Had the winds wafted thee a few days sooner,
Thou hadst seen me high in honour, and thy name

¹ "She sternly shook her dewy locks, and brake
A melancholy smile." — Quarles.

Alone had scatter'd armies; yet, my son,
I bid thee welcome! here we rest our flight,
And face again the foe."

So spake the chief;
And well he counsel'd; for not yet the sun
Had reach'd meridian height, when o'er the plain
Of Patay, they beheld the troops of France
Speed in pursuit. Soon as the troops of France
Beheld the dark battalions of the foe
Shadowing the distant plain, a general shout
Burst from the expectant host, and on they prest,
Elate of heart and eager for the fight,
With clamours ominous of victory.
Thus urging on, one from the adverse host
Advanced to meet them; they his garb of peace
Knew, and they halted as the herald spake
His bidding to the chieftains. "Sirs!" he cried,
"I bear defiance to you from the Earl
William of Suffolk. Here on this fit ground,
He will to give you battle, power to power,
So please you, on the morrow."

"On the morrow
We will join battle then," replied Dunols,
"And God befriend the right!" Then on the herald
A robe rich-furr'd and broider'd he bestow'd,
A costly guerdon. Through the army spread
The unwelcome tidings of delay: 'possess'd
With agitating hopes they felt the hours
Pass heavily; but soon the night wain'd on,
And the loud trumpets' blare from broken sleep
Roused them; a second time the thrilling blast
Rade them be arm'd, and at the third long sound
They rang'd them in their ranks.² From man to man

¹ When the armies of England and France lay in the plain between Vironfosse and Fiemenguerre, 1339, Edward sent to demand a day of battle of the French king. "An herald of the duke of Gueldres, being well skilled in the French tongue, was sent on this errand: he rode forth till he came to the French host, where being admitted before the king and his council, he spake aloud these words, 'Sir, the king of England is here hard by in the fields, and desires to fight you power against power: and if you please to appoint him a day he will not fail to meet you upon the word of a king.' This message being thus delivered, king Philip yielded either to give or take battle two days after, and in token of his acceptance of the news, richly rewarded the herald with furred gowns, and other gifts bestowed on him, as well by himself as others, the princes and lords of his host, and so dismissed him again." — Barnes.

² "Every man was warned to rise from sleep at the first sound of the trumpet; at the second to arm without delay, and at the third to take horse in his due place under the colours." — Barnes.

³ Religious ceremonies seem to have preceded all settled engagements at this period. On the night before the battle of Cressy "King Edward made a supper in his royal pavilion for all his chief barons, lords, and captains: at which he appeared wonderful cheerful and pleasant, to the great encouragement of his people. But when they were all dismissed to their several quarters, the king himself retired into his private oratory, and came before the altar, and there prostrated himself to Almighty God and devoutly prayed, 'That of his infinite goodness he would vouchsafe to look down on the justice of his cause, and remember his unfeigned endeavours for a reconciliation, although they had all been rendered frustrate by his enemies: that if he should be brought to a battle the next day it would please him of his great mercy to grant him the victory, as his trust was only in him, and in the right which he had given him.' Being thus armed with faith, about midnight

With pious haste hurried the confessors
To shrive them³, lest with souls all unprepared
They to their death might go. Dunols meantime
Rode through the host, the shield of dignity⁴
Before him borne, and in his hand he held
The white wand of command. The open helm
Disclosed that eye which temper'd the strong lines
Of steady valour, to obedient awe
Winning the will's assent. To some he spake
Of late-earn'd glory; others, new to war,
He bade bethink them of the feats achieved
When Talbot, recreant to his former fame,
Fled from beleaguer'd Orleans. Was there one
Whom he had known in battle? by the hand
Him did he take, and bid him on that day
Summon his wonted courage, and once more Support his chief and comrade. Happy he
Who caught his eye, or from the chieftain's lips
Heard his own name! joy more inspiriting
Fills not the Persian's soul, when sure he deems
That Mithra hears propitiously his prayer,
And o'er the scattered cloud of morning pours
A brighter ray responsive.

Then the host
Partook due food, this their last meal belike
Receiving with such thoughtful doubts as make
The soul, impatient of uncertainty,
Rush eager to the event; being thus prepared,
Upon the grass the soldiers laid themselves,
Each in his station, waiting there the sound
Of onset, that in undiminish'd strength
Strong, they might meet the battle⁵; silent some Pondering the chances of the coming day,

he laid himself upon a pallet or mattress to take a little repose; but he rose again bytimes and heard mass, with his son the young prince, and received absolution, and the body and blood of his Redeemer, as did the prince also, and most of the lords and others who were so disposed." — Barnes.

Thus also before the battle of Agincourt "after prayers and supplications of the king, his priests, and people, done with great devotion, the king of England in the morning very early set forth his hosts in array." — Stowe.

⁴ The roundel. A shield too weak for service which was borne before the general of an army.

⁵ The conduct of the English on the morning of the battle of Cressy is followed in the text. "All things being thus ordered, every lord and captain under his own banner and pennon, and the ranks duly settled, the valourous young king mounted on a lusty white hobby, and with a white wand in his hand, rode between his two marshalls from rank to rank, and from one battalia unto another, exhorting and encouraging every man that day to defend and maintain his right and honour: and this he did with so cheerful a countenance, and with such sweet and obliging words, that even the most faint-hearted of the army were sufficiently assured thereby. By that time the English were thus prepared, it was nine o'clock in the morning, and then the king commanded them all to take their refreshment of meat and drink, which being done, with small disturbance they all repaired to their colours again, and then laid themselves in their order upon the dry and warm grass, with their harts and helmets by their side, to be more fresh and vigorous upon the approach of the enemy." — Barnes.

The English before the battle of Agincourt, "fell prostrate to the ground, and committed themselves to God, every of them took in his mouth a little piece of earth, in remembrance that they were mortall and made of earth, as also in remembrance of the holy communion." — Stowe.

Some whiling with a careless gait
The fearful pause of action.

Thus the French
In such array and high in confident hope
Await the signal; whilst with other thoughts,
And ominous awe, once more the invading host
Prepare them in the field of fight to meet
The Prophetess. Collected in himself
Appear'd the might of Talbot. Through the ranks
He stalks, reminds them of their former fame,
Their native land, their homes, the friends they loved,

All the rewards of this day's victory.
But awe had fill'd the English, and they struck
Faintly their shields; for they who had beheld
The hallowed banner with celestial light
Irradiate, and the mission'd Maiden's deeds,
Felt their hearts sink within them, at the thought
Of her near vengeance; and the tale they told
Roused such a tumult in the new-come troops,
As fitted them for fear. The aged Earl
Beheld their drooping valour, and his brow,
Wrinkled with thought, bewray'd his inward doubts:
Still he was firm, though all might fly, resolved
That Talbot should retrieve his old renown,
And end his life with glory. Yet some hope
Inspired the veteran, as across the plain
Casting his eye, he mark'd the embattled strength
Of thousands; archers of unequalled skill,
Brigands and pikemen, from whose lifted points
A fearful radiance flash'd, and young esquires,
And high-born warriors, bright in blazon'd arms.

¹ The pennon was long, ending in two points, the banner square. "Un seigneur n'étoit banneret et ne pouvoit porter la bannière quarée, que lors qu'il pouvoit entretenir à ses dépens un certain nombre de chevaliers et d'Ecuyers, avec leur suite à la guerre: jusques-là son étendard avoit deux queues ou fanons, et quand il devenoit plus puissant, son souverain coupoit lui-même les fanons de son étendard, pour le rendre quaré." — Tressan.

An incident before the battle of Najara exemplifies this. "As the two armies approached near together, the prince went over a little hill, in the descending whereof he saw plainly his enemies marching toward him: wherefore when the whole army was come over this mountain, he commanded that there they should make an halt, and so fit themselves for fight. At that instant the Lord John Chandos brought his ensign folded up, and offered it to the prince, saying, 'Sir, here is my guidon; I request your highness to display it abroad, and to give me leave to raise it this day as my banner; for I thank God and your highness, I have lands and possessions sufficient to maintain it withall.' Then the prince took the pennon, and having cut off the tail, made it a square banner, and this done, both he and King Don Pedro for the greater honour, holding it between their hands displayed it abroad, it being Or, a sharp pile Gules; and then the prince delivered it unto the Lord Chandos again, saying, 'Sir John, behold here is your banner. God send you much joy and honour with it.' And thus being made a knight banneret, the lord Chandos returned to the head of his men, and said, 'Here, gentlemen, behold my banner and yours! Take and keep it, to your honour and mine!' And so they took it with a shout, and said by the grace of God and St. George they would defend it to the best of their powers. But the banner remained in the hands of a gallant English esquire named William Alestry, who bore it all that day, and acquitted himself in the service right honourably." — Barnes.

Nor few, nor fameless were the English chiefs.
In many a field victorious, he was there,
The garter'd Fastolfe; Hungerford, and Scales,
Men who had seen the hostile squadrons fly
Before the arms of England; Suffolk there,
The haughty chieftain tower'd; blest had he fallen
Ere yet a courtly minion he was mark'd
By public hatred, and the murderer's guilt!
There too the son of Talbot, young in arms,
Heir of a noble race and mighty name:
At many a tilt and tournament had he Approved his skill and prowess; confident
In strength, and jealous of his future fame,
His heart beat high for battle. Such array
Of marshal'd numbers fought not on the field
Of Cressy, nor at Poitiers; nor such force
Led Henry to the fight of Agincourt
When thousands fell before him.

Onward move
The host of France. It was a goodly sight
To see the embattled pomp, as with the step
Of stateliness the barded steeds come on, . . .
To see the pennons rolling their long waves
Before the gale, and banners broad and bright!
Tossing their blazonry, and high-plumed chiefs
Vidames² and Seneschalls and Castellains,
Gay with their bucklers' gorgeous heraldry,
And silken surcoats to the mid-day sun
Glittering.³

And now the knights of France dismount,
For not to brutal strength they deem'd it right
To trust their fame and their dear country's weal;⁴

² This title frequently occurs in the French Chronicles; it was peculiar to France, "the vidame or vicedominus being to the bishop in his temporals as the viccomes or vicounts anciently to the earls, in his judicials." — Peter Heylen.

³ Joshua Barnes seems to have been greatly impressed with the splendour of such a spectacle. "It was a glorious and ravishing sight, no doubt," says he, "to behold these two armies standing thus regularly embattled in the field, their banners and standards waving in the wind, their proud horses barded, and kings, lords, knights, and esquires richly armed, and all shining in their surcoats of satin and embroidery."

Thus also at Poitiers, "there you might have beheld a most beautiful sight of fair harness, of shining steel, feathered crests of glittering helmets, and the rich embroidery of silken surcoats of arms, together with golden standards, banners and pennons gloriously moving in the air."

And at Najara "the sun being now risen, it was a ravishing sight to behold the armies, and the sun reflecting from their bright steel and shining armour. For in those days the cavalry were generally armed in mail or polished steel at all points, and besides that, the nobility wore over their armour rich surcoats of silk and satin embroidery, whereon was curiously sticht or beaten, the arms of their house, whether in colour or metal."

⁴ "Nos ancestres, et notamment du temps de la guerre des Anglois, en combats solennels et journées assignées, se mettoient la plupart du temps tous à pied; pour ne se fier à autre chose qu'à leur force propre et vigueur de leur courage et de leurs membres, de chose si chère que l'honneur et la vie." — Montaigne, liv. I. c. 48.

In the battle of Fatay, Monstrelet says, "les François moult de pres mirent pied à terre, et descendirent la plus grand partie de leur chevaux."

In "El Cavallero Determinado," an allegorical romance translated from the French of Olivier de la Marche, by Harnando de Acuna, Barcelona, 1566, this custom is referred to

Rather to manly courage, and the glow
Of honourable thoughts, such as inspire
Ennobling energy. Unhorsed, unpurred,
Their javelins shorten'd to a widdly length,¹
They to the foe advanced. The Maid alone,
Conspicuous on a coal-black courser, meet
The war. They moved to battle with such sound
As rushes o'er the vaulted firmament,
When from his seat, on the utmost verge of heaven
That overhangs the void, the Sire of Winds,
Hraesvelgr starting², rears his giant bulk,
And from his eagle pinions shakes the storm.

High on her stately steed the martial Maid
Rode foremost of the war; her burn'd arms
Shone like the brook that o'er its pebbled course
Runs glittering gayly to the noon-tide sun.
The foaming courser, of her guiding hand
Impatient, smote the earth, and toss'd his mane,
And rear'd aloft with many a froward bound,
Then answered to the rein with such a step,
As, in submission, he was proud to show
His spirit unsubdued. Slow on the air
Waved the white plumes that shadow'd o'er her helm.
Even such, so fair, so terrible in arms,
Pelides moved from Scyros, where, conceal'd,
He lay obedient to his mother's fears
A seemly damsel; thus the youth appear'd
Terribly graceful, when upon his neck
Deidamia hung, and with a look
That spake the tumult of her troubled soul,

by Understanding, when giving the knight directions for his combat with Atropos.

"En esto es mi parecer
Que en cavallo no te fies;
Por lo qual has de entender
Que de ninguno confies
Tu lymosna y bien hazer."

¹ Thus at Poitiers, "the three battails being all ready ranged in the field, and every lord in his due place under his own banner, command was given that all men should put off their spurs, and cut their spears to five foot length, as most commodious for such who had left their horses."—Barnes.

² "Hraesvelgr vocatur
Qui sedet in extremitate coeli,
Gigas exuvias amictus aquilae:
Ex ejus alis
Ferunt venire ventum
Omnes super homines."—l'asthruðnismal.

"Where the Heavens remotest bound
With darkness is encompassed round,
There Hraesvelgr sits and swings
The tempest from his eagle wings."

The Edda of Sannud, translated by Amos Cottle.

Among the idols of Aitutaki (one of the Hervey Islands), sent home among other trophies of the same kind to the Missionary Museum, is the God of Thunder, Taau. The natives used to believe that when Taau was flying abroad, Thunder was produced by the flapping of his wings. — Williams' Missionary Enterprises in the South Sea Islands, p. 109.

At the promontory of Malea on the ruins of the Temple of Apollo, there is a chapel built to the honour of Michael the archangel. Here we could not but laugh at the foolish superstition of the sailors, who say, when the wind blows from that place, that it is occasioned by the violent motion of Michael's wings, because forsooth, he is painted with wings.

Fear, anguish, and upbraiding tenderness,
Gazed on the father of her unborn babe.

As English knight, who eager for renown
Lest to the peaceful mansion, mark'd the Maid.
His gaze suspicious and portentous deeds
He saw, the troops had heard incredulous,
And with their easy fears, and vow'd that he,
Proving the magic of this dreaded girl
In equal battle, would dissolve the spell,
Powerless opposed to valour. Forth he spurr'd
Before the ranks; she mark'd the coming foe,
And fix'd her lance in rest, and rush'd along.
Midway they met; full on her buckler driven,
Shiver'd the English spear: her better force
Drove the brave foeman senseless from his seat.
Headlong he fell for ever to the sense;
Of shame awoke, for crowding multitudes
Soon crush'd the helpless warrior.

Then the Maid
Rode through the thickest battle; fast they fell,
Pierced by her forceful spear. Amid the troops
Plunged her strong war-horse, by the noise of arms
Elate and roused to rage, he tramples o'er,
Or with the lance pretended from his front,³ Thrusts down the thronging squadrons. Where she turns

The foe tremble and die. Such ominous fear
Seizes the traveller o'er the trackless sands,
Who marks the dread Simoom across the waste
Sweep its swift pestilence: to earth he falls,

And for that reason, when they sail by Michael they pray to him that he may hold his wings still. — Braungarten.

³ In a combat fought in Smithfield 1467, between the Lord Scales and the bastard of Burgoyne, "the Lord Scales' horse had on his chafron a long sharp pike of steel, and as the two champions cooped together, the same horse thrust his pike into the nostrils of the bastard's horse, so that for very paine, he mounted so high that he fell on the one side with his master." — Stowe.

This weapon is mentioned by Lope de Vega, and by an old Scotch poet.

"Unicornia el cavallo parecia
Con el fuerte pyramide delante,
Que en medio del boçal resplandecia
Como si fuera punta de diamante."

Jerusalem Conquistada, l. x.

His horse in syne sandel was trapped to the hele.

"And, in his cheveron biforne,
Stode as an unicorn,
Als sharp as a thorne,
An anlas of steele."

Sir Gawain and Sir Galahad.

Florisel found this part of his horse's armour of good service, when in the combat of eighteen against eighteen, he encountered the king of the Scythians, "geant demesuré; il chevauchoit un grand animal de son pays, duquel nous ne savons le nom: aussi étoit-il tant corpuent et membru, qu'on n'eust sçeu fournir roussin qui l'eust pu porter." The first encounter "fut très belle jouste à voir, et au joindre des corps mourut treize chevaux, compris l'animal du Roy de Scythie, qui fut si tourdemēt rencostré par le destrier de Florisel, portant bardes de fer, et une poignée acérée sur le chanfrain qu'il fourra si avant parmy les flancs de ceste grosse beste, qu'il atterrace avec les autres, et la jambe de son maistre dessous." — Amadis, l. x. ff. 51, 52.

The Abyssinians use it at this day: Bruce says it is a very troublesome useless piece of their armour.

Nor dares give utterance to the inward prayer,
Deeming the Genius of the desert breathes
The purple blast of death.

Such was the sound

As when a tempest, mingling air and sea,
Flies o'er the upturn ocean : dashing high
Their foamy heads amid the incumbent clouds,
The madden'd billows with their deafening roar
Drown the loud thunder's peal. In every form
Of horror, death was there. They fall, transfix'd
By the random arrow's point, or fierce-thrust lance,
Or sink, all battered by the ponderous mace :
Some from their coursers thrown, lie on the earth,
Helpless because of arms, that weak to save,
Lengthen'd the lingering agonies of death.
But most the English fell, by their own fears
Betray'd, for fear the evil that it dreads
Increaseth. Even the chiefs, who many a day
Had met the war and conquer'd, trembled now,
Appall'd before the Maid miraculous.
As the blood-nurtur'd monarch of the wood,
That o'er the wilds of Afric in his strength
Restless ranges, when the mutinous clouds
Burst, and the lightnings through the midnight sky
Dart their red fires, lies fearful in his den,
And howls in terror to the passing storm.

But Talbot, fearless where the bravest fear'd,
Mow'd down the hostile ranks. The chieftain stood
Like a strong oak, amid the tempest's rage,
That stands unharm'd, and while the forest falls
Uprooted round, lifts his high head aloft,
And nods majestic to the warring wind.
He fought, resolved to snatch the shield of death¹
And shelter him from shame. The very herd
Who fought near Talbot, though the Virgin's name
Made their cheeks pale and drove the curdling blood
Back to their hearts, caught from his daring deeds
New force, and went like eaglets to the prey
Beneath their mother's wing : to him they look'd,
Their tower of strength², and follow'd where his sword
Made through the foe a way. Nor did the son
Of Talbot shame his lineage ; by his sire
Emulous he strove, like the young lionet
When first he bathes his murderous jaws in blood.
They fought intrepid, though amid their ranks
Fear and confusion triumph'd ; for such dread
Possess'd the English, as the Etruscans felt,
When self-devoted to the infernal gods
The awful Decius stood before the troops,
Bobbed in the victim garb of sacrifice,

¹ Thus did Juba catch up the shield of death to defend himself from ignominy. — Cleopatra.

² Πρωτε γὰρ καὶ πρῶτος ἐν ἀνδραγαθίᾳ ἔστην. — Tyræus.

Charles has made this expression somewhat ludicrous by calling Sampson

"Great army of men, the wonder of whose power
Gives thee the title of a walking tower."

³ Two carols for this occasion are preserved in Mr. Ritson's valuable collection of Ancient Songs. The first of these, here alluded to, is as follows :

"Caput apri deferro Reddens laudes domino."

And spake aloud, and call'd the shadowy powers
To give to Rome the conquest, and receive
Their willing prey ; then rush'd amid the foe,
And died upon the hecatombs he slew.

But hope inspired the assailants. Xaintrilles there
Spread fear and death, and Orleans' valiant son
Fought as when Warwick fled before his arm.
O'er all pre-eminent for hardest deeds
Was Conrade. Where he drove his battle-axe,
Weak was the buckler or the helm's defence,
Hauberk, or plated mail, through all it pierced,
Resistless as the forked flash of heaven.
The death- doom'd foe, who mark'd the coming chief,
Felt such a charge run through his shivering frame,
As the night-traveller of the Pyrenees,
Lone and bewilder'd on his wintry way,
When from the mountains round reverberates
The hungry wolves' deep yell ; on every side,
Their fierce eyes gleaming as with meteor fires,
The famish'd pack come round ; the affrighted mule
Snorts loud with terror, on his huddering limbs
The big sweat starts, convulsive pant his sides,
Then on he gallops, wild in desperate speed.
Him dealing death an English knight beheld,
And spur'd his steed to crush him. Conrade leap'd
Lightly aside, and through the warrior's grieves
Fix'd a deep wound : nor longer could the foe,
Disabled thus, command his mettled horse,
Or his rude plunge endure ; headlong he fell,
And perish'd. In his castle-hall was hung
On high his father's shield, with many a dint
Graced on the plorious field of Agincourt.
His deeds the son had heard ; and when a boy,
Listening delighted to the old man's tale,
His little hand would lift the weighty spear
In warlike pastime he had left behind
An infant offspring, and had fondly deem'd
He too in age the exploits of his youth
Should tell, and in the stripling's bosom rouse
The fire of glory.

Conrade the next foe
Smote where the heaving membrane separates
The chambers of the trunk. The dying man,
In his lord's castle dwelt, for many a year,
A well-beloved servant : he could sing
Carols for Shrove-tide, or for Candlemas,
Songs for the wassel and when the boar's head,
Crown'd with gay garlands and with rosemary,
Smoked on the Christmas board³ : he went to war
Following the lord he loved, and saw him fall

"The bore's heed in hand bring I
With garlands gay and rosemary,
I pray you all syng me
Qui estis in convivio.

"The bore's heed I understande
Is the chefe servyce in this lande,
Loke wherever it be fande servite cum cantioo.

"Be gladd lordes bothe more and lesse
For this hath ordyned our stewarde,
To chere you all this christmasse
The bore's heed with mustarde."

When Henry II. had his eldest son crowned as fellow with

Beneath the arm of Conrade, and expired,
Slain on his master's body.

Nor the fight
Was doubtful long. Fierce on the invading host
Press the French troops impetuous, as of old,
When pouring o'er his legion slaves on Greece,
The eastern despot bridged the Hellespont,
The rushing sea against the mighty pile
Roll'd its full weight of waters; far away
The fearful Satrap mark'd on Asia's coasts
The floating fragments, and with ominous fear
Trembled for the great king.

Still Talbot strove,
His foot firm planted, his uplifted shield
Fencing that breast which never yet was known
The throb of fear. But when the warrior's eye,
Glancing around the fight, beheld the French
Pressing to conquest, and his heartless troops
Striking with feeble force in backward step,
Then o'er his cheek he felt the indignant flush
Of shame, and loud he lifted up his voice,
And cried, "Fly, cravens! leave your aged chief
Here in the front to perish! his old limbs
Are not like yours so supple in the flight.¹
Go tell your countrymen how ye escaped
When Talbot fell!"

In vain the warrior spake,
In the uproar of the fight his voice was lost;
And they, the nearest, who had heard, beheld
The Prophetess approach, and every thought
Was overwhelm'd in terror. But the son
Of Talbot mark'd her thus across the plain

him in the kingdom, upon the day of coronation, king Henry, the father, served his son at the table as sewer, bringing up the bore's head with trumpets before it, according to the manner; whereupon (according to the old adage,

"Immutant mores homines cum dantur honores")

the young man, conceiving a pride in his heart, beheld the standers-by with a more stately countenance than he had been wont. The archbishop of York who sat by him, marking his behaviour, turned unto him and said, "Be glad, my good son, there is not another prince in the world that hath such a sewer at his table." To this the new king answered as it were disdainfully thus: "Why dost thou marvel at that?
my father in doing it thinketh it not more than becometh him, he being borne of princely blood only on the mother's side, serveth me that am a king born, having both a king to my father and a queen to my mother." Thus the young man, of an evil and perverse nature, was puffed up in pride by his father's unseemly doings.

But the king his father hearing his talk was very sorrowful in his mind, and said to the archbishop softly in his ear, "It repenteth me, it repenteth me, my lord, that I have thus advanced the boy." For he guessed hereby what a one he would prove afterward, that shewed himself so disobedient and forward already. — Holmeshead.

Μὴ καταλιπεῖντες φωνοῦν τοὺς γίγαντες.
Αἰσχρὸν γὰρ διὰ τοῦτο μάταια στραμαχίαν τίθενται,
Κινοῦντες πρὸς τὴν μάχην παλαιότερον.
Ἦδη λευκοὶ ἔχοντα αἶμα, κόλλας τε γυναικῶν.
Θύμους ἀποσπῶντες ἀλλήλους ἐν κοίτῃ. — Tyræus.

² In the combat between Francus and Phouere, Ronsard says —

"... de la main leurs coutelas trouverent
Bien aiguës qui de l'arçon pendoyent."

Careering fierce in conquest, and the hope
Of glory rose within him. Her to meet
He spur'd his horse, by one decisive deed
Or to retrieve the battle, or to fall
With honour. Each beneath the others' blow
Bow'd down; their lances shiver'd with the shock:
To earth their coursers fell: at once they rose,
He from the saddle bow his falchion caught²
Rushing to closer combat, and she bared
The lightning of her sword.³ In vain the youth
Essay'd to pierce those arms which even the power
Of time was weak to injure: she the while
Through many a wound beheld her foeman's blood
Ooze fast. "Yet save thyself!" the Maiden cried.
"Me thou canst not destroy: be timely wise,
And live!" He answer'd not, but lifting high
His weapon, smote with fierce and forceful arm
Full on the Virgin's helm: fire from her eyes
Flash'd with the stroke: one step she back recoil'd,
Then in his breast plunged deep the sword of death.

Talbot beheld his fall; on the next foe,
With rage and anguish wild, the warrior turn'd;
His ill-directed weapon to the earth
Drove down the unwounded Frank: he strikes again
And through his all-in-vain imploring hands
Cleaves the poor suppliant. On that dreadful day
The sword of Talbot⁴, clogg'd with hostile gore,
Made good its vaunt. Amid the heaps his arm
Had slain, the chieftain stood and sway'd around
His furious strokes: nor ceased he from the fight,
Though now discomfited the English troops

On this passage the commentator observes, "l'auteur arme ces deux chevaliers à la mode de nos gendarmes François, la lance en la main, la coutelace ou la mace à l'arçon, et l'espée au costé.

Thus Desmarets says of the troops of Clovis —

"A tous pend de l'arçon, à leur mode guerrière, Et la hache tranchante, et la masse meurtrière."

And when Clovis on foot and without a weapon hears the screaks of a woman, he sees his horse,

"Jette l'œil sur l'arçon, et void luire sa hache."

Lope de Vega speaks of the sword being carried in the same manner, when he describes Don Juan de Aguilá as —

"... desatando del arçon la espada."

³ "Desnudo el rayo de la ardiente espada."

Jerusalem Conquie tada.

⁴ Talbot's sword, says Camden, was found in the river of Dordon, and sold by a peasant to an armourer of Bourdeaux, with this inscription,

"Sum Talboti, M. IIII. C. XLIII.
Pro vincere inimicos meos."

But pardon the Latin, for it was not his, but his camping chaplain's. — A sword with bad Latin upon it, but good steel within it, says Fuller.

It was not uncommon to bear a motto upon the sword.
Lope de Vega describes that of Aguilá as bearing, "Inlaid in gold, a verse of the Psalms. It was, he says,

"Mas famosa que fue de hombre cenida,
Para ocasiones del honor guardada,
Y en ultima defensa de la vida,
Y desde cuya guarnicion dorada
Hasta la punta la canal brulda
Tenia escrito de David un verso
Nielado de oro, en el azero terso.

Jerusalem Conquistada.

Fled fast, all panic-struck and spiritless,
And mingling with the routed, Fastolfe fled,
Fastolfe, all fierce and haughty as he was,¹
False to his former fame; for he beheld
The Maiden rushing onward, and such fear
Ran through his frame, as thrills the African,
When, grateful solace in the sultry hour,
He lies on the buoyant billow's breast,
And then beholds the inevitable shark
Close on him, open-mouth'd.

But Talbot now
A moment paused, for bending thitherward
He mark'd a warrior, such as well might ask
His utmost force. Of strong and stately port
The onward foeman moved, and bore on high
A battle-axe², in many a field of blood
Known by the English chieftain. Over heaps
Of slaughter'd, he made way, and bade the troops
Retire from the bold earl: then Conrade spake.
"Vain is thy valour, Talbot! look around,
See where thy squadrons fly! but thou shalt lose
No honour, by their cowardice subdued,
Performing well thyself the soldier's part."

"And let them fly!" the indignant Earl exclaim'd,
"And let them fly! and bear thou witness, chief!
That guiltless of this day's disgrace, I fall.
But, Frenchman! Talbot will not tamely fall,
Nor unrevenged."

So saying, for the war
He stood prepared: nor now with heedless rage
The champions fought, for either knew full well
His foeman's prowess: now they aim the blow
Insidious, with quick change then drive the steel
Fierce on the side exposed. The unfaithful arms Yield to the strong-driven edge; the blood streams down

Their batter'd mail. With swift eye Conrade mark'd
The lifted buckler, and beneath impell'd
His battle-axe; that instant on his helm
The sword of Talbot fell, and with the blow
It broke. "Yet yield thee, Englishman!" exclaim'd
The generous Frank; "vain is this bloody strife:
Me should'st thou conquer, little would my death
Avail thee, weak and wounded!"

"Long enough
Talbot has lived," replied the sullen chief:

¹ In the Paston Letters, published by Mr. Fenn, Fastolfe appears in a very unfavourable light. Henry Windsor writes thus of him, "hit is not unknown that cruelle and vengible he hath byn ever, and for the most part with oute pite and mercy. I can no more, but vade et corripe eum, for truly he cannot bryng about his matiers in this word (word), for the word is not for him. I suppose it wolnot change yett be likelones, but i beseeche you sir help not to amend hym onely, but every other man yf ye kno any mo mysse disposed."

The order of the garter was taken from Fastolfe for his conduct at Patay. He suffered a more material loss in the money he expended in the service of the state. In 1455, 4863*l.* 1*s.* 7*d.* were due to him for costs and charges during his services in France, "whereof the said Fastolfe hath had neither payement nor assignation." So he complains.

His battle between the Burgundians and Dauphinois, near Abbeville (1421), Monstrelet, especially notices the conduct of John Viliain, who had that day been made a knight. He was a nobleman from Flanders, very tall, and of great

"His hour is come; yet shalt not thou survive
To glory in his fall!" So, as he spake,
He lifted from the ground a massy spear,
And came again to battle.

Now more fierce
The conflict raged, for careless of himself,
And desperate, Talbot fought. Collected still
Was Conrade. Wheresoe'er his foeman aim'd
The well-thrust javelin, there he swung around
His guardian shield: the long and vain assault
Exhausted Talbot now; foredone with toil
He bare his buckler low for weariness,
The buckler now splinter'd with many a stroke³
Fell piecemeal, from his riven arms the blood
Stream'd fast, and now the Frenchman's battle-axe
Came unresisted on the shieldless mail.
But then he held his hand. "Urge not to death
This fruitless contest!" he exclaim'd: "Oh chief!
Are there not those in England who would feel
Keen anguish at thy loss? a wife per chance
Who trembles for thy safety, or a child
Needing a father's care!"

Then Talbot's heart
Smote him. "Warrior!" he cried, "if thou dost think
That life is worth preserving, hie thee hence,
And save thyself: I loathe this useless talk."

So saying, he address'd him to the fight,
Impatient of existence: from their arms
Fire flash'd, and quick they panted; but not long
Endured the deadly combat. With full force
Down through his shoulder even to the chest,
Conrade impell'd the ponderous battle-axe;
And at that instant underneath his shield
Received the hostile spear. Prone fell the Earl,
Even in his death rejoicing that no foe
Should live to boast his fall.

Then with faint hand
Conrade unlaced his helm, and from his brow
Wiping the cold dews ominous of death,
He laid him on the earth, thence to remove,
While the long lance hung heavy in his side,
Powerless. As thus beside his lifeless foe
He lay, the herald of the English Earl
With faltering step drew near, and when he saw
His master's arms, "Alas! and is ~~thus~~ you,
My lord?" he cried. "God pardon you your sins!

boldly strength, and was mounted on a good horse, holding a battle-axe in both hands. Thus he pushed into the thickest part of the battle, and throwing the bridle on his horse's neck, gave such blows on all sides with his battle-axe, that whoever was struck was instantly unhorsed and wounded past recovery. In this way he met Poton de Xaintrailles, who, after the battle was over, declared the wonders he did, and that he got out of his reach as fast as he could.—Vol. v. p. 294.

³ "L'écu des chevaliers était ordinairement un bouclier de forme à peu près triangulaire, large par le haut pour couvrir le corps, et se terminant en pointe par le bas, afin d'être moins lourd. On les faisait de bois qu'on recouvrait avec du cuir bouilli, avec des nerfs ou autres matières dures, mais jamais du fer ou d'acier. Seulement il était permis, pour les empêcher d'être coupés trop aisément par les épées, d'y mettre un cercle d'or, d'argent, ou de fer, qui les entourait."—Le Grand.

I have been forty years your officer,
And time it is I should surrender now
The ensigns of my office ! " So he said,
And paying thus his rite of sepulture,
Threw o'er the slaughter'd chief his blazon'd coat.¹

Then Conrade thus bespake him : " Englishman,
Dost for a dying soldier one kind act !
Seek for the Maid of Orleans, bid her haste
Hither, and thou shalt gain what recompence
It pleaseth thee to ask."

The herald soon
Meeting the mission'd Virgin, told his tale.
Trembling she hasten'd on, and when she knew
The death-pale face of Conrade, scarce could Joan
Lift up the expiring warrior's heavy hand,
And press it to her heart.

" I sent for thee,
My friend ! " with interrupted voice he cried,
" That I might comfort this my dying hour
With one good deed. A fair domain is mine,
Let Francis and his Isabel possess
That, mine inheritance." He paused awhile,
Struggling for utterance ; then with breathless speed,
And pale as him he mourn'd for, Francis came,
And hung in silence o'er the blameless man,
Even with a brother's sorrow : he pursued,
" This Joan will be thy care. I have at home
An aged mother — Francis, do thou soothe
Her childless age. Nay, weep not for me thus :
Sweet to the wretched is the tomb's repose ! "

So saying, Conrade drew the javelin forth,
And died without a groan.

By this the scouts,
Forerunning the king's march, upon the plain
Of Putay had arrived, of late so gay
With marshall'd thousands in their radiant arms,
And streamers glittering in the noon-tide sun,
And blazon'd shields and gay accoutrements,
The pageantry of war : but now defiled
With mingled dust and blood, and broken arms,
And mangled bodies. Soon the monarch joins
His victor army. Round the royal flag,
Uprear'd in conquest now, the chieftains flock
Proffering their eager service. To his arms,
Or wisely fearful, or by speedy force
Compell'd, the embattled towns submit and own
Their rightful king. Baugenci strives in vain :
Yenville and Mehun yield ; from Sully's wall
Hurl'd is the banner'd lion : on they pass,
Auxerre, and Troyes, and Chalons, ope their gates,
And by the mission'd Maiden's rumour'd deeds
Inspired, the citizens of Rheims
Feel their own strength ; against the English troops

With patriot valour, irresistible,
They rise, they conquer, and to their liege lord
Present the city keys.

The morn was fair
When Rheims re-echoed to the busy hum
Of multitudes, for high solemnity
Assembled. To the holy fabric moves
The long procession, through the streets bestrew'd
With flowers and laurel boughs. The courtier throng
Were there, and they in Orleans, who endured
The siege right bravely ; Gaucour, and La Hire,
The gallant Xaintrailles, Boussac, and Chabannes,
Alenson, and the bravest of the brave,
The Bastard Orleans, now in hope elate,
Soon to release from hard captivity
His dear-beloved brother ; gallant men,
And worthy of eternal memory,
For they, in the most perilous times of France,
Despair'd not of their country. By the king
The delegated Damsel passed along
Clad in her batter'd arms. She bore on high
Her hallow'd banner to the sacred pile,
And fix'd it on the altar, whilst her hand
Pour'd on the monarch's head the mystic oil,²
Wafted of yore by milk-white dove from heaven,
(So legends say) to Clovis when he stood
At Rheims for baptism ; dubious since that day,
When Tolbiac plain reek'd with his warrior's blood,
And fierce upon their flight the Almanni prest,
And rear'd the shout of triumph ; in that hour
Clovis invoked aloud the Christian God
And conquer'd : waked to wonder thus, the chief
Became love's convert, and Clotilda led
Her husband to the font.

The mission'd Maid
Then placed on Charles's brow the crown of France,
And, quick retiring, gazed upon the king
One moment, quickly scanning all the past,
Till in a tumult of wild wonderment
She wept aloud. The assembled multitude
In awful stillness witness'd : then at once,
As with a tempest-rushing noise of winds,
Lifted their mingled clamours. Now the Maid
Stood as prepared to speak, and waved her hand,
And instant silence followed.

" King of France ! "
She cried, " At Chinon, when my gifted eye
Knew thee disguised, what inwardly the spirit
Prompted, I promised, with the sword of God,
To drive from Orleans far the English wolves,
And crown thee in the rescued walls of Rheims.
All is accomplish'd. I have here this day
Fulfill'd my mission, and anointed thee
King over this great nation. Of this charge,
Or well perform'd, or carelessly, that God

at the coronation of their kings, fetch it from the church where it is kept, with great solemnity. For it is brought (saith Sleiden in his Commentaries) by the prior sitting on a white ambling palfrey, and attended by his monks ; the archbishop of the town (Rheims) and such bishops as are present, going to the church door to meet it, and leaving for it with the prior some gage, and the king, when it is by the archbishop brought to the altar, bowing himself before it with great reverence." — Peter Heylyn.

¹ This fact is mentioned in Andrews's History of England. I have merely verified the original expressions. "The herald of Talbot sought out his body among the slain. 'Alas, my lord, and is it you ! I pray God pardon you all your misdoings. I have been your officer of arms forty years and more : it is time that I should surrender to you the ensigns of my office.' Thus saying, with the tears gushing from his eyes, he threw his hat of arms over the corpse, thus performing one of the ancient rites of sepulture."

² "The Frenchmen wonderfully reverence this oyle ; and

Of Whom thou holdest ~~thee~~ authority
Will take account; from Him all power derives.
Thy duty is to fear the Lord, and rule,
According to His word and to the laws,
The people thus committed to thy charge:
Theirs is to fear Him and to honour Thee,
And with that fear and honour to obey
In all things lawful; both being thus alike
By duty bound, alike restricted both
From wilful license. If thy heart be set
To do His will and in His ways to walk,
I know no limit to the happiness
Thou may'st create. I do beseech thee, King! "
The Maid exclaim'd, and fell upon the ground
And clasp'd his knees, "I do beseech thee, King!
By all the thousands that depend on thee,
For weal or woe, . . . consider what thou art,
By Whom appointed! If thou dost oppress
Thy people; if to aggrandize thyself
Thou tear'st them from their homes, and sendest them
To slaughter, prodigal of misery;
If when the widow and the orphan groan
In want and wretchedness, thou turnest thee
To hear the music of the flatterer's tongue;

If when thou hear'st of thousands who have fallen,
Thou say'st, 'I am a King! and fit it is
That these should perish for me;' . . . if thy realm
Should, through the counsels of thy government,
Be fill'd with woe, and in thy streets be heard
The voice of mourning and the feeble cry
Of asking hunger; if in place of Law
Iniquity prevail; if Avarice grind
The poor; if discipline be utterly
Relax'd, Vice charter'd, Wickedness let loose;
Though in the general ruin all must share,
Each answer for his own peculiar guilt,
Yet at the Judgement-day, from those to whom
The power was given, the Giver of all power
Will call for righteous and severe account.
Chuse thou the better part, and rule the land
In righteousness; in righteousness thy throne
Shall then be establish'd, not by foreign foes
Shaken, nor by domestic enemies,
But guarded then by loyalty and love,
True hearts, Good Angels, and All-seeing Heaven."

Thus spake the Maid of Orleans, solemnly
Accomplishing her marvellous mission here.

THE VISION OF THE MAID OF ORLEANS.

In the first edition of Joan of Arc this Vision formed the ninth book, allegorical machinery having been introduced throughout the poem as originally written. All that remained of such machinery was expunged in the second edition, and the Vision was then struck out, as no longer according with the general design.

THE FIRST BOOK.

ORLEANS was hush'd in sleep. Stretch'd on her couch
The delegated Maiden lay; with toil
Exhausted, and sore anguish, soon she closed
Her heavy eyelids; not reposing then,
For busy phantasy in other scenes
Awaken'd: whether that superior powers,

By wise permission, prompt the midnight dream,
Instructing best the passive faculty;¹
Or that the soul, escaped its fleshly clog,
Flies free, and soars amid the invisible world,
And all things are that seem.²

Along a moor,
Barren, and wide, and drear, and desolate,
She roam'd, a wanderer through the cheerless night.

¹ May says of Serapis,

"Erudit at placide humanam per somnia mentem,
Nocturnaque quiete docet; nulloque labore
Hic tantum parva est pretiosa scientia, nullo
Excolitur studio verum. Mortalia corda
Tunc Deus iste docet, cum sunt minus apta doceri,
Cum nullum obsequium præstant, meritisque fatentur
Nil esse debere suis; tunc recta scientes
Cum nil scire valent. Non illo tempore sensus
Humenos forsan dignatur nomen intrare,
Cum propriis possunt per se discursibus uti,
Et recte humana ratio divina colere."—Sup. Lucani.

² I have met with a singular tale to illustrate this spiritual theory of dreams.

Charun, king of the Franks, was liberal to the poor, and he himself experienced the wonderful effects of divine liberality. For one day as he was hunting in a forest he was separated from his companions, and arrived at a little stream of water with only one comrade of tried and approved fidelity. Here he found himself oppress'd by drowsiness, and reclining his head upon the servant's lap went to sleep. The servant witnessed a wonderful thing, for he saw a little beast creep out of the mouth of his sleeping master, and go immediately to the streamlet, which it vainly attempted to cross. The servant drew his sword and laid it across the water, over which the little beast easily past and crept into a hole of a mountain on the opposite side; from whence it made its appearance again in an hour, and returned by the same means into the king's mouth. The king then awakened, and told his companion that he had dreamt that he was arrived upon the bank of an immense river, which he had

Far through the silence of the unbroken plain
The bittern's boom was heard ; hoarse, heavy, deep,
It made accordant music to the scene.
Black clouds, driven fast before the stormy wind,
Swept shadowing : through their broken folds the moon

Struggled at times with transitory ray,
And made the moving darkness visible.
And now arrived beside a fenny lake
She stands, amid whose stagnate waters, hoarse
The long reeds rustled to the gale of night.
A time-worn bark receives the Maid, impell'd
By powers unseen ; then did the moon display
Where through the crazy vessel's yawning side
The muddy waters oozed. A Woman guides,
And spreads the sail before the wind, which moan'd
As melancholy mournful to her ear,
As ever by a dungeon'd wretch was heard
Howling at evening round his prison towers.
Wan was the pilot's countenance, her eyes
Hollow, and her sunk cheeks were furrow'd deep,
Channell'd by tears ! a few grey locks hung down
Beneath her hood : and through the Maiden's veins
Chill crept the blood, when, as the night-breeze pass'd,
Lifting her tatter'd mantle, coll'd around
She saw a serpent gnawing at her heart.

The plumeless bats with short shrill note flit by,
And the night-raven's scream came fitfully,
Borne on the hollow blast. Eager the Maid
Look'd to the shore, and now upon the bank
Leapt, joyful to escape, yet trembling still
In recollection.

There, a mouldering pile
Stretch'd its wide ruins, o'er the plain below
Casting a gloomy shade, save where the moon
Shone through its fretted windows : the dark yew,
Withering with age, branch'd there its naked roots,
And there the melancholy cypress rear'd
Its head ; the earth was heaved with many a mound,
And here and there a half-demolish'd tomb.

And now, amid the ruin's darkest shade,
The Virgin's eye beheld where pale blue flames
Rose wavering, now just gleaming from the earth,
And now in darkness drown'd. An aged man
Sat near, seated on what in long-past days
Had been some sculptured monument, now fallen
And half-obscured by moss, and gather'd heaps
Of wither'd yew-leaves and earth-mouldering bones.
His eye was large and rayless, and fix'd full
Upon the Maid ; the tomb-fires on his face
Shed a blue light ; his face was of the hue
Of death ; his limbs were mantled in a shroud.

crossed by a bridge of iron, and from thence came to a mountain in which a great quantity of gold was concealed. When the king had concluded, the servant related what he had beheld, and they both went to examine the mountain, where upon digging they discovered an immense weight of gold.

I stumbled upon this tale in a book entitled SPRINK, Theologico-Philosophica. Authore Johanne Heidefeldio, Ecclesiastico Ebersbachiano. 1621.

The same story is in Matthew of Westminster ; it is added that Guntram applied the treasures thus found to pious uses. For the truth of the theory there is the evidence of a

Then with a deep heart-tormenting voice,
Exclaim'd the spectre, " Welcome to these realms,
These regions of Despair, O thou whose steps
Sorrow hath guided to my sad abodes !
Welcome to my drear empire, to this gloom
Eternal, to this everlasting night,
Where never morning darts the enlivening ray,
Where never shines the sun, but all is dark,
Dark as the bosom of their gloomy King."

So saying, he arose, and drawing on,
Her to the abbey's inner ruin led,
Resisting not his guidance. Through the roof
Once fretted and emblazed, but broken now
In part, elsewhere all open to the sky,
The moon-beams enter'd, chequer'd here, and here
With unimpeded light. The ivy twined
Round the dismantled columns ; imaged forms
Of saints and warlike chiefs, makes-canker'd now
And mutilate, lay strewn upon the ground,
With crumbled fragments, crucifixes fallen,
And rusted trophies. Meantime overhead
Roar'd the loud blast, and from the tower the owl
Scream'd as the tempest shook her secret nest.
He, silent, led her on, and often paused,
And pointed, that her eye might contemplate
At leisure the drear scene.

He dragg'd her on
Through a low iron door, down broken stairs ;
Then a cold horror through the Maiden's frame
Crept, for she stood amid a vault, and saw,
By the sepulchral lamp's dim glaring light,
The fragments of the dead.

" Look here ! " he cried,
" Damsel, look here ! survey this house of death ;
O soon to tenant it ; soon to increase
These trophies of mortality, . . for hence
Is no return. Gaze here ; behold this skull,
These eyeless sockets, and these unflesh'd jaws,
That with their ghastly grinning seem to mock
Thy perishable charms ; for thus thy cheek
Must moulder. Child of grief ! shrinks not thy soul,
Viewing these horrors ? trembles not thy heart
At the dread thought that here its life's-blood soon
Shall stagnate, and the finely-fibred frame,
Now warm in life and feeling, mingle soon
With the cold clod ? thing horrible to think, . .
Yet in thought only, for reality
Is none of suffering here ; here all is peace ;
No nerve will thro' to anguish in the grave.
Dreadful it is to think of losing life,
But having lost, knowledge of loss is not,
Therefore no ill. Oh, wherefore then delay
To end all ills at once ! "

monkish miracle. When Thurcillus was about to follow St. Julian and visit the world of souls, his guide said to him, " Let thy body rest in the bed, for thy spirit only is about to depart with me ; and lest the body should appear dead, I will send into it a vital breath."

The body however by a strange sympathy was affected like the spirit ; for when the foul and fetid smoke which arose from the tithes withheld on earth had nearly suffocated Thurcillus, and made him cough twice, those who were near his body said that it coughed twice about the same time.

Matthew Paris.

So spake Despair.

The vaulted roof echoed his hollow voice,
And all again was silence. Quick her heart
Fainted. He placed a dagger in her hand,
And cried again, "Oh wherefore then delay!
One blow, and rest for ever!" On the fiend,
Dark scowl'd the Virgin with indignant eye,
And threw the dagger down. He next his heart
Replaced the murderous steel, and drew the Maid
Along the downward vault.

The damp earth gave

A dim sound as they pass'd: the tainted air
Was cold, and heavy with unwholesome dews.
"Behold!" the fiend exclaim'd, "how loathsomely
The fleshly remnant of mortality
Moulders to clay!" then fixing his broad eye
Full on her face, he pointed where a corpse
Lay livid; she beheld with horrent look,
The spectacle abhorred by living man.

"Look here!" Despair pursued, "this loathsomely mass

Was once as lovely, and as full of life
As, Damsel, thou art now. Those deep-sunk eyes
Once beam'd the mild light of intelligence,
And where thou seest the pamp'rd flesh-worm trail,
Once the white bosom heaved. She fondly thought
That at the hallow'd altar, soon the priest
Should bless her coming union, and the torch
Its joyful lustre o'er the hall of joy,
Cast on her nuptial evening: earth to earth
That priest consign'd her, for her lover went
By glory lured to war, and perish'd there;
Not she endured to live. Ha! fades thy cheek?
Dost thou then, Maiden, tremble at the tale?
Look here! behold the youthful paramour!
The self-devoted hero!"

Fearfully

The Maid look'd down, and saw the well-known face
Of Theodore. In thoughts unspeakable,
Convulsed with horror, o'er her face she clasp'd
Her cold damp hands: "Shrink not," the phantom cried,

"Gaze on!" and unrelentingly he grasp'd
Her quivering arm: "this lifeless mouldering clay,
As well thou know'st, was warm with all the glow
Of youth and love; this is the hand that cleft
Proud Salisbury's crest, now motionless in death,
Unable to protect the ravaged frame
From the foul offspring of mortality
That feed on heroes. Though long years were thine,
Yet never more would life reanimate
This slaughter'd youth; slaughter'd for thee! for thou
Didst lead him to the battle from his home,
Where else he had survived to good old age:
In thy defence he died: strike then! destroy
Remorse with life."

The Maid stood motionless,
And, wistless what she did, with trembling hand
Received the dagger. Starting then, she cried,
"Avant, Despair! Eternal Wisdom deals
Or peace to man, or misery, for his good
Alike design'd; and shall the creature cry,
'Why hast thou done this? and with impious pride Destroy the life God gave?'"

The fiend rejoind'd,

"And thou dost deem it impious to destroy
The life God gave? What, Maiden, is the lot
Assign'd to mortal man? born but to drag,
Through life's long pilgrimage, the wearying load
Of being; care-corroded at the heart;
Assail'd by all the numerous train of ills
That flesh inherits; till at length worn out,
This is his consummation! — Think again!
What, Maiden, canst thou hope from lengthen'd life,
But lengthen'd sorrow? If protracted long,
Till on the bed of death thy feeble limbs
Stretch out their lengthen'd length, oh think what thoughts,

What agonizing feelings, in that hour,
Assail the sinking heart! slow beats the pulse,
Dim grows the eye, and clammy drops bedew
The shuddering frame; then in its mightiest force,
Mightiest in impotence, the love of life
Seizes the throbbing heart; the faltering lips
Pour out the implous prayer that fain would change
The Unchangeable's decree; surrounding friends
Sob round the sufferer, wet his cheek with tears
And all he loved in life embitters death.

"Such, Maiden, are the pangs that wait the hour
Of easiest dissolution! yet weak man
Resolves, in timid piety, to live;
And velling Fear in Superstition's garb,
He calls her Resignation!

Coward wretch!

Fond coward, thus to make his reason war
Against his reason. Insect as he is,
This sport of chance, this being of a day,
Whose whole existence the next cloud may blast,
Believes himself the care of heavenly powers,
That God regards man, miserable man,
And preaching thus of power and providence,
Will crush the reptile that may cross his path!

"Fool that thou art! the Being that permits
Existence, gives to man the worthless boon:
A goodly gift to those who, fortune-blest,
Bask in the sunshine of prosperity,
And such do well to keep it. But to one
Sick at the heart with misery, and sore
With many a hard unmerited affliction,
It is a hair that chains to wretchedness
The slave who dares not burst it!

Thinkest thou,

The parent, if his child should unrecalld
Return and fall upon his neck, and cry,
'Oh! the wide world is comfortless, and full
Of fleeting joys and heart-consuming cares,
I can be only happy in my home
With thee — my friend! — my father!' Thinkest thou,

That he would thrust him as an outcast forth?
Oh! he would clasp the truant to his heart,
And love the trespass."

Whilst he spake, his eye

Dwelt on the Maiden's cheek, and read her soul
Struggling within. In trembling doubt she stood,
Even as a wretch, whose famish'd entrails crave
Supply, before him sees the poison'd food
In greedy horror.

Yet, not silent long,

"Eloquent tempter cease!" the Maiden cried,
 "What though affliction be my portion here,
 Thinkest thou I do not feel high thoughts of joy,
 Of heart-ennobling joy, when I look back
 Upon a life of duty well perform'd,
 Then lift mine eyes to Heaven, and there in faith
 Know my reward? . . . I grant, were this life all,
 Was there no morning to the tomb's long night,
 If man did mingle with the senseless clod,
 Himself as senseless, then wert thou indeed
 A wise and friendly comforter! . . . But, fiend,
 There is a morning to the tomb's long night,
 A dawn of glory, a reward in heaven,
 He shall not gain who never merited.
 If thou didst know the worth of one good deed
 In life's last hour, thou would'st not bid me lose
 The precious privilege, while life endures
 To do my Father's will. A mighty task
 Is mine, . . . a glorious call. France looks to me
 For her deliverance."

"Maiden, thou hast done
 Thy mission here," the un baffled fiend replied:
 "The foes are fled from Orleans: thou, perchance
 Exulting in the pride of victory,
 Forgettest him who perish'd: yet albeit
 Thy harden'd heart forget the gallant youth,
 That hour allotted canst thou not escape,
 That dreadful hour, when contumely and shame
 Shall sojourn in thy dungeon. Wretched Maid!
 Destined to drain the cup of bitterness,
 Even to its dregs, . . . England's inhuman chiefs
 Shall scoff thy sorrows, blacken thy pure fame,
 Wit-wanton it with lewd barbarity,
 And force such burning blushes to the cheek
 Of virgin modesty, that thou shalt wish
 The earth might cover thee. In that last hour,
 When thy bruise'd breast shall heave beneath the chains
 That link thee to the stake, a spectacle
 For the brute multitude, and thou shalt hear
 Mockery more painful than the circling flames
 Which then consume thee; wilt thou not in vain
 Then wish my friendly aid? then wish thine ear
 Had drank my words of comfort? that thy hand
 Had grasp'd the dagger, and in death preserved
 Insulted modesty?"

Her glowing cheek
 Blush'd crimson; her wide eye on vacancy

¹ These lines strongly resemble a passage in the Pharonida of William Chamberlayne, a poet who has told an interesting story in uncouth rhymes, and mingled sublimity of thought and beauty of expression, with the quaintest conceits, and most awkward inversions.

"On a rock more high
 Than Nature's common surface, she beholds
 The mansion house of Fate, which thus unfolds
 Its sacred mysteries. A trine within
 A quadrate placed, both these encompass in
 A perfect circle was its form; but what
 Its matter was, for us to wonder at,
 Is undiscovered left. A tower there stands
 At every angle, where Time's fatal hands
 The impartial Parac dwell; 't the first she sees
 Clotho the kindest of the Destinies,
 From immaterial essences to cull
 The seeds of life, and of them frame the wool

Was fix'd; her breath short panted. The cold fiend,
 Grasping her hand, exclaim'd, "Too timid Maid
 So long repugnant to the healing aid
 My friendship proffers, now shalt thou behold
 The allotted length of life."

He stamp'd the earth,
 And dragging a huge coffin as his car,
 Two Ghouls came on, of form more fearful-foul
 Than ever palsied in her wildest dream
 Hag-ridden Superstition. Then Despair
 Seized on the Maid whose curdling blood stood still,
 And placed her in the seat, and on they pass'd
 Adown the deep descent. A meteor light
 Shot from the demons, as they dragg'd along
 The unwelcome load, and mark'd their brethren feast
 On carcasses.

Below, the vault dilates
 Its ample bulk. "Look here!"—Despair address
 The shuddering Virgin, "see the dome of Death!"
 It was a spacious cavern, hewn amid
 The entrails of the earth, as though to form
 A grave for all mankind: no eye could reach,
 Its distant bounds. There, throned in darkness, dwelt
 The unseen power of Death.

Here stopt the Ghouls,
 Reaching the destined spot. The fiend stept out,
 And from the coffin as he led the Maid,
 Exclaim'd, "Where mortal never stood before,
 Thou standest: look around this boundless vault;
 Observe the dole that Nature deals to man,
 And learn to know thy friend."

She answer'd not,
 Observing where the Fates their several tasks
 Plied ceaseless. "Mark how long the shortest web
 Allow'd to man!" he cried; "observe how soon,
 Twined round yon never-resting wheel, they change
 Their snowy hue, darkening through many a shade,
 Till Atropos relentless shuts the sheers."

Too true he spake, for of the countless threads,
 Drawn from the heap, as white as unsunn'd snow,
 Or as the spotless lily of the vale,
 Was never one beyond the little span
 Of infancy untainted; few there were
 But lightly tinged; more of deep crimson hue,
 Or deeper sable died.¹ Two Genii stood,
 Still as the web of being was drawn forth,

For Lachesis to spin; about her file
 Myriads of souls, that yet want flesh to live
 Warm'd with their functions in, whose strength bestows
 That power by which man ripe for misery grows.

"Her next of objects was that glorious tower
 Where that swift-fingered nymph that spares no hour
 From mortals' service, draws the various threads
 Of life in several lengths; to weary beds
 Of age extending some, whilst others in
 Their infancy are broke: some black in sin,
 Others, the favorites of Heaven, from whence
 Their origin, candid with innocence;
 Some purpled in afflictions, others dyed
 In sanguine pleasures: some in glittering pride
 Spun to adorn the earth, whilst others wear
 Rags of deformity, but knots of care
 No thread was wholly free from. Next to this Fair glorious tower, was placed that black abyss

Sprinkling their powerful drops. From ebon urn,
The one unsparing dash'd the bitter drops
Of woe; and as he dash'd, his dark-brown brow
Relax'd to a hard smile. The milder form
Shed less profusely there his lesser store;
Sometimes with tears increasing the scant boon,
Compassionating man; and happy he
Who on his thread those precious tears receives;
If it be happiness to have the pulse
That throbs with pity, and in such a world
Of wretchedness, the generous heart that aches
With anguish at the sight of human woe.

To her the fiend, well hoping now success,
"This is thy thread; observe how short the span;
And little doth the evil Genius spare
His bitter tincture there." The Maiden saw
Calmly. "Now gaze!" the tempter fiend exclaim'd,
And placed again the poniard in her hand,
For Superstition, with a burning torch,
Approach'd the loom. "This, Damsel, is thy fate!
The hour draws on — now strike the dagger home!
Strike now, and be at rest!"

The Maid replied,
"Or to prevent or change the will of Heaven,
Impious I strive not: let that will be done!"

THE VISION OF THE MAID OF ORLEANS.

THE SECOND BOOK.

Six spake, and lo! celestial radiance beam'd
Amid the air, such odours wafting now
As erst came blended with the evening gale,
From Eden's bowers of bliss. An angel form
Stood by the Maid; his wings, ethereal white,
Flash'd like the diamond in the noon-tide sun,
Dazzling her mortal eye: all else appear'd
Her Theodore.

Amazed she saw: the fiend
Was fled, and on her ear the well-known voice
Sounded, though now more musically sweet
Than ever yet had thrill'd her soul attuned,
When eloquent affection fondly told
The day-dreams of delight.

"Beloved Maid!
Lo! I am with thee, still thy Theodore!
Hearts in the holy bands of love combined,

Of dreadful Atropos, the baleful seat
Of death and horror, in each room repleat
With lazy damps, loud groans, and the sad sight
Of pale grim ghosts, those terrors of the night.
To this, the last stage that the winding clew
Of life can lead mortally unto,
Fear was the dreadful porter, which let in
All guests sent thither by destructive sin."

It is possible that I may have written from the recollec-

Death has no power to sever. Thou art mine!
A little while and thou shalt dwell with me,
In scenes where sorrow is not. Cheerily
Tread thou the path that leads thee to the grave,
Rough though it be and painful, for the grave
Is but the threshold of eternity.

"Favour'd of Heaven, to thee is given to view
These secret realms. The bottom of the abyss
Thou treadest, Maiden. Here the dungeons are Where bad men learn repentance. Souls diseased
Must have their remedy; and where disease
Is rooted deep, the remedy is long
Perforce, and painful."

Thus the spirit spake,
And led the Maid along a narrow path,
Dark gleaming to the light of far-off flames,
More dread than darkness. Soon the distant sound
Of clanking anvils, and the lengthen'd breath
Provoking fire are heard: and now they reach
A wide expanded den where all around
Tremendous furnaces, with hellish blaze,
Were burning. At the heaving bellows stood
The meagre form of Care, and as he blew
To augment the fire, the fire augmented scorch'd
His wretched limbs; sleepless for ever thus
He toil'd and toll'd, of toil no end to know
But endless toil and never-ending woe.

An aged man went round the infernal vault,
Urging his workmen to their ceaseless task;
White were his locks, as is the wintry snow
On hoar Plinlimmon's head. A golden staff
His steps supported: powerful talisman,
Which whoso feels shall never feel again
The tear of pity, or the throb of love.
Touch'd but by this, the massy gates give way,
The buttress trembles, and the guarded wall,
Guarded in vain, submits. Him heathens erst
Had deified, and bowed the suppliant knee
To Plutus. Nor are now his votaries few,
Even though our blessed Saviour hath himself
Told us, that easier through the needle's eye
Shall the huge camel pass¹, than the rich man
Enter the gates of heaven. "Ye cannot serve
Your God, and worship Mammon."

"Mission'd Maid!"
So spake the spirit, "know that these, whose hands
Round each white furnace ply the unceasing toil,
Were Mammon's slaves on earth. They did not spare
To wring from poverty the hard-earn'd mite,
They robb'd the orphan's pittance, they could see
Want's asking eye unmoved; and therefore these,
Ranged round the furnace, still must persevere
In Mammon's service, scorch'd by these fierce fires, tion of this passage. The conceit is the same, and I willingly attribute it to Chamberlayne, a poet to whom I am indebted for many hours of delight.

¹ I had originally written camel instead of camel. The alteration would not be worth noticing were it not for the reason which occasioned it. Facillus elephas per foramen acus, is among the Hebrew adages collected by Drusus; the same metaphor is found in two other Jewish proverbs, and this confirms beyond all doubt the common reading of Matt.
xix. 24.

*Nor seldom by the overboiling ore
Caught; yet retaining still, to punishment
Converted here, their old besetting sin,
Often impatiently to quench their thirst
Unquenchable, large draughts of molten gold¹
They drink insatiate, still with pain renew'd,
Pain to destroy."

So saying, her he led
Forth from the dreadful cavern to a cell,
Brilliant with gem-born light. The rugged walls
Part gleam'd with gold, and part with silver ore
In milder radiance shone. The carbuncle
There its strong lustre like the flamy sun
Shot forth irradiate; from the earth beneath,
And from the roof there stream'd a diamond light;
Rubies and amethysts their glows commix'd
With the gay topaz, and the softer ray
Shot from the sapphire, and the emerald's hue,
And bright pyropus.

There on golden seats,
A numerous, sullen, melancholy train
Sat silent. "Maiden, these," said Theodore,
"Are they who let the love of wealth absorb
All other passions; in their souls that vice
Struck deeply-rooted, like the poison-tree
That with its shade spreads barrenness around.
These, Maid! were men by no atrocious crime
Blacken'd, no fraud, nor ruffian violence;
Men of fair dealing, and respectable
On earth, but such as only for themselves
Heap'd up their treasures, deeming all their wealth
Their own, and given to them, by partial Heaven,
To bless them only: therefore here they sit,
Possess'd of gold enough, and by no pain
Tormented, save the knowledge of the bliss
They lost, and vain repentance. Here they dwell,
Loathing these useless treasures, till the hour
Of general restitution."

Thence they pass'd,
And now arrived at such a gorgeous dome,
As even the pomp of eastern opulence
Could never equal: wander'd through its halls
A numerous train; some with the red-swoln eye
Of riot, and intemperance-bloated cheek;
Some pale and nerveless, and with feeble step,
And eyes lack-lustre.

"Maiden!" said her guide,
"These are the wretched slaves of Appetite,
Curs'd with their wish enjoy'd. The epicure
Here pampers his foul frame, till the pall'd sense
Loathes at the banquet; the voluptuous here
Plunge in the tempting torrent of delight,
And sink in misery. All they wish'd on earth

¹ The same idea, and almost the same words, are in one of Ford's plays. The passage is a very fine one:

"Ay, you are wretched, miserably wretched,
Almost condemn'd alive! There is a place,
(List daughter!) in a black and hollow vault,
Where day is never seen; there shines no sun,
But flaming horror of consuming fires;
A lightless sulphur, chok'd with smoky fogs
Of an infected darkness. In this place
Dwell many thousand thousand sundry sorts
Of never-dying deaths; there damned souls
Roar without pity, there are gluttons fed

Possessing here, whom have they to accuse
But their own folly, for the lot they chose?
Yet, for that these injured themselves alone,
They to the house of Penitence may hie,
And, by a long and painful regimen,
To wearied Nature her exhausted powers
Restore, till they shall learn to form the wish
Of wisdom, and Almighty Goodness grants
That prize to him who seeks it."

Whilst he spake,
The board is spread. With bloated paunch, and eyes
Fat-swoln, and legs whose monstrous size disgraced
The human form divine, their caterer,
Hight Gluttony, set forth the smoking feast.
And by his side came on a brother form,
With fiery cheek of purple hue, and red
And scurfy-white, mix'd motley; his gross bulk,
Like some huge hog'shead shapen'd, as applied.
Him had antiquity with mystic rites
Adored; to him the sons of Greece, and thine
Imperial Rome, on many an altar pour'd
The victim blood, with godlike titles graced,
Bacchus, or Dionusus; son of Jove,
Deem'd falsely, for from Folly's idiot form
He sprung, what time Madness, with furious hand,
Seized on the laughing female. At one birth
She brought the brethren, mental here below,
Though sovereigns upon earth, where oft they hold
High revels. 'Mid the monastery's gloom,
Thy palace Gluttony, and oft to thee
The sacrifice is spread, when the grave voice
Episcopal proclaims approaching day
Of visitation; or churchwardens meet
To save the wretched many from the gripe
Of poverty; or 'mid thy ample halls
Of London, mighty Mayor! rich Aldermen,
Of coming feast hold converse.

Otherwhere,
For though allied in nature as in blood,
They hold divided sway, his brother lifts
His spongy sceptre. In the noble domes
Of princes, and state-wearied ministers,
Maddening he reigns; and when the affrighted mind
Casts o'er a long career of guilt and blood
Its eye reluctant, then his aid is sought
To lull the worm of conscience to repose.
He too the halls of country squires frequents;
But chiefly loves the learned gloom that shades
Thy offspring Rhedycina, and thy walls
Granta! nightly libations there to him
Profuse are pour'd, till from the dizzy brain
Triangles, circles, parallelograms,
Moods, tenses, dialects, and demigods,

With toads and adders: there is burning oil
Pour'd down the drunkard's throat, the usurer
Is forced to sup whole draughts of molten gold;
There is the murderer for ever stabb'd,
Yet he can never die; there lies the wanton
On racks of burning steel, whilst in his soul
He feels the torment of his raging lust."

'Tis Pity she's a Whore.

I wrote this passage when very young, and the idea, trite as it is, was new to me. It occurs I believe in most descriptions of hell, and perhaps owes its origin to the fate of Crassus.

And logic and theology are swept
By the red deluge.

Unmolested there
He revels; till the general feast comes round,
The sacrifice septennial, when the sons
Of England meet, with watchful care to chuse
Their delegates, wise, independent men,
Unbribing and unbribed, and chosen to guard
Their rights and charters from the encroaching grasp
Of greedy power; then all the joyful land
Join in his sacrifices so inspired
To make the important choice.

The observing Maid
Address'd her guide, "These, Theodore, thou say'st
Are men, who pampering their foul appetites,
Injured themselves alone. But where are they,
The worst of villains, viper-like, who coil
Around deluded woman, so to sting
The heart that loves them?"

"Them," the spirit replied,
"A long and dreadful punishment awaits.
For when the prey of want and infamy,
Lower and lower still the victim sinks,
Even to the depth of shame, not one lewd word,
One impious imprecation from her lips
Escapes, nay not a thought of evil lurks
In the polluted mind, that does not plead
Before the throne of Justice, thunder-tongued
Against the foul seducer."

Now they reach'd
The house of Penitence. Credulity
Stood at the gate, stretching her eager head
As though to listen; on her vacant face,
A look that promised premature assent;
Though her Regret behind, a meagre fiend,
Disciplined sorely.

Here they entered in,
And now arrived where, as in study tranced,
They saw the mistress of the dome. Her face
Spoke that composed severity, that knows
No angry impulse, no weak tenderness,
Resolved and calm. Before her lay the Book,
Which hath the words of life; and as she read,
Sometimes a tear would trickle down her cheek,
Though heavenly joy beam'd in her eye the while.

Leaving her undisturb'd to the first ward
Of this great laser-house, the Angel led
The favour'd Maid of Orleans. Kneeling down
On the hard stone which their bare knees had worn,
In sackcloth robed, a numerous train appear'd:
Hard-featured some, and some demurely grave;
Yet such expression stealing from the eye,
As though, that only naked, all the rest
Were one close-fitting mask. A scoffing fiend,
For fiend he was, though wisely serving here,
Mock'd at his patients, and did often strew
Ashes upon them, and then bid them say
Their prayers aloud, and then he louder laugh'd:
For these were hypocrites, on earth revered
As holy ones, who did in public tell
Their beads, and make long prayers, and cross themselves,

And call themselves most miserable sinners,
That so they might be deem'd most pious saints;
And go all filth, and never let a smile

Bend their stern muscles; gloomy, sullen men,
Barren of all affection, and all this
To please their God, forsooth! And therefore Scorn
Grinn'd at his patients, making them repeat
Their solemn farce, with keenest rallery
Tormenting; but if earnest in their prayer,
They pour'd the silent sorrows of the soul
To heaven, then did they not regard his mocks
Which then came painless, and Humility
Then rescued them, and led to Penitence,
That she might lead to heaven.

From thence they came
Where, in the next ward, a most wretched band
Groan'd underneath the bitter tyranny
Of a fierce dæmon. His coarse hair was red,
Pale grey his eyes, and blood-shot; and his face
Wrinkled by such a smile as Malice wears
In ecstasy. Well-pleased he went around,
Plunging his dagger in the hearts of some,
Or probing with a poison'd lance their breasts,
Or placing coals of fire within their wounds;
Or seizing some within his mighty grasp,
He fix'd them on a stake, and then drew back
And laugh'd to see them writhe.

"These," said the spirit,
"Are taught by Cruelty, to loathe the lives
They led themselves. Here are those wicked men
Who loved to exercise their tyrant power
On speechless brutes; bad husbands undergo
A long purgation here; the traffickers
In human flesh here too are disciplined,
Till by their suffering they have equal'd all
The miseries they inflicted, all the mass
Of wretchedness caused by the wars they waged,
The villages they burnt, the widows left
In want, the slave or led to suicide,
Or murder'd by the foul infected air
Of his close dungeon, or, more sad than all,
His virtue lost, his very soul enslaved,
And driven by woe to wickedness.

These next,
Whom thou beholdest in this dreary room,
With sullen eyes of hatred and of fear
Each on the other scowling, these have been False friends. Tormented by their own dark thoughts
Here they dwell: in the hollow of their hearts
There is a worm that feeds, and though thou seest
That skilful leech who willingly would heal
The ill they suffer, judging of all else
By their own evil conscience, they suspect
The aid he vainly proffers, lengthening thus
By vice its punishment."

"But who are these,"
The Maid exclaim'd, "that robed in flowing lawn,
And mitred, or in scarlet, and in caps
Like cardinals, I see in every ward,
Performing menial service at the beck
Of all who bid them?"

Theodore replied,
"These men are they who in the name of Christ
Have heap'd up wealth, and arrogating power,
Have made kings kiss their feet, yet call'd themselves
The servants of the servants of the Lord.
They dwell in palaces, in purple clothed,
And in fine linen; therefore are they here;
And though they would not minister on earth,

Here penanced they perforce must minister:
Did not the Holy One of Nazareth,
Tell them, his kingdom is not of the world?"

So saying, on they pass'd, and now arrived
Where such a hideous ghastly grouse abode,
That the Maid gazed with half-averting eye,
And shudder'd: each one was a loathly corpse,
The worm was feeding on his putrid prey,
Yet had they life and feeling exquisite
Though motionless and mute.

"Most wretched men
Are these," the angel cried. "Poets thou see'st
Whose loose lascivious lays perpetuated
Their own corruption. Soul-polluted slaves,
Who sate them down, deliberately lewd,
So to awake and pamper lusts in minds
Unborn; and therefore foul of body now
As then they were of soul, they here abide
Long as the evil works they left on earth
Shall live to taint mankind. A dreadful doom!
Yet amply merited by all who thus
Have to the Devil's service dedicated
The gift of song, the gift divine of Heaven!"

And now they reach'd a huge and massy pile,
Massy it seem'd, and yet with every blast
As to its ruin shook. There, porter fit,
Remorse for ever his sad vigils kept.
Pale, hollow-eyed, emaciate, sleepless wretch,
Inly he groan'd, or starting, wildly shriek'd,
Aye as the fabric tottering from its base,
Threaten'd its fall, and so expectant still
Lived in the dread of danger still delay'd.
They enter'd there a large and lofty dome,
O'er whose black marble sides a dim drear light
Struggled with darkness from the unfrequent lamp.
Enthroned around, the murderers of mankind,
Monarchs, the great, the glorious, the august,
Each bearing on his brow a crown of fire,
Sat stern and silent. Nimrod, he was there,
First king, the mighty hunter; and that chief
Who did belie his mother's fame, that so
He might be called young Ammon. In this court
Cæsar was crown'd, the great libertine;
And he who to the death of Cicero
Consented, though the courtly minion's lyre
Hath hymn'd his praise, though Maro sung to him,
And when death level'd to original clay
The royal body, impious Flattery
Fell at his feet, and worshipp'd the new god,
Titus was here¹, the conqueror of the Jews,
He the delight of human-kind misnamed;
Cæsars and Soldans, Emperors and Kings,
All who for glory fought, here they were all,
Here in the Hall of Glory, reaping now

¹ During the siege of Jerusalem, "the Roman commander, with a generous clemency, that inseparable attendant on true heroism, laboured incessantly, and to the very last moment, to preserve the place. With this view, he again and again intreated the tyrants to surrender and save their lives. With the same view also, after carrying the second wall, the siege was intermitted four days: to rouse their fears, prisoners to the number of five hundred or more, were crucified daily

The meed they merited.

As gazing round
The Virgin mark'd the miserable train,
A deep and hollow voice from one went forth;
"Thou who art come to view our punishment,
Maiden of Orleans! hither turn thine eye,
For I am he whose bloody victories
Thy power hath render'd vain. Lo! I am here,
The hero conqueror of Agincourt,
Henry of England! . . . Wretched that I am!
I might have reign'd in happiness and peace,
My coffers full, my subjects undisturb'd,
And Plenty and Prosperity had loved
To dwell amongst them: but in evil hour
Seeing the realm of France, by faction torn,
I thought in pride of heart that it would fall
An easy prey. I persecuted those Who taught new doctrines, though they taught the truth:

And when I heard of thousands by the sword
Cut off, or blasted by the pestilence,
I calmly counted up my proper gains,
And sent new herds to slaughter. Temperate
Myself, no blood that mutinied, no vice
Tainting my private life, I sent abroad
Murder and Rape; and therefore am I doom'd,
Like these imperial sufferers, crown'd with fire,
Here to remain, till man's awaken'd eye
Shall see the genuine blackness of our deeds;
And warn'd by them, till the whole human race,
Equalling in bliss the aggregate we caused
Of wretchedness, shall form one brotherhood,
One universal family of love."

THE VISION OF THE MAID OF ORLEANS.

THE THIRD BOOK.

THE Maiden, musing on the warrior's words,
Turn'd from the Hall of Glory. Now they reach'd
A cavern, at whose mouth a Genius stood,
In front a beardless youth, whose smiling eye
Beam'd promise, but behind, wither'd and old,
And all unlovely. Underneath his feet
Records obliterate lay, and laurels sere.
He held an hour-glass, and as the sands fall,
So pass the lives of men. By him they pass'd
Along the darksome cave, and reach'd a stream,

before the walls; till space, Josephus says, was wanting for the crosses, and crosses for the captives."—Cherton's Bampton Lectures.

If any of my readers should enquire why Titus Vespasian, the delight of mankind, is placed in such a situation,—I answer, for this instance of "his generous clemency, that inseparable attendant on true heroism."

Still rolling onward its perpetual course
Noiseless and undisturb'd. Here they ascend
A bark unplotted, that down the stream,
Borne by the current, rush'd, which circling still,
Returning to itself, an island form'd;
Nor had the Maiden's footsteps ever reach'd
The insulated coast, eternally
Rapt round in endless whirl; but Theodore
Drove with a spirit's will the obedient bark.

They land; a mighty fabric meets their eyes,
Seen by its gem-born light. Of adamant
The pile was framed, for ever to abide Firm in eternal strength. Before the gate
Stood eager Expectation, as to catch
The half-heard murmurs issuing from within,
Her mouth half-open'd, and her head stretch'd forth.
On the other side there stood an aged crone,
Listening to every breath of air; she knew
Vague suppositions and uncertain dreams
Of what was soon to come, for she would mark
The little glow-worm's self-emitted light,
And argue thence of kingdoms overthrown,
And desolated nations; ever fill'd
With undetermined terror, as she heard
Or distant screech-owl, or the regular beat
Of evening death-watch.

"Maid," the spirit cried,
"Here, robed in shadows, dwells Futurity.
There is no eye hath seen her secret form,
For round the Mother of Time, eternal mists
Hover. If thou would'st read the book of fate,
Go in!"

The damsel for a moment paused,
Then to the angel spake: "All-gracious Heaven,
Benignant in withholding, hath denied
To man that knowledge. I, in faith assured,
Knowing my heavenly Father, for the best
Ordaineth all things, in that faith remain
Contented."

"Well and wisely hast thou said,"
So Theodore replied; "and now, O Maid!
Is there amid this boundless universe
One whom thy soul would visit? Is there place
To memory dear, or vision'd out by hope,
Where thou would'st now be present? form the wish,
And I am with thee, there."

His closing speech
Yet sounded on her ear, and lo! they stood
Swift as the sudden thought that guided them,
Within the little cottage that she loved.
"He sleeps! the good man sleeps!" enrapt she cried,
As bending o'er her uncle's lowly bed
Her eye retraced his features. "See the beads
Which never morn nor night he fails to tell,
Remembering me, his child, in every prayer.
Oh! peaceful be thy sleep, thou dear old man!
Good Angels guard thy rest! and when thine hour
Is come, as gently may'st thou wake to life,
As when through yonder lattice the next sun
Shall bid thee to thy morning orisons!"

"Thy voice is heard," the angel guide rejoind,
"He sees thee in his dreams, he hears thee breathe
Blessings, and happy is the good man's rest.
Thy fame has reach'd him, for who hath not heard

Thy wondrous exploits? and his aged heart
Hath felt the deepest joy that ever yet
Made his glad blood flow fast. Sleep on, old Claude!
Peaceful, pure spirit, be thy sojourn here,
And short and soon thy passage to that world
Where friends shall part no more!

Does thy soul own
No other wish? or sleeps poor Madelon
Forgotten in her grave? . . . See'st thou yon star,"
The spirit pursued, regardless that her eye
Reproach'd him; "See'st thou that evening star
Whose lovely light so often we beheld
From yonder woodbine porch? How have we gazed
Into the dark deep sky, till the baffled soul,
Lost in the infinite, return'd, and felt
The burthen of her bodily load, and yearn'd
For freedom! Maid, in yonder evening star
Lives thy departed friend. I read that glance,
And we are there!"

He said, and they had pass'd
The immeasurable space.

Then on her ear
The lonely song of adoration rose,
Sweet as the cloister'd virgin's vesper hymn,
Whose spirit, happily dead to earthly hopes,
Already lives in heaven. Abrupt the song
Ceased, tremulous and quick a cry
Of joyful wonder roused the astonish'd Maid,
And instant Madelon was in her arms;
No airy form, no unsubstantial shape,
She felt her friend, she prest her to her heart,
There tears of rapture mingled.

She drew back,
And eagerly she gazed on Madelon,
Then fell upon her neck and wept again.
No more she saw the long-drawn lines of grief,
The emaciate form, the hue of sickness,
The languid eye: youth's loveliest freshness now
Mantled her cheek, whose every lineament
Bespoke the soul at rest, a holy calm,
A deep and full tranquillity of bliss.

"Thou then art come, my first and dearest friend!"
The well-known voice of Madelon began,
"Thou then art come! And was thy pilgrimage
So short on earth? and was it painful too,
Painful and short as mine? but blessed they
Who from the crimes and miseries of the world
Early escape!"

"Nay," Theodore replied,
"She hath not yet fulfill'd her mortal work.
Permitted visitant from earth she comes
To see the seat of rest; and oftentimes
In sorrow shall her soul remember this;
And patient of its transitory woe,
Partake again the anticipated joy."

"Soon be that work perform'd!" the Maid ex-
claim'd,
"O Madelon! O Theodore! my soul,
Spurning the cold communion of the world,
Will dwell with you. But I shall patiently,
Yea, even with joy, endure the allotted ills
Of which the memory in this better state
Shall heighten bliss. That hour of agony,
When, Madelon, I felt thy dying grasp,

And from thy forehead wiped the dews of death,
The very anguish of that hour becomes
A joy for memory now."

"O earliest friend!

I too remember," Madelon replied,
"That hour, thy looks of watchful agony,
The supprest grief that struggled in thine eye
Endearing love's last kindness. Thou did'st know
With what a deep and earnest hope intense
I felt the hour draw on: but who can speak
The unutterable transport, when mine eyes,
As from a long and dreary dream, unclosed
Amid this peaceful vale, . . . unclosed upon
My Arnaud! He had built me up a bower,
A bower of rest. — See, Maiden, where he comes,
His manly lineaments, his beaming eye
The same, but now a holier innocence
Sits on his cheek, and loftier thoughts illumine
The enlighten'd glance."

They met; what joy was theirs
He best can feel, who for a dear friend dead
Hath wet the midnight pillow with his tears.

Fair was the scene around; an ample vale
Whose mountain circle at the distant verge
Lay soften'd on the sight; the near ascent
Rose bolder up, in part abrupt and bare,
Part with the ancient majesty of woods
Adorn'd, or lifting high its rocks sublime.
A river's liquid radiance roll'd beneath;
Beside the bower of Madelon it wound
A broken stream, whose shallows, though the waves
Roll'd on their way with rapid melody,
A child might tread. Behind, an orange grove
Its gay green foliage starr'd with golden fruit.
But with what odours did their blossoms load
The passing gale of eve! Less thrilling sweets
Rose from the marble's perforated floor,
Where kneeling at her prayers, the Moorish queen
Inhaled the cool delight, and whilst she ask'd
The prophet for his promised paradise,
Shaped from the present bliss its utmost joys.
A goodly scene! fair as that fairy land
Where Arthur lives, by ministering spirits borne
From Camelot's bloody banks; or as the groves
Of earliest Eden, where, so legends say,
Enoch abides; and he who, rapt away
By fiery steeds and charioted in fire,
Pass'd in his mortal form the eternal ways;
And John, beloved of Christ, enjoying there
The beatific vision, sometimes seen,
The distant dawning of eternal day,
Till all things be fulfilled.

"Survey this scene!"

So Theodore address'd the Maid of Arc:

"There is no evil here, no wretchedness;
It is the heaven of those who nurst on earth
Their nature's gentlest feelings. Yet not here
Centering their joys, but with a patient hope,

Waiting the allotted hour when capable
Of loftier callings, to a better state
They pass; and hither from that better state
Frequent they come, preserving so those ties
Which through the infinite progressiveness
Complete our perfect bliss.

Even such, so blest,

Save that the memory of no sorrows past
Heighten'd the present joy, our world was once,
In the first era of its innocence,
Ere man had learnt to bow the knee to man.
Was there a youth whom warm affection fill'd,
He spake his honest heart; the earliest fruits
His toil produced, the sweetest flowers that deck'd
The sunny bank, he gather'd for the maid,
Nor she disdain'd the gift; for Vice not yet
Had burst the dungeons of her Hell, and rear'd
Those artificial boundaries that divide
Man from his species. State of blessedness!
Till that ill-omen'd hour when Cain's true son
Delves in the bowels of the earth for gold,
Accursed bane of virtue, . . . of such force
As poets feign dwelt in the Gorgon's locks,
Which whoso saw, felt instant the life-blood
Cold curdle in his veins, the creeping flesh
Grew stiff with horror, and the heart forgot
To beat. Accursed hour! for man no more
To Justice paid his homage, but forsook
Her altars, and bow'd down before the shrine
Of Wealth and Power, the Idols he had made.
Then Hell enlarged herself, her gates flew wide,
Her legion fiends rush'd forth. Oppression came,
Whose frown is desolation, and whose breath
Blasts like the pestilence; and Poverty,
A meagre monster, who with withering touch
Makes barren all the better part of man,
Mother of Miseries. Then the goodly earth,
Which God had framed for happiness, became
One theatre of woe, and all that God
Had given to bless free men, these tyrant fiends
His bitterest curses made. Yet for the best
Have all things been appointed by the All-wise!
For by experience taught shall man at length
Dash down his Moloch-idols, Samson-like,
And burst his fetters. Then in the abyss
Oppression shall be chain'd, and Poverty
Die, and with her, her brood of miseries;
And Virtue and Equality preserve
The reign of Love, and earth shall once again
Be Paradise, where Wisdom shall secure
The state of bliss which Ignorance betray'd.

"O, age of happiness!" the Maid exclaim'd,
"Roll fast thy current, Time, till that blest age
Arrive! and happy thou, my Theodore,
Permitted thus to see the sacred depths
Of wisdom!"

"Such," the blessed spirit replied,
"Beloved! such our lot; allowed to range

¹ In the cabinet of the Alhambra where the queen used to dress and say her prayers, and which is still an enchanting sight, there is a slab of marble full of small holes, through which perfumes exhaled that were kept constantly burning beneath. The doors and windows are disposed so as to afford the most agreeable prospects, and to throw a soft yet lively light upon the eyes. Fresh currents of air too are admitted, so as to renew every instant the delicious coolness of this apartment. — Sketch of the History of the Spanish Moors, prefixed to Florian's Gonsalvo of Cordova.

The vast infinity, progressive still
In knowledge and increasing blessedness,
This our united portion. Thou hast yet
A little while to sojourn amongst men :
I will be with thee ; there shall not a breeze
Wanton around thy temples, on whose wing
I will not hover near ; and at that hour
When from its fleshly sepulchre let loose,
Thy phoenix-soul shall soar, O best-beloved !
I will be with thee in thine agonies,
And welcome thee to life and happiness,
Eternal infinite beatitude ! ”

He spake, and led her near a straw-roof'd cot,
Love's palace. By the Virtues circled there,
The Immortal listen'd to such melodies,
As aye, when one good deed is register'd
Above, re-echo in the halls of Heaven.
Labour was there, his crisp locks floating loose,
Clear was his cheek, and beaming his full eye,
And strong his arm robust ; the wood-nymph Health
Still follow'd on his path, and where he trod
Fresh flowers and fruits arose. And there was Hope,
The general friend ; and Pity, whose mild eye
Wept o'er the widow'd dove : and, loveliest form,
Majestic Chastity, whose sober smile
Delights and awes the soul ; a laurel wreath
Restrained her tresses, and upon her breast
The snow-drop hung its head¹, that seem'd to grow
Spontaneous, cold and fair. Beside the maid
Love went submit, with eye more dangerous

¹ “ The grave matron does not perceive how time has impaired her charms, but decks her faded bosom with the same

Than fancied basilisk to wound whoe'er
Too bold approach'd ; yet anxious would he read
Her every rising wish, then only pleased
When pleasing. Hymning him the song was raised.

“ Glory to thee, whose vivifying power
Pervades all Nature's universal frame !
Glory to thee, Creator Love ! to thee,
Parent of all the smiling Charities,
That strew the thorny path of life with flowers !
Glory to thee, Preserver ! To thy praise
The awakened woodlands echo all the day
Their living melody ; and warbling forth
To thee her twilight song, the nightingale
Holds the lone traveller from his way, or charms
The listening poet's ear. Where Love shall deign
To fix his seat, there blameless Pleasure sheds
Her roseate dews ; Content will sojourn there,
And Happiness behold Affection's eye
Gleam with the mother's smile. Thrice happy he
Who feels thy holy power ! he shall not drag,
Forlorn and friendless, along life's long path
To age's drear abode ; he shall not waste
The bitter evening of his days unsooth'd ;
But Hope shall cheer his hours of solitude,
And Vice shall vainly strive to wound his breast,
That bears that talisman ; and when he meets
The eloquent eye of Tenderness, and hears
The bosom-thrilling music of her voice,
The joy he feels shall purify his soul,
And imp it for anticipated heaven.”

snow-drop that seems to grow on the breast of the virgin.”—

THE TRIUMPH OF WOMAN.

The Subject of this Poem is taken from the third and fourth Chapters of the First Book of Esdras.

EDITH SOUTHEY.¹

With way-worn feet, a traveller woe-begone,
Life's upward road I journey'd many a day,
And framing many a sad yet soothing lay,
Beguill'd the solitary hours with song.
Lonely my heart and rugged was the way
Yet often pluck'd I, as I pass'd along,
The wild and simple flowers of poesy ;
And sometimes, unreflecting as a child,
Entwined the weeds which pleased a random eye.
Take thou the wreath, BELOVED ; it is wild
And rudely garlanded ; yet scorn not thou
The humble offering, where dark rosemary weaves
Amid gay flowers its melancholy leaves,
And myrtle gathered to adorn thy brow.

TO

MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT.

THE lily cheek, the “ purple light of love,”
The liquid lustre of the melting eye, . .
Mary ! of these the Poet sung, for these
Did Woman triumph ; . . . turn not thou away
Contemtuously from the theme. No Maid of Arc
Had, in those ages, for her country's cause
Wielded the sword of freedom ; no Roland
Had borne the palm of female fortitude ;
No Cordé with self-sacrificing zeal
Had glorified again the Avenger's name,
As erst when Cæsar perish'd : haply too
Some strains may hence be drawn, befitting me
To offer, nor unworthy thy regard.

THE TRIUMPH OF WOMAN.

GLAD as the weary traveller tempest-tost
To reach secure at length his native coast ;
Who wandering long o'er distant lands hath sped,
The night-blast wildly howling round his head,
Known all the woes of want, and felt the storm
Of the bleak winter parch his shivering form ;
The journey o'er and every peril past
Beholds his little cottage-home at last,
And as he sees afar the smoke curl slow,
Feels his full eyes with transport overflow,
So from the scene where Death and Misery reign,
And Vice and Folly drench with blood the plain,
Joyful I turn, to sing how Woman's praise
Avail'd again Jerusalem to raise,
Call'd forth the sanction of the Despot's nod,
And freed the nation best beloved of God.

Darius gives the feast ; to Persia's court,
Awed by his will, the obedient throng resort :
Attending Satraps swell their prince's pride,
And vanquish'd Monarchs grace the Conqueror's side.
No more the warrior wears the garb of war,
Girds on the sword, or mounts the scythed car ;
No more Judæa's sons dejected go,
And hang the head, and heave the sigh of woe.
From Persia's rugged hills descend the train,
From where Orontes foams along the plain,
From where Choaspes rolls his royal waves,
And India sends her sons, submissive slaves.
Thy daughters, Babylon, for this high feast
Weave the loose robe, and paint the flowery vest,
With roseate wreaths they braid the glossy hair,
They tinge the cheek which nature form'd so fair,
Learn the soft step, the soul-subduing glance,
Melt in the song, and swim adown the dance.
Exalted on the Monarch's golden throne,
In royal state the fair Apame shone ;
Her form of majesty, her eyes of fire,
Chill with respect, or kindle with desire ;
The admiring multitude her charms adore,
And own her worthy of the rank she bore.

Now on his couch reclined Darius lay,
Tired with the toilsome pleasures of the day,
Without Judæa's watchful sons await,
To guard the sleeping idol of the state.
Three youths were these of Judah's royal race,
Three youths whom Nature dower'd with every grace,
To each the form of symmetry she gave,
And haughty genius cursed each favourite slave ;
These fill'd the cup, around the Monarch kept,
Served when he spake, and guarded while he slept.

Yet oft for Salem's hallow'd towers laid low
The sigh would heave, the unbidden tear would flow,
And when the dull and wearying round of power
Allow'd Zorobabel one vacant hour,
He loved on Babylon's high wall to roam,
And lingering gaze toward his distant home ;

Or on Euphrates' willowy banks reclined
Hear the sad harp moan fitful to the wind.

As now the perfumed lamps stream wide their light,
And social converse cheers the livelong night,
Thus spake Zorobabel : " Too long in vain
For Zion desolate her sons complain ;
All hopelessly our years of sorrow flow,
And these proud heathen mock their captives' woe.
While Cyrus triumph'd here in victor state
A brighter prospect cheer'd our exiled fate ;
Our sacred walls again he bade us raise,
And to Jehovah rear the pile of praise.
Quickly these fond hopes faded from our eyes,
As the frail sun that glids the wintry skies,
And spreads a moment's radiance o'er the plain,
Soon hid by clouds which dim the scene again.

" Opprest by Artaxerxes' jealous reign,
We vainly pleaded here, and wept in vain.
Now when Darius, chief of mild command,
Bids joy and pleasure fill the festive land,
Still shall we droop the head in sullen grief,
And sternly silent shun to seek relief ?
What if amid the Monarch's mirthful throng
Our harps should echo to the cheerful song ? "

" Fair is the occasion," thus the one replied,
" Now then let all our tuneful skill be tried.
And while the courtiers quaff the smiling bowl,
And wine's strong fumes inspire the gladden'd soul,
Where all around is merriment, be mine
To strike the lute, and praise the power of Wine."

" And while," his friend rejoind'd, " in state alone,
Lord of the earth, Darius fills the throne,
Be yours the mighty power of Wine to sing,
My lute shall sound the praise of Persia's King."

To them Zorobabel : " On themes like these Seek ye the Monarch of Mankind to please ;
To Wine superior, or to Power's strong arms,
Be mine to sing resistless Woman's charms.
To him victorious in the rival lays
Shall just Darius give the meed of praise ;
A purple robe his honour'd frame shall fold,
The beverage sparkle in his cup of gold ;
A golden couch support his bed of rest,
The chain of honour grace his favour'd breast ;
His the rich turban, his the car's array,
On Babylon's high wall to wheel its way ;
And for his wisdom seated on the throne,
For the King's Cousin shall the Bard be known."

Intent they meditate the future lay,
And watch impatient for the dawn of day
The morn rose clear, and shrill were heard the flute,
The cornet, sackbut, dulcimer, and lute ;
To Babylon's gay streets the throng resort,
Swarm through the gates, and fill the festive court.
High on his throne Darius tower'd in pride,
The fair Apame graced her Sovereign's side :
And now she smiled, and now with mimic frown
Placed on her brow the Monarch's sacred crown.

In transport o'er her faultless form he bends,
Loves every look, and every act commends.

And now Darius bids the herald call
Judæa's Bards to grace the thronging hall.
Hush'd are all sounds, the attending crowd are mute,
And then the Hebrew gently touch'd the lute :

When the Traveller on his way,
Who has toil'd the livelong day,
Feels around on every side
The chilly mists of eventide,
Fatigued and faint his weary mind
Rekurs to all he leaves behind ;
He thinks upon the well-trimm'd hearth,
The evening hour of social mirth,
And her who at departing day
Weeps for her husband far away.
Oh give to him the flowing bowl !
Bid it renovate his soul !
Then shall sorrow sink to sleep,
And he who wept no more shall weep ;
For his care-clouded brow shall clear,
And his glad eye will sparkle through the tear.

When the poor man heart-oppress
Betakes him to his evening rest,
And worn with labour thinks in sorrow
On the labour of to-morrow ;
When repining at his lot
He hies him to his joyless cot,
And loathes to meet his children there,
The rivals for his scanty fare ;
Oh give to him the flowing bowl !
Bid it renovate his soul !
The generous juice with magic power
Shall cheat with happiness the hour,
And with each warm affection fill
The heart by want and wretchedness made chill.

When, at the dim close of day,
The Captive loves alone to stray
Along the haunts recluse and rude
Of sorrow and of solitude ;
When he sits with mournful eye
To mark the lingering radiance die,
And lets distempered fancy roam
Amid the ruins of his home ; . .
Oh give to him the flowing bowl !
Bid it renovate his soul !
The bowl shall better thoughts bestow,
And lull to rest his wakeful woe,
And joy shall gild the evening hour,
And make the Captive Fortune's conqueror.

When the wearying cares of state
Oppress the Monarch with their weight,
When from his pomp retired alone
He feels the duties of the throne,
Feels that the multitude below
Depend on him for weal or woe ;
When his powerful will shall bless
A realm with peace and happiness,
Or with desolating breath
Breathe ruin round, and woe and death ;
Oh give to him the flowing bowl !
Bid it humanize his soul !

He shall not feel the empire's weight,
He shall not feel the cares of state,
The bowl shall each dark thought beguile,
And Nations live and prosper from his smile.

Hush'd was the lute, the Hebrew ceased the song,
Long peals of plaudits echoed from the throng ;
All tongues the liberal words of praise repaid,
On every cheek a smile applauding play'd ;
The rival Bard approach'd, he struck the string,
And pour'd the loftier song to Persia's King.

Why should the wearying cares of state
Oppress the Monarch with their weight ?
Alike to him if peace shall bless
The multitude with happiness ;
Alike to him if frenzied War
Career triumphant on the embattled plain,
And rolling on o'er myriads slain,
With gore and wounds shall clog his scythed car.
What though the tempest rage ? no sound
Of the deep thunder shakes his distant throne ;
And the red flash that spreads destruction round,
Reflects a glorious splendour on the crown.
Where is the Man who with ennobling pride
Regards not his own nature ? where is he
Who without awe can see
The mysteries of the human mind,
The miniature of Deity ?
For Man the vernal clouds descending
Shower down their fertilizing rain ;
For Man the ripen'd harvest bending
Waves with soft murmur o'er the plenteous plain.
He spreads the sail to catch the favouring gale,
Or sweeps with oars the main :
For him the winds of heaven subservient blow,
Earth tremes for him, for him the waters flow,
He thinks, and wills, and acts, a Deity below !

Where is the King who with elating pride
Sees not this Man, this godlike Man his slave ?
Mean are the mighty by the Monarch's side ;
Alike the wise, alike the brave,
With timid step and pale, advance,
And tremble at the royal glance ;
Suspended millions watch his breath,
Whose smile is happiness, whose frown is death.

Why goes the Peasant from that little cot,
Where Peace and Love have blest his humble life ?
In vain his wretched wife
With tears bedews her husband's face,
And clasps him in a long and last embrace ;
In vain his children round his bosom creep,
And weep to see their mother weep,
Fettering their father with their little arms !
What are to him the war's alarms ?
What are to him the distant foes ?
He at the earliest dawn of day
To dally labour went his way,
And when he saw the sun decline,
He sat in peace beneath his vine.
The King commands, the peasant goes,
From all he loved on earth he flies,
And for his monarch toils, and fights, and bleeds, and dies.

What though yon city's castled wall
Cast o'er the darken'd plain its crested shade?
What though her Priests in earnest terror call
On all their host of Gods to aid?
Vain is the bulwark, vain the tower!
In vain her gallant youth expose
Their breasts, a bulwark, to the foes!
In vain at that tremendous hour,
Clasp'd in the savage soldier's reeking arms,
Shrieks to deaf Heaven the violated Maid!
By the rude hand of Ruin scatter'd round,
Their moss-grown towers shall spread the desert ground.

Low shall the mouldering palace lie,
Amid the princely halls the grass wave high,
And through the shatter'd roof descend the inclement sky.

Gay o'er the embattled plain,
Moves yonder warrior train,
Their banners wanton on the morning gale;
Full on their bucklers beams the rising ray,
Their glittering helms give glory to the day;
The shout of war rings echoing o'er the vale.
Far reaches as the aching eye can strain
The splendid horror of their wide array.
Ah! not in vain expectant, o'er
Their glorious pomp the vultures soar!
Amid the Conqueror's palace high
Shall sound the song of victory;
Long after journeying o'er the plain
The traveller shall with startled eye
See their white bones then blanched by many a winter sky.

Lord of the earth! we will not raise
The temple to thy bounded praise;
For thee no victim need expire,
For thee no altar blaze with hallow'd fire;
The burning City flames for thee,
Thine Altar is the field of victory!
Thy sacred Majesty to bless
Man a self-offer'd victim freely flies;
To thee he sacrifices happiness
And peace, and Love's endearing ties;
To thee a Slave he lives, for thee a Slave he dies.

Hush'd was the lute, the Hebrew ceased to sing;
The shout burst forth, "For ever live the King!"
Loud was the uproar, as when Rome's decree
Pronounced Achaia once again was free;
Assembled Greece enrapt with fond belief
Heard the false boon, and bless'd the treacherous Chief.
Each breast with freedom's holy ardour glows,
From every voice the cry of rapture rose;
Their thundering clamours rend the astonished sky,
And birds o'erpassing hear, and drop, and die.
Thus o'er the Persian dome their plaudits ring,
And the high hall re-echoed. . . "Live the King!"
The mutes bow'd reverent down before their Lord,
The assembled Satraps envied and adored,
Joy sparkled in the Monarch's conscious eyes,
And his pleased pride already doom'd the prize.

Silent they saw Zorobabel advance:
He to Apame turn'd his timid glance;

With downward eye he paused, a moment mute,
Then with light finger touch'd the softer lute.
Apame knew the Hebrew's grateful cause,
And bent her head, and sweetly smiled applause.

Why is the warrior's cheek so red?
Why downward droops his musing head?
Why that slow step, that faint advance,
That keen yet quick retreating glance?
That crested head in war tower'd high,
No backward glance disgraced that eye,
No flushing fear that cheek o'erspread,
When stern he strode o'er heaps of dead:
Strange tumult now his bosom moves, . .
The Warrior fears because he loves.

Why does the Youth delight to rove
Amid the dark and lonely grove?
Why in the throng where all are gay,
With absent eyes from gaiety distraught,
Sits he alone in silent thought?
Silent he sits, for far away
His passion'd soul delights to stray;
Recluse he roves as if he fain would shun
All human-kind, because he loves but One!

Yes, King of Persia, thou art blest!
But not because the sparkling bowl
To rapture elevates thy waken'd soul;
But not because of power possess;
Nor that the Nations dread thy nod,
And Princes reverence thee their earthly God!
Even on a monarch's solitude
Will Care, dark visitant, intrude;
The bowl brief pleasure can bestow;
The purple cannot shield from woe;
But, King of Persia, thou art blest,
For Heaven who raised thee thus the world above,
Hath made thee happy in Apame's love!

Oh! I have seen him fondly trace
The heavenly features of her face,
Rove o'er her form with eager eye,
And sigh and gaze, and gaze and sigh.
See! from his brow with mimic frown
Apame takes the sacred crown;
Those sparkling eyes, that radiant face,
Give to the diadem new grace:
And subject to a Woman's laws,
Darius sees, and smiles applause!

He ceased, and silent still remain'd the throng,
While rapt attention own'd the power of song.
Then, loud as when the wintry whirlwinds blow,
From every voice the thundering plaudits flow,
Darius smiled, Apame's sparkling eyes
Glanced on the King, and Woman won the prize.

Now silent sate the expectant crowd: Alone
The victor Hebrew gazed not on the throne;
With deeper hue his cheek distemper'd glows,
With statelier stature now he rose;
Heavenward he gazed, regardless of the throng,
And pour'd with awful voice sublimer song.

"Ancient of days! Eternal Truth! one hymn,
One holler strain the Bard shall raise to Thee,

Thou Powerful! Thou Benevolent! Thou Just!
Friend! Father! All in all! The Vine's rich blood,
The Monarch's might, and Woman's conquering charms,

These shall we praise alone? . . . O ye who sit
Beneath your vine, and quaff at evening hour
The healthful bowl, remember Him whose dew,
Whose rains, whose sun, matured the growing fruit,
Creator and Preserver! . . . Reverence Him,
O Thou who from thy throne dispensest life
And death, for He hath delegated power,
And thou shalt one day at the throne of God
Render thy strict account! . . . And ye who gaze
Enrapt on Beauty's fascinating form,
Gaze on with love; and loving beauty, learn
To shun abhorrent all the mental eye
Beholds deform'd and foul; for so shall Love
Climb to the source of goodness. God of Truth!
All-Just! All-Mighty! I should ill deserve
Thy noblest gift, the gift divine of song,
If, so content with ear-deep melodies
To please all-profitless, I did not pour
Severer strains, . . . of Truth . . . eternal Truth,
Unchanging Justice, universal Love.
Such strains awake the Soul to loftiest thoughts;
Such strains the blessed Spirits of the Good
Waft, grateful incense, to the Halls of Heaven."

The dying notes still murmur'd on the string,
When from his throne arose the raptur'd King.
About to speak he stood, and waved his hand,
And all expectant sate the obedient band.

Then just and generous, thus the Monarch cries
"Be thine, Zorobabel, the well-earn'd prize.
The purple robe of state thy form shall fold,
The beverage sparkle in thy cup of gold,
The golden couch, the car, and honour'd chain,
Requite the merits of thy favour'd strain,
And raised supreme the ennobled race among,
Be call'd My Cousin for the victor song.
Nor these alone the victor song shall bless,
Ask what thou wilt, and what thou wilt possess."

"Fallen is Jerusalem!" the Hebrew cries,
And patriot anguish fills his streaming eyes,
"Hurl'd to the earth by Rapine's vengeful rod,
Polluted lies the temple of our God;
Far in a foreign land her sons remain,
Hear the keen taunt, and drag the galling chain;
In fruitless woe they wear the weary years,
And steep the bread of bitterness in tears.
O Monarch, greatest, mildest, best of men,
Restore us to those ruin'd walls again!
Allow us to rebuild that sacred dome,
To live in liberty, and die at Home."

So spake Zorobabel. — Thus Woman's praise
Aval'd again Jerusalem to raise,
Call'd forth the sanction of the Despot's nod,
And freed the Nation best beloved of God.

WAT TYLER;

A DRAMA.

Twenty years ago, upon the surreptitious publication of this notable Drama, and the use which was made of it, I said what is then became me to say in a letter to one of those gentlemen who thought proper to revile me, not for having entertained democratical opinions, but for having outgrown them, and learnt to appreciate and to defend the institutions of my country.

Had I written lewdly in my youth, like Beza, — like Beza, I would ask pardon of God and man; and no considerations should induce me to reprint what I could never think of without sorrow and shame. Had I at any time, like St. Augustine, taught doctrines which I afterwards perceived to be erroneous, — and if, as in his case, my position in society, and the estimation in which I was held, gave weight to what I had advanced, and made those errors dangerous to others, — like St. Augustine, I would publish my retractions, and endeavour to counteract the evil which, though erringly, with no evil intention, I had caused.

Wherefore then, it may be asked, have I included Wat Tyler in this authentic collection of my poetical works? For these reasons, — that it may not be supposed I think it any reproach to have written it, or that I am more ashamed of having been a republican, than of having been a boy. *Quicumque ista lecturi sunt, non me imitentur errantem, sed in melius proficentem. Inveniet enim fortasse, quomodo scribendo profecerim, quisquis opuscula mea, ordine quo scripta sunt, legerit.*¹

I have endeavoured to correct in my other juvenile

St. Augustine.

pieces such faults as were corrigible. But Wat Tyler appears just as it was written, in the course of three mornings, in 1794; the stolen copy, which was committed to the press twenty-three years afterwards, not having undergone the slightest correction of any kind.¹

WAT TYLER.

ACT I.

SCENE. A Blacksmith's shop; WAT TYLER at work within; a May-pole before the door.

ALICE, PIERS, &c.

SONG.

CHEERFUL on this holiday,
Welcome we the merry May.

On every sunny hillock spread,
The pale primrose lifts her head;
Rich with sweets, the western gale
Sweeps along the cowslip'd dale;
Every bank, with violets gay,
Smiles to welcome in the May.

The linnet from the budding grove,
Chirps her vernal song of love.
The copse resounds the thrush's notes,
On each wild gale sweet music floats;
And melody from every spray,
Welcomes in the merry May.

Cheerful on this holiday,
Welcome we the merry May. [Dance.

[During the dance, TYLER lays down his hammer, and sits mournfully down before the door.

Hob Carter. Why so sad, neighbour?—do not these gay sports,

This revelry of youth, recall the days
When we too mingled in the revelry,
And lightly tripping in the morris dance,
Welcomed the merry month?

Tyler. Ay, we were young,
No cares had quell'd the heyday of the blood:
We sported deftly, in the April morning,
Nor mark'd the black clouds gathering o'er our noon,
Nor fear'd the storm of night.

Hob. Beshrew me, Tyler,
But my heart joys to see the imps so cheerful!
Young, hale, and happy, why should they destroy
These blessings by reflection?

Tyler. Look ye, neighbour—
You have known me long.

Hob. Since we were boys together,
And play'd at barley-brake, and danced the morris.
Some five-and-twenty-years!

¹ Prefixed to this Poem by the Author in the edition of his Poetical Works published in 1837.

Tyler.
And hale, and happy?

Hob. Cheerful as the best.
Tyler. Have not I been a staid, hard-working man?
Up with the lark at labour; sober, honest,
Of an unblemish'd character?

Hob. Who doubts it?
There's never a man in Essex bears a better.

Tyler. And shall not these, though young, and hale, and happy,

Look on with sorrow to the future hour?
Shall not reflection poison all their pleasures?
When I—the honest, staid, hard-working Tyler—
Toll through the long course of the summer's day,
Still toiling, yet still poor! when with hard labour
Scarce can I furnish out my daily food,
And age comes on to steal away my strength,
And leave me poor and wretched! Why should this be?

My youth was regular—my labour constant—
I married an industrious, virtuous woman;
Nor while I toll'd and sweated at the anvil,
Sat she neglectful of her spinning-wheel.
Hob! I have only six groats in the world,
And they must soon by law be taken from me.

Hob. Curse on these taxes—one succeeds another—
Our ministers, panders of a king's will,
Drain all our wealth away, waste it in revels,
And lure, or force away our boys, who should be
The props of our old age, to fill their armies,
And feed the crows of France. Year follows year,
And still we madly prosecute the war;
Draining our wealth, distressing our poor peasants, Slaughtering our youths—and all to crown our chiefs

With glory!—I detest the hell-sprung name.

Tyler. What matters me who wears the crown of France?

Whether a Richard or a Charles possess it?
They reap the glory—they enjoy the spoil—
We pay—we bleed! The sun would shine as cheerily,
The rains of heaven as seasonably fall,
Though neither of these royal pests existed.

Hob. Nay, as for that, we poor men should fare better;

No legal robbers then should force away
The hard-earned wages of our honest toil.
The Parliament for ever cries more money,
The service of the state demands more money;
Just heaven! of what service is the state?

Tyler. Oh, 'tis of vast importance! who should pay for

The luxuries and riots of the court?
Who should support the flaunting courtier's pride,
Pay for their midnight revels, their rich garments,
Did not the state enforce?—Think ye, my friend,
That I, a humble blacksmith, here at Deptford,
Would part with these six groats—earn'd by hard toll,

All that I have! to massacre the Frenchmen,
Murder as enemies men I never saw!
Did not the state compel me?

(Tax-gatherers pass by.) There they go,
Privileged ruffians! [PIERS and ALICE advance to him.

Alice. Did we not dance it well to-day, my father?
You know I always loved these village sports,

Even from my infancy, and yet methinks
I never tripp'd along the mead so gaily.
You know they chose me queen, and your friend
Piers

Wreathed me this cowslip garland for my head —
Is it not simple? — You are sad, my father!

You should have rested from your work to-day,
And given a few hours up to merriment —
But you are so serious!

Tyler. Serious, my good girl!
I may well be so: when I look at thee
It makes me sad! thou art too fair a flower
To bear the wintry wind of poverty.

Piers. Yet I have often heard you speak of riches
Even with contempt; they cannot purchase peace,
Or innocence, or virtue; sounder sleep
Waits on the weary ploughman's lowly bed,
Than on the drowsy couch of luxury
Lulls the rich slave of pride and indolence.
I never wish for wealth; my arm is strong,
And I can purchase by it a coarse meal,
And hunger savours it.

Tyler. Young man, thy mind
Has yet to learn the hard lesson of experience.
Thou art yet young: the blasting breath of want
Has not yet froze the current of thy blood.

Piers. Fare not the birds well, as from spray to spray,

Whence come they bound, yet find their simple food
Scatter'd abundantly?

Tyler. No fancied boundaries of mine and thine
Restrain their wanderings. Nature gives enough
For all; but Man, with arrogant selfishness,
Proud of his heaps, hoards up superfluous stores
Robb'd from his weaker fellows, starves the poor,
Or gives to pity what he owes to justice!

Piers. So I have heard our good friend John Ball preach. [prison'd?]

Alice. My father, wherefore was John Ball imwas he not charitable, good, and pious?
I have heard him say that all mankind are brethren,
And that like brethren they should love each other;
Was not that doctrine pious?

Tyler. Rank sedition —
High treason, every syllable, my child!
The priests cry out on him for heresy,
The nobles all detest him as a rebel,
And this good man, this minister of Christ,
This man, the friend and brother of mankind,
Lingers in the dark dungeon! — My dear Alice,
Retire awhile. [Exit ALICE.]

Piers, I would speak to thee,
Even with a father's love! you are much with me,
And I believe do court my conversation;
Thou could'st not choose thee forth a truer friend.
I would fain see thee happy, but I fear
Thy very virtues will destroy thy peace.
My daughter — she is young — not yet fifteen:
Piers, thou art generous, and thy youthful heart
Warm with affection; this close intimacy
Will ere long grow to love,

Piers. Suppose it so;
Were that an evil, Walter? She is mild
And cheerful, and industrious: — now methinks
With such a partner life would be most happy!
Why would ye warn me then of wretchedness?

Is there an evil that can harm our lot?
I have been told the virtuous must be happy,
And have believed it true: tell me, my friend,
What shall disturb the virtuous?

Tyler. Poverty,
A bitter foe.

Piers. Nay, you have often told me
That happiness does not consist in riches.

Tyler. It is most true; but tell me, my dear boy,
Could'st thou be happy to behold thy wife
Pining with want? the children of your loves
Clad in the squalid rags of wretchedness?
And, when thy hard and unremitting toil
Had earn'd with pain a scanty recompense, [thee,
Could'st thou be patient when the law should rob
And leave thee without bread and penniless?

Piers. It is a dreadful picture.

Tyler. 'Tis a true one.

Piers. But yet methinks our sober industry
Might drive away the danger! 'tis but little
That I could wish; food for our frugal meals,
Raiment, however homely, and a bed
To shield us from the night.

Tyler. Thy honest reason
Could wish no more: but were it not most wretched
To want the coarse food for the frugal meal?
And by the orders of your merciless lord,
If you by chance were guilty of being poor,
To be turn'd out adrift to the bleak world,
Unhoused, unfriended? — Piers, I have not been idle,
I never ate the bread of indolence;
Could Alice be more thrifty than her mother?
Yet with but one child, — and that one how good,
Thou knowest, — I scarcely can provide the wants
Of nature: look at these wolves of the law,
They come to drain me of my hard-earn'd wages.
I have already paid the heavy tax
Laid on the wool that clothes me, on my leather,
On all the needful articles of life!
And now three groats (and I work'd hard to earn them)
The Parliament demands — and I must pay them,
Forsooth, for liberty to wear my head

[Enter Tax-gatherers.]

Collector. Three groats a head for all your family.

Piers. Why is this money gather'd? 'tis a hard tax
On the poor labourer! It can never be
That Government should thus distress the people.
Go to the rich for money — honest labour
Ought to enjoy its fruits.

Collector. The state wants money,
War is expensive — 'tis a glorious war,
A war of honour, and must be supported. —
Three groats a head.

Tyler. There, three for my own head,
Three for my wife's; what will the state tax next?

Collector. You have a daughter.

Tyler. She is below the age — not yet fifteen.

Collector. You would evade the tax.

Tyler. Sir Officer,
I have paid you fairly what the law demands.

[ALICE and her Mother enter the shop. The Tax-gatherers go to her. One of them lays hold of her.
She screams. — TYLER goes in.]

Collector. You say she's under age.

[ALICE screams again. TYLER knocks out the Tax-gatherer's brains. His companions fly.]

Piers. A just revenge.

Tyler. Most just indeed; but in the eye of the law 'Tis murder: and the murderer's lot is mine.

[Piers goes out—TYLER sits down mournfully.]

Alice. Fly, my dear father! let us leave this place Before they raise pursuit.

Tyler. Nay, nay, my child, Flight would be useless—I have done my duty; I have punish'd the brute insolence of lust, And here will wait my doom.

Wife. Oh, let us fly, My husband, my dear husband!

Alice. Quit but this place, And we may yet be safe, and happy too.

Tyler. It would be useless, Alice; 't would but lengthen

A wretched life in fear.

[Cry without, Liberty, Liberty! Enter Mob, Hon CARTER, &c. crying Liberty, Liberty! No Poll-tax! No War!]

Hob. We have broke our chains, we will arise in anger,

The mighty multitude shall trample down The handful that oppress them.

Tyler. Have ye heard So soon then of my murder?

Hob. Of your vengeance. Piers ran throughout the village: told the news—Cried out, to arms!—arm, arm for liberty; For Liberty and Justice!

Tyler. My good friends, Heed well your danger, or be resolute! Learn to laugh menaces and force to scorn, Or leave me. I dare answer the bold deed—Death must come once: return ye to your homes, Protect my wife and child, and on my grave Write why I died; perhaps the time may come, When honest Justice shall applaud the deed.

Hob. Nay, nay, we are oppress'd, and have too long Kneit at our proud lords' feet; we have too long Obey'd their orders, bow'd to their caprices, Sweated for them the wearying summer's day, Wasted for them the wages of our toil, Fought for them, conquer'd for them, bled for them, Still to be trampled on, and still despised! But we have broke our chains.

Tom Miller. Piers is gone on Through all the neighbouring villages, to spread The glorious tidings.

Hob. He is hurried on To Maidstone, to deliver good John Ball, Our friend, our shepherd. [Mob increases.]

Tyler. Friends and Countrymen, Will ye then rise to save an honest man From the fierce clutches of the bloody law? Oh, do not call to mind my private wrongs, [me, That the state drain'd my hard-earn'd pittance from That, of his office proud, the foul Collector Durst with lewd hand seize on my darling child, Insult her maiden modesty, and force A father's hand to vengeance; heed not this; Think not, my countrymen, on private wrongs, Remember what yourselves have long endured; Think of the insults, wrongs, and contumelies, Ye bear from your proud lords—that your hard toil Manures their fertile fields—you plough the earth,

You sow the corn, you reap the ripen'd harvest,— They riot on the produce!—that, like beasts, They sell you with their land, claim all the fruits Which the kindly earth produces, as their own, The privilege, forsooth, of noble birth! On, on to freedom; feel but your own strength, Be but resolv'd, and these destructive tyrants Shall shrink before your vengeance.

Hob. On to London,— The tidings fly before us—the court trembles,— Liberty—Vengeance—Justice.

ACT II

SCENE I. Blackheath.

TYLER, HOB, &c.

SONG.

'When Adam delved and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman?'

Wretched is the infant's lot,
Born within the straw-roof'd cot;
Be he generous, wise, or brave,
He must only be a slave.
Long, long labour, little rest,
Still to toil to be oppress'd;
Drain'd by taxes of his store,
Punish'd next for being poor:
This is the poor wretch's lot,
Born within the straw-roof'd cot.

While the peasant works—to sleep;
What the peasant sows—to reap;
On the couch of ease to lie,
Rioting in revelry;
Be he villain, be he fool,
Still to hold despotic rule,
Trampling on his slaves with scorn!
This is to be nobly born.

'When Adam delved and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman?'

Jack Straw. The mob are up in London—the proud courtiers Begin to tremble.

Tom Miller. Ay, ay, 'tis time to tremble: Who'll plough their fields, who'll do their drudgery now,

And work like horses to give them the harvest?

Jack Straw. I only wonder we lay quiet so long. We had always the same strength; and we deserved The ills we met with for not using it.

Hob. Why do we fear those animals call'd lords? What is there in the name to frighten us? Is not my arm as mighty as a Baron's?

Enter PIERS and JOHN BALL.

Piers (to Tyler). Have I done well, my father?— I remember'd This good man lay in prison.

Tyler. My dear child,
Most well; the people rise for liberty,
And their first deed should be to break the chains
That bind the virtuous:—Oh, thou honest priest,
How much hast thou endured!

John Ball. Why, ay, my friend!
These squalid rags bespeak what I have suffer'd.
I was reviled, insulted, left to languish
In a damp dungeon; but I bore it cheerily—
My heart was glad—for I had done my duty.
I pitied my oppressors, and I sorrow'd
For the poor men of England.

Tyler. They have felt
Th'ir strength: look round this heath; 'tis throng'd with men

Ardent for freedom: mighty is the event
That waits their fortune.

John Ball. I would fain address them.

Tyler. Do so, my friend, and preach to them their duty.

Remind them of their long-withholden rights.
What ho! there; silence!

Piers. Silence, there, my friends,
This good man would address you.

Hob. Ay, ay, hear him;
He is no mealy-mouth'd court-orator,
To flatter vice, and pamper lordly pride.

John Ball. Friends, brethren! for ye are my brethren all;

Englishmen, met in arms to advocate
The cause of freedom, hear me; pause awhile
In the career of vengeance!—It is true
I am a priest, but, as these rags may speak,
Not one who riots in the poor man's spoil,
Or trades with his religion. I am one

Who preach the law of Christ; and, in my life,
Would practise what he taught. The Son of God
Came not to you in power: humble in mien,
Lowly in heart, the man of Nazareth

Preach'd mercy, justice, love: "Woe unto ye,
Ye that are rich: if that ye would be saved
Sell that ye have, and give unto the poor."
So taught the Saviour: Oh, my honest friends,
Have ye not felt the strong indignant throb

Of justice in your bosoms, to behold
The lordly Baron feasting on your spoils?
Have you not in your hearts arraign'd the lot

That gave him on the couch of luxury
To pillow his head, and pass the festive day

In sportive feasts, and ease, and revelry?
Have you not often in your conscience ask'd,

Why is the difference; wherefore should that man,
No worthier than myself, thus lord it over me,
And bid me labour, and enjoy the fruits?

The God within your breasts has argued thus:
The voice of truth has murmur'd. Came ye not
As helpless to the world? Shines not the sun

With equal ray on both? Do ye not feel
The self-same winds of heaven as keenly parch ye?
Abundant is the earth—the Sire of all,

Saw and pronounced that it was very good.

Look round; the vernal fields smile with new flowers,
The budding orchard perfumes the sweet breeze,
And the green corn waves to the passing gale.

There is enough for all; but your proud Baron
Stands up, and, arrogant of strength, exclaims,

"I am a Lord—by nature I am noble:
These fields are mine, for I was born to them,
I was born in the castle—you, poor wretches,
Whelp'd in the cottage, are by birth my slaves."
Almighty God! such blasphemies are utter'd:
Almighty God! such blasphemies believed!

Tom Miller. This is something like a sermon.
Jack Straw. Where's the bishop
Would tell you truths like these?

Hob. There never was a bishop among all the apostles.

John Ball. My brethren—

Piers. Silence; the good priest speaks.

John Ball. My brethren, these are truths, and weighty ones,

Ye are all equal: nature made ye so.
Equality is your birthright.—When I gaze
On the proud palace, and behold one man
In the blood-purpled robes of royalty,
Feasting at ease, and lording over millions,

Then turn me to the hut of poverty,
And see the wretched labourer worn with toil,
Divide his scanty morsel with his infants,
I sicken, and indignant at the sight,
"Blush for the patience of humanity."

Jack Straw. We will assert our rights.
Tom Miller. We'll trample down

These insolent oppressors.

John Ball. In good truth,
Ye have cause for anger: but, my honest friends,
Is it revenge or justice that ye seek?

Mob. Justice! Justice!

John Ball. Oh, then, remember mercy;
And though your proud oppressors spare not you,
Show you excel them in humanity.

They will use every art to disunite you;
To conquer separately, by stratagem,
Whom in a mass they fear;—but be ye firm;
Boldly demand your long-forgotten rights,
Your sacred, your inalienable freedom.

Be bold—be resolute—be merciful:
And while you spurn the hated name of slaves,
Show you are men.

Mob. Long live our honest priest.

Jack Straw. He shall be made archbishop.

John Ball. My brethren, I am plain John Ball, your friend,

Your equal: by the law of Christ enjoin'd
To serve you, not command.

Jack Straw. March we for London.

Tyler. Mark me, my friends—we rise for Liberty—
Justice shall be our guide: let no man dare
To plunder in the tumult.

Mob. Lead us on. Liberty! Justice!
[Exeunt, with cries of Liberty! No Poll-tax!

No War.

SCENE II.

The Tower.

KING RICHARD, ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, SIR
JOHN TREVELLAN, WALWORTH, PHILPOT.

King. What must we do? the danger grows more imminent.

The mob increases.

Philpot. Every moment brings
Fresh tidings of our peril.

King. It were well
To grant them what they ask.

Archbishop. Ay, that my liege
Were politic. Go boldly forth to meet them,
Grant all they ask—however wild and ruinous—
Meantime, the troops you have already summon'd
Will gather round them. Then my Christian power
Absolves you of your promise. [rabble]

Walworth. Were but their ringleaders cut off, the
Would soon disperse.

Philpot. United in a mass,
There's nothing can resist them—once divide them
And they will fall an easy sacrifice. [fair]

Archbishop. Lull them by promises—bespeak them
Go forth, my liege—spare not, if need requires,
A solemn oath to ratify the treaty.

King. I dread their fury.

Archbishop. 'Tis a needless dread,

There is divinity about your person;
It is the sacred privilege of Kings,
Howe'er they act, to render no account
To man. The people have been taught this lesson,
Nor can they soon forget it.

King. I will go—
I will submit to every thing they ask;
My day of triumph will arrive at last. [Shouts without.]

Enter Messenger.

Messenger. The mob are at the city gates.
Archbishop. Haste! Haste!

Address them ere too late. I'll remain here,
For they detest me much. [Shouts again.]

Enter another Messenger.
Mess. The Londoners have open'd the city gates;
The rebels are admitted. [mayor]

King. Fear then must give me courage. My lord
Come you with me. [Exeunt. Shouts without.]

SCENE III.

Smithfield.

WAT TYLER, JOHN BALL, PIERS, &c. Mob.

Piers. So far triumphant are we. How these nobles,
These petty tyrants, who so long oppress'd us,
Shrink at the first resistance.

Hob. They were powerful
Only because we fondly thought them so.
Where is Jack Straw?

Tyler. Jack Straw is gone to the Tower
To seize the king, and so to end resistance.

John Ball. It was well judged; fain would I spare the shedding

Of human blood: gain we that royal puppet
And all will follow fairly; deprived of him,
The nobles lose their pretext, nor will dare
Rebel against the people's majesty.

Enter Herald.

Herald. Richard the Second, by the grace of God,
Of England, Ireland, France, and Scotland, King,
And of the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed,
Would parley with Wat Tyler.

Tyler. Let him know
Wat Tyler is in Smithfield. [Exit Herald.]—I will parley

With this young monarch: as he comes to me,
Trusting my honour, on your lives I charge you
Let none attempt to harm him.

John Ball. The faith of courts
Is but a weak dependence. You are honest—
And better is it even to die the victim
Of credulous honesty, than live preserved
By the cold policy that still suspects.

Enter KING, WALWORTH, PHILPOT, &c.

King. I would speak to thee, Wat Tyler: bid the mob

Retire awhile.

Piers. Nay, do not go alone—
Let me attend you.

Tyler. Wherefore should I fear?
Am I not arm'd with a just cause? Retire,
And I will boldly plead the cause of Freedom.

[Advances.]
King. Tyler, why have you kill'd my officer,
And led my honest subjects from their homes,
Thus to rebel against the Lord's anointed?

Tyler. Because they were oppress'd.
King. Was this the way
To remedy the ill? You should have tried
By milder means—petition'd at the throne—
The throne will always listen to petitions.

Tyler. King of England,
Petitioning for pity is most weak—

The sovereign people ought to demand justice.
I kill'd your officer, for his lewd hand
Insulted a maid's modesty. Your subjects
I lead to rebel against the Lord's anointed,
Because his ministers have made him odious,
His yoke is heavy, and his burden grievous.
Why do we carry on this fatal war,
To force upon the French a king they hate,
Tearing our young men from their peaceful homes,
Forcing his hard-earn'd fruits from the honest peasant,
Distressing us to desolate our neighbours?

Why is this ruinous poll-tax imposed,
But to support your court's extravagance,
And your mad title to the crown of France?
Shall we sit tamely down beneath these evils
Petitioning for pity? King of England,
Why are we sold like cattle in your markets—
Deprived of every privilege of man?

Must we lie tamely at our tyrant's feet,
And, like your spaniels, lick the hand that beats us?
You sit at ease in your gay palaces,
The costly banquet courts your appetite,
Sweet music soothes your slumbers: we the while,
Scarce by hard toll can earn a little food,
And sleep scarce shelter'd from the cold night wind;
Whilst your wild project wrests the little from us
Which might have cheer'd the wintry hour of age.

The parliament for ever asks more money;
We toil and sweat for money for your taxes:
Where is the benefit, what good reap we
From all the counsels of your government?
Think you that we should quarrel with the French?
What boots to us your victories, your glory?

We pay, we fight, you profit at your ease.
 Do you not claim the country as your own?
 Do you not call the venison of the forest,
 The birds of heaven your own? — prohibiting us,
 Even though in want of food, to seize the prey
 Which nature offers. King! is all this just?
 Think you, we do not feel the wrongs we suffer?
 The hour of retribution is at hand,
 And tyrants tremble — mark me, King of England.
Watworth — (comes behind him, and stabs him.)
 Insolent rebel, threatening the King!
Piers. Vengeance! Vengeance!

Hob. Seize the King.

King. I must be bold. (Advancing.)

My friends and loving subjects,
 I will grant you all you ask; you shall be free —
 The tax shall be repeal'd — all, all you wish.
 Your leader menaced me, he deserv'd his fate.
 Quiet your angers: on my royal word
 Your grievances shall all be done away;
 Your vassalage abolish'd. A free pardon
 Allow'd to all: So help me God, it shall be.

John Ball. Revenge, my brethren, becoms not Christians:

Send us these terms, sign'd with your seal of state.
 We will await in peace. Deceive us not —
 Act justly, so to excuse your late foul deed.

King. The charter shall be drawn 'out: on mine honour
 All shall be justly done.

ACT III.

SCENE I. Smithfield.

JOHN BALL, PIERS, &c.

Piers. (to John Ball.) You look disturbed, my father.

John Ball. Piers, I am so.

Jack Straw has forced the Tower: seized the Archbishop,
 And beheaded him.

Piers. The curse of insurrection.

John Ball. Ay, Piers, our nobles level down their vassals,

Keep them at endless labour, like their brutes,
 Degrading every faculty by servitude,
 Repressing all the energy of mind:
 We must not wander, then, that, like wild beasts,
 When they have burst their chains, with brutal rage
 They revenge them on their tyrants.

Piers. This Archbishop,
 He was oppressive to his humble vassals:
 Proud, haughty, avaricious —

John Ball. A true high priest,
 Preaching humility with his mitre on;
 Praising up alms and Christian charity,
 Even whilst his unforgiving hand dispos'd
 His honest tenants.

Piers. He deserved his fate, then.
John Ball. Justice can never link with cruelty.
 Is there among the catalogue of crimes

A sin so black that only Death can explete?
 Will Reason never rouse her from her slumbers,
 And darting through the veil her eagle eye,
 See in the sable garments of the law
 Revenge conceal'd? This high priest has been haughty.

He has oppress'd his vassals: tell me, Piers,
 Does his death remedy the ills he caused?
 Were it not better to repress his power
 Of doing wrong, that so his future life
 Might remedy the evils of the past,
 And benefit mankind?

Piers. But must not vice
 Be punish'd?

John Ball. Is not punishment revenge?
 The momentary violence of anger
 May be excus'd; the indignant heart will throb
 Against oppression, and the outstretch'd arm
 Resent its injured feelings. The Collector
 Insulted Alice, and roused the keen emotions
 Of a fond father. Tyler murder'd him.

Piers. Murder'd! — a most harsh word.

John Ball. Yes, murder'd him:
 His mangled feelings prompted the bad act,
 And Nature will almost commend the deed
 That Justice blames: but will the awakened feelings
 Plead with the heart-moving eloquence
 For the calm deliberate murder of Revenge?
 Would you, Piers, in your calmer hour of reason,
 Condemn an erring brother to be slain?
 Cut him at once from all the joys of life,
 All hopes of reformation — to revenge
 The deed his punishment cannot recall?
 My blood boil'd in me at the fate of Tyler,
 Yet I revenged not.

Piers. Oh, my Christian father,
 They would not argue thus humanely on us,
 Were we within their power.

John Ball. I know they would not;
 But we must pity them that they are vicious,
 Nor imitate their vice.

Piers. Alas, Poor Tyler!
 I do repent me much that I stood back,
 When he advanced, fearless in rectitude,
 To meet these royal assassins.

John Ball. Not for myself,
 Though I have lost an honest virtuous friend,
 Mourn I the death of Tyler: he was one
 Gifted with the strong energy of mind,
 Quick to perceive the right, and prompt to act
 When Justice needed: he would listen to me
 With due attention, yet not yielding lightly
 What had to him seem'd good: severe in virtue,
 He awed the ruder people, whom he led,
 By his stern rectitude.

Piers. Witness that day
 When they destroy'd the palace of the Gaunt;
 And hurl'd the wealth his avarice had amass'd
 Amid the fire: the people, fierce in zeal,
 Threw in the flames a wretch whose selfish hand
 Purloin'd amid the tumult.

John Ball. I lament
 The death of Tyler for my country's sake.
 I shudder lest posterity enslaved,
 Should rue his murder. Who shall now controul
 The giddy multitude, blind to their own good,

And listening with avidity to the tale
Of courtly falsehood.

Piers. The King must perform
His plighted promise.
(Cry without.—The Charter;—the Charter.)

Enter Mob and Herald.

Tom Miller. Read it out—read it out.

Hob. Ay, ay, let's hear the Charter.

Herald. Richard Plantagenet, by the grace of God, King of England, Ireland, France, Scotland, and the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, to all whom it may concern,—These presents Whereas our loving subjects have complained to us of the heavy burdens they endure, particularly from our late enacted poll-tax; and whereas they have risen in arms against our officers, and demanded the abolition of personal slavery, vassalage and manorial rights;
we, ever ready in our sovereign mercy to listen to the petitions of our loving subjects, do annul all these grievances

Mob. Hurra! long live the King.

Herald (continues). And do of our royal mercy grant a free pardon to all who may have been anyways concerned in the late insurrection. All this shall be faithfully performed on our royal word, so help us God.—God save the King.

[Loud and repeated shouts

Herald. Now then depart in quiet to your homes.

John Ball. Nay, my good friend, the people will remain

Embodied peaceably, till parliament confirm the royal Charter: tell your King so:
We will await the Charter's confirmation,
Meanwhile comporting ourselves orderly,
As peaceful citizens, not risen in tumult,
But to redress their evils.

[Exit Herald, &c.

Hob. 'Twas well ordered.
I place but little trust in courtly faith.

John Ball. We must remain embodied; else the
Will plunge again in royal luxury, [King
And when the storm of danger is past over,
Forget his promises.

Hob. Ay, like an aguish sinner,
He'll promise to repent, when the fit's on him,
When well recover'd, laugh at his own terrors.

Piers. Oh I am grieved that we must gain so little.
Why are not all these empty ranks abolish'd,
King, slave, and lord, ennobled in MAN.
Are we not equal all?—have you not told me
Equality is the sacred right of man,
Inalienable, though by force withheld?

John Ball. Even so: but, Piers, my frail and fallible judgement

Knows hardly to decide if it be right,
Peaceably to return, content with little,
With this half restitution of our rights,
Or boldly to proceed, through blood and slaughter,
Till we should all be equal and all happy.
I choose the milder way:—perhaps I err'd!

Piers. I fear me! By the mass, the unsteady people
Are flocking homewards—how the multitude Diminishes!

John Ball. Go thou, my son, and stay them.
Carter, do you exert your influence:

All depends upon their stay: my mind is troubled,
And I would fain compose my thoughts for action [Exit Hob and Piers.

Father of mercies! I do fear me much
That I have err'd. Thou gavest my ardent mind
To pierce the mists of superstitious falsehood;—
Gavest me to know the truth. I should have urged it
Through every opposition; now, perhaps,
The seemly voice of pity has deceived me,
And all this mighty movement ends in ruin.
I fear me I have been like the weak leech,
Who, sparing to cut deep, with cruel mercy
Mangles his patient without curing him.

[Great tumult.
What means this tumult? hark! the clang of arms.
God of eternal justice—the false monarch
Has broke his plighted vow.

[Enter Piers wounded.

Piers. Fly, fly, my father—the perjured King,— fly, fly.

John Ball. Nay, nay, my child; I dare abide my fate.

Let me bind up thy wounds.

Piers. 'Tis useless succour.
They seek thy life; fly, fly, my honoured father,
And let me have the hope to sweeten death
That thou at least hast escaped. They are murdering
Our unsuspecting brethren—halt unarm'd,
Trusting too fondly to the tyrant's word,
They were dispersing:—the streets swim with blood.
Oh, save thyself.

[Enter soldiers.

1st Soldier. This is that old seditious heretic.

2d Soldier. And here the young spawn of rebellion;

My orders arn't to spare him. [Stabs Piers.
Come, you old stirrer-up of insurrection,
You bell-wether of the mob—you arn't to die
So easily.

(Mob fly across the stage—the Troops pursue them—tumult increases—loud cries and shouts.

SCENE II.

Westminster Hall.

KING, WALWORTH, PHILNOT, SIR JOHN
TRESILIAN, &c.

Walworth. My liege, 'twas wisely ordered, to destroy

The dunghill rabble, but take prisoner
That old seditious priest. His strange wild notions
Of this equality, when well exposed,
Will create ridicule, and shame the people
Of their late tumults.

Sir John. Ay, there's nothing like
A fair, free, open trial, where the King
Can choose his jury and appoint his judges.

King. Walworth, I must thank you for my deliverance,

'Twas a bold deed to stab him in the parley.
Kneel down, and take a knight, Sir William Walworth.

Enter Messenger.

Messenger. I left them hotly at it. Smithfield smoked

With the rebels' blood ! your troops fought loyally.
There's not a man of them will lend an ear
To pity.

Walsworth. Is John Ball secured ?

Messenger. They have seized him.

Enter Guards with JOHN BALL.

1st Guard. We've brought the old villain.

2d Guard. An old mischief maker —
Why there's fifteen hundred of the mob are killed,
All through his preaching.

Sir John Tr. Prisoner, are you the arch-rebel,
John Ball ?

John Ball. I am John Ball ; but I am not a rebel.
Take ye the name, who, arrogant in strength,
Rebel against the people's sovereignty.

Sir John Tr. John Ball, you are accused of stirring up

The poor deluded people to rebellion ;
Not having the fear of God and of the King
Before your eyes ; of preaching up strange notions,
Heretical and treasonous ; such as saying
That kings have not a right from Heaven to govern ;
That all mankind are equal ; and that rank,
And the distinctions of society,
Ay, and the sacred rights of property,
Are evil and oppressive ; plead you guilty
To this most heavy charge ?

John Ball. If it be guilt,
To preach what you are pleased to call strange notions,
That all mankind as brethren must be equal ;
That privileged orders of society
Are evil and oppressive ; that the right
Of property is a juggle to deceive
The poor whom you oppress ; I plead me guilty.

Sir John Tr. It is against the custom of this court
That the prisoner should plead guilty.

John Ball. Why then put you
The needless question ? Sir Judge, let me save
The vain and empty insult of a trial.
What I have done, that I dare justify.

Sir John Tr. Did you not tell the mob they were oppress'd ;

And preach upon the equality of man ;
With evil intent thereby to stir them up
To tumult and rebellion ?

John Ball. That I told them
That all mankind are equal, is most true :
Ye came as helpless infants to the world ;
Ye feel alike the infirmities of nature ;
And at last moulder into common clay. [earth
Why then these vain distinctions ? — bears not the Food in abundance ? — must your granaries
O'erflow with plenty, while the poor man starves ?
Sir Judge, why sit you there, clad in your furs ;
Why are your cellars stored with choicest wines ?
Your lanterns hung with dainties, while your vassal,
As virtuous, and as able too by nature,
Though by your selfish tyranny deprived
Of mind's improvement, shivers in his rags,
And starves amid the plenty he creates.
I have said this is wrong, and I repeat it —

And there will be a time when this great truth
Shall be confess'd — be felt by all mankind.
The electric truth shall run from man to man,
And the blood-cemented pyramid of greatness
Shall fall before the flash.

Sir John Tr. Audacious rebel ;
How darest thou insult this sacred court,
Blaspheming all the dignities of rank ?
How could the Government be carried on Without the sacred orders of the King
And the nobility ?

John Ball. Tell me, Sir Judge,
What does the Government avail the peasant ?
Would not he plough his field, and sow the corn,
Ay, and in peace enjoy the harvest too ?
Would not the sun shine and the dews descend,
Though neither King nor Parliament existed ?
Do your court politics ought matter him ?
Would he be warring even unto death
With his French neighbours ? Charles and Richard contend,

The people fight and suffer : — think ye, Sirs,
If neither country had been cursed with a chief,
The peasants would have quarrell'd ?

King. This is treason !
The patience of the court has been insulted —
Condemn the foul-mouth'd contumacious rebel.

Sir John Tr. John Ball, whereas you are accused before us

Of stirring up the people to rebellion,
And preaching to them strange and dangerous doctrines ;

And whereas your behaviour to the court
Has been most insolent and contumacious ;
Insulting Majesty — and since you have pleaded Guilty to all these charges ; I condemn you
To death : you shall be hanged by the neck,
But not till you are dead — your bowels open'd —
Your heart torn out, and burnt before your face —
Your traitorous head be severed from your body —
Your body quarter'd, and exposed upon
The city gates — a terrible example —
And the Lord God have mercy on your soul.

John Ball. Why, be it so. I can smile at your vengeance,

For I am arm'd with rectitude of soul.
The truth, which all my life I have divulged,
And am now doom'd in torments to expire for,
Shall still survive. The destined hour must come,
When it shall blaze with sun-surpassing splendour,
And the dark mists of prejudice and falsehood
Fade in its strong effulgence. Flattery's incense
No more shall shadow round the gore-dyed throne ;
That altar of oppression, fed with rites
More savage than the priests of Moloch taught,
Shall be consumed amid the fire of Justice ;
The rays of truth shall emanate around,
And the whole world be lighted.

King. Drag him hence :
Away with him to death ; order the troops
Now to give quarter, and make prisoners —
Let the blood-reeking sword of war be sheathed,
That the law may take vengeance on the rebels,

POEMS CONCERNING THE SLAVE TRADE.

SONNET I.

Hold your mad hands ! for ever on your plain
Must the gorged vulture clog his beak with blood ?
For ever must your Niger's tainted flood,
Roll to the ravenous shark his banquet slain ?
Hold your mad hands ! and learn at length to know,
And turn your vengeance on the common foe,
Yon treacherous vessel and her godless crew !
Let never traders with false pretext fair
Set on your shores again their wicked feet :
With interdict and indignation meet
Repel them, and with fire and sword pursue !
Avarice, the white cadaverous fiend, is there,
Who spreads his toils accursed wide and far,
And for his purveyor calls the demon War.

SONNET II.

Why dost thou beat thy breast and rend thine hair,
And to the deaf sea pour thy frantic cries ?
Before the gale the laden vessel flies ;
The Heavens all-favouring smile, the breeze is fair ;
Hark to the clamours of the exulting crew !
Hark how their cannon mock the patient skies !
Why dost thou shriek, and strain thy red-swoln eyes,
As the white sail is lessening from thy view ?
Go pine in want and anguish and despair,
There is no mercy found in human-kind !
Go, Widow, to thy grave, and rest thee there !
But may the God of Justice bid the wind
Whelm that curst bark beneath the mountain wave,
And bless with liberty and death the Slave !

SONNET III.

Oh, he is worn with toil ! the big drops run
Down his dark cheek ; hold — hold thy merciless hand,
Pale tyrant ! for beneath thy hard command
O'erwearied nature sinks. The scorching sun,
As pitiless as proud Prosperity,
Darts on him his full beams ; gasping he lies
Arraigning with his looks the patient skies,
While that inhuman driver lifts on high
The mangling scourge. O ye who at your ease
Sip the blood-sweetened beverage, thoughts like these Haply ye scorn : I thank thee, gracious God,
That I do feel upon my cheek the glow
Of indignation, when beneath the rod
A sable brother writhes in silent woe.

SONNET IV.

'Tis night : the unrelenting owners sleep
As undisturb'd as Justice ; but no more
The o'erwearied slave, as on his native shore,
Rests on his reedy couch : he wakes to weep.
Though through the toll and anguish of the day
No tear escaped him, not one suffering groan
Beneath the twisted thong, he weeps alone
In bitterness ; thinking that far away
While happy Negroes join the midnight song,
And merriment resounds on Niger's shore,
She whom he loves, far from the cheerful throng
Stands sad, and gazes from her lowly door
With dim-grown eyes, silent and woe-begone,
And weeps for him who will return no more.

SONNET V.

Did then the Negro rear at last the sword
Of vengeance ? Did he plunge its thirsty blade
In the hard heart of his inhuman lord ?
Oh ! who shall blame him ? in the midnight shade
There came on him the intolerable thought
Of every past delight ; his native grove,
Friendship's best joys, and liberty and love,
For ever lost. Such recollections wrought
His brain to madness. Wherefore should he live
Longer with sject patience to endure
His wrongs and wretchedness, when hope can give
No consolation, time can bring no cure ?
But justice for himself he yet could take,
And life is then well given for vengeance' sake.

SONNET VI.

High in the air exposed the slave is hung,
To all the birds of heaven, their living food !
He groans not, though awaked by that fierce sun
New torturers live to drink their parent blood ;
He groans not, though the gorging vulture tear
The quivering fibre. Hither look, O ye
Who tore this man from peace and liberty !
Look hither, ye who weigh with politic care
The gain against the guilt ! Beyond the grave
There is another world ! . . . bear ye in mind,
Ere your decree proclaims to all mankind
The gain is worth the guilt, that there the Slave
Before the Eternal, " thunder-tongued shall plead
Against the deep damnation of your deed."

Bristol, 1794.

TO THE GENIUS OF AFRICA.

O thou, who from the mountain's height
 Rollest thy clouds with all their weight
 Of waters to old Nile's majestic tide;
 Or o'er the dark sepulchral plain
 Recallest Carthage in her ancient pride,
 The mistress of the Main;
 Hear, Genius, hear thy children's cry!
 Not always should'st thou love to brood
 Stern o'er the desert solitude
 Where seas of sand heave their hot surges high;
 Nor, Genius, should the midnight song
 Detain thee in some milder mood
 The palmy plains among,
 Where Gambia to the torches' light
 Flows radiant through the awaken'd night.

Ah, linger not to hear the song!
 Genius, avenge thy children's wrong!
 The demon Avarice on your shore
 Brings all the horrors of his train,
 And hark! where from the field of gore
 Howls the hyena o'er the slain!
 Lo! where the flaming village fires the skies
 Avenging Power, awake! arise!

Arise, thy children's wrongs redress!
 Heed the mother's wretchedness,
 When in the hot infectious air
 O'er her sick babe she bows oppress, . .
 Hear her when the Traders tear
 The suffering infant from her breast!
 Sunk in the ocean he shall rest!
 Hear thou the wretched mother's cries,
 Avenging Power! awake! arise!

By the rank infected air
 That taints those cabins of despair;
 By the scourges blacken'd o'er,
 And stiff and hard with human gore;
 By every groan of deep distress,
 By every curse of wretchedness;
 The vices and the crimes that flow
 From the hopelessness of woe;
 By every drop of blood bespilt,
 By Africa's wrongs and Europe's guilt,
 Awake! arise! avenge!

And thou hast heard! and o'er their blood-fed plains
 Sent thine avenging hurricanes
 And bade thy storms with whirlwind roar
 Dash their proud navies on the shore;
 And where their armies claim'd the fight
 Wither'd the warrior's might;
 And o'er the unholy host with baneful breath,
 There, Genius, thou hast breathed the gales of Death.

THE SAILOR,

WHO HAD SERVED IN THE SLAVE TRADE.

In September, 1798, a Dissenting Minister of Bristol discovered a sailor in the neighbourhood of that city, groaning and praying in a cow-house. The circumstance which occasioned his agony of mind is detailed in the annexed ballad, without the slightest addition or alteration. By presenting it as a Poem the story is made more public, and such stories ought to be made as public as possible.

It was a Christian minister,
 Who, in the month of flowers,
 Walk'd forth at eve amid the fields
 Near Bristol's ancient towers;

When from a lonely out-house breathed,
 He heard a voice of woe,
 And groans which less might seem from pain,
 Than wretchedness to flow;

Heart-rending groans they were, with words
 Of bitterest despair,
 Yet with the holy name of Christ
 Pronounced in broken prayer.

The Christian minister went in,
 A Sailor there he sees,
 Whose hands were lifted up to Heaven,
 And he was on his knees.

Nor did the Sailor so intent
 His entering footsteps heed,
 But now "Our Father" said, and now
 His half-forgotten creed;

And often on our Saviour call'd
 With many a bitter groan,
 But in such anguish as may spring
 From deepest guilt alone.

The miserable man was ask'd
 Why he was kneeling there,
 And what had been the crime that caused
 The anguish of his prayer?

"I have done a cursed thing!" he cried,
 "It haunts me night and day,
 And I have sought this lonely place
 Here undisturb'd to pray.

Aboard I have no place for prayer,
 So I came here alone,
 That I might freely kneel and pray,
 And call on Christ, and groan.

If to the main-mast head I go;
 The Wicked One is there;
 From place to place, from rope to rope,
 He follows every where.

I shut my eyes . . . it matters not .
Still, still the same I see . . .
And when I lie me down at night,
'Tis always day with me !

He follows, follows every where,
And every place is Hell !
O God . . . and I must go with Him
In endless fire to dwell !

He follows, follows every where,
He's still above . . . below !
Oh, tell me where to fly from him !
Oh, tell me where to go !"

" But tell thou," quoth the stranger then,
" What this thy crime hath been,
So haply I may comfort give
To one who grieves for sin."

" O cursed, cursed is the deed !"
The wretched man replies,
" And night and day and every where
'Tis still before my eyes.

I sail'd on board a Guinea-man,
And to the slave-coast went ; . . .
Would that the sea had swallowed me
When I was innocent !

And we took in our cargo there,
Three hundred negro slaves,
And we sail'd homeward merrily
Over the ocean-waves.

But some were sulky of the slaves,
And would not touch their meat,
So therefore we were forced by threats
And blows to make them eat.

One woman, sulkier than the rest,
Would still refuse her food, . . .
O Jesus God ! I hear her cries !
I see her in her blood !

The captain made me tie her up,
And flog while he stood by ;
And then he cursed me if I staid
My hand to hear her cry.

She shriek'd, she groan'd, . . . I could not spare,
For the Captain he stood by ; . . .
Dear God ! that I might rest one night
From that poor creature's cry !

What woman's child a sight like that
Could bear to look upon !
And still the Captain would not spare . . .
But made me still flog on.

She could not be more glad than I
When she was taken down :
A blessed minute ! . . . 'twas the last
That I have ever known !

I did not close my eyes all night,
Thinking what I had done ;
I heard her groans, and they grew faint
Towards the rising sun.

She groan'd and moan'd, but her voice grew
Fainter at morning tide ;
Fainter and fainter still it came
Until at noon she died.

They flung her overboard ; . . . poor wretch
She rested from her pain, . . .
But when . . . O Christ ! O blessed God !
Shall I have rest again !

I saw the sea close over her,
Yet she is still in sight ;
I see her twisting every where ;
I hear her day and night.

Go where I will, do what I can,
The Wicked One I see :
Dear Christ, have mercy on my soul !
O God, deliver me !

Oh give me comfort, if you can !
Oh tell me where to fly !
Oh tell me if there can be hope
For one so lost as I !"

What said the Minister of Christ ?
He bade him trust in Heaven,
And call on Him for whose dear sake
All sins shall be forgiven.

He told him of that precious blood
Which should his guilt efface ;
Told him that none are lost, but they
Who turn from proffer'd grace.

He bade him pray, and knelt with him,
And join'd him in his prayers : . . .
And some who read the dreadful tale
Perhaps will aid with theirs.

VERSES

SPOKEN IN THE THEATRE AT OXFORD,

UPON THE

INSTALLATION OF LORD GRENVILLE.

GRENVILLE, few years have had their course, since last
Exulting Oxford view'd a spectacle
Like this day's pomp; and yet to those who throng'd
These walls, which echo'd then with Portland's praise,
What change hath intervened! The bloom of spring
Is fled from many a cheek, where roseate joy
And beauty bloom'd; the inexorable Grave
Hath claim'd its portion; and the band of youths,
Who then, collected here as in a port
From whence to launch on life's adventurous sea,
Stood on the beach, ere this have found their lots
Of good or evil. Thus the lapse of years,
Evolving all things in its quiet course,
Hath wrought for them; and though those years have seen

Fearful vicissitudes, of wilder change
Than history yet had learnt, or old romance
In wildest mood imagined, yet these too,
Portentous as they seem, not less have risen
Each of its natural cause the sure effect,
All righteously ordain'd. Lo! kingdoms wreck'd,
Thrones overturn'd, built up, then swept away
Like fabrics to the summer clouds, dispersed
By the same breath that heap'd them; rightful kings,
Who, from a line of long-drawn ancestry
Held the transmitted sceptre, to the axe
Bowing the anointed head; or dragg'd away
To eat the bread of bondage; or escaped
Beneath the shadow of Britannia's shield,
There only safe. Such fate have vicious courts,
Statesmen corrupt, and fear-struck policy,
Upon themselves drawn down; till Europe, bound
In iron chains, lies bleeding in the dust,
Beneath the feet of upstart tyranny:
Only the heroic Spaniard, he alone
Yet unsubdued in these degenerate days,
With desperate virtue, such as in old time,
Hallow'd Saguntum and Numantia's name,
Stands up against the oppressor undismay'd.
So may the Almighty bless the noble race,
And crown with happy end their holiest cause

Deem not these dread events the monstrous birth
Of chance! And thou, O England, who dost ride
Serene amid the waters of the flood,
Preserving, even like the Ark of old,
Amid the general wreck, thy purer faith,

Domestic loves, and ancient liberty,
Look to thyself, O England! for be sure,
Even to the measure of thine own desert,
The cup of retribution to thy lips
Shall soon or late be dealt! . . . a thought that well
Might fill the stoutest heart of all thy sons
With awful apprehension. Therefore, they
Who fear the Eternal's justice, bless thy name,
Grenville, because the wrongs of Africa
Cry out no more to draw a curse from Heaven
On England! — for if still the trooping sharks
Track by the scent of death the accursed ship
Freighted with human anguish, in her wake
Pursue the chase, crowd round her keel, and dart
Toward the sound contending, when they hear
The frequent carcass from her guilty deck
Dash in the opening deep, no longer now
The guilt shall rest on England; but if yet
There be among her children, hard of heart
And sear'd of conscience, men who set at nought
Her laws and God's own word, upon themselves
Their sin be visited! . . . the red-cross flag,
Redeem'd from stain so foul, no longer now
Covereth the abomination.

This thy praise,
O Grenville, and while ages roll away
This shall be thy remembrance. Yea, when all
For which the tyrant of these abject times
Hath given his honourable name on earth,
His nights of innocent sleep, his hopes of heaven;
When all his triumphs and his deeds of blood,
The fretful changes of his feverish pride,
His midnight murders and perfidious plots,
Are but a tale of years so long gone by,
That they who read distrust the hideous truth,
Willing to let a charitable doubt
Abate their horror; Grenville, even then
Thy memory will be fresh among mankind;
Africa with all her tongues will speak of thee,
With Wilberforce and Clarkson, he whom Heaven,
To be the apostle of this holy work,
Raised up and strengthen'd, and upheld through all
His arduous toil. To end the glorious task,
That blessed, that redeeming deed was thine:
Be it thy pride in life, thy thought in death,
Thy praise beyond the tomb. The statesman's fame
Will fade, the conqueror's laurel crown grow sere;
Fame's loudest trump upon the ear of Time
Leaves but a dying echo; they alone
Are held in everlasting memory,
Whose deeds partake of heaven. Long ages hence,
Nations unborn, in cities that shall rise
Along the palmy coast, will bless thy name;
And Senegal and secret Niger's shore,
And Calabar, no longer startled then
With sounds of murder, will, like Isis now,
Ring with the songs that tell of Grenville's praise.

BOTANY-BAY ECLOGUES.

"Where a sight shall shuddering sorrow find,
Sad as the ruins of the human mind." — Bowles.

I.

ELINOR.

TIME, Morning. SCENE, The Shore.

ONCE more to daily toil, once more to wear
The livery of shame, once more to search
With miserable task this savage shore !
O thou, who moudest so triumphantly
In yonder Heaven, beginning thy career
Of glory, O thou blessed Sun ! thy beams
Fall on me with the same benignant light
Here, at the farthest limits of the world,
And blasted as I am with infamy,
As when in better years poor Elinor
Gazed on thy glad uprise with eye undimm'd
By guilt and sorrow, and the opening morn
Woke her from quiet sleep to days of peace.
In other occupation then I trod
The beach at eve ; and then when I beheld
The billows as they roll'd before the storm
Burst on the rock and rage, my timid soul
Shrunk at the perils of the boundless deep,
And heaved a sigh for suffering mariners ; . . .
Ah ! little thinking I myself was doom'd
To tempt the perils of the boundless deep,
An outcast, unbelov'd and unbewall'd.

Still wilt thou haunt me, Memory ! still present
The fields of England to my exil'd eyes,
The joys which once were mine. Even now I see
The lowly lovely dwelling ; even now
Behold the woodbine clasping its white walls,
Where fearlessly the red-breasts chirp'd around
To ask their morning meal : and where at eve
I loved to sit and watch the rook sail by
And hear his hollow tone, what time he sought
The church-yard elm, that with its ancient boughs
Full-foiaged, half-conceal'd the house of God ;
That holy house, where I so oft have heard
My father's voice explain the wondrous works
Of Heaven to sinful man. Ah ! little deem'd
His virtuous bosom, that his shameless child
So soon should spurn the lesson, . . . sink, the slave
Of Vice and Infamy, . . . the hireling prey
Of brutal appetite ; — at length worn out
With famine, and the avenging scourge of guilt,
Should share dishonesty, — yet dread to die !

Welcome, ye savage lands, ye barbarous climes,
Where angry England sends her outcast sons,
I hail your joyless shores ! My weary bark,

Long tempest-tost on Life's inclement sea,
Here hails her haven ; welcomes the drear scene,
The marshy plain, the briar-entangled wood,
And all the perils of a world unknown.
For Elinor hath nothing new to fear
From cruel Fortune ; all her rankling shafts
Barb'd with disgrace, and venom'd with disease,
Have pierced my bosom, and the dart of death
Has lost its terrors to a wretch like me.

Welcome, ye marshy heaths, ye pathless woods,
Where the rude native rests his wearied frame
Beneath the sheltering shade ; where, when the storm
Benumbs his naked limbs, he flies to seek
The dripping shelter. Welcome, ye wild plains
Unbroken by the plough, undelved by hand
Of patient rustic ; where for lowing herds,
And for the music of the bleating flocks,
Alone is heard the kangaroo's sad note
Deepening in distance. Welcome, wilderness,
Nature's domain ! for here, as yet unknown
The comforts and the crimes of polish'd life,
Nature benignly gives to all enough,
Denies to all a superfluity.

What though the garb of infamy I wear,
Though day by day along the echoing beach
I gather wave-worn shells ; yet day by day
I earn in honesty my frugal food,
And lay me down at night to calm repose ;
No more condemned, the mercenary tool
Of brutal lust, while heaves the indignant heart
Abhorrent, and self-loathed, to fold my arms
Round the rank felon, and for daily bread
To hug contagion to my poison'd breast !
On these wild shores the saving hand of Grace
Will probe my secret soul, and cleanse its wounds,
And fit the faithful penitent for Heaven.

Oxford, 1794.

II.

HUMPHREY AND WILLIAM.

TIME, Noon.

HUMPHREY.

SAX'ER thou not, William, that the scorching sun
By this time half his daily race hath run ?
The savage thrusts his light canoe to shore,
And hurries homeward with his fishy store.

Suppose we leave awhile this stubborn soil,
To eat our dinner and to rest from toil.

WILLIAM.

Agreed. Yon tree, whose purple gum bestows
A ready medicine for the sick man's woes,
Forms with its shadowy boughs a cool retreat
To shield us from the noontide's sultry heat.
Ah, Humphrey! now upon old England's shore
The weary labourer's morning work is o'er.
The woodman there rests from his measured stroke,
Flings down his axe, and sits beneath the oak;
Savour'd with hunger there he eats his food,
There drinks the cooling streamlet of the wood.
To us no cooling streamlet winds its way,
No joys domestic crown for us the day;
The felon's name, the outcast's garb we wear,
Toll all the day, and all the night despair.

HUMPHREY.

Ay, William! labouring up the furrow'd ground,
I used to love the village clock's old sound,
Rejoice to hear my morning toll was done,
And trudge it homeward when the clock went one.
'Twas ere I turn'd a soldier and a sinner!
Pshaw! curse this whining—let us fall to dinner.

WILLIAM.

I too have loved this hour, nor yet forgot
The household comforts of my little cot,
For at this hour my wife with watchful care
Was wont her humble dainties to prepare;
The keenest sauce by hunger was supplied,
And my poor children prattled at my side.
Methinks I see the old oak table spread,
The clean white trencher, and the good brown bread
The cheese, my daily fare, which Mary made,
For Mary knew full well the housewife's trade;
The jug of cyder,—cyder I could make;—
And then the knives,—I won 'em at the wake.
Another has them now! I toiling here
Look backward like a child, and drop a tear.

HUMPHREY.

I love a dismal story. tell me thine,
Meantime, good Will, I'll listen as I dine;
I too, my friend, can tell a piteous story
When I turn'd hero, how I purchased glory.

WILLIAM.

But, Humphrey, sure thou never canst have known
The comforts of a little home thine own:
A home so snug, so cheerful too, as mine,
'T was always clean, and we could make it fine.
For there King Charles's Golden Rules were seen,
And there—God bless 'em both! the King and Queen.
The pewter plates, our garnish'd chimney's grace,
So bright, that in them you might see your face;
And over all, to frighten thieves, was hung,
Well clean'd, although but seldom used, my gun;
Ah! that damn'd gun! I took it down one morn. . .
A desperate deal of harm they did my corn!
Our testy Squire, too, loved to save the breed,
So covey upon covey ate my seed.
I mark'd the mischievous rogues, and took my aim;
I fired, they fell, and . . . up the keeper came.

That cursed morning brought on my undoing;
I went to prison, and my farm to ruin.
Poor Mary! for her grave the parish paid,
No tombstone tells where her remains are laid!
My children . . my poor boys . .

HUMPHREY.

Come! . . grief is dry . . .

You to your dinner; . . to my story I.
For you, my friend, who happier days have known,
And each calm comfort of a home your own,
This is bad living. I have spent my life
In hardest toil and unavailing strife,
And here, (from forest ambush safe at least,)
To me this scanty pittance seems a feast.
I was a plough-boy once, as free from woes
And blithesome as the lark with whom I rose.
Each evening at return a meal I found;
And though my bed was hard, my sleep was sound.
One Whitsuntide, to go to fair I drest
Like a great pumpkin in my Sunday's best;
A primrose posy in my hat I stuck,
And to the revel went to try my luck.
From show to show, from booth to booth I stray,
See, stare, and wonder all the lvelong day.
A sergeant to the fair recruiting came,
Skill'd in man-catching, to beat up for game;
Our booth he enter'd, and sat down by me; . .
Methinks even now the very scene I see!
The canvass roof, the hog'shead's running store,
The old blind fiddler seated next the door,
The frothy tankard passing to and fro,
And the rude rabble round the puppet-show.
The sergeant eyed me well; the punch-bowl comes,
And as we laugh'd and drank, up struck the drum.
And now he gives a bumper to his wench,
God save the King! and then, God damn the French!
Then tells the story of his last campaign,
How many wounded and how many slain,
Flags flying, cannons roaring, drums a-beating,
The English marching on, the French retreating . .
"Push on . . push on, my lads! they fly before ye,
March on to riches, happiness, and glory!"
At first I wonder'd, by degrees grew bolder,
Then cried, "'Tis a fine thing to be a soldier!"
"Ay, Humphrey!" says the sergeant, . . "that's your name?"
'Tis a fine thing to fight the French for fame!
March to the field, . . knock out a Mounseer's brains,
And pick the scoundrel's pocket for your pains.
Come, Humphrey, come! thou art a lad of spirit;
Rise to a halbert, as I did, . . by merit!
Wouldst thou believe it? even I was once
As thou art now, a plough-boy and a dunce;
But courage rais'd me to my rank. How now, boy!
Shall Hero Humphrey still be Numps the plough-boy?
A proper-shaped young fellow! tall and straight!
Why, thou wert made for glory! . . five feet eight!
The road to riches is the field of fight! . .
Didst ever see a guinea look so bright?
Why regimentals, Numps, would give thee grace,
A hat and feather would become that face;
The girls would crowd around thee to be kiss'd! . .
Dost love a girl?"—"Odd Zounds!" I cried, "I'll list!"

So pass'd the night; anon the morning came,
And off I set a volunteer for fame. [head,
"Back shoulders, turn out your toes, hold up your
"Stand easy!" . . so I did . . till almost dead.
O how I long'd to tend the plough again,
Trudge up the field, and whistle o'er the plain,
When tired and sore, amid the piteous throng,
Hungry, and cold, and wet, I limp'd along,
And growing fainter as I pass'd, and colder,
Cursed that ill hour when I became a soldier!
In town I found the hours more gaily pass,
And time fled swiftly with my girl and glass;
The girls were wondrous kind and wondrous fair,
They soon transferr'd me to the Doctor's care;
The Doctor undertook to cure the evil,
And he almost transferred me to the Devil.
"Twere tedious to relate the dismal story
Of fighting, fasting, wretchedness, and glory.
At last discharged, to England's shores I came,
Pd for my wounds with want instead of fame;
Found my fair friends, and plunder'd as they bade me.
They kiss'd me, coax'd me, robb'd me, and betray'd
me.
Tried and condemn'd, His Majesty transports me,
And here in peace, I thank him, he supports me.
So ends my dismal and heroic story,
And Humphrey gets more good from guilt than glory.

Oxford, 1794

III.

JOHN, SAMUEL, AND RICHARD.

Time, Evening.

JOHN.

'Tis a calm pleasant evening, the light fades away,
And the sun going down has done watch for the day.
To my mind we live wondrous well when transported;
It is but to work, and we must be supported.
Fill the cann, Dick! Success here to Botany Bay!

RICHARD.

Success if you will, . . but God send me away!

JOHN.

You lubberly landmen don't know when you're well!
Hast thou known half the hardships of which I can tell!
The sailor has no place of safety in store;
From the tempest at sea, to the press-gang on shore;
When Roguery rules all the rest of the earth,
God be thank'd, in this corner I've got a good berth.

SAMUEL.

Talk of hardships! what these are the sailor don't know;
'Tis the soldier, my friend, that's acquainted with woe;
Long journies, short halting, hard work, and small pay,
To be pept at like pigeons for sixpence a-day! . .
Thank God I'm safe quarter'd at Botany Bay

JOHN.

Ah! you know but little. I'll wager a pot
I have suffer'd more evils than fell to your lot.
Come, we'll have it all fairly and properly tried,
Tell story for story, and Dick shall decide.

SAMUEL.

Done.

JOHN.

Done. 'Tis a wager, and I shall be winner;
Thou wilt go without grog, Sam, to-morrow at dinner.

SAMUEL.

I was trapp'd by the Sergeant's palavering pretences,
He listed me when I was out of my senses;
So I took leave to-day of all care and all sorrow,
And was drill'd to repentance and reason to-morrow.

JOHN.

I would be a sailor, and plough the wide ocean,
But was soon sick and sad with the billows' commotion,
So the boatwain he sent me aloft on the mast,
And cursed me, and bade me cry there, . . and hold fast!

SAMUEL.

After marching all day, faint and hungry and sore,
I have lain down at night on the swamps of the moor,
Unshelter'd and forced by fatigue to remain,
All chill'd by the wind and benumb'd by the rain.

JOHN.

I have rode out the storm when the billows beat high,
And the red gleaming lightnings flash'd through the dark sky;
When the tempest of night the black sea overcast,
Wet and weary I labour'd, yet sung to the blast.

SAMUEL.

I have march'd, trumpets sounding, drums beating, flags flying,
Where the music of war drown'd the shrieks of the dying;
When the shots whizz'd around me, all dangers defied;
Push'd on when my comrades fell dead at my side;
Drove the foe from the mouth of the cannon away,
Fought, conquer'd, and bled, all for sixpence a-day.

JOHN.

And I too, friend Samuel, have heard the shots rattle!
But we seamen rejoice in the play of the battle;
Though the chain and the grape shot roll splintering around,
With the blood of our messmates though slippery the ground,
The fiercer the fight, still the fiercer we grow,
We heed not our loss so we conquer the foe;
And the hard battle won, if the prize be not sunk,
The Captain gets rich, and the Sailors get drunk.

SAMUEL.

God help the poor soldier when backward he goes,
In disgraceful retreat through a country of foes !
No respite from danger by day or by night,
He is still forced to fly, still o'ertaken to fight ;
Every step that he takes he must battle his way,
He must force his hard meal from the peasant away ;
No rest, and no hope, from all succour afar, . .
God forgive the poor soldier for going to the war !

JOHN.

But what are these dangers to those I have past,
When the dark billows roar'd to the roar of the blast :
When we work'd at the pumps worn with labour and weak,
And with dread still beheld the increase of the leak ?
Sometimes as we rose on the wave could our sight,
From the rocks of the shore catch the light-house's
light ;
In vain to the beach to assist us they press ;
We fire faster and faster our guns of distress ;
Still with rage unabating the wind and waves roar ; . .
How the giddy wreck reels, as the billows burst o'er !
Leap, leap ; for she yawns, for she sinks in the wave !
Call on God to preserve . . for God only can save !

SAMUEL.

There's an end of all troubles, however, at last !
And when I in the waggon of wounded was cast,
When my wounds with the chilly night-wind smarted
sore,
And I thought of the friends I should never see more,
No hand to relieve, scarce a morsel of bread,
Sick at heart I have envied the peace of the dead,
Left to rot in a jail, till by treaty set free,
Old England's white cliffs with what joy did I see !
I had gain'd enough glory, some wounds, but no good,
And was turn'd on the public to shift how I could.
When I think what I've suffer'd, and where I am now,
I curse him who snared me away from the plough.

JOHN.

When I was discharged, I went home to my wife,
There in comfort to spend all the rest of my life.
My wife was industrious, we earn'd what we spent,
And though little we had, were with little content ;
And whenever I listen'd and heard the wind roar,
I bless'd God for my little snug cabin on shore.
At midnight they seized me, they dragged me away,
They wounded me sore when I would not obey, . .
And because for my country I'd ventured my life,
I was dragg'd like a thief from my home and my wife.
Then the fair wind of fortune chapt round in my face,
And want at length drove me to gulf and disgrace.
But all's for the best ; . . on the world's wide sea cast,
I am haven'd in peace in this corner at last.

SAMUEL.

Come, Dick ! we have done . . and for judgement
we call.

RICHARD.

And in faith I can give you no judgement at all ;
But that as you're now settled, and safe from foul weather,
You drink up your grog, and be merry together.

IV.

FREDERIC.

TIME, Night. SCENE, The Woods.

Where shall I turn me ? whither shall I bend
My weary way ? thus worn with toil and faint,
How through the thorny mazes of this wood
Attain my distant dwelling ? That deep cry
That echoes through the forest, seems to sound
My parting knell ! it is the midnight howl
Of hungry monsters prowling for their prey !
Again ! O save me — save me, gracious Heaven !
I am not fit to die !

Thou coward wretch,
Why palpitates thy heart ? why shake thy limbs
Beneath their palsied burthen ? Is there aught
So lovely in existence ? wouldst thou drain
Even to its dregs the bitter draught of life ?
Stamp'd with the brand of Vice and Infamy,
Why should the felon Frederic shrink from Death ?

Death ! Where the magic in that empty name
That chill'd my inmost heart ? Why at the thought
Starts the cold dew of fear on every limb ?
There are no terrors to surround the Grave,
When the calm Mind collected in itself
Surveys that narrow house : the ghastly train
That haunt the midnight of delirious GUILT
Then vanish ; in that home of endless rest
All sorrows cease ! . . Would I might slumber there !

Why then this panting of the fearful heart ?
This miser love of life, that dreads to lose
Its cherish'd torment ? Shall a man diseased
Yield up his members to the surgeon's knife,
Doubtful of succour, but to rid his frame
Of fleshly anguish ; and the coward wretch,
Whose ulcerated soul can know no help,
Shrink from the best Physician's certain aid ?
Oh, it were better far to lie me down
Here on this cold damp earth, till some wild beast
Seize on his willing victim.

If to die

Were all, 'twere sweet indeed to rest my head
On the cold clod, and sleep the sleep of Death.
But if the Archangel's trump at the last hour
Startle the ear of Death, and wake the soul
To frenzy ? . . Dreams of infancy ; fit tales
For garrulous beldames to affrighten babes !
What if I warr'd upon the world ? the world
Had wrong'd me first : I had endured the ill
Of hard injustice ; all this goodly earth
Was but to me one wide waste wilderness ;

I had no share in Nature's patrimony;
 Blasted were all my morning hopes of youth,
 Dark Disappointment followed on my ways,
 Care was my bosom inmate, Penury
 Gnaw'd at my heart. Eternal One, thou know'st
 How that poor heart, even in the bitter hour
 Of lowliest revelry, has inly yearn'd
 For peace.

My Father! I will call on thee,
 Pour to thy mercy-seat my earnest prayer,
 And wait thy righteous will, resign'd of soul.
 O thought of comfort! how the afflicted heart,
 Tired with the tempest of its passions, rests
 On you with holy hope! The hollow howl
 Of yonder harmless tenant of the woods
 Comes with no terror to the sober'd sense.
 If I have sinn'd against mankind, on them
 Be that past sin; they made me what I was.
 In these extremest climes Want can no more

Urge me to deeds of darkness, and at length
 Here I may rest. What though my hut be poor —
 The rains descend not through its humble roof: . . .
 Would I were there again! The night is cold;
 And what if in my wanderings I should rouse
 The savage from his thicket!

Hark! the gun!
 And lo, the fire of safety! I shall reach
 My little hut again! again by toll
 Force from the stubborn earth my sustenance,
 And quicken'd guilt will never start alarm'd
 Amid the well-earn'd meal. This felon's garb . . .
 Will it not shield me from the winds of Heaven?
 And what could purple more? O strengthen me,
 Eternal One, in this serener state!
 Cleanse thou mine heart, so Penitence and Faith
 Shall heal my soul, and my last days be peace.

Oxford, 1794.

SONNETS.

I.

Go, Valentine, and tell that lovely maid
 Whom fancy still will pourtray to my sight,
 How here I linger in this sullen shade,
 This dreary gloom of dull monastic night;
 Say, that from every joy of life remote
 At evening's closing hour I quit the throng,
 Listening in solitude the ring-dove's note,
 Who pours like me her solitary song;
 Say, that her absence calls the sorrowing sigh;
 Say, that of all her charms I love to speak,
 In fancy feel the magic of her eye,
 In fancy view the smile illumine her cheek,
 Court the lone hour when silence stills the grove,
 And heave the sigh of memory and of love.

1794.

II.

THINK, Valentine, as speeding on thy way
 Homeward thou hastest light of heart along,
 If heavily creep on one little day
 The medley crew of travellers among,
 Think on thine absent friend; reflect that here
 On life's sad journey comfortless he roves,
 Remote from every scene his heart holds dear,
 From him he values, and from her he loves.
 And when, disgusted with the vain and dull
 Whom chance companions of thy way may doom,
 Thy mind, of each domestic comfort full,
 Turns to itself and meditates on home,
 Ah, think what cares must ache within his breast
 Who loathes the road, yet sees no home of rest.

1794.

III.

Nor to thee, Bedford, mournful is the tale
 Of days departed. Time in his career
 Arraigns not thee that the neglected year
 Hath past unheeded onward. To the vale
 Of years thou journeyest; may the future road
 Be pleasant as the past; and on my friend
 Friendship and Love, best blessings, still attend,
 Till full of days he reach the calm abode
 Where Nature slumbers. Lovely is the age
 Of virtue; with such reverence we behold
 The silver hairs, as some grey oak grown old
 That whilome mock'd the rushing tempest's rage,
 Now like a monument of strength decay'd,
 With rarely-sprinkled leaves casting a trembling shade.

1794.

IV. CORSTON.

As thus I stand beside the murmuring stream
 And watch its current, memory here pourtrays
 Scenes faintly form'd of half-forgotten days,
 Like far-off woodlands by the moon's bright beam
 Dimly descried, but lovely. I have worn
 Amid these haunts the heavy hours away,
 When childhood idled through the Sabbath-day;
 Risen to my tasks at winter's earliest morn;
 And when the summer twilight darken'd here,
 Thinking of home, and all of heart forlorn,
 Have sigh'd and shed in secret many a tear.
 Dream-like and indistinct those days appear,
 As the faint sounds of this low brooklet, borne
 Upon the breeze, reach fitfully the ear.

1794.

V. THE EVENING RAINBOW.

MILD arch of promise, on the evening sky
 Thou shinest fair with many a lovely ray
 Each in the other melting. Much mine eye
 Delights to linger on thee; for the day,
 Changeful and many-weather'd, seem'd to smile
 Flashing brief splendour through the clouds awhile,
 Which deepen'd dark anon and fell in rain:
 But pleasant is it now to pause, and view
 Thy various tints of frill and watery hue,
 And think the storm shall not return again.
 Such is the smile that Piety bestows
 On the good man's pale cheek, when he, in peace
 Departing gently from a world of woes,
 Anticipates the world where sorrows cease.

1794.

VI.

WITH many a weary step, at length I gain
 Thy summit, Lansdown; and the cool breeze plays
 Gratefully round my brow, as hence I gaze
 Back on the fair expanse of yonder plain.
 'Twas a long way and tedious; to the eye
 Though fair the extended vale, and fair to view
 The autumnal leaves of many a faded hue,
 That eddy in the wild gust moaning by.
 Even so it fared with life: in discontent
 Restless through Fortune's mingled scenes I went...
 Yet wept to think they would return no more.
 But cease, fond heart, in such sad thoughts to roam;
 For surely thou ere long shalt reach thy home,
 And pleasant is the way that lies before.

1794.

VII.

FAIR is the rising morn when o'er the sky
 The orient sun expands his roseate ray,
 And lovely to the musing poet's eye
 Fades the soft radiance of departing day;
 But fairer is the smile of one we love,
 Than all the scenes in Nature's ample sway,
 And sweeter than the music of the grove,
 The voice that bids us welcome. Such delight,
 EDITH! is mine, escaping to thy sight
 From the cold converse of the indifferent throng:
 Too swiftly then toward the silent night,
 Ye hours of happiness, ye speed along,
 Whilst I, from all the world's dull cares apart,
 Pour out the feelings of my burthen'd heart.

1794.

VIII.

How darkly o'er yon far-off mountain frowns
 The gather'd tempest! from that lurid cloud
 The deep-voiced thunders roll, awful and loud
 Though distant; while upon the misty downs
 Fast falls in shadowy streaks the pelting rain.
 I never saw so terrible a storm!
 Perhaps some way-worn traveller in vain
 Wraps his thin raiment round his shivering form,
 Cold even as hope within him. I the while
 Pause here in sadness, though the sun-beams smile
 Cheerly round me. Ah! that thus my lot
 Might be with Peace and Solitude assign'd,
 Where I might from some little quiet cot
 Sigh for the crimes and miseries of mankind.

1794.

IX.

O THOU sweet Lark, who in the heaven so high
 Twinkling thy wings dost sing so joyfully,
 I watch thee soaring with a deep delight,
 And when at last I turn mine aching eye
 That lags below thee in the Infinite,
 Still in my heart receive thy melody.
 O thou sweet Lark, that I had wings like thee!
 Not for the joy it were in yon blue light
 Upward to mount, and from my heavenly height
 Gaze on the creeping multitude below;
 But that I soon would wing my eager flight
 To that loved home where Fancy even now
 Hath fled, and Hope looks onward through a tear,
 Counting the weary hours that hold her here.

1798.

X.

THOU lingerest, Spring! still wintry is the scene,
 The fields their dead and sapless russet wear;
 Scarce doth the glossy celandine appear
 Starring the sunny bank, or early green
 The elder yet its circling tufts put forth.
 The sparrow tenants still the eaves-built nest
 Where we should see our martin's snowy breast
 Oft darting out. The blasts from the bleak north
 And from the keener east still frequent blow.
 Sweet Spring, thou lingerest; and it should be so...
 Late let the fields and gardens blossom out!
 Like man when most with smiles thy face is drest,
 'Tis to deceive, and he who knows ye best,
 When most ye promise, ever most must doubt.

Westbury, 1799.

XI.

BEWARE a speedy friend, the Arabian said,
 And wisely was it he advised distrust:
 The flower that blossoms earliest fades the first.
 Look at yon Oak that lifts its stately head,
 And dallies with the autumnal storm, whose rage
 Tempests the great sea-waves; slowly it rose,
 Slowly its strength increased through many an age,
 And timbly did its light leaves disclose,
 As doubtful of the spring, their palest green.
 They to the summer cautiously expand,
 And by the warmer sun and season bland
 Matured, their foliage in the grove is seen,
 When the bare forest by the wintry blast
 Is swept, still lingering on the boughs the last.

1798.

XII. To a Goose.

If thou didst feed on western plains of yore;
 Or waddle wide with fat and flabby feet
 Over some Cambrian mountain's plashy moor;
 Or find in farmer's yard a safe retreat
 From gipsy thieves, and foxes aly and fleet;
 If thy grey quills, by lawyer guided, trace
 Deeds big with ruin to some wretched race,
 Or love-sick poet's sonnet, sad and sweet,
 Walling the rigour of his lady fair;
 Or if, the drudge of housemaid's daily toil,
 Cobwebs and dust thy pinions white besoil,
 Departed Goose! I neither know nor care.
 But this I know, that we pronounced thee fine,
 Season'd with sage and onions, and port wine.

London, 1798.

XIII.

I MARVEL not, O Sun ! that unto thee
In adoration man should bow the knee,
And pour his prayers of mingled awe and love ;
For like a God thou art, and on thy way
Of glory sheddest with benignant ray,
Beauty, and life, and joyance from above.
No longer let these mists thy radiance shroud,
These cold raw mists that chill the comfortless day ;
But shed thy splendour through the opening cloud
And cheer the earth once more. The languid flowers
Lie scentless, beaten down with heavy rain ;
Earth asks thy presence, saturate with showers ;
O Lord of Light ! put forth thy beams again,
For damp and cheerless are the gloomy hours.

Westbury, 1799.

XIV.

FAIR be thy fortunes in the distant land,
Companion of my earlier years and friend !
Go to the Eastern world, and may the hand
Of Heaven its blessing on thy labour send.
And may I, if we ever more should meet,
See thee with affluence to thy native shore
Return'd : . . I need not pray that I may greet
The same untainted goodness as before.
Long years must intervene before that day ;
And what the changes Heaven to each may send,
It boots not now to bode : O early friend !
Assured, no distance e'er can wear away
Esteem long rooted, and no change remove
The dear remembrance of the friend we love.

1798.

XV.

A WRINKLED, crabbed men they picture thee,
Old Winter, with a rugged beard as grey
As the long moss upon the apple-tree ;
Blue-lipt, an ice-drop at thy sharp blue nose,
Close muffled up, and on thy dreary way,
Flooding alone through sleet and drifting snows.
They should have drawn thee by the high-heap'd hearth,
Old Winter ! seated in thy great arm'd chair,
Watching the children at their Christmas mirth ;
Or circled by them as thy lips declare
Some merry jest or tale of murder dire,
Or troubled spirit that disturbs the night,
Pausing at times to rouse the mouldering fire,
Or taste the old October brown and bright.

Westbury, 1799.

XVI.

PORLOCK, thy verdant vale so fair to sight,
Thy lofty hills which fern and furze embrown,
The waters that roll musically down
Thy woody glens, the traveller with delight
Recalls to memory, and the channel grey
Circling its surges in thy level bay.
Porlock, I also shall forget thee not,
Here by the unwelcome summer rain confined ;
But often shall hereafter call to mind
How here, a patient prisoner, 'twas my lot
To wear the lonely, lingering close of day,
Making my Sonnet by the alehouse fire,
Whilst Idleness and Solitude inspire
Dull rhymes to pass the duller hours away.

August 9. 1799.

XVII.

STATELY yon vessel sails adown the tide,
To some far distant land adventurous bound ;
The sailors' busy cries from side to side
Pealing among the echoing rocks resound :
A patient, thoughtless, much-enduring band,
Joyful they enter on their ocean way,
With shouts exulting leave their native land,
And know no care beyond the present day.
But is there no poor mourner left behind,
Who sorrows for a child or husband there ?
Who at the howling of the midnight wind
Will wake and tremble in her boding prayer ?
So may her voice be heard, and Heaven be kind !
Go, gallant Ship, and be thy fortune fair !

Westbury, 1799.

XVIII.

O God ! have mercy in this dreadful hour
On the poor mariner ! in comfort here
Safe shelter'd as I am, I almost fear
The blast that rages with resistless power.
What were it now to toss upon the waves,
The madden'd waves, and know no succour near ;
The howling of the storm alone to hear.
And the wild sea that to the tempest raves ;
To gaze amid the horrors of the night
And only see the billow's gleaming light ;
Then in the dread of death to think of her
Who, as she listens sleepless to the gale,
Puts up a silent prayer and waxes pale ? . . .
O God ! have mercy on the mariner !

Westbury, 1799.

XIX.

SHE comes majestic with her swelling sails,
The gallant Ship ; along her watery way
Homeward she drives before the favouring gales ;
Now flirting at their length the streamers play,
And now they ripple with the ruffling breeze.
Hark to the sailors' shouts ! the rocks rebound,
Thundering in echoes to the joyful sound.
Long have they voyaged o'er the distant seas,
And what a heart-delight they feel at last,
So many toils, so many dangers past,
To view the port desired, he only knows
Who on the stormy deep for many a day
Hath tost, aweary of his watery way,
And watch'd, all anxious, every wind that blows.

Westbury, 1799.

XX.

FAREWELL my home, my home no longer now,
Witness of many a calm and happy day ;
And thou fair eminence, upon whose brow
Dwells the last sunshine of the evening ray,
Farewell ! These eyes no longer shall pursue
The western sun beyond the farthest height,
When slowly he forsakes the fields of light.
No more the freshness of the falling dew,
Cool and delightful, here shall bathe my head,
As from this western window dear, I lean,
Listening, the while I watch the placid scene,
The martins twittering underneath the shed.
Farewell, dear home ! whose many a day has past
In joys whose loved remembrance long shall last.

Westbury, 1799.

MONODRAMAS.

SAPPHO.

Scene, The Promontory of Leucadia.

THIS is the spot: 'tis here tradition says
That hopeless Love from this high towering rock
Leaps headlong to oblivion or to Death.
Oh, 'tis a giddy height! my dizzy head
Swims at the precipice! 'tis death to fall!

Lie still, thou coward heart! this is no time
To shake with thy strong throbs the frame convulsed.
To die,—to be at rest,—oh, pleasant thought!
Perchance to leap and live; the soul all still,
And the wild tempest of the passions hush'd
In one deep calm: the heart, no more diseased
By the quick ague fits of hope and fear,
Quietly cold!

Presiding Powers, look down!
In vain to you I pour'd my earnest prayers,
In vain I sung your praises: chiefly thou,
Venus! ungrateful Goddess, whom my lyre
Hymn'd with such full devotion. Lesbian groves,
Witness how often, at the languid hour
Of summer twilight, to the melting song
Ye gave your choral echoes! Grecian maids,
Who hear with downcast look and flushing cheek,
That lay of love, bear witness! and ye youths,
Who hang enraptured on the impassion'd strain,
Gazing with eloquent eye, even till the heart
Sinks in the deep delirium! And ye, too,
Ages unborn! bear witness ye, how hard
Her fate who hymn'd the votive hymn in vain!
Ungrateful Goddess! I have hung my lute
In yonder holy pile; my hand no more
Shall wake the melodies that fall'd to move
Obdurate Phæon!... yet when rumour tells
How from Leucadia Sappho cast herself,
A self-devoted victim, . . . he may melt
Too late in pity, obstinate to love.

Oh! haunt his midnight dreams, black Nemeis!
Whom I, self-conceiving in the inmost depths
Of Chaos, blackest Night long-labouring bore,
When the stern Destinies, her elder brood,
And shapeless Death, from that more monstrous birth
Leapt shuddering: Haunt his slumbers, Nemeis!
Scorch with the fires of Phlegethon his heart,
Till helpless, hopeless, heaven-abandon'd wretch,
He too shall seek beneath the unfathom'd deep
To hide him from thy fury.

How the sea

Herod.

Far distant glitters as the sun-beams smile,
And gaily wanton o'er its heaving breast!
Phæbus shines forth, nor wears one cloud to mourn
His votary's sorrows. God of Day shine on! . .
By man despised, forsaken by the Gods,
I supplicate no more.

How many a day,
O pleasant Lesbos! in thy secret streams
Delighted have I plunged, from the hot sun
Screen'd by the o'er-arching grove's delightful shade,
And pillow'd on the waters! Now the waves
Shall chill me to repose.

Tremendous height!
Scarce to the brink will these rebellious limbs
Support me. Hark! how the rude deep below
Roars round the rugged base, as if it call'd
Its long reluctant victim! I will come! . .
One leap, and all is over! The deep rest
Of death, or tranquil apathy's dead calm,
Welcome alike to me. Away, vain fears!
Phæon is cold, and why should Sappho live!
Phæon is cold, or with some fairer one . . .
Thought worse than death!

XIMALPOCA.

The story of this Mexican King is related by Torquemada in his Monarquía Indiana, l. ii. c. 28. and by the Abate Clavigero, Storia Antica del Messico, t. i. l. iii. p. 199. The sacrifice was not completed; a force sent by his enemy arrived in time to prevent the catastrophe; he was carried off captive, and destroyed himself in prison.

Scene, The Temple of Mexitli.

SUBJECTS! friends! children! I may call you children,
For I have ever borne a father's love
Towards you; it is thirteen years since first
You saw me in the robes of royalty, . .
Since here the multitudes of Mexico
Hail'd me their King. I thank you, friends, that now,
In equal numbers and with equal love,
You come to grace my death.

For thirteen years
What I have been, ye know: that with all care,
That with all justness and all gentleness,
Seeking your weal, I govern'd. Is there one
Whom I have injured? one whose just redress
I have denied, or baffled by delay?

Let him come forth, that so no evil tongue
Speak shame of me hereafter. O my people,
Not by my sins have I drawn down upon me
The wrath of Heaven.

The wrath is heavy on me !

Heavy ! a burthen more than I can bear !
I have endured contempt, insult, and wrongs
From that Acolhuan tyrant. Should I seek Revenge ? alas, my people, we are few, . .
Feeble our growing state ; it hath not yet
Rooted itself to bear the hurricane ;
It is the lion-cub that tempts not yet
The tyger's full-aged fury. Mexicans,
He sent to bid me wear a woman's robe ; . .
When was the day that ever I look'd back
In battle ? Mexicans, the wife I loved,
To faith and friendship trusted, in despite
Of me, of heaven, he seiz'd, and spurn'd her back
Polluted ! . . Coward villain ! and he lurks
Behind his armies and his multitudes,
And mocks my idle wrath ! . . It is not fit . .
It is not possible that I should live !
Live ! and deserve to be the finger-mark
Of slave-contempt ! . . His blood I cannot reach,
But in my own all stains may be effaced ;
It shall blot out the marks of infamy,
And when the warriors of the days to come
Tell of Ximalpoca, it shall be said
He died the brave man's death !

Not of the God

Unworthy, do I seek his altar thus,
A voluntary victim. And perchance
The sacrifice of life may profit ye,
My people, though all living efforts fail'd
By fortune, not by fault.

Cease your lament !

And if your ill-doom'd King deserved your love,
Say of him to your children, he was one
Who bravely bore misfortune ; who, when life
Became dishonour, shook his body off,
And join'd the spirits of the heroes dead.
Yes ! not in Miclantecutli's dark abode
With cowards shall your King receive his doom :
Not in the icy caverns of the North
Suffer through endless ages. He shall join
The Spirits of the brave, with them at morn
Shall issue from the eastern gate of Heaven,
And follow through his fields of light the Sun ;
With them shall raise the song and weave the dance ;
Sport in the stream of splendour ; company
Down to the western palace of his rest
The Prince of Glory ; and with equal eye
Endure his center'd radiance. Not of you
Forgetful, O my people, even then ;
But often in the amber cloud of noon
Diffused, will I o'erspread your summer fields,
And on the freshen'd maize and brightening meads
Shower plenty.

Spirits of my vallant Sires,

I come ! Mexitli, never at thy shrine
Flow'd braver blood ; never a nobler heart
Steam'd up to thee its life ! Priests of the God,
Perform your office !

Westbury, 1796.

THE WIFE OF FERGUS.

Fergusius 3. perit veneno ab uxore dato. Alii scribunt cum uxor saepe exprobrasset ei matrimonii contemptum et pellicum greges, neque quicquam profecisset, tandem noctu dormientem ab ea strangulatum. Questione de morte ejus habita, cum amicorum plurimi insinularentur, nec quisquam ne in gravissimis quidem tormentis quicquam fateretur, mulier, alloqui ferocem, et innoxiorum caput miseram, in medium processit, ac e superiore loco eadem a se factum confessa, ne ad ludibrium superasset, pectus cultro transfodit : quod ejus factum varie pro cujusque ingenio est acceptum, ac perinde sermonibus celebratum. — Buchanan.

Scene, The Palace Court. The Queen speaking from the Battlements.

CEASE . . cease your torments ! spare the sufferers !
Scotchmen, not theirs the deed ; . . the crime was mine.
Mine is the glory.

Idle threats ! I stand
Secure. All access to these battlements
Is barr'd beyond your sudden strength to force ;
And lo ! the dagger by which Fergus died !

Shame on ye, Scotchmen, that a woman's hand
Was left to do this deed ! Shame on ye, Thanes,
Who with slave-patience have so long endured
The wrongs, and insolence of tyranny !
Cowardly race ! . . that not a husband's sword
Smote that adulterous King ! that not a wife
Revenge'd her own pollution ; in his blood
Wash'd herself pure, and for the sin compell'd
Atoned by righteous murder ! . . O my God !
Of what beast-matter hast thou moulded them
To bear with wrongs like these ? There was a time
When if the Bard had feign'd you such a tale,
Your eyes had throb'd with anger, and your hand,
In honest instinct would have grasp'd the sword.
O miserable men, who have disgraced
Your fathers, whom your sons must blush to name !

Ay, . . ye can threaten me ! ye can be brave
In anger to a woman ! one whose virtue
Upbraids your coward vice ; whose name will live
Honour'd and praised in song, when not a hand
Shall root from your forgotten monuments
The cankering moss. Fools ! fools ! to think that death
Is not a thing familiar to my mind ;
As if I knew not what must consummate
My glory ! as if aught that earth can give
Could tempt me to endure the load of life ! . .
Scotchmen ! ye saw when Fergus to the altar
Led me, his maiden Queen. Ye blest me then, . .
I heard you bless me, . . and I thought that Heaven
Had heard you also, and that I was blest ;
For I loved Fergus. Bear me witness, God !
With what a heart and soul sincerity
My lips pronounced the unrecallable vow
That made me his, his mine ; bear witness, Thou !
Before whose throne I this day must appear

Stain'd with his blood and mine! My heart was his, ..
His in the strength of all its first affections.
In all obedience, in all love, I kept
Holy my marriage-vow. Behold me, Thanes!
Time hath not changed the face on which his eye
So often dwelt, when with assiduous care
He sought my love, with seeming truth, for one,
Sincere herself, impossible to doubt.
Time hath not changed that face!.. I speak not now
With pride of beauties that will feed the worm
To-morrow; but with honest pride I say,
That if the truest and the purest love
Deserved requital, such was ever mine.
How often reeking from the adulterous bed
Have I received him! and with no complaint.
Neglect and insult, cruelty and scorn,
Long, long did I endure, and long curb down
The indignant nature.

Tell your countrymen,
Scotchmen, what I have spoken! Say to them
Ye saw the Queen of Scotland lift the dagger
Red from her husband's heart, that in her own
She plunged it. [Stabs herself.]

Tell them also, that she felt
No guilty fear in death.

LUCRETIA.

Scene, The House of Collatine.

WELCOME, my father! good Valerius,
Welcome! and thou too, Brutus! ye were both
My wedding guests, and fitly ye are come.
My husband... Collatine... alas! no more
Lucretia's husband, for thou shalt not clasp
Pollution to thy bosom... hear me on!
For I must tell thee all.

I sat at eve
Spinning amid my maidens as I wont,
When from the camp at Ardea Sextus came.
Curb down thy swelling feelings, Collatine!
I little liked the man! yet, for he came
From Ardea, for he brought me news of thee,
I gladly gave him welcome; gladly listen'd,
Thou canst not tell how gladly... to his tales
Of battles, and the long and perilous siege;
And when I laid me down at night to sleep,
'Twas with a lighten'd heart... I knew thee safe,
My visions were of thee.

Nay, hear me out!
And be thou wise in vengeance, so thy wife
Not vainly shall have suffer'd. I have wrought
My soul up to the business of this hour,
That it may stir your noble spirits, and prompt
Such glorious deeds that ages yet unborn
Shall bless my fate. At midnight I awoke,
The Tarquin was beside me! O my husband,
Where wert thou then! go! was my rebel strength...
All power of utterance gone! astonish'd, stunn'd,

I saw the coward ruffian, heard him urge
His wicked slift, and bid me tamely yield...
Yield to dishonour. When he proffer'd death...
Oh, I had leapt to meet the merciful sword?
But that with most accursed vows he vow'd,
That he would lay a dead slave by my side,
Murdering my spotless honour... Collatine,
From what an anguish have I rescued thee!
And thou, my father, wretched as thou art,
Thou miserable, childless, poor old man...
Think, father, what that agony had been!
Now thou may'st sorrow for me, thou may'st bless
The memory of thy poor, polluted child.

Look if it have not kindled Brutus' eye:
Mysterious man! at last I know thee now,
I see thy dawning glories!.. to the grave
Not unrevenged Lucretia shall descend;
Not always shall her wretched country wear
The Tarquin's yoke! Ye will deliver Rome,
And I have comfort in this dreadful hour.

Thinkest thou, my husband, that I dreaded death?
O Collatine! the weapon that had gored
My bosom had been ease, been happiness...
Elysium, to the hell of his hot grasp.
Judge if Lucretia could have fear'd to die!

[Stabs herself.]

LA CABA.

This monodrama was written several years before the author had any intention of treating at greater length the portion of Spanish history to which it relates. It is founded upon the following passage in the Historia Verdadera del Rey Don Rodrigo, which Miguel de Luna translated from the Arabic.

"Aviendose despedido en la ciudad de Cordoba el Conde Don Julian de aquellos Generales, recogió toda su gente, deudos y criados; y porque sus tierras estaban tan perdidas y maltratadas, se fue á un lugar pequeño, que está fabricado en la ribera del mar Mediterraneo, en la provincia que llaman Vandalucia, á la qual nombraron los Christianos en su lengua Villaviciosa. Y aviendo llegado á ella, dió orden de embiar por su muger, y hija, que estaban detenidas en aquellas partes de Africa, en una ciudad que está en la ribera del mar, la qual se llama Tanjer, para desde allí aguardar el suceso de la conquista de España en que avia de parar: las quales llegaron en aquella villa, el Conde D. Julian las recibió con mucho contento, porque tenia bien sentida su larga ausencia. Y aviendo descansado, desde allí el Conde dá orden con mucha diligencia para poblar y restaurar sus tierras, para ir á vivir á ellas. Su hija estava muy triste y afligida; y por mucho que su padre y madre la regalavan, nunca la podian contentar, ni alegrar. Imaginava la grande pérdida de España, y la grande destrucción de los Christianos, con tantas muertes, y cautiverios, robadas sus haciendas, y que ella huviesse sido causa principal, cabera, y ocasion de aquella perdicion; y sobre todo ella la granan mas sus pesadumbres en verse deshonrada, y sin esperansa de tener estado, segun ella deseava. Con esta imaginacion, sugañada del demonio, determinó entresí de morir desesperada; y un día se subió á una torre, cerrando la puerta della por dentro, porque no fuese estorvada de aquel hecho que quería hazer; y dixo á una ama suya, que le llamasse á su padre y madre, que les quería desir un poco. Y siendo venidos, desde lo alto de aquella torre les hizo un razonamiento muy lastimoso, diciéndoles al fin dcl, que muger tan desdichada como ella era, y tan desventurada, no merecia vivir en el mundo con tanta deshonra, mayormente aviendo sido causa de tanto mal y destrucion. Y luego les dixo, Padres, en memoria de mi desdicha, de aqui adelante no se llame esta ciudad, Villaviciosa, sino Malaca; Oy se acaba en ella la mas mala muger que huvo en el mundo. Y acabadas estas palabras, sin mas oír á sus padres, ni á nadie de los que estavan presentes, por muchos ruegos que la hizieron, y amonestaciones que no se echase abaxo, se dexó caer en el suelo; y llevada medio muerta, vivió como tres dias, y luego murió. — Fue causa este desastre y desesperacion de mucho escandalo, y notable memoria, entre los Moros y Christianos: y desde alle adelante se llamo aquella ciudad Malaga corruptamente por los Christianos; y de los Arabes fue llamada Malaca, en memoria de aquellas palabras que dixo quando se echó de la torre, no se llame Villaviciosa, sino Malaca, porque ca, en lenguaje Español quiere desir porque; y porque dixo, ca, oy se acaba en ella la mas mala muger que huvo en el mundo, se compuso este nombre de Mala y ca." — Cap. xviii. pp. 81. 83.

Bleda, who has incorporated Miguel de Luna's story in his Cronica de los Moros de España, pp. 193, 194., has the following curious passage concerning La Caba.

"Fue la hermosa desta dama no menos dafiosa á España, que la de Elena á Troya. Llamaronla los Moros por mal nombre La Cava; y nota el Padre Fray Estevan de Salazar, Cartuxo, en los discursos doctísimos sobre el Credo, que esto no fue sin mysterio: porque el nombre de nuestra primera madre en el Hebreo no se pronuncia Eva, sino Cavah: de suerte que tuvieron un mesmo nombre dos mugeres que fueron ruyna de los hombres, la una en todo el mundo, y la otra en España." — Bleda, p. 146.

Morales supposes that the Gate at Malaga derived its name not from the death of La Caba, but from her having passed through it on her way to Africa.

"En Malaga he visto la puerta en el muro, que llaman de La Cava, y dicen le quedó aquel nombre, habiendo salido esta vez por ella embarcarse. Y la gran desventura que luego sucedió, dexó tristemente notable aquel lugar." — Morales, l. xli. cap. lxvii. § 4.

The very different view which I have taken of this subject when treating it upon a great scale, renders it proper to substitute for Julian in this earlier production the name of Illan, for which the Cronica de España affords authority, and to call his daughter as she is named in that spirited Ode by F. Luis de Leon, of which a good translation may be found in Russell's poems.

FATHER! Count Illan! here — what here. I say, — Aloft . . . look up! . . . ay, father, here I stand, Safe of my purpose now! The way is barr'd; — Thou need'st not hasten hither! — Ho! Count Illan, I tell thee I have barr'd the battlements! I tell thee that no human power can curb A desperate will. The poison and the knife . . . These thou couldst wrest from me; but here I stand Beyond thy thrall; free mistress of myself. Though thou hadst wings thou could'st not overtake My purpose. I command my destiny. Would I stand dallying on Death's threshold here, If it were possible that hand of man Could pluck me back?

Why didst thou bring me here
To set my foot, reluctant as I was,
On this most injured and unhappy land?
Yonder in Afric . . . on a foreign shore,
I might have linger'd out my wretched life . . .
I might have found some distant lurking place,
Where my accursed tale was never known;
Where Gothic speech would never reach my ear, —
Where among savages I might have fled
The leprous curse of infamy! But here —
In Spain, — in my own country; — night and morn
Where all good people curse me in their prayers;
Where every Moorish accent that I hear
Doth tell me of my country's overthrow,
Doth stab me like a dagger to the soul;
Here — here — in desolated Spain, whose fields
Yet reek to Heaven with blood, — whose slaughter'd sons

Lie rotting in the open light of day,
My victims; — said I mine? Nay — nay, Count Illan,
They are thy victims! at the throne of God
Their spirits call for vengeance on thy head;
Their blood is on thy soul, — even I, myself,
I am thy victim too, — and this death more
Must yet be placed in Hell to thy account.

O my dear Country! O my mother Spain!
My cradle and my grave! — for thou art dear,
And nurst to thy undoing as I was,
Still, still I am thy child — and love thee still;
I shall be written in thy chronicles
The veryest wretch that ever yet betray'd
Her native land! From sire to son my name
Will be transmitted down for infamy! —
Never again will mother call her child
La Caba, — an Iscariot curse will lie
Upon the name, and children in their songs
Will teach the rocks and hills to echo with it
Strumpet and traitress!

This is thy work, father!
Nay, tell me not my shame is wash'd away —
That all this ruin and this misery
Is vengeance for my wrongs. I ask'd not this, —
I call'd for open, manly, Gothic vengeance.
Thou wert a vassal, and thy villain lord
Most falsely and most foully broke his faith;
Thou wert a father, and the lustful king
By force abused thy child; — Thou hadst a sword,
Shame on thee to call in the scymetar
To do thy work! Thou wert a Goth — a Christian —
Son of an old and honourable house, —
It was my boast, my proudest happiness,
To think I was the daughter of Count Illan.
Fool that I am to call this African
By that good name! Oh do not spread thy hands
To me! — and put not on that father's look!
Moor! turbaned misbeliever! renegade!
Circumcised traitor! Thou Count Illan, Thou!
Thou my dear father? — cover me, O Earth!
Hell hide me from the knowledge!

THE AMATORY POEMS OF ABEL SHUFFLEBOTTOM.

SONNET I.

DELIA AT PLAY.

SHE held a Cup and Ball of ivory white,
Less white the ivory than her snowy hand !
 Enrapt, I watch'd her from my secret stand,
 As now, intent, in innocent delight,
 Her taper fingers twirl'd the giddy ball,
 Now tost it, following still with eagle sight,
 Now on the pointed end isfix'd its fall.
 Marking her sport I mused, and musing sigh'd,
 Methought the ball she play'd with was my heart;
 (Alas ! that sport like that should be her pride !)
 And the keen point which stedfast still she eyed
 Wherewith to pierce it, that was CUPID's dart ;
 Shall I not then the cruel Fair condemn
 Who on that dart imparts my bosom's gem ?

SONNET II.

TO A PAINTER ATTEMPTING DELIA'S PORTRAIT.

RASH Painter ! canst thou give the ORB OF DAY
 In all its noontide glory ? or pourtray
 The DIAMOND, that athwart the taper'd hall
Flings the rich flashes of its dazzling light ?
 Even if thine art could boast such magic night,
 Yet if it strove to paint my Angel's eye,
 Here it perforce must fall. Cease ! lest I call
Heaven's vengeance on thy sin : Must thou be told
The crime it is to paint DIVINITY ?
 Rash Painter ! should the world her charms behold,
 Dim and defiled, as there they needs must be,
 They to their old idolatry would fall,
 And bend before her form the pagan knee,
 Fairer than VENUS, DAUGHTER OF THE SEA.

SONNET III.

HE PROVES THE EXISTENCE OF A SOUL FROM HIS LOVE FOR DELIA.

SOME have denied a soul ! THEY NEVER LOVED.
 Far from my Delia now by fate removed,
 At home, abroad, I view her every where ;
 Her ONLY in the FLOOD of NOON I see,
 My Goddess-Maid, my OMNIPRESENT FAIR,
 For LOVE annihilates the world to me !
 And when the weary SOL around his bed
Closes the sable CURTAINS of the night,
 SUN of my SLUMBERS, on my dazzled sight
 SHE shines confest. When every sound is dead,
 The SPIRIT OF HER VOICE comes then to roll
The surge of music o'er my wavy brain.
 Far, far from her my Body drags its chain,
 But sure with Delia I exist a SOUL !

SONNET IV.

THE POET EXPRESSES HIS FEELINGS RESPECTING A PORTRAIT IN DELIA'S PARLOUR.

I WOULD I were that portly Gentleman
 With gold-laced hat and golden-headed cane,
 Who hangs in Delia's parlour ! For whene'er
 From book or needlework her looks arise,
 On him converge the SUN-BEAMS of her eyes,
 And he unblamed may gaze upon MY FAIR,
 And oft MY FAIR his favour'd form surveys.
 O HAPPY PICTURE ! still ON HER to gaze ;
 I envy him ! and jealous fear alarms,
 Lest the STRONG glance of those divinest charms
 WARM HIM TO LIFE, as in the ancient days,
 When MARBLE MELTED in Pygmalion's arms.
 I would I were that portly Gentleman
 With gold-laced hat and golden-headed cane.

LOVE ELEGIES.

ELEGY I.

THE POET RELATES HOW HE OBTAINED DELIA'S POCKET-HANDKERCHIEF.

'Tis mine ! what accents can my joy declare ?
 Blest be the pressure of the thronging rout !
 Blest be the hand so hasty of my fair,
 That left the tempting corner hanging out !

I envy not the joy the pilgrim feels,
 After long travel to some distant shrine,
 When at the relic of his saint he kneels,
 For Delia's POCKET-HANDKERCHIEF IS MINE.

When first with sliding fingers I drew near,
 Keen hope shot tremulous through every vein ;
 And when the finish'd deed removed my fear,
 Scarce could my bounding heart its joy contain.

What though the Eighth Commandment rose to mind,
 It only served a moment's qualm to move ;
 For thefts like this it could not be design'd,
 The Eighth Commandment WAS NOT MADE FOR LOVE !

Here when she took the macaroons from me,
She wiped her mouth to clean the crumbs so sweet!

Dear napkin! yes, she wiped her lips in thee!
Lips sweeter than the macaroons she eat.

And when she took that pinch of Mocabaw,
That made my Love so delicately sneeze,
Thee to her Roman nose applied I saw,
And thou art doubly dear for things like these.

No washerwoman's filthy hand shall e'er,
SWEET POCKET-HANDKERCHIEF! thy worth profane;

For thou hast touch'd the rubies of my fair,
And I will kiss thee o'er and o'er again.

ELEGY II.

THE POET INVOKES THE SPIRITS OF THE ELEMENTS TO APPROACH DELIA. — HE DESCRIBES HER SINGING.

YE SYLPHS, who banquet on my Delia's blush,
Who on her locks of FLOATING GOLD repose,
Dip in her cheek your GOSSAMERY BRUSH,
And with its bloom of beauty tinge THE ROSE.

Hover around her lips on rainbow wing,
Load from her honey'd breath your viewless feet,
Bear thence a richer fragrance for the Spring,
And make the lily and the violet sweet.

Ye GNOMES, whose toll through many a dateless year
Its nurture to the infant gem supplies,
From central caverns bring your diamonds here,
To ripen in the sun OF DELIA'S EYES.

And ye who bathe in Etna's lava springs,
Spirits of fire! to see my love advance;
Fly, SALAMANDERS, on ASBESTOS' wings,
To wanton in my Delia's fiery glance.

She weeps, she weeps! her eye with anguish swells,
Some tale of sorrow melts my FEELING GIRL!
NYMPHS! catch the tears, and in your lucid shells
Enclose them, EMBRYOS OF THE ORIENT PEARL.

She sings! the Nightingale with envy hears,
The CHERUB listens from his starry throne,
And motionless are stopt the attentive SPHERES,
To hear more heavenly music than their own.

Cease, Delia, cease! for all the ANGEL THROUG,
Hearkening to thee, let sleep their golden wires!
Cease, Delia, cease that too surpassing song,
Lest, stung to envy, they should break their lyres.

Cease, ere my senses are to madness driven
By the strong joy! Cease, Delia, lest my soul,
Enrapt, already THINK ITSELF IN HEAVEN,
And burst the feeble Body's frail controul.

ELEGY III.

THE POET EXPATIATES ON THE BEAUTY OF DELIA'S HAIR.

THE comb between whose ivory teeth she strains
The straitening curls of gold so beamy bright,
Not spotless merely from the touch remains,
But issues forth more pure, more milky white.

The rose-pomatum that the FRISSEUR spreads
Sometimes with honour'd fingers for my fair,
No added perfume on her tresses sheds,
But borrows sweetness from her sweeter hair.

Happy the FRISSEUR who in Delia's hair
With licensed fingers uncontroul'd may rove!
And happy in his death the DANCING BEAR,
Who died to make pomatum for my LOVE.

Oh could I hope that e'er my favour'd lays Might curl those lovely locks with conscious pride,
Nor Hammond, nor the Mantuan Shepherd's praise,
I'd envy then, nor wish reward beside.

Cupid has strung from you, O tresses fine,
The bow that in my breast impell'd his dart;
From you, sweet locks! he wove the subtle line
Wherewith the urchin angled for MY HEART.

Fine are my Delia's tresses as the threads
That from the silk-worm, self-interr'd, proceed;
Fine as the GLEAMY GOSSAMER that spreads
Its filmy web-work o'er the tangled mead.

Yet with these tresses Cupid's power elate
My captive heart has handcuff'd in a chain,
Strong as the cables of some huge first-rate,
THAT BEARS BRITANNIA'S THUNDERS O'ER THE MAIN.

The SYLPHS that round her radiant locks repair,
In flowing lustre bathe their brightening wings;
And ELFIN MINSTRELS with assiduous care
The ringlets rob for FAERY FIDDLE-STRINGS.

ELEGY IV.

THE POET RELATES HOW HE STOLE A LOCK OF DELIA'S HAIR, AND HER ANGER.

Oh! be the day accurst that gave me birth!
Ye Seas, to swallow me in kindness rise!
Fall on me, Mountains! and thou merciful Earth,
Open, and hide me from my Delia's eyes!

Let universal Chaos now return,
Now let the central fires their prison burst,
And EARTH and HEAVEN and AIR and OCEAN burn . .
For Delia FROWNS . . SHE FROWNS, and I am curs'd !

Oh ! I could dare the fury of the fight,
Where hostile MILLIONS sought my single life ;
Would storm VOLCANO BATTERIES with delight,
And grapple with GRIM DEATH in glorious strife.

Oh ! I could brave the bolts of angry Jove,
When ceaseless lightnings fire the midnight skies ;
What is his wrath to that of HER I love ?
What is his LIGHTNING to my DELIA'S EYES ?

Go, fatal lock ! I cast thee to the wind ;
Ye serpent CURLS, ye poison-tendrils, go !
Would I could tear thy memory from my mind,
ACCURSED LOCK, . . thou cause of all my woe !

Seize the CURST CURLS, ye Furies, as they fly !
Demons of Darkness, guard the infernal roll,
That thence your cruel vengeance when I die,
May knit the KNOTS OF TORTURE for my SOUL.

Last night, . . Oh hear me, Heaven, and grant my prayer !

The BOOK OF FATE before thy suppliant lay,
And let me from its ample records tear
Only the single PAGE OF YESTERDAY.

Or let me meet OLD TIME upon his flight,
And I will STOP HIM on his restless way :
Omnipotent in Love's resistless might,
I'll force him back the ROAD OF YESTERDAY.

Last night, as o'er the page of Love's despair,
My Delia bent deliciously to grieve,
I stood a treacherous loiterer by her chair,
And drew the FATAL SCISSORS from my sleeve :

And would that at that instant o'er my thread
The SHEARS OF ATROPOS had open'd then ;
And when I reft the lock from Delia's head,
Had cut me sudden from the sons of men !

She heard the scissors that fair lock divide,
And whilst my heart with transport panted big,
She cast a FURY frown on me, and cried,
" You stupid Puppy, . . you have spoil'd my Wig !"

LYRIC POEMS.

TO HORROR.

Τὴν γὰρ ποταίσουσα
τὰν καὶ σκύλας τρομέοντι,
'Ερχομένην νεύου ἀνὰ τ' ἥλια καὶ μύλων αἶμα.

Theocritus.

DARK Horror ! hear my call !
Stern Genius, hear from thy retreat
On some old sepulchre's moss-canker'd seat,
Beneath the Abbey's ivied wall
That trembles o'er its shade ;
Where wrapt in midnight gloom, alone,
Thou lovest to lie and hear
The roar of waters near,
And listen to the deep dull groan
Of some perturbed sprite
Borne fitful on the heavy gales of night.

Or whether o'er some wide waste hill
Thou see'st the traveller stray,
Bewilder'd on his lonely way,
When, loud and keen and chill,
The evening winds of winter blow,
Drifting deep the dismal snow.

Or if thou followest now on Greenland's shore,
With all thy terrors, on the lonely way
Of some wreck'd mariner, where to the roar
Of herded bears, the floating ice-hills round
Return their echoing sound,
And by the dim drear Boreal light
Givest half his dangers to the wretch's sight.

Or if thy fury form,
When o'er the midnight deep
The dark-wing'd tempests sweep,
Beholds from some high cliff the increasing storm,
Watching with strange delight,
As the black billows to the thunder rave,
When by the lightning's light
Thou see'st the tall ship sink beneath the wave.

Bear me in spirit where the field of fight
Scatters contagion on the tainted gale,
When, to the Moon's faint beam,
On many a carcass shine the dews of night,
And a dead silence stills the vale,
Save when at times is heard the glutt'd Raven's scream.

Where some wreck'd army from the Conqueror's might,
Speed their disastrous flight,

With thee, fierce Genius ! let me trace their way
And hear at times the deep heart-groan
Of some poor sufferer left to die alone ;
And we will pause, where, on the wild,
The mother to her breast,
On the heap'd snows reclining, clasps her child,
Not to be pitied now, for both are now at rest.

Black Horror ! speed we to the bed of Death,
Where one who wide and far
Hath sent abroad the myriad plagues of war
Struggles with his last breath ;
Then to his wildly-starting eyes
The spectres of the slaughter'd rise ;
Then on his phrensied ear
Their calls for vengeance and the Demions' yell
In one heart-maddening chorus swell ;
Cold on his brow convulsing stands the dew,
And night eternal darkens on his view.

Horror ! I call thee yet once more !
Bear me to that accursed shore,
Where on the stake the Negro writhes.
Assume thy sacred terrors then ! dispense
The gales of Pestilence !
Arouse the opprest ; teach them to know their power ;
Lead them to vengeance ! and in that dread hour
When ruin rages wide,
I will behold and smile by Mercy's side.

Bristol, 1791.

TO CONTEMPLATION. ♪

Καὶ παρῶς φιλοῖμαι τὸν ἑγγύθεν ἔχον ἀκούειν,
Ἄ τίς ποτε ψόφισα τοῦ ὄρεος, οὐχὶ τρεῖς αἶσιν.
Moschus.

FAINT gleams the evening radiance through the sky,
The sober twilight dimly darkens round ;
In short quick circles the shrill bat flits by,
And the slow vapour curls along the ground.

Now the pleased eye from yon lone cottage sees
On the green mead the smoke long-shadowing play ;
The Red-breast on the blossom'd spray
Warbles wild her latest lay ;
And lo ! the Rooks to yon high-tufted trees
Wing in long files vociferous their way.
Calm CONTEMPLATION, 'tis thy favourite hour !
Come, tranquillizing Power !

I view thee on the calmy shore
When Ocean stills his waves to rest ;
Or when slow-moving on the surges hoar
Meet with deep hollow roar
And whiten o'er his breast ;
And when the Moon with softer radiance gleams,
And lovelier heave the billows in her beams.

When the low gales of evening moan along,
I love with thee to feel the calm cool breeze,
And roam the pathless forest wilds among,
Listening the mellow murmur of the trees
Full-foliaged, as they wave their heads on high,
And to the winds respond in symphony.

Or lead me where amid the tranquil vale
The broken streamlet flows in silver light ;
And I will linger where the gale
O'er the bank of violets sighs,
Listening to hear its soften'd sounds arise ;
And hearken the dull beetle's drowsy flight,
And watch'd the tube-eyed snail
Creep o'er his long moon-glittering trail,
And mark where radiant through the night
Shines in the grass-green hedge the glow-worm's living light.

Thee, meekest Power ! I love to meet,
As oft with solitary pace
The ruin'd Abbey's hallowed rounds I trace,
And listen to the echoings of my feet.
Or on some half-demolish'd tomb,
Whose warning texts anticipate my doom,
Mark the clear orb of night
Cast through the ivy'd arch a broken light.

Nor will I not in some more gloomy hour
Invoke with fearless awe thine holier power,
Wandering beneath the sacred pile
When the blast moans along the darksome aisle,
And clattering patters all around
The midnight shower with dreary sound.

But sweeter 'tis to wander wild
By melancholy dreams beguiled,
While the summer moon's pale ray
Faintly guides me on my way
To some lone romantic glen
Far from all the haunts of men ;
Where no noise of uproar rude
Breaks the calm of solitude ;
But soothing Silence sleeps in all,
Save the neighbouring waterfall,
Whose hoarse waters falling near
Load with hollow sounds the ear,
And with down-dasht torrent white
Gleam hoary through the shades of night.

Thus wandering silent on and slow,
I'll nurse Reflection's sacred woe,
And muse upon the happier day
When Hope would weave her visions gay,
Ere Fancy, chill'd by adverse fate,
Left sad Reality my mate.

O CONTEMPLATION ! when to Memory's eyes
The visions of the long-past days arise,
Thy holy power imparts the best relief,
And the calm'd Spirit loves the joy of grief.

Bristol, 1792.

TO A FRIEND.

Oh my faithful Friend !
 Oh early chosen, ever found the same,
 And trusted and beloved ! once more the verse
 Long destined, always obvious to thine ear,
 Attend indulgent. Alcouside.

And would'st thou seek the low abode
 Where Peace delights to dwell ?
 Pause, Traveller, on thy way of life !
 With many a snare and peril rife
 Is that long labyrinth of road !
 Dark is the vale of years before ;
 Pause, Traveller, on thy way,
 Nor dare the dangerous path explore
 Till old Experience comes to lend his leading ray.

Not he, who comes with lanthorn light
 Shall guide thy groping pace aright
 With faltering feet and slow ;
 No ! let him rear the torch on high,
 And every maze shall meet thine eye,
 And every snare and every foe ;
 Then with steady step and strong,
 Traveller, shalt thou march along.

Though Power invite thee to her hall,
 Regard not thou her tempting call,
 Her splendour's meteor glare ;
 Though courteous Flattery there await,
 And Wealth adorn the dome of State,
 There stalks the midnight spectre Care ;
 Peace, Traveller, doth not sojourn there.

If Fame allure thee, climb not thou
 To that steep mountain's craggy brow
 Where stands her stately pile ;
 For far from thence doth Peace abide,
 And thou shalt find Fame's favouring smile
 Cold as the feeble Sun on Hecla's snow-clad side.

And, Traveller ! as thouapest to find
 That low and loved abode,
 Retire thee from the thronging road,
 And shun the mob of human-kind.
 Ah ! hear how old Experience schools,
 " Fly, fly the crowd of Knaves and Fools,
 " And thou shalt fly from woe !
 " The one thy heedless heart will greet
 " With Judas-smile, and thou wilt meet
 " In every Fool a Foe !"

So safely may'st thou pass from these,
 And reach secure the home of Peace,
 And Friendship find thee there ;
 No happier state can mortal know,
 No happier lot can Earth bestow,
 If Love thy lot shall share.
 Yet still Content with him may dwell
 Whom Hymen will not bless,
 And Virtue sojourn in the cell
 Of hermit happiness.

Bristol, 1793.

REMEMBRANCE.

The remembrance of Youth is a sigh. Al.

MAN hath a weary pilgrimage
 As through the world he wends,
 On every stage from youth to age
 Still discontent attends ;
 With heaviness he casts his eye
 Upon the road before,
 And still remembers with a sigh
 The days that are no more.

To school the little exile goes,
 Torn from his mother's arms, . .
 What then shall soothe his earliest woes,
 When novelty hath lost its charms ?
 Condemn'd to suffer through the day
 Restraints which no rewards repay,
 And cares where love has no concern,
 Hope lengthens as she counts the hours
 Before his wish'd return.
 From hard controul and tyrant rules,
 The unfeeling discipline of schools,
 In thought he loves to roam,
 And tears will struggle in his eye
 While he remembers with a sigh
 The comforts of his home.

Youth comes ; the toils and cares of life
 Torment the restless mind ;
 Where shall the tired and harass'd heart
 Its consolation find ?
 Then is not Youth, as Fancy tells,
 Life's summer prime of joy ?
 Ah no ! for hopes too long delay'd
 And feelings blasted or betray'd,
 Its fabled bliss destroy ;
 And Youth remembers with a sigh
 The careless days of Infancy.

Maturer Manhood now arrives,
 And other thoughts come on,
 But with the baseless hopes of Youth
 Its generous warmth is gone ;
 Cold calculating cares succeed,
 The timid thought, the wary deed,
 The dull realities of truth ;
 Back on the past he turns his eye,
 Remembering with an envious sigh
 The happy dreams of Youth.

So reaches he the latter stage
 Of this our mortal pilgrimage,
 With feeble step and slow ;
 New ills that latter stage await,
 And old Experience learns too late
 That all is vanity below.
 Life's vain delusions are gone by
 Its idle hopes are o'er,
 Yet age remembers with a sigh
 The days that are no more.

THE SOLDIER'S WIFE.

DACTYLICS.

WEARY way-wanderer, languid and sick at heart,
Travelling painfully over the rugged road,
Wild-visaged Wanderer! God help thee wretched one!

Sorely thy little one drags by thee bare-footed,
Cold is the baby that hangs at thy bending back,
Meagre and livid and screaming for misery.

Woe-begone mother, half anger, half agony,
As over thy shoulder thou lookest to hush the babe,
Bleakly the blinding snow beats in thy haggard face.

Ne'er will thy husband return from the war again,
Cold is thy heart and as frozen as Charity!
Cold are thy children. — Now God be thy comforter!

Bristol, 1795.

THE WIDOW.

SAPPHICS.

Cold was the night wind, drifting fast the snow fell,
Wile were the downs and shelterless and naked,
When a poor Wanderer struggled on her journey,
Weary and way-sore.

Drear were the downs, more dreary her reflections;
Cold was the night-wind, colder was her bosom:
She had no home, the world was all before her,
She had no shelter.

Fast o'er the heath a chariot rattled by her,
"Pity me!" feebly cried the lonely wanderer;
"Pity me, strangers! lest with cold and hunger
Here I should perish.

"Once I had friends, — though now by all forsaken!
Once I had parents, — they are now in Heaven!
I had a home once — I had once a husband —
Pity me, strangers!

"I had a home once — I had once a husband —
I am a widow, poor and broken-hearted!"
Loud blew the wind, unheard was her complaining,
On drove the chariot.

Then on the snow she laid her down to rest her;
She heard a horseman, "Pity me!" she groan'd out;
Loud was the wind, unheard was her complaining,
On went the horseman.

¹ This Stanza was written by S. T. Coleridge.

Worn out with anguish, toil and cold and hunger,
Down sunk the Wanderer, sleep had seized her senses;
There did the traveller find her in the morning;
God had released her.

THE CHAPEL BELL.

Lo I, the man who from the Muse did ask
Her deepest notes to swell the Patriot's meeds,
Am now enforced, a far unfitter task,
For cap and gown to leave my minstrel weeds;
For yon dull tone that tinkles on the air
Bids me lay by the lyre and go to morning prayer.

Oh how I hate the sound! it is the knell
That still a requiem tells to Comfort's hour;
And loth am I, at Superstition's bell,
To quit or Morpheus' or the Muse's bower:
Better to lie and doze, than gape amain,
Hearing still mumbled o'er the same eternal strain.

Thou tedious herald of more tedious prayers,
Say, dost thou ever summon from his rest
One being wakening to religious cares?
Or rouse one pious transport in the breast?
Or rather, do not all reluctant creep
To linger out the time in listlessness or sleep?

I love the bell that calls the poor to pray,
Chiming from village church its cheerful sound,
When the sun smiles on Labour's holy-day,
And all the rustic train are gather'd round,
Each deftly dizen'd in his Sunday's best,
And pleased to hail the day of piety and rest.

And when, dim shadowing o'er the face of day
The mantling mists of even-tide rise slow,
As through the forest gloom I wend my way,
The minster curfew's sullen voice I know,
And pause, and love its solemn toll to hear,
As made by distance soft it dies upon the ear.

Nor with an idle nor unwilling ear
Do I receive the early passing bell;
For, sick at heart with many a secret care,
When I lie listening to the dead man's knell,
I think that in the grave all sorrows cease,
And would full fain recline my head and be at peace.

But thou, memorial of monastic gall!
What fancy sad or lightsome hast thou given?
Thy vision-scaring sounds alone recall
The prayer that trembles on a yawn to heaven;
The snuffing, snaffling Fellow's nasal tone,
And Romish rites retain'd, though Romish faith be flown.

Oxford, 1793.

TO HYMEN.

Gon of the torch, whose soul-illuming flame
Beams brightest radiance o'er the human heart,
Of many a woe the cure,
Of many a joy the source ;

To thee I sing, if haply may the Muse
Pour forth the song unblamed from these dull haunts,
Where never beams thy torch
To cheer the sullen scene.

I pour the song to thee, though haply doom'd
Alone and unbelov'd to pass my days ;
Though doom'd perchance to die
Alone and unbewail'd.

Yet will the lark albeit in cage enthrall'd
Send out her voice to greet the morning sun,
As wide his cheerful beams
Light up the landscape round ;

When high in heaven she hears the caroling,
The prisoner too begins her morning hymn,
And hails the beam of joy,
Of joy to her denied.

Friend to each better feeling of the soul,
I sing to thee, for many a joy is thine,
And many a Virtue comes
To join thy happy train.

Lured by the splendour of thy sacred torch,
The beacon-light of bliss, young Love draws near,
And leads his willing slaves
To wear thy flowery chain.

And chasten'd Friendship comes, whose mildest sway
Shall cheer the hour of age, when fainter burn
The fading flame of Love,
The fading flame of Life.

Parent of every bliss, the busy hand
Of Fancy oft will paint in brightest hues
How calm, how clear, thy torch
Illumes the wintry hour ;

Will paint the wearied labourer at that hour,
When friendly darkness yields a pause to toil,
Returning blithely home
To each domestic joy ;

Will paint the well-trimm'd fire, the frugal meal
Prepared with fond solicitude to please ;
The ruddy children round
Climbing the father's knee.

And oft will Fancy rise above the lot
Of honest Poverty, and think how man
Nor rich, nor poor, enjoys
His best and happiest state ;

When toll no longer irksome and constrain'd
By hard necessity, but comes to please,
To vary the still hour
Of tranquil happiness.

Why, Fancy, wilt thou, o'er the lovely scene
Pouring thy vivid hues, why, sorceress bland,
Soothe sad reality
With visionary bliss ?

Turn thou thine eyes to where the hallowed light
Of Learning shines ; ah rather lead thy son
Along her mystic paths
To drink the sacred spring.

Lead calmly on along the unvaried path
To solitary Age's drear abode ; . . .
Is it not happiness
That gives the sting to Death ?

Well then is he whose unembitter'd years
Are waning on in lonely listlessness :
If Life hath little joy,
Death hath for him no sting.

Oxford, 1794.

WRITTEN

ON THE FIRST OF DECEMBER.

Though now no more the musing ear
Delights to listen to the breeze,
That lingers o'er the green-wood shade,
I love thee, Winter ! well.

Sweet are the harmonies of Spring,
Sweet is the Summer's evening gale,
And sweet the Autumnal winds that shake
The many-colour'd grove.

And pleasant to the sober'd soul
The silence of the wintry scene,
When Nature shrouds herself, entranced
In deep tranquillity.

Not undelightful now to roam
The wild heath sparkling on the sight ;
Not undelightful now to pace
The forest's ample rounds ;

And see the spangled branches shine ;
And mark the moss of many a hue
That varies the old tree's brown bark,
Or o'er the grey stone spreads.

And see the cluster'd berries bright
Amid the holly's gay green leaves ;
The ivy round the leafless oak
That clasps its foliage close.

So Virtue diffident of strength
Clings to Religion's firmer aid ;
So by Religion's aid upheld,
Endures calamity.

Nor void of beauties now the spring,
Whose waters hid from summer-sun
Have soothed the thirsty pilgrim's ear
With more than melody.

Green moss shines there with ice incased ;
The long grass bends its spear-like form :
And lovely is the silvery scene
When faint the sun-beams smile.

Reflection too may love the hour
When Nature, hid in Winter's grave,
No more expands the bursting bud,
Or bids the flowret bloom ;

For Nature soon in Spring's best charms,
Shall rise revived from Winter's grave,
Expand the bursting bud again,
And bid the flower re-bloom.

Bath, 1793.

WRITTEN

ON THE FIRST OF JANUARY.

COME, melancholy Moralizer, come !
Gather with me the dark and wintry wreath ;
With me engarland now
The Sepulchre of Time.

Come, Moralizer, to the funeral song !
I pour the dirge of the Departed Days ;
For well the funeral song
Befits this solemn hour.

BUT hark ! even now the merry bells ring round
With clamorous joy to welcome in this day,
This consecrated day,
To Joy and Merriment.

Mortal ! while Fortune with benignant hand
Fills to the brim thy cup of happiness,
Whilst her unclouded sun
Illumes thy summer day,

Canst thou rejoice, . . . rejoice that Time flies fast ?
That night shall shadow soon her summer-sun ?
That swift the stream of Years
Rolls to Eternity ?

If thou hast wealth to gratify each wish,
If power be thine, remember what thou art !
Remember thou art Man,
And Death thine heritage !

Hast thou known Love ! Doth Beauty's better sun
Cheer thy fond heart with no capricious smile,
Her eye all eloquence,
All harmony her voice ?

Oh state of happiness ! . . . Hark ! how the gale
Moans deep and hollow through the leafless grove !
Winter is dark and cold ;
Where now the charms of Spring !

Say'st thou that Fancy paints the future scene
In hues too sombrous ? that the dark-stoled Maid
With frowning front severe
Appals the shuddering soul ?

And would'st thou bid me court her fairy form,
When, as she sports her in some happier mood,
Her many-coloured robes
Float varying in the sun ?

Ah ! vainly does the Pilgrim, whose long road
Leads o'er a barren mountain's storm-veft height,
With wistful eye behold
Some quiet vale, far off.

And there are those who love the pensive song,
To whom all sounds of Mirth are dissonant ;
Them in accordant mood
This thoughtful strain will find.

For hopeless Sorrow hails the lapse of Time,
Rejoicing when the fading orb of day
Is sunk again in night,
That one day more is gone.

And he who bears Affliction's heavy load
With patient piety, well pleased he knows
The World a pilgrimage,
The Grave his inn of rest.

Bath, 1794.

WRITTEN

ON SUNDAY MORNING.

Go thou and seek the House of Prayer !
I to the woodlands wend, and there,
In lovely Nature see the God of Love.
The swelling organ's peal
Wakes not my soul to zeal,
Like the sweet music of the vernal grove.
The gorgeous altar and the mystic vest
Excite not such devotion in my breast,
As where the noon-tide beam
Flash'd from some broken stream,
Vibrates on the dazzled sight ;
Or where the cloud-suspended rain
Sweeps in shadows o'er the plain ;
Or when reclining on the cliff's huge height
I mark the billows burst in silver light.

Go thou and seek the House of Prayer !
I to the woodlands shall repair,
Feed with all Nature's charms mine eyes,
And hear all Nature's melodies.
The primrose bank will there dispense
Faint fragrance to the awaken'd sense ;

The morning beams that life and joy impart,
Will with their influence warm my heart,
And the full tear that down my cheek will steal,
Will speak the prayer of praise I feel.

Go thou and seek the House of Prayer !
I to the Woodlands bend my way,
And meet Religion there !
She needs not haunt the high-arch'd dome to pray,
Where storied windows dim the doubtful day ;
Liberty she loves to rove,
Wide o'er the heathy hill or cowslip dale ;
Or seek the shelter of the embowering grove,
Or with the streamlet wind along the vale.
Sweet are these scenes to her ; and when the Night
Pours in the North her silver streams of light,
She woos reflection in the silent gloom,
And ponders on the world to come.

THE RACE OF BANQUO.

A FRAGMENT.

" Fly, son of Banquo ! Fleance, fly !
Leave thy guilty sire to die !"
O'er the heath the stripling fled,
The wild storm howling round his head ;
Fear, mightier through the shades of night,
Urged his feet, and wing'd his flight ;
And still he heard his father's cry,
" Fly, son of Banquo ! Fleance, fly ! "

" Fly, son of Banquo ! Fleance, fly !
Leave thy guilty sire to die !"
On every blast was heard the moan,
The anguish'd shriek, the death-fraught groan ;
Loathly night-hags join the yell,
And lo ! — the midnight rites of Hell !

" Forms of magic ! spare my life !
Shield me from the murderer's knife !
Before me dim in lurid light
Float the phantoms of the night —
Behind I hear my Father cry,
' Fly, son of Banquo — Fleance, fly ! ' "

" Parent of the sceptred race,
Boldly tread the circled space ;
Boldly, Fleance, venture near,
Sire of monarchs, spurn at fear.
Sisters, with prophetic breath,
Pour we now the dirge of Death ! "

WRITTEN IN ALENTEJO,

JANUARY 23. 1796.

1.

When at morn, the Muleteer
With early call announces day,
Sorrowing that early call I hear,
Which scares the visions of delight away :
For dear to me the silent hour
When sleep exerts its wizard power,
And busy Fancy then let free,
Borne on the wings of Hope, my Edith, flies to thee.

2.

When the slant sunbeams crest
The mountain's shadowy breast ;
When on the upland slope
Shines the green myrtle wet with morning dew,
And lovely as the youthful dreams of Hope,
The dim-scen landscape opens on the view.
I gaze around with raptur'd eyes
On Nature's charms, where no illusion lies,
And drop the joy and memory mingled tear,
And sigh to think that Edith is not here.

3.

At the cool hour of even,
When all is calm and still,
And o'er the western hill
A richer radiance robes the mellow'd heaven,
Absorb'd in darkness thence,
When slowly fades in night
The dim decaying light,
Like the fair day-dreams of Benevolence ;
Fatigued, and sad, and slow
Along my lonely way I go,
And muse upon the distant day,
And sigh, remembering Edith far away.

4.

When late arriving at our inn of rest,
Whose roof, expos'd to many a winter's sky,
Half shelters from the wind the shivering guest ;
By the lamp's melancholy gloom,
I see the miserable room,
And musing on the evils that arise
From disproportion'd inequalities,
Pray that my lot may be
Neither with Riches, nor with Poverty,
But in that happy mean,
Which for the soul is best,
And with contentment blest,
In some secluded glen
To dwell with Peace and Edith far from men.

TO RECOVERY.

RECOVERY, where art thou?
Daughter of Heaven, where shall we seek thy help?
Upon what hallow'd fountain hast thou laid,
O Nymph adored, thy spell?

By the grey ocean's verge,
Daughter of Heaven, we seek thee, but in vain;
We find no healing in the breeze that sweeps
The thymy mountain's brow.

Where are the happy hours,
The sunshine where that cheer'd the morn of life!
For Health is fled, and with her fled the joys
Which made existence dear.

I saw the distant hills
Smile in the radiance of the orient beam,
And gazed delighted that anon our feet
Should visit scenes so fair.

I look'd abroad at noon,
The shadow and the storm were on the hills;
The crags which like a fairy fabric shone
Darkness had overcast.

On you, ye coming years,
So fairly shone the April gleam of hope;
So darkly o'er the distance, late so bright,
Now settle the black clouds.

Come thou, and chase away
Sorrow and Pain, the persecuting Powers,
Who make the melancholy day so long,
So long the restless night.

Shall we not find thee here,
Recovery, on the salt sea's breezy strand?
Is there no healing in the gales that sweep
The thymy mountain's brow?

I look for thy approach,
O life-preserving Power! as one who strays
Alone in darkness o'er the pathless marsh,
Watches the dawn of day.

Minehead, July, 1799.

YOUTH AND AGE.

With cheerful step the traveller
Pursues his early way,
When first the dimly-dawning east
Reveals the rising day.

He bounds along his craggy road,
He hastens up the height,
And all he sees and all he hears
Administer delight.

And if the mist, retiring slow,
Roll round its wavy white,
He thinks the morning vapours hide,
Some beauty from his sight.

But when behind the western clouds
Departs the fading day,
How wearily the traveller
Pursues his evening way!

Sorely along the craggy road
His painful footsteps creep,
And slow, with many a feeble pause,
He labours up the steep.

And if the mists of night close round,
They fill his soul with fear;
He dreads some unseen precipice,
Some hidden danger near.

So cheerfully does youth begin
Life's pleasant morning stage;
Alas! the evening traveller feels
The fears of wary age!

THE OAK OF OUR FATHERS

ALAS for the Oak of our Fathers, that stood
In its beauty, the glory and pride of the wood!

It grew and it flourish'd for many an age,
And many a tempest wreak'd on its rage;
But when its strong branches were bent with the blast,
It struck its root deeper, and flourish'd more fast.

Its head tower'd on high, and its branches spread round;
For its roots had struck deep, and its heart was sound;
The bees o'er its honey-dew'd foliage play'd,
And the beasts of the forest fed under its shade.

The Oak of our Fathers to Freedom was dear,
Its leaves were her crown, and its wood was her spear.
Alas for the Oak of our Fathers, that stood
In its beauty, the glory and pride of the wood!

There crept up an ivy and clung round the trunk,
It struck in its mouths and the juices it drunk;
The branches grew sickly, deprived of their food,
And the Oak was no longer the pride of the wood.

The foresters saw, and they gather'd around,
The roots still were fast, and the heart still was sound;
They lopt off the boughs that so beautiful spread,
But the ivy they spared on its vitals that fed.

No longer the bees o'er its honey-dews play'd,
Nor the beasts of the forest fed under its shade;
Lopt and mangled the trunk in its ruin is seen,
A monument now what its beauty has been.

The Oak has received its incurable wound,
They have loosen'd the roots, though the heart may be sound;
What the travellers at distance green-flourishing see,
Are the leaves of the ivy that poison'd the tree.

Alas for the Oak of our Fathers, that stood
In its beauty, the glory and pride of the wood!

THE BATTLE OF PULTOWA.

On Vorska's glittering waves
The morning sunbeams play;
Pultowa's walls are throng'd
With eager multitudes;
Athwart the dusty vale
They strain their aching eyes,
Where to the fight moves on
The Conqueror Charles, the iron-hearted Swede.

Him Famine hath not tamed,
The tamer of the brave.
Him Winter hath not quell'd;
When man by man his veteran troops sunk down,
Frozen to their endless sleep,
He held undaunted on.
Him Pain hath not subdued;
What though he mounts not now
The fiery steed of war,
Borne on a litter to the field he goes.

Go, iron-hearted King!
Full of thy former fame.
Think how the humbled Dane
Crouch'd underneath thy sword;
Think how the wretched Pole
Resign'd his conquer'd crown;
Go, iron-hearted King!
Let Narva's glory swell thy haughty breast, . .
The death-day of thy glory, Charles, hath dawn'd!
Proud Swede, the Sun hath risen
That on thy shame shall set!

Now, Patkul, may thine injured spirit rest!
For over that relentless Swede
Ruin hath raised his unrelenting arm;
For ere the night descends,
His veteran host destroyed,
His laurels blasted to revive no more,
He flies before the Moscovite.

Impatiently that haughty heart must bear
Long years of hope deceived;

Long years of idleness
That sleepless soul must brook.
Now, Patkul, may thine injured spirit rest!
To him who suffers in an honest cause
No death is ignominious; not on thee,
But upon Charles, the cruel, the unjust,
Not upon thee, . . on him
The ineffaceable reproach is fix'd,
The infamy abides.

Now, Patkul, may thine injured spirit rest
Westbury, 1798.

THE TRAVELLER'S RETURN.

SWEET to the morning traveller
The song amid the sky,
Where twinkling in the dewy light
The skylark soars on high.

And cheering to the traveller
The gales that round him play,
When faint and heavily he drags
Along his noon-tide way.

And when beneath the unclouded sun
Full wearily toils he,
The flowing water makes to him
A soothing melody.

And when the evening light decays,
And all is calm around,
There is sweet music to his ear
In the distant sheep-bell's sound.

But oh! of all delightful sounds
Of evening or of morn,
The sweetest is the voice of Love,
That welcomes his return.

Westbury, 1798.

THE OLD MAN'S COMFORTS,

AND HOW HE GAINED THEM.

You are old, Father William, the young man cried,
The few locks which are left you are grey;
You are hale, Father William, a hearty old man,
Now tell me the reason, I pray.

In the days of my youth, Father William replied,
I remember'd that youth would fly fast,
And abused not my health and my vigour at first,
That I never might need them at last.

You are old, Father William, the young man cried,
And pleasures with youth pass away;
And yet you lament not the days that are gone,
Now tell me the reason, I pray.

In the days of my youth, Father William replied,
I remember'd that youth could not last;
I thought of the future, whatever I did,
That I never might grieve for the past.

You are old, Father William, the young man cried,
And life must be hastening away;
You are cheerful, and love to converse upon death,
Now tell me the reason, I pray.

I am cheerful, young man, Father William replied,
Let the cause thy attention engage;
In the days of my youth I remember'd my God!
And He hath not forgotten my age.

TRANSLATION OF A GREEK ODE ON ASTRONOMY,

WRITTEN BY S. T. COLERIDGE, FOR THE PRIZE AT CAM-BRIDGE, 1793.

1.

HAIL, venerable NIGHT !
O first-created, hail !
Thou who art doom'd in thy dark breast to veil
The dying beam of light,
The eldest and the latest thou,
Hail, venerable NIGHT !
Around thine ebony brow,
Glittering plays with lightning rays
A wreath of flowers of fire,
The varying clouds with many a hue attire
Thy many-tinted veil.
Holy are the blue graces of thy zone !
But who is he whose tongue can tell
The dewy lustres which thine eyes adorn ?
Lovely to some the blushes of the morn ;
To some the glories of the Day,
When, blazing with meridian ray,
The gorgeous Sun ascends his highest throne :
But I with solemn and severe delight
Still watch thy constant car, immortal NIGHT !

2.

For then to the celestial Palaces
Urania leads, Urania, she
The Goddess who alone
Stands by the blazing throne,
Effulgent with the light of Deity.
Whom Wisdom, the Creatrix, by her side
Placed on the heights of yonder sky,
And smiling with ambrosial love, unlock'd
The depths of Nature to her piercing eye.
Angelic myriads struck their harps around,
And with triumphant song
The host of Stars, a beauteous throng,
Around the ever-living Mind
In jubilee their mystic dance begun ;
When at thy leaping forth, O Sun !
The Morning started in affright,
Astonish'd at thy birth, her Child of Light !

3.

Hail, O Urania, hail !
Queen of the Muses ! Mistress of the Song !
For thou didst deign to leave the heavenly throng.
As earthward thou thy steps wert bending,
A ray went forth and harbinger'd thy way :
All Ether laugh'd with thy descending,
Thou hadst wreath'd thy hair with roses,
The flower that in the immortal bower
Its deathless bloom discloses.
Before thine awful mien, compelled to shrink,
Fled Ignorance abash'd with all her brood ;
Dragons, and Hags of baleful breath,
Fierce Dreams, that wont to drink
The Sepulchre's black blood ;
Or on the wings of storms
Riding in fury forms,
Shriek to the mariner the shriek of Death.

4.

I boast, O Goddess, to thy name
That I have raised the pile of fame ;
Therefore to me be given
To roam the starry path of Heaven,
To charioteer with wings on high,
And to rein-in the Tempests of the sky.

5.

Charlots of happy Gods ! Fountains of Light !
Ye Angel-Temples bright !
May I unblamed your flaming thresholds tread ?
I leave Earth's lowly scene ;
I leave the Moon serene,
The lovely Queen of Night ;
I leave the wide domains,
Beyond where Mars his fiercer light can fling,
And Jupiter's vast plains,
(The many-belted king ;)
Even to the solitude where Saturn reigns,
Like some stern tyrant to just exile driven ;
Dim-seen the sullen power appears
In that cold solitude of Heaven,
And slow he drags along
The mighty circle of long-lingering years.

6.

Nor shalt thou escape my sight,
Who at the threshold of the sun-trod domes
Art trembling, . . youngest Daughter of the Night !
And you, ye fiery-tressed strangers ! you,
Comets who wander wide,
Will I along your pathless way pursue,
Whence bending I may view
The Worlds whom elder Suns have vivified.

7.

For Hope with loveliest visions soothes my mind,
That even in Man, Life's winged power,
When comes again the natal hour,
Shall on heaven-wandering feet
In undecaying youth,
Spring to the blessed seat ;
Where round the fields of Truth
The fiery Essences for ever feed ;
And o'er the ambrosial mead,
The breezes of serenity
Silent and soothing glide for ever by.

8.

There, Priest of Nature ! dost thou shine,
Newton ! a King among the Kings divine.
Whether with harmony's mild force,
He guides along its course
The axle of some beauteous star on high ;
Or gazing, in the spring
Ebullient with creative energy,
Feels his pure breast with rapturous joy possess,
Inebriate in the holy ecstasy.

9.

I may not call thee mortal then, my soul !
Immortal longings lift thee to the skies :
Love of thy native home inflames thee now,
With pious madness wise.

Know then thyself! expand thy wings divine!
 Soon mingled with thy fathers thou shalt shine
 A star amid the starry throng,
 A God the Gods among.

London, 1802.

GOOSEBERRY-PIE.

A PINDARIC ODE.

1.

GOOSEBERRY-PIE is best.
 Full of the theme, O Muse, begin the song
 What though the sunbeams of the West
 Mature within the Turtle's breast
 Blood glutinous and fat of verdant hue?
 What though the Deer bound sportively along
 O'er springey turf, the Park's elastic vest?
 Give them their honours due, . .
 But Gooseberry-Pie is best.

2.

Behind his oxen slow
 The patient Ploughman plods,
 And as the Sower followed by the clods
 Earth's genial womb received the living seed.
 The rains descend, the grains they grow;
 Saw ye the vegetable ocean
 Roll its green ripple to the April gale?
 The golden waves with multitudinous motion
 Swell o'er the summer vale?

3.

It flows through Alder banks along
 Beneath the copse that hides the hill;
 The gentle stream you cannot see,
 You only hear its melody,
 The stream that turns the Mill.
 Pass on a little way, pass on,
 And you shall catch its gleam anon;
 And hark! the loud and agonizing groan
 That makes its anguish known,
 Where tortured by the Tyrant Lord of Meal
 The Brook is broken on the Wheel!

4.

Blow fair, blow fair, thou orient gale!
 On the white bosom of the sail
 Ye Winds enamour'd lingering lie!
 Ye Waves of ocean spare the bark,
 Ye Tempests of the sky!
 From distant realms she comes to bring
 The sugar for my Pie.
 For this on Gamp's arid side
 The Vulture's feet are scaled with blood,
 And Beelzebub beholds with pride,
 His darling planter brood.

5.

First in the spring thy leaves were seen,
 Thou beauteous bush, so early green!
 Soon ceased thy blossoms' little life of love.
 O safer than the gold-fruit-bearing tree
 The glory of that old Hesperian grove, . .
 No Dragon does there need for thee
 With quintessential sting to work alarms,
 Prepotent guardian of thy fruitage fine,
 Thou vegetable Porcupine! . . .
 And didst thou scratch thy tender arms,
 O Jane! that I should dine!

6.

The flour, the sugar, and the fruit,
 Commingled well, how well they suit,
 And they were well bestow'd.
 O Jane, with truth I praise your Pie,
 And will not you in just reply
 Praise my Pindaric Ode?

Exeter, 1799.

TO A BEE.

1.

Thou wert out betimes, thou busy, busy Bee!
 As abroad I took my early way,
 Before the Cow from her resting-place
 Had risen up and left her trace
 On the meadow, with dew so grey,
 Saw I thee, thou busy, busy Bee.

2.

Thou wert working late, thou busy, busy Bee!
 After the fall of the Cistus flower,
 When the Primrose-of-evening was ready to burst,
 I heard thee last, as I saw thee first;
 In the silence of the evening hour,
 Heard I thee, thou busy, busy Bee.

3.

Thou art a miser, thou busy, busy Bee!
 Late and early at employ;
 Still on thy golden stores intent,
 Thy summer in heaping and hoarding is spent,
 What thy winter will never enjoy;
 Wise lesson this for me, thou busy, busy Bee!

4.

Little dost thou think, thou busy, busy Bee!
 What is the end of thy toil.
 When the latest flowers of the ivy are gone,
 And all thy work for the year is done,
 Thy master comes for the spoil.
 Woe then for thee, thou busy, busy Bee!

Westbury, 1799

TO A SPIDER. ✓

1.

SPIDER ! thou need'st not run in fear about
To shun my curious eyes ;
I won't humanely crush thy bowels out
Lest thou should'st eat the flies ;
Nor will I roast thee with a damn'd delight
Thy strange instinctive fortitude to see,
For there is One who might
One day roast me.

2.

Thou art welcome to a Rhymer sore perplext,
The subject of his verse ;
There's many a one who on a better text
Perhaps might comment worse.
Then shrink not, old Free-Mason, from my view,
But quietly like me spin out the line ;
Do thou thy work pursue
As I will mine.

3.

Weaver of snares, thou emblemest the ways
Of Satan, Sire of lies ;
Hell's huge black Spider, for mankind he lays
His toils, as thou for flies.
When Betty's busy eye runs round the room,
Woe to that nice geometry, if seen !
But where is he whose broom
The earth shall clean ?

4.

Spider ! of old thy flimsy webs were thought,
And 'twas a likeness true,
To emblem laws in which the weak are caught,
But which the strong break through :
And if a victim in thy toils is ta'en,
Like some poor client is that wretched fly ;
I'll warrant thee thou'lt drain
His life-blood dry.

5.

And is not thy weak work like human schemes
And care on earth employ'd ?
Such are young hopes and Love's delightful dreams
So easily destroy'd !
So does the Statesman, whilst the Avengers sleep,
Self-deem'd secure, his wiles in secret lay,
Soon shall destruction sweep
His work away.

6.

Thou busy labourer ! one resemblance more
May yet the verse prolong,
For, Spider, thou art like the Poet poor,
Whom thou hast help'd in song.
Both busily our needful food to win,
We work, as Nature taught, with ceaseless pains :
Thy bowels thou dost spin,
I spin my brains.

THE DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM. ✓

THE rage of Babylon is roused,
The King puts forth his strength ;
And Judah bends the bow,
And points her arrows for the coming war.

Her walls are firm, her gates are strong ;
Her youth gird on the sword ;
High are her chiefs in hope,
For soon will Egypt send the promised aid.

But who is he whose voice of woe
Is heard amid the streets ?
Whose ominous voice proclaims
Her strength and arms and promised succours vain.

His meagre cheek is pale and sunk,
Wild is his hollow eye,
Yet awful is its glance ;
And who could bear the anger of his frown ?

PROPHET of God ! in vain thy lips
Proclaim the woe to come ;
In vain thy warning voice
Summons her rulers timely to repent !

The Ethiop changes not his skin.
Impious and reckless still
The rulers spurn thy voice,
And now the measure of their crimes is full.

For now around Jerusalem
The countless foes appear ;
Far as the eye can reach
Spreads the wide horror of the circling siege.

Why is the warrior's cheek so pale ?
Why droops the gallant youth
Who late in pride of heart
Sharpen'd his javelin for the welcome war ?

'Tis not for terror that his eye
Swells with the struggling woe ;
Oh ! he could bear his ills,
Or rush to death, and in the grave have peace.

His parents do not ask for food,
But they are weak with want ;
His wife has given her babes
Her wretched pittance, . . she makes no complaint.

The consummating hour is come !
Alas for Solyma !
How is she desolate, . .
She that was great among the nations, fallen !

And thou . . thou miserable King . .
Where is thy trusted flock ?
Thy flock so beautiful,
Thy Father's throne, the temple of thy God ?

Repentance brings not back the past;
It will not call again
Thy murder'd sons to life,
Nor vision to those eyeless sockets more.

Thou wretched, childless, blind, old man,
Heavy thy punishment;
Dreadful thy present woes,
Alas more dreadful thy remember'd guilt!

THE DEATH OF WALLACE. ✓

Joy, joy in London now!
He goes, the rebel Wallace goes to death;
At length the traitor meets the traitor's doom,
Joy, joy, in London now!

He on a sledge is drawn,
His strong right arm unweapon'd and in chains,
And garlanded around his helmless head
The laurel wreath of scorn.

They throng to view him now
Who in the field had fled before his sword,
Who at the name of Wallace once grew pale
And falter'd out a prayer.

Yes! they can meet his eye,
That only beams with patient courage now;
Yes! they can look upon those manly limbs,
Defenceless now and bound.

And that eye did not shrink
As he beheld the pomp of infamy;
Nor one ungovern'd feeling shook those limbs,
When the last moment came.

What though suspended sense
Was by their legal cruelty revived;
What though ingenious vengeance lengthened life
To feel protracted death!

What though the hangman's hand
Graspt in his living breast the heaving heart, . .
In the last agony, the last sick pang,
Wallace had comfort still.

He call'd to mind his deeds
Done for his country in the embattled field;
He thought of that good cause for which he died,
And it was joy in death.

Go, Edward, triumph now!
Cambria is fallen, and Scotland's strength is crush'd;
On Wallace, on Llewellyn's mangled limbs,
The fowls of heaven have fed.

Unrival'd, unopposed,
Go, Edward, full of glory to thy grave!
The weight of patriot blood upon thy soul,
Go, Edward, to thy God!

Westbury, 1798.

THE SPANISH ARMADA. ✓

Clear shone the morn, the gale was fair,
When from Coruña's crowded port
With many a cheerful shout and loud acclaim
The huge Armada past.

To England's shores their streamers point,
To England's shores their sails are spread,
They go to triumph o'er the sea-girt land,
And Rome hath blest their arms.

Along the ocean's echoing verge,
Along the mountain range of rocks,
The clustering multitudes behold their pomp,
And raise the votive prayer.

Commingling with the ocean's roar
Ceaseless and hoarse their murmurs rise,
And soon they trust to see the winged bark
That bears good tidings home.

The watch-tower now in distance sinks,
And now Galicia's mountain rocks
Faint as the far-off clouds of evening lie,
And now they fade away.

Each like some moving citadel,
On through the waves they sail sublime;
And now the Spaniards see the silvery cliffs,
Behold the sea-girt land!

O fools! to think that ever foe
Should triumph o'er that sea-girt land:
O fools! to think that ever Britain's sons
Should wear the stranger's yoke!

For not in vain hath Nature rear'd
Around her coast those silvery cliffs;
For not in vain old Ocean spreads his waves
To guard his favourite isle!

On come her gallant mariners!
What now avail Rome's boasted charms?
Where are the Spaniard's vaunts of eager wrath?
His hopes of conquest now?

And hark! the angry Winds arise,
Old Ocean heaves his angry Waves;
The Winds and Waves against the invaders fight
To guard the sea-girt land.

Howling around his palace-towers
The Spanish despot hears the storm;
He thinks upon his navies far away,
And boding doubts arise.

Long, over Biscay's bolisterous surge
The watchman's aching eye shall strain!
Long shall he gaze, but never winged bark
Shall bear good tidings home.

Westbury, 1798.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY.

THE night is come, no fears disturb
The dreams of innocence ;
They trust in kingly faith and kingly oaths,
They sleep, . . alas ! they sleep !

Go to the palace, would'st thou know
How hideous night can be ;
Eye is not closed in those accursed walls,
Nor heart at quiet there.

The Monarch from the window leans,
He listens to the night,
And with a horrible and eager hope
Awaits the midnight bell.

Oh he has Hell within him now !
God, always art thou just !
For innocence can never know such pangs
As pierce successful guilt.

He looks abroad, and all is still.
Hark ! . . now the midnight bell
Sounds through the silence of the night alone, . .
And now the signal gun !

Thy hand is on him, righteous God !
He hears the frantic shrieks,
He hears the glorying yells of massacre,
And he repents, . . too late.

He hears the murderer's savage shout,
He hears the groan of death ;
In vain they fly, . . soldiers defenceless now,
Women, old men, and babes.

Righteous and just art thou, O God !
For at his dying hour
Those shrieks and groans re-echoed in his ear, .
He heard that murderous yell !

They throng'd around his midnight couch,
The phantoms of the slain ; . .
It prey'd like poison on his powers of life ; . .
Righteous art thou, O God !

Spirits ! who suffer'd at that hour
For freedom and for faith,
Ye saw your country bend beneath the yoke,
Her faith and freedom crush'd.

And like a giant from his sleep
Ye saw when France awoke ;
Ye saw the people burst their double chain,
And ye had joy in Heaven !

Westbury, 1798.

THE HOLLY TREE. ✓

1.

O READER ! hast thou ever stood to see
The Holly Tree ?
The eye that contemplates it well perceives
Its glossy leaves
Order'd by an intelligence so wise,
As might confound the Atheist's sophistries.

2.

Below, a circling fence, its leaves are seen
Wrinkled and keen ;
No grazing cattle through their prickly round
Can reach to wound ;
But as they grow where nothing is to fear,
Smooth and unarm'd the pointless leaves appear.

3.

I love to view these things with curious eyes,
And moralize :
And in this wisdom of the Holly Tree
Can emblems see
Wherewith perchance to make a pleasant rhyme,
One which may profit in the after time.

4.

Thus, though abroad perchance I might appear
Harsh and austere,
To those who on my leisure would intrude
Reserved and rude,
Gentle at home amid my friends I'd be
Like the high leaves upon the Holly Tree.

5.

And should my youth, as youth is apt I know,
Some harshness show,
All vain asperities I day by day
Would wear away,
Till the smooth temper of my age should be
Like the high leaves upon the Holly Tree.

6.

And as when all the summer trees are seen
So bright and green,
The Holly leaves a sober hue display
Less bright than they,
But when the bare and wintry woods we see,
What then so cheerful as the Holly Tree ?

7.

Serious should my youth appear among
The thoughtless throng,
So would I seem, amid the young and gay
More grave than they,
That in my age as cheerful I might be
As the green winter of the Holly Tree.

Westbury, 1798.

THE EBB TIDE. ✓

Slowly thy flowing tide
Came in, old Avon ! scarcely did mine eyes,
As watchfully I roam'd thy green-wood side,
Perceive its gentle rise.

With many a stroke and strong
The labouring boatmen upward plied their oars,
Yet little way they made, though labouring long
Between thy winding shores.

Now down thine ebbing tide
The unlabour'd boat falls rapidly along ;
The solitary helmsman sits to guide,
And sings an idle song.

Now o'er the rocks that lay
So silent late, the shallow current roars ;
Fast flow thy waters on their seaward way
Through wider-spreading shores.

Avon ! I gaze and know
The lesson emblem'd in thy varying way ;
It speaks of human joys that rise so slow,
So rapidly decay.

Kingdoms which long have stood,
And slow to strength and power attain'd at last,
Thus from the summit of high fortune's flood
They ebb to ruin fast.

Thus like thy flow appears
Time's tardy course to manhood's envied stage ;
Alas ! how hurryingly the ebbing years
Then hasten to old age !

Westbury, 1799.

THE COMPLAINTS OF THE POOR. ✓

And wherefore do the Poor complain ?
The Rich Man ask'd of me ; . . .
Come walk abroad with me, I said,
And I will answer thee.

'Twas evening, and the frozen streets
Were cheerless to behold,
And we were wrapt and coated well,
And yet we were a-cold.

We met an old bare-headed man,
His locks were thin and white ;
I ask'd him what he did abroad
In that cold winter's night ;

The cold was keen indeed, he said,
But at home no fire had he,
And therefore he had come abroad
To ask for charity.

We met a young bare-footed child,
And she begg'd loud and bold ;
I ask'd her what she did abroad
When the wind it blew so cold ;

She said her father was at home,
And he lay sick a-bed,
And therefore was it she was sent
Abroad to beg for bread.

We saw a woman sitting down
Upon a stone to rest,
She had a baby at her back
And another at her breast ;

I ask'd her why she loiter'd there
When the night-wind was so chill ;
She turn'd her head and bade the child
That scream'd behind, be still ;

Then told us that her husband served,
A soldier, far away,
And therefore to her parish she
Was begging back her way.

We met a girl, her dress was loose
And sunken was her eye,
Who with a wanton's hollow voice
Address'd the passers-by ;

I ask'd her what there was in guilt
That could her heart allure
To shame, disease, and late remorse ;
She answer'd she was poor.

I turn'd me to the Rich Man then,
For silently stood he, . . .
You ask'd me why the Poor complain,
And these have answer'd thee !

London, 1798.

TO MARY. ✓

MARY ! ten chequer'd years have past
Since we beheld each other last ;
Yet, Mary, I remember thee,
Nor canst thou have forgotten me.

The bloom was then upon thy face,
Thy form had every youthful grace ;
I too had then the warmth of youth,
And in our hearts was all its truth.

We conversed, were there others by,
With common mirth and random eye ;
But when escaped the sight of men,
How serious was our converse then !

Our talk was then of years to come,
Of hopes which ask'd a humble doom,
Themes which to loving thoughts might move,
Although we never spake of love.

At our last meeting sure thy heart
Was even as loth as mine to part;
And yet we little thought that then
We parted . . . not to meet again.

Long, Mary! after that adieu,
My dearest day-dreams were of you;
In sleep I saw you still, and long
Made you the theme of secret song.

When manhood and its cares came on,
The humble hopes of youth were gone;
And other hopes and other fears
Effaced the thoughts of happier years.

Meantime through many a varied year
Of thee no tidings did I hear,
And thou hast never heard my name
Save from the vague reports of fame.

But then I trust detraction's lie
Hath kindled anger in thine eye;
And thou my praise wert proud to see, . . .
My name should still be dear to thee.

Ten years have held their course; thus late
I learn the tidings of thy fate;
A Husband and a Father now,
Of thee, a Wife and Mother thou.

And, Mary, as for thee I frame
A prayer which hath no selfish aim,
No happier lot can I wish thee
Than such as Heaven hath granted me.

London, 1802.

TO A FRIEND, ✓

INQUIRING IF I WOULD LIVE OVER MY YOUTH
AGAIN.

1.

Do I regret the past?
Would I again live o'er
The morning hours of life?
Nay, William! nay, not so!

In the warm joyance of the summer sun

I do not wish again
The changeful April day.

Nay, William! nay, not so!

Safe haven'd from the sea,

I would not tempt again

The uncertain ocean's wrath.

Praise be to Him who made me what I am,
Other I would not be.

2.

Why is it pleasant then to sit and talk
Of days that are no more?
When in his own dear home
The traveller rests at last,
And tells how often in his wanderings

The thought of those far off
Hath made his eyes o'erflow
With no unmanly tears;
Delighted he recalls

Through what fair scenes his lingering feet have trod;
But ever when he tells of perils past
And troubles now no more,
His eyes are brightest, and a readier joy
Flows thankful from his heart

3.

No, William! no, I would not live again
The morning hours of life;

I would not be again

The slave of hope and fear;

I would not learn again

The wisdom by Experience hardly taught.

4.

To me the past presents

No object for regret;

To me the present gives

All cause for full content.

The future? . . . it is now the cheerful noon,

And on the sunny-smiling fields I gaze

With eyes alive to joy;

When the dark night descends,

I willingly shall close my weary lids,

In sure and certain hope to wake again.

Westbury, 1796.

THE DEAD FRIEND. ✓

1.

Nor to the grave, not to the grave, my Soul,

Descend to contemplate

The form that once was dear!

The Spirit is not there

Which kindled that dead eye,

Which throb'd in that cold heart,

Which in that motionless hand

Hath met thy friendly grasp.

The Spirit is not there!

It is but lifeless perishable flesh

That moulders in the grave;

Earth, air, and water's ministering particles

Now to the elements

Resolved, their uses done.

Not to the grave, not to the grave, my Soul,

Follow thy friend beloved,

The spirit is not there!

2.

Often together have we talk'd of death;

How sweet it were to see

All doubtful things made clear;

How sweet it were with powers

Such as the Cherubim,

To view the depth of Heaven!

O Edmund! thou hast first

Begun the travel of Eternity !
 I look upon the stars,
 And think that thou art there,
 Unfetter'd as the thought that follows thee.

3.

And we have often said how sweet it were
 With unseen ministry of angel power
 To watch the friends we loved.
 Edmund ! we did not err !
 Sure I have felt thy presence ! Thou hast given
 A birth to holy thought,
 Hast kept me from the world unstain'd and pure.
 Edmund ! we did not err !
 Our best affections here
 They are not like the toys of infancy ;

The Soul outgrows them not ;
 We do not cast them off ;
 Oh if it could be so,
 It were indeed a dreadful thing to die !

4.

Not to the grave, not to the grave, my Soul,
 Follow thy friend beloved !
 But in the lonely hour,
 But in the evening walk,
 Think that he companies thy solitude ;
 Think that he holds with thee
 Mysterious intercourse ;
 And though remembrance wake a tear,
 There will be joy in grief.

Westbury, 1799.

SONGS OF THE AMERICAN INDIANS.

THE HURON'S ADDRESS TO THE DEAD.

1.

BROTHER, thou wert strong in youth !
 Brother, thou wert brave in war !
 Unhappy man was he
 For whom thou hadst sharpen'd the tomahawk's edge !
 Unhappy man was he
 On whom thine angry eye was fix'd in fight !
 And he who from thy hand
 Received the calumet,
 Blest Heaven, and slept in peace.

2.

When the Evil Spirits seized thee,
 Brother, we were sad at heart :
 We bade the Jongler come
 And bring his magic aid ;
 We circled thee in mystic dance,
 With songs and shouts and cries,
 To free thee from their power.
 Brother, but in vain we strove,
 The number of thy days was full.

3.

Thou sittest amongst us on thy mat,
 The bear-skin from thy shoulder hangs,
 Thy feet are sandal'd ready for the way.
 Those are the unfatiguable feet
 That traversed the forest track ;
 Those are the lips that late
 Thunder'd the yell of war ;
 And that is the strong right arm
 Which never was lifted in vain.
 Those lips are silent now,
 The limbs that were active are stiff,
 Loose hangs the strong right arm !

4.

And where is That which in thy voice
 The language of friendship spake ?
 That gave the strength of thine arm ?
 That fill'd thy limbs with life ?
 It was not Thou, for Thou art here,
 Thou art amongst us still,
 But the Life and the Feeling are gone.
 The Iroquois will learn
 That thou hast ceased from war ;
 'Twill be a joy-like victory to them,
 For thou wert the scourge of their nation.

5.

Brother, we sing thee the song of death ;
 In thy coffin of bark we lay thee to rest ;
 The bow shall be placed by thy side,
 And the shafts that are pointed and feather'd for flight,
 To the country of the Dead
 Long and painful is thy way ;
 Over rivers wide and deep
 Lies the road that must be pass'd,
 By bridges narrow-wall'd,
 Where scarce the Soul can force its way,
 While the loose fabric totters under it.

6.

Safely may our brother pass !
 Safely, may he reach the fields,
 Where the sound of the drum and the shell
 Shall be heard from the Country of Souls !
 The Spirits of thy Sires
 Shall come to welcome thee :
 The God of the Dead in his Bower
 Shall receive thee, and bid thee join
 The dance of eternal joy.

7.

Brother, we pay thee the rites of death,
 Rest in thy Bower of Delight !

Westbury, 1799.

THE PERUVIAN'S DIRGE OVER THE BODY OF HIS FATHER.

1.

Rest in peace, my Father, rest !
With danger and toil have I borne thy corpse
From the Stranger's field of death.
I bless thee, O Wife of the Sun,
For veiling thy beams with a cloud,
While at the pious task
Thy votary toil'd in fear.
Thou badest the clouds of night
Enwrap thee, and hide thee from Man ;
But didst thou not see my toil,
And put on the darkness to aid,
O Wife of the visible God ?

2.

Wretched, my Father, thy life !
Wretched the life of the Slave !
All day for another he toils ;
Overwearied at night he lies down,
And dreams of the freedom that once he enjoy'd.
Thou wert blest in the days of thy youth,
My Father ! for then thou wert free.
In the fields of the nation thy hand
Bore its part of the general task ;
And when with the song and the dance,
Ye brought the harvest home,
As all in the labour had shared,
So justly they shared in the fruits.

3.

Thou visible Lord of the Earth,
Thou God of my Fathers, thou God of my heart,
O Giver of light and of life !
When the Strangers came to our shores,
Why didst thou not put forth thy power ?
Thy thunders should then have been hurl'd,
Thy fires should in lightnings have flash'd ! . . .
Visible God of the Earth,
The Strangers mock at thy might !
To idols and beams of wood
They force us to bow the knee ;
They plunge us in caverns and dens,
Where never thy blessed light
Shines on our poisonous toil !
But not in the caverns and dens,
O Sun, are we mindless of thee !
We pine for the want of thy beams,
We adore thee with anguish and groans.

4.

My Father, rest in peace !
Rest with the dust of thy Sires !
They placed their Cross in thy dying grasp ; . . .
They bore thee to their burial place,
And over thy breathless frame
Their bloody and merciless Priest
Mumbled his magic hastily.
Oh ! could thy bones be at peace
In the field where the Strangers are laid ? . . .
Alone, in danger and in pain,
My Father, I bring thee here :

So may our God, in reward,
Allow me one faithful friend
To lay me beside thee when I am released !
So may he summon me soon,
That my Spirit may join thee there,
Where the Strangers never shall come !

Esoter, 1799

SONG OF THE ARAUCANS

DURING A THUNDER STORM.

The storm-cloud grows deeper above ;
Araucans ! the tempest is ripe in the sky ;
Our forefathers come from their Islands of Bliss,
They come to the war of the winds.

The Souls of the Strangers are there,
In their garments of darkness they ride through the heaven ;
Yon cloud that rolls luridly over the hill
Is red with their weapons of fire.

Hark ! hark ! in the howl of the wind
The shout of the battle, the clang of their drums ;
The horsemen are met, and the shock of the fight
Is the blast that disbranches the wood.

Behold from the clouds of their power
The lightning . . . the lightning is lanced at our sires !
And the thunder that shakes the broad pavement of Heaven !
And the darkness that quenches the day !

Ye Souls of our Fathers, be brave !
Ye shrunk not before the invaders on earth,
Ye trembled not then at their weapons of fire ;
Brave Spirits, ye tremble not now !

We gaze on your warfare in hope,
We send up our shouts to encourage your arms !
Lift the lance of your vengeance, O Fathers, with force,
For the wrongs of your country strike home !

Remember the land was your own
When the Sons of Destruction came over the seas ;
That the old fell asleep in the fulness of days,
And their children wept over their graves.

Till the Strangers came into the land
With tongues of deceit and with weapons of fire :
Then the strength of the people in youth was cut off,
And the father wept over his son.

It thickens . . . the tumult of fight !
Louder and louder the blast of the battle is heard ! . . .
Remember the wrongs that your country endures !
Remember the fields of your fame !

Joy! joy! for the Strangers recoil, . .
 They give way, . . they retreat, . . they are routed, . .
 they fly;
 Pursue them! pursue them! remember your wrongs!
 Let your lances be drunk with their wounds.

The Souls of your wives shall rejoice
 As they welcome you back to your Islands of Bliss;
 And the breeze that refreshes the toil-throbbing
 Waft thither the song of your praise. [brow
Westbury, 1799.

SONG OF THE CHIKKASAH WIDOW.

'Twas the voice of my husband that came on the
 His unappeased Spirit in anger complains; [gale;
 Rest, rest Ollanahta, be still!
 The day of revenge is at hand.

The stake is made ready, the captives shall die;
 To-morrow the song of their death shalt thou hear,
 To-morrow thy widow shall wield
 The knife and the fire; . . be at rest!

The vengeance of anguish shall soon have its course, . .
 The fountains of grief and of fury shall flow, . .
 I will think, Ollanahta! of thee,
 Will remember the days of our love.

Ollanahta, all day by thy war-pole I sat,
 Where idly thy hatchet of battle is hung;
 I gazed on the bow of thy strength
 As it waved on the stream of the wind.

The scalps that we number'd in triumph were there,
 And the musket that never was levell'd in vain, . . .
 What a leap has it given to my heart
 To see thee suspend it in peace.

When the black and blood-banner was spread to the gale,
 When thrice the deep voice of the war-drum was
 I remember thy terrible eyes [heard,
 How they flash'd the dark glance of thy joy.

I remember the hope that shone over thy cheek
 As thy hand from the pole reach'd its doers of death;
 Like the ominous gleam of the cloud
 Ere the thunder and lightning are born.

He went, and ye came not to warn him in dreams,
 Kindred Spirits of Him who is holy and great!
 And where was thy warning, O Bird,
 The timely announcer of ill?

Alas! when thy brethren in conquest return'd;
 When I saw the white plumes bending over their
 And the pine-boughs of triumph before, [heads,
 Where the scalps of their victory swung, . .

The war-hymn they pour'd, and thy voice was not there!
 I call'd thee, . . alas, the white deer-skin was brought;
 And thy grave was prepared in the tent
 Which I had made ready for joy!

Ollanahta, all day by thy war-pole I sit, . .
 Ollanahta, all night I weep over thy grave!
 To-morrow the victims shall die,
 And I shall have joy in revenge.

Westbury, 1799.

THE

OLD CHIKKASAH TO HIS GRANDSON.

1.

Now go to the battle, my Boy!
 Dear child of my son,
 There is strength in thine arm,
 There is hope in thy heart,
 Thou art ripe for the labours of war.
 Thy Sire was a stripling like thee
 When he went to the first of his fields.

2.

He return'd, in the glory of conquest return'd;
 Before him his trophies were borne,
 These scalps that have hung till the Sun and the Rain
 Have rusted their raven locks.
 Here he stood when the morn of rejoicing arrived,
 The day of the warrior's reward;
 When the banners sun-beaming were spread,
 And all hearts were dancing in joy
 To the sound of the victory-drum.
 The Heroes were met to receive their reward;
 But distinguish'd among the young Heroes that day,
 The pride of his nation, thy Father was seen:
 The swan-feathers hung from his neck,
 His face like the rainbow was tinged,
 And his eye, . . how it sparkled in pride!
 The Elders approach'd, and they placed on his brow
 The crown that his valour had won,
 And they gave him the old honour'd name.
 They reported the deeds he had done in the war,
 And the youth of the nation were told
 To respect him and tread in his steps.

3.

My Boy! I have seen, and with hope,
 The courage that rose in thine eye
 When I told thee the tale of his death.
 His war-pole now is grey with moss,
 His tomahawk red with rust;
 His bowstring whose twang was death
 Now sings as it cuts the wind;
 But his memory is fresh in the land
 And his name with the names that we love.

4.

Go now and revenge him, my Boy!
 That his Spirit no longer may hover by day
 O'er the hut where his bones are at rest,
 Nor trouble our dreams in the night.
 My Boy, I shall watch for the warriors' return,
 And my soul will be sad
 Till the steps of thy coming I see.

OCCASIONAL PIECES.

I.

THE PAUPER'S FUNERAL.

WHAT ! and not one to heave the pious sigh ?
 Not one whose sorrow-swoln and aching eye,
 For social scenes, for life's endearments fled,
 Shall drop a tear and dwell upon the dead ?
 Poor wretched Outcast ! I will weep for thee,
 And sorrow for forlorn humanity.
 Yes, I will weep ; but not that thou art come
 To the cold sabbath of the silent tomb :
 For pining want, and heart-consuming care,
 Soul-withering evils, never enter there.
 I sorrow for the ills thy life has known,
 As through the world's long pilgrimage, alone,
 Haunted by Poverty and woe-begone,
 Unloved, unfriended, thou didst journey on ;
 Thy youth in ignorance and labour past,
 And thine old age all barrenness and blast !
 Hard was thy Fate, which, while it doom'd to woe,
 Denied thee wisdom to support the blow,
 And robb'd of all its energy thy mind,
 Ere yet it cast thee on thy fellow-kind,
 Abject of thought, the victim of distress,
 To wander in the world's wide wilderness.

Poor Outcast, sleep in peace ! the wintry storm
 Blows bleak no more on thine unshelter'd form ;
 Thy woes are past ; thou restest in the tomb ; —
 I pause, . . and ponder on the days to come.

II.

THE SOLDIER'S FUNERAL.

It is the funeral march. I did not think
 That there had been such magic in sweet sounds !
 Hark ! from the blacken'd cymbal that dead tone ! . .
 It awes the very rabble multitude ;
 They follow silently, their earnest brows
 Lifted in solemn thought. 'Tis not the pomp
 And pageantry of death that with such force
 Arrests the sense ; . . the mute and mourning train,
 The white plume nodding o'er the sable hearse,
 Had pass'd unheeded, or perchance awoke
 A serious smile upon the poor man's cheek
 At pride's last triumph. Now these measured sounds,
 This universal language to the heart

Speak instant, and on all these various minds
 Compel one feeling.

But such better thoughts
 Will pass away, how soon ! and these who here
 Are following their dead comrade to the grave,
 Ere the night fall will in their revelry
 Quench all remembrance. From the ties of life
 Unnaturally rent, a man who knew
 No resting place, no dear delights of home,
 Belike who never saw his children's face,
 Whose children knew no father, . . he is gone, . .
 Dropt from existence, like a blasted leaf
 That from the summer tree is swept away,
 Its loss unseen. She hears not of his death
 Who bore him, and already for her son
 Her tears of bitterness are shed ; when first
 He had put on the livery of blood,
 She wept him dead to her.

* We are indeed
 Clay in the potter's hand ! One favour'd mind,
 Scarce lower than the Angels, shall explore
 The ways of Nature, whilst his fellow-man,
 Framed with like miracle, the work of God,
 Must as the unreasonable beast drag on
 A life of labour ; like this soldier here,
 His wondrous faculties bestow'd in vain,
 Be moulded by his fate till he becomes
 A mere machine of murder.

And there are
 Who say that this is well ! as God has made
 All things for man's good pleasure, so of men
 The many for the few ! Court-moralists,
 Reverend lip-comforters, that once a-week
 Proclaim how blessed are the poor, for they Shall have their wealth hereafter, and though now
 Toiling and troubled, they may pick the crumbs
 That from the rich man's table fall, at length
 In Abraham's bosom rest with Lazarus.
 Themselves meantime secure their good things here,
 And feast with Dives. These are they, O Lord !
 Who in thy plain and simple Gospel see
 All mysteries, but who find no peace enjoin'd,
 No brotherhood, no wrath denounced on them
 Who shed their brethren's blood, . . blind at noon-day
 As owls, lynx-eyed in darkness !

O my God !
 I thank thee, with no Pharisaic pride
 I thank thee, that I am not such as these ;
 I thank thee for the eye that sees, the heart
 That feels, the voice that in these evil days,
 Amid these evil tongues, exalts itself,
 And cries aloud against iniquity.

ON A LANDSCAPE OF GASPAR POUSSIN.

GASPAR ! how pleasantly thy pictured scenes
 Beguile the lonely hour ! I ailt and gaze
 With lingering eye, till dreaming Fancy makes
 The lovely landscape live, and the rapt soul
 From the foul haunts of herded human-kind
 Flies far away with spirit speed, and tastes
 The untainted air, that with the lively hue
 Of health and happiness illumines the cheek
 Of mountain Liberty. My willing soul
 All eager follows on thy faery flights,
 Fancy ! best friend ; whose blessed witcheries
 With cheering prospects cheat the traveller
 O'er the long wearying desert of the world.
 Nor dost thou, Fancy ! with such magic mock
 My heart, as, demon-born, old Merlin knew,
 Or Alquist, or Zarzafiel's sister sage,
 Who in her vengeance for so many a year
 Held in the jacinth sepulchre entranced
 Lisuart the pride of Grecian chivalry.
 Friend of my lonely hours ! thou leadest me
 To such calm joys as Nature, wise and good,
 Proffers in vain to all her wretched sons, . .
 Her wretched sons who pine without want amid
 The abundant earth, and blindly bow them down
 Before the Moloch shrines of Wealth and Power,
 Authors of Evil. Well it is sometimes
 That thy delusions should beguile the heart,
 Sick of reality. The little pile
 That tops the summit of that craggy hill
 Shall be my dwelling : craggy is the hill
 And steep ; yet through yon hazels upward leads
 The easy path, along whose winding way
 Now close embower'd I hear the unseen stream
 Dash down, anon behold its sparkling foam
 Gleam through the thicket ; and ascending on
 Now pause me to survey the goodly vale
 That opens on my prospect. Half way up
 Pleasant it were upon some broad smooth rock
 To sit and sun myself, and look below,
 And watch the goatherd down yon high-bank path
 Urging his flock grotesque ; and bidding now
 His lean rough dog from some near cliff go drive
 The straggler ; while his barking loud and quick
 Amid their tremulous bleat arising oft,
 Fainter and fainter from the hollow road
 Send their far echoes, till the waterfall,
 Hoarse bursting from the cavern'd cliff beneath,
 Their dying murmurs drown. A little yet
 Onward, and I have gain'd the utmost height.
 Fair spreads the vale below : I see the stream
 Stream radiant on beneath the noontide sky.
 A passing cloud darkens the bordering steep,
 Where the town-spires behind the castle-towers
 Rise graceful ; brown the mountain in its shade,
 Whose circling grandeur, part by mists conceal'd,
 Part with white rocks resplendent in the sun,
 Should pound mine eyes, . . ay, and my wishes too,
 For I would have no hope or fear beyond.
 The empty turmoil of the worthless world,
 Its vanities and vices would not vex

My quiet heart. The traveller, who beheld
 The low tower of the little pile, might deem
 It were the house of God ; nor would he err
 So deeming, for that home would be the home
 Of Peace and Love, and they would hallow it
 To Him. Oh, life of blessedness ! to reap
 The fruit of honourable toil, and bound
 Our wishes with our wants ! Delightful thoughts,
 That soothe the solitude of weary Hope,
 Ye leave her to reality awaked,
 Like the poor captive, from some fleeting dream
 Of friends and liberty and home restored,
 Startled, and listening as the midnight storm
 Beats hard and heavy through his dungeon bars.

ON CHRISTMAS DAY, 1795.

How many hearts are happy at this hour
 In England ! Brightly o'er the cheerful hall
 Flares the heaped hearth, and friends and kindred meet,
 And the glad mother round her festive board
 Beholds her children, separated long
 Amid the wide world's ways, assembled now,
 A sight at which affection lightens up
 With smiles, the eye that age has long bedimmed.
 I do remember when I was a child
 How my young heart, a stranger then to care,
 With transport leap'd upon this holiday,
 As o'er the house, all gay with evergreens,
 From friend to friend with joyful speed I ran,
 Bidding a merry Christmas to them all.
 Those years are past ; their pleasures and their pains
 Are now like yonder convent-crested hill
 That bounds the distant prospect, indistinct,
 Yet pictured upon memory's mystic glass
 In faint fair hues. A weary traveller now
 I journey o'er the desert mountain tracks
 Of Leon, wilds all drear and comfortless,
 Where the grey lizards in the noontide sun
 Sport on the rocks, and where the goatherd starts,
 Roused from his sleep at midnight when he hears
 The prowling wolf, and falters as he calls
 On Saints to save. Here of the friends I think
 Who now, I ween, remember me, and fill
 The glass of votive friendship. At the name
 Will not thy cheek, Beloved, change its hue,
 And in those gentle eyes uncall'd-for tears
 Tremble ? I will not wish thee not to weep ;
 Such tears are free from bitterness, and they
 Who know not what it is sometimes to wake
 And weep at midnight, are but instruments
 Of Nature's common work. Yes, think of me.
 My Edith, think that, travelling far away,
 Thus I beguile the solitary hours
 With many a day-dream, picturing scenes as fair
 Of peace, and comfort, and domestic bliss
 As ever to the youthful poet's eye
 Creative Fancy fashion'd. Think of me.

Though absent, thine; and if a sigh will rise,
And tears, unbidden, at the thought steal down,
Sure hope will cheer thee, and the happy hour
Of meeting soon all sorrow overpay.

WRITTEN AFTER VISITING
THE CONVENT OF ARRABIDA
NEAR SETUBAL.

MARCH 22. 1796.

HAPPY the dwellers in this holy house :
For surely never worldly thoughts intrude
On this retreat, this sacred solitude,
Where Quiet with Religion makes her home.
And ye who tenant such a goodly scene,
How should ye be but good, where all is fair,
And where the mirror of the mind reflects
Serenest beauty ? O'er these mountain wilds
The insatiate eye with ever new delight
Roams raptur'd, marking now where to the wind
The tall tree bends its many-tinted boughs
With soft accordant sound ; and now the sport
Of joyous sea-birds o'er the tranquil deep,
And now the long-extending stream of light
Where the broad orb of day refulgent sinks
Beneath old Ocean's line. To have no cares
That eat the heart, no wants that to the earth
Chain the reluctant spirit, to be freed
From forced communion with the selfish tribe
Who worship Mammon,—yea, emancipate
From this world's bondage, even while the soul
Inhabits still its corruptible clay, . .
Almost, ye dwellers in this holy house,
Almost I envy you. You never see
Pale Misery's asking eye, nor roam about
Those huge and hateful haunts of crowded men.
Where Wealth and Power have built their palaces,
Fraud spreads his snares secure, man preys on man,
Iniquity abounds, and rampant Vice,
With an infection worse than mortal, taints
The herd of humankind.

I too could love,
Ye tenants of this sacred solitude,
Here to abide, and when the sun rides high
Seek some sequester'd dingle's coolest shade ;
And at the breezy hour, along the beach
Stray with slow step, and gaze upon the deep,
And while the breath of evening fann'd my brow,
And the wild waves with their continuous sound
Soothed my accustom'd ear, think thankfully
That I had from the crowd withdrawn in time,
And found an harbour. . . Yet may yonder deep
Suggest a less unprofitable thought,
Monastic brethren. Would the mariner,
Though storms may sometimes swell the mighty waves,
And o'er the reeling bark with thundering crash
Impel the mountainous surge, quit yonder deep,
And rather float upon some tranquil sea,
Whose moveless waters never feel the gale,
In safe stagnation ? Rouse thyself my soul !
No season this for self-deluding dreams ;

It is thy spring-time ; sow, if thou would'st reap ;
Then, after honest labour, welcome rest,
In full contentment not to be enjoy'd
Unless when duly earn'd. O happy then
To know that we have walked among mankind
More sinn'd against than sinning ! Happy then
To muse on many a sorrow overpast,
And think the business of the day is done,
And as the evening of our lives shall close,
The peaceful evening, with a Christian's hope
Expect the dawn of everlasting day.

ON MY OWN MINIATURE PICTURE,

TAKEN AT TWO YEARS OF AGE.

AND I was once like this ! that glowing cheek
Was mine, those pleasure-sparkling eyes ; that brow
Smooth as the level lake, when not a breeze
Dies o'er the sleeping surface ! . . Twenty years
Have wrought strange alteration ! Of the friends
Who once so dearly prized this miniature,
And loved it for its likeness, some are gone
To their last home ; and some, estranged in heart,
Beholding me, with quick-averted glance
Pass on the other side. But still these hues
Remain unalter'd, and these features wear
The look of Infancy and Innocence.
I search myself in vain, and find no trace
Of what I was : those lightly arching lines
Dark and o'erhanging now ; and that sweet face Settled in these strong lineaments ! . . There were
Who form'd high hopes and flattering ones of thee,
Young Robert ! for thine eye was quick to speak
Each opening feeling : should they not have known,
If the rich rainbow on a morning cloud
Reflects its radiant dyes, the husbandman
Beholds the ominous glory, and foresees
Impending storms ! . . They augured happily,
That thou didst love each wild and wondrous tale
Of fairy fiction, and thine infant tongue
Lisp'd with delight the godlike deeds of Greece
And rising Rome ; therefore they deem'd, forsooth,
That thou shouldst tread Preferment's pleasant path.
Ill-judging ones ! they let thy little feet
Stray in the pleasant paths of Poesy,
And when thou shouldst have prest amid the crowd,
There didst thou love to linger out the day,
Loitering beneath the laurel's barren shade.
SPIRIT OF SPENSER ! was the wanderer wrong ?

VII.

ON THE DEATH OF A FAVOURITE OLD
SPANIEL.

AND they have drown'd thee then at last ! poor
Phillis !
The burden of old age was heavy on thee,

And yet thou should'st have lived! What though thine eye

Was dim, and watch'd no more with eager joy
The wonted call that on thy dull sense sunk
With fruitless repetition, the warm Sun
Might still have cheer'd thy slumbers; thou didst love

To lick the hand that fed thee, and though past
Youth's active season, even Life itself
Was comfort. Poor old friend, how earnestly
Would I have pleaded for thee! thou hadst been Still the companion of my boyish sports;
And as I roam'd o'er Avon's woody cliffs,
From many a day-dream has thy short quick bark
Recall'd my wandering soul. I have beguiled
Often the melancholy hours at school,
Sour'd by some little tyrant; with the thought
Of distant home, and I remember'd then
Thy faithful fondness; for not mean the joy,
Returning at the happy holydays,
I felt from thy dumb welcome. Pensively
Sometimes have I remark'd thy slow decay,
Feeling myself changed too, and musing much
On many a sad vicissitude of Life.

Ah, poor companion! when thou follow'dst last
Thy master's parting footsteps to the gate
Which closed for ever on him, thou didst lose
Thy truest friend, and none was left to plead
For the old age of brute fidelity.
But fare thee well! Mine is no narrow creed;
And He who gave thee being did not frame
The mystery of life to be the sport
Of merciless Man. There is another world
For all that live and move . . . a better one!
Where the proud bipeds, who would fain confine
INFINITE GOODNESS to the little bounds
Of their own charity, may envy thee.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A DAY'S JOURNEY IN SPAIN.

Nor less delighted do I call to mind,
Land of Romance, thy wild and lovely scenes,
Than I beheld them first. Pleased I retrace
With memory's eye the placid Minho's course,
And catch its winding waters gleaming bright
Amid the broken distance. I review
Leon's wide wastes, and heights precipitous,
Seen with a pleasure not unmix'd with dread,
As the sagacious mules along the brink
Wound patiently and slow their way secure;
And rude Galicia's hovels, and huge rocks
And mountains, where, when all beside was dim,
Dark and broad-headed the tall pines erect
Rose on the farthest eminence distinct,
Cresting the evening sky.

Rain now falls thick,
And damp and heavy is the unwholesome air;
I by this friendly hearth remember Spain,
And tread in fancy once again the road,

Where twelve months since I held my way, and thought
Of England, and of all my heart held dear,
And wish'd this day were come.

The morning mist,

Well I remember, hover'd o'er the heath,
When with the earliest dawn of day we left
The solitary Venta.¹ Soon the Sun
Rose in his glory; scatter'd by the breeze
The thin fog roll'd away, and now emerged
We saw where Oropesa's castled hill
Tower'd dark, and dimly seen; and now we pass'd
Torvalva's quiet huts, and on our way
Paused frequently, look'd back, and gazed around,
Then journey'd on, yet turn'd and gazed again,
So lovely was the scene. That ducal pue
Of the Toledos now with all its towers
Shone in the sunlight. Half way up the hill,
Enbow'd in olives, like the abode of Peace,
Lay Lagartina; and the cool fresh gale
Bending the young corn on the gradual slope
Play'd o'er its varying verdure. I beheld
A convent near, and could almost have thought
The dwellers there must needs be holy men,
For as they, look'd around them all they saw
Was good.

But when the purple eve came on,
How did the lovely landscape fill my heart!
Trees scatter'd among peering rocks adorn'd
The near ascent; the vale was overspread
With ilex in its wintry foliage gay,
Old cork trees through their soft and swelling bark
Bursting, and glaucous olives, underneath
Whose fertilizing influence the green herb
Grew greener, and with heavier ears enrich'd
The healthful harvest bends. Pellucid streams
Through many a vocal channel from the hills
Wound through the valley their melodious way;
And o'er the intermediate woods descried,
Naval-Moral's church tower announced to us
Our resting-place that night,—a welcome mark;
Though willingly, we loiter'd to behold
In long expanse Plasencia's fertile plain,
And the high mountain range which bounded it,
Now losing fast the roseate hue that eve
Shed o'er its summit and its snowy breast,
For eve was closing now. Faint and more faint
The murmurs of the goatherd's scatter'd flock
Were borne upon the air, and sailing slow
The broad-wing'd stork sought on the church tower top

His consecrated nest. O lovely scenes!
I gazed upon you with intense delight,
And yet with thoughts that weigh the spirit down.
I was a stranger in a foreign land,
And knowing that these eyes should never more
Behold that glorious prospect, Earth itself
Appear'd the place of pilgrimage it is.

TO MARGARET HILL,

WRITTEN FROM LONDON. 1798.

MARGARET! my Cousin, . . nay, you must not smile,

I love the homely and familiar phrase:
And I will call thee Cousin Margaret,
However quaint amid the measured line
The good old term appears. Oh! it looks ill
When delicate tongues disclaim old terms of kin,
Sir-ing and Madam-ing as civilly
As if the road between the heart and lips
Were such a weary and Laplandish way,
That the poor travellers came to the red gates
Half frozen. Trust me, Cousin Margaret,
For many a day my memory hath play'd
The creditor with me on your account,
And made me shame to think that I should owe
So long the debt of kindness. But in truth
Like Christian on his pilgrimage, I bear
So heavy a pack of business, that albeit
I toil on mainly, in our twelve hours' race
Time leaves me distanced. Loth indeed were I
That for a moment you should lay to me
Unkind neglect; mine, Margaret, is a heart
That smokes not, yet methinks there should be some Who know its genuine warmth. I am not one
Who can play off my smiles and courtesies
To every Lady of her lan-dog tired
Who wants a play-thing; I am no sworn friend
Of half-an-hour, as apt to leave as love;
Mine are no mushroom feelings, which spring up
At once without a seed and take no root,
Wiseliest distrusted. In a narrow sphere,
The little circle of domestic life,
I would be known and loved: the world beyond
Is not for me. But, Margaret, sure I think
That you should know me well, for you and I
Grew up together, and when we look back
Upon old times, our recollections paint
The same familiar faces. Did I wield
The wand of Merlin's magic; I would make
Brave witchcraft. We would have a faery ship,
Ay, a new Ark, as in that other flood
Which swept the sons of Anak from the earth;
The Sylphs should waft us to some goodly isle
Like that where whilom old Apollidon,
Retiring wisely from the troublous world,
Built up his blameless spell; and I would bid
The Sea-Nymphs pile around their coral bowers,
That we might stand upon the beach, and mark
The far-off breakers shower their silver spray,
And hear the eternal roar, whose pleasant sound
Told us that never mariner should reach
Our quiet coast. In such a blessed isle
We might renew the days of infancy,
And Life like a long childhood pass away,
Without one care. It may be, Margaret,
That I shall yet be gather'd to my friends;
For I am not of those who live estranged
Of choice, till at the last they join their race

In the family-vault. If so, if I should lose,
Like my old friend the Pilgrim, this huge pack
So heavy on my shoulders, I and mine
Right pleasantly will end our pilgrimage.
If not, if I should never get beyond,
This Vanity-town, there is another world
Where friends will meet. And often, Margaret,
I gaze at night into the boundless sky,
And think that I shall there be born again,
The exalted native of some better star;
And, like the untaught American, I look
To find in Heaven the things I loved on earth.

X.

AUTUMN.

NAV, William, nay, not so! the changeful year
In all its due successions to my sight
Presents but varied beauties, transient all,
All in their season good. These fading leaves,
That with their rich variety of hues
Make yonder forest in the slanting sun
So beautiful, in you awake the thought
Of winter, . . cold, drear winter, when the trees
Each like a fleshless skeleton shall stretch
Its bare brown boughs; when not a flower shall spread
Its colours to the day, and not a bird
Carol its joyance, . . but all nature wear
One sullen aspect, bleak and desolate,
To eye, ear, feeling, comfortless alike.
To me their many-colour'd beauties speak
Of times of merriment and festival,
The year's best holyday: I call to mind
The school-boy days, when in the falling leaves
I saw with eager hope the pleasant sign
Of coming Christmas; when at morn I took
My wooden kalendar, and counting up
Once more its often-told account, smoothed off
Each day with more delight the daily notch.
To you the beauties of the autumnal year
Make mournful emblems, and you think of man
Doom'd to the grave's long winter, spirit-broken,
Bending beneath the burthen of his years,
Sense-dull'd and fretful, "full of aches and pains,"
Yet clinging still to life. To me they shew
The calm decay of nature when the mind
Retains its strength, and in the languid eye
Religion's holy hopes kindle a joy
That makes old age look lovely. All to you
Is dark and cheerless; you in this fair world
See some destroying principle abroad,
Air, earth, and water full of living things,
Each on the other preying; and the ways
Of man, a strange perplexing labyrinth,
Where crimes and miseries, each producing each,
Render life loathsome, and destroy the hope
That should in death bring comfort. Oh, my friend,
That thy faith were as mine! that thou couldst see Death still producing life, and evil still Working its own destruction; couldst behold

The strifes and troubles of this troubled world
With the strong eye that sees the promised day
Dawn through this night of tempest ! All things then
Would minister to joy ; then should thine heart
Be heal'd and harmonised, and thou wouldst feel
God, always, every where, and all in all.

Westbury, 1798.

XI.

THE VICTORY.

HARK, . . how the church-bells with redoubling peals
Stun the glad ear ! Tidings of joy have come,
Good tidings of great joy ! two gallant ships
Met on the element, . . they met, they fought
A desperate fight ! . . good tidings of great joy !
Old England triumph'd ! yet another day
Of glory for the ruler of the waves !
For those who fell, 'twas in their country's cause,
They have their passing paragraphs of praise,
And are forgotten.

There was one who died
In that day's glory, whose obscurer name
No proud historian's page will chronicle.
Peace to his honest soul ! I read his name,
'Twas in the list of slaughter, and thank'd God
The sound was not familiar to mine ear.
But it was told me after, that this man
Was one whom lawful violence had forced
From his own home and wife and little ones,
Who by his labour liv'd ; that he was one
Whose uncorrupted heart could keenly feel
A husband's love, a father's anxiousness ;
That from the wages of his toil he fed
The distant dear ones, and would talk of them
At midnight when he trod the silent deck
With him he valued, . . talk of them, of joys
Which he had known, . . Oh God ! and of the hour
When they should meet again, till his full heart,
His manly heart, at times would overflow,
Even like a child's, with very tenderness.
Peace to his honest spirit ! suddenly
It came, and merciful the ball of death,
That it came suddenly and shatter'd him,
Nor left a moment's agonising thought
On those he loved so well.

He ocean-deep
Now lies at rest. Be Thou her comforter
Who art the widow's friend ! Man does not know
What a cold sickness made her blood run back
When first she heard the tidings of the fight !
Man does not know with what a dreadful hope
She listened to the names of those who died ;
Man does not know, or knowing will not heed,
With what an agony of tenderness
She gazed upon her children, and beheld
His image who was gone. O God ! be Thou,
Who art the widow's friend, her comforter !

Westbury, 1798.

XII.

HISTORY

Thou chronicle of crimes ! I'll read no more ;
For I am one who willingly would love
His fellow-kind. O gentle Poesy,
Receive me from the court's polluted scenes,
From dungeon horrors, from the fields of war,
Receive me to your haunts, . . that I may nurse
My nature's better feelings, for my soul
Sickens at man's misdeeds !

I spake, when lo !

There stood before me, in her majesty,
Clio, the strong-eyed Muse. Upon her brow
Sate a calm anger. Go, young man, she cried,
Sigh among myrtle bowers, and let thy soul
Effuse itself in strains so sorrowful sweet,
That love-sick Maids may weep upon thy page,
Soothed with delicious sorrow. Oh shame ! shame !
Was it for this I waken'd thy young mind ?
Was it for this I made thy swelling heart
Throb at the deeds of Greece, and thy boy's eye
So kindle when that glorious Spartan died ?
Boy ! boy ! deceive me not ! . . What if the tale
Of murder'd millions strike a chilling pang ;
What if Tiberius in his island stews,
And Philip at his beads, alike in-pire
Strong anger and contempt ; hast thou not risen
With nobler feelings, . . with a deeper love
For freedom ? Yes, if righteously thy soul
Loathes the black history of human crimes
And human misery, let that spirit fill
Thy song, and it shall teach thee, boy ! to raise
Strains such as Cato might have deign'd to hear,
As Sidney in his hall of bliss may love.

WRITTEN IMMEDIATELY AFTER READING^a THE SPEECH OF ROBERT EMMET,

ON HIS TRIAL AND CONVICTION FOR HIGH TREASON,
SEPT. 1803.

" Let no man write my epitaph ; let my grave
Be uninscribed, and let my memory rest
Till other times are come, and other men,
Who then may do me justice."¹

Emmet, no !

No withering curse hath dried my spirit up,
That I should now be silent, . . that my soul

¹ These were the words in his speech : " Let there be no inscription upon my tomb. Let no man write my epitaph. No man can write my epitaph. I am here ready to die. I am not allowed to vindicate my character ; and when I am prevented from vindicating myself, let no man dare to calumniate me. Let my character and my motives repose in obscurity and peace, till other times and other men can do them justice. Then shall my character be vindicated ; then may my epitaph be written. I HAVE DONE."

Should from the stirring inspiration shrink,
 Now when it shakes her, and withhold her voice,
 Of that divinest impulse never more
 Worthy, if impious I withheld it now,
 Hardening my heart. Here, here in this free Isle,
 To which in thy young virtue's erring zeal
 Thou wert so perilous an enemy,
 Here in free England shall an English hand
 Build thy imperishable monument;
 'O, to thine own misfortune and to ours,
 By thine own deadly error so beguiled,
 Here in free England shall an English voice
 Raise up thy mourning-song. For thou hast paid
 'The bitter penalty of that misdeed;
 Justice hath done her unrelenting part,
 If she in truth be Justice who drives on,
 Bloody and blind, the chariot wheels of death.

So young, so glowing for the general good,
 Oh what a lovely manhood had been thine,
 When all the violent workings of thy youth
 Had pass'd away, hadst thou been wisely spared,
 Left to the slow and certain influences
 Of silent feeling and maturing thought.
 How had that heart, . . . that noble heart of thine,
 Which even now had snapt one spell, which beat
 With such brave indignation at the shame
 And guilt of France, and of her miscreant Lord,
 How had it clung to England! With what love,
 What pure and perfect love, return'd to her,
 Now worthy of thy love, the champion now
 For freedom, . . . yea, the only champion now,
 And soon to be the Avenger. But the blow
 Hath fallen, the indiscriminating blow,
 That for its portion to the Grave consign'd
 Youth, Genius, generous Virtue. Oh, grief, grief!
 Oh, sorrow and reproach! Have ye to learn,
 Deaf to the past, and to the future blind,
 Ye who thus irremissibly exact
 The forfeit life, how lightly life is staked,
 When in distemper'd times the feverish mind
 To strong delusion yields? Have ye to learn
 With what a deep and spirit-stirring voice
 Pity doth call Revenge? Have ye no hearts
 To feel and understand how Mercy tames
 The rebel nature, madden'd by old wrongs,
 And binds it in the gentle bands of love,
 When steel and adamant were weak to hold
 That Samson-strength subdued!

Let no man write

Thy epitaph! Emmet, nay; thou shalt not go
 Without thy funeral strain! O young and good
 And wise, though erring here, thou shalt not go
 Unhonour'd nor unsung. And better thus
 Beneath that indiscriminating stroke,
 Better to fall, than to have lived to mourn,
 As sure thou wouldst, in misery and remorse,
 Thine own disastrous triumph; to have seen,
 If the Almighty at that awful hour
 Had turn'd away his face, wild Ignorance
 Let loose, and frantic Vengeance, and dark Zeal,
 And all bad passions tyrannous, and the fires
 Of Persecution once again ablaze.
 How had it sunk into thy soul to see,
 Last curse of all, the ruffian slaves of France
 In thy dear native country lordling it!

How happier thus, in that heroic mood
 That takes away the sting of death, to die,
 By all the good and all the wise forgiven,
 Yea, in all ages by the wise and good
 To be remember'd, mourn'd, and honour'd still.

Keswick.

THANKSGIVING FOR VICTORY.

[Written for Music, and composed by Shield.]

GLORY to Thee in thine omnipotence,
 O Lord, who art our shield and our defence,
 And dost dispense,
 As seemeth best to thine unerring will (Which passeth mortal sense),
 The lot of Victory still;
 Edging sometimes with might the sword unjust;
 And bowing to the dust
 The rightful cause, that so such seeming ill
 May thine appointed purposes fulfil;
 Sometimes, as in this late auspicious hour
 For which our hymns we raise,
 Making the wicked feel thy present power;
 Glory to thee and praise,
 Almighty God, by whom our strength was given!
 Glory to thee, O Lord of Earth and Heaven!

STANZAS

WRITTEN IN LADY LONSDALE'S ALBUM, AT LOWTHER CASTLE, OCTOBER 13. 1821.

1.

SOMETIMES in youthful years,
 When in some ancient ruin I have stood,
 Alone and musing, till with quiet tears
 I felt my cheeks bedew'd,
 A melancholy thought hath made me grieve
 For this our age, and humbled me in mind,
 That it should pass away and leave
 No monuments behind.

2.

Not for themselves alone
 Our fathers lived; nor with a niggard hand
 Raised they the fabrics of enduring stone,
 Which yet adorn the land;
 Their piles, memorials of the mighty dead,
 Survive them still, majestic in decay;
 But ours are like ourselves, I said,
 The creatures of a day.

3.

With other feelings now,
 Lowther! have I beheld thy stately walls,
 Thy pinnacles, and broad embattled brow,
 And hospitable halls.

The sun those wide-spread battlements shall crest,
And silent years unharmed shall go by,
Till centuries in their course invest
Thy towers with sanctity.

4.
But thou the while shalt bear,
To after-times, an old and honour'd name,
And to remote posterity declare
Thy Founder's virtuous fame.
Fair structure! worthy the triumphant age
Of glorious England's opulence and power,
Peace be thy lasting heritage,
And happiness thy dower!

STANZAS

ADDRESSED TO W. R. TURNER, ESQ., R. A., ON HIS VIEW OF THE LAGO MAGGIORE FROM THE TOWN OF ARONA.

[Engraved for the Keepsake of 1829.]

1.
TURNER, thy pencil brings to mind a day
When from Laveno and the Beuscer hill
I over Lake Verbanus held my way
In pleasant fellowship, with wind at will;
Smooth were the waters wide, the sky serene,
And our hearts gladden'd with the joyful scene;

2.
Joyful, . . for all things minister'd delight, . .
The lake and land, the mountains and the vales;
The Alps their snowy summits rear'd in light,
Tempering with gelid breath the summer gales;
And verdant shores and woods refresh'd the eye
That else had ached beneath that brilliant sky.

3.
To that elaborate island were we bound
Of yore the scene of Borromean pride, . .
Folly's prodigious work; where all around,
Under its coronet and self-bellied,
Look where you will, you cannot choose but see
The obtrusive motto's proud "HUMILITY!"

4.
Far off the Borromean saint was seen,
Distinct though distant, o'er his native town,
Where his Colossus with benignant mien
Looks from its station on Arona down:
To it the inland sailor lifts his eyes,
From the wide lake, when perilous storms arise.

5.
But no storm threaten'd on that summer-day;
The whole rich scene appear'd for joyance made;
With many a gliding bark the mere was gay,
The fields and groves in all their wealth array'd;
I could have thought the Sun beheld with smiles
Those towns and palaces and populous isles.

6.
From fair Arona, even on such a day,
When gladness was descending like a shower,
Great painter, did thy gifted eye survey
The splendid scene; and, conscious of its power,
Well hath thine hand inimitable given
The glories of the lake, and land, and heaven.

ON A PICTURE BY J. M. WRIGHT, ESQ.

[Engraved for the Keepsake of 1829.]

1.
THE sky-lark hath perceived his prison-door
Unclosed; for liberty the captive tries:
Puss eagerly hath watched him from the floor,
And in her grasp he flutters, pants, and dies.

2.
Lucy's own Puss, and Lucy's own dear Bird,
Her foster'd favourites both for many a day,
That which the tender-hearted girl prefer'd,
She in her fondness knew not sooth to say.

3.
For if the sky-lark's pipe were shrill and strong,
And its rich tones the thrilling ear might please,
Yet Pussybel could breathe a fireside song
As winning, when she lay on Lucy's knees.

4.
Both knew her voice, and each alike would seek
Her eye, her smile, her fondling touch to gain:
How faintly then may words her sorrow speak,
When by the one she sees the other slain.

5.
The flowers fall scatter'd from her lifted hands;
A cry of grief she utters in affright;
And self-condemn'd for negligence she stands
Aghast and helpless at the cruel sight.

6.
Come, Lucy, let me dry those tearful eyes;
Take thou, dear child, a lesson not unholy,
From one whom nature taught to moralize
Both in his mirth and in his melancholy.

7.
I will not warn thee not to set thy heart
Too fondly upon perishable things;
In vain the earnest preacher spends his art
Upon that theme; in vain the poet sings.

8.
It is our nature's strong necessity,
And this the soul's unerring instincts tell:
Therefore I say, let us love worthily,
Dear child, and then we cannot love too well.

9.

Better it is all losses to deplore,
Which dutiful affection can sustain,
Than that the heart should, in its inmost core,
Harden without it, and have lived in vain.

10.

This love which thou hast lavish'd, and the woe
Which makes thy lip now quiver with distress,
Are but a vent, an innocent overflow,
From the deep springs of female tenderness.

11.

And something I would teach thee from the grief
That thus hath fill'd those gentle eyes with tears,
The which may be thy sober, sure relief
When sorrow visits thee in after years.

12.

I ask not whither is the spirit flown
That lit the eye which there in death is seal'd ;
Our Father hath not made that mystery known ;
Needless the knowledge, therefore not reveal'd.

13.

But didst thou know in sure and sacred truth,
It had a place assign'd in yonder skies,
There through an endless life of joyous youth,
To warble in the bowers of Paradise ;

14.

Lucy, if then the power to thee were given
In that cold form its life to re-engage,
Wouldst thou call back the warbler from its Heaven,
To be again the tenant of a cage ?

15.

Only that thou might'st cherish it again,
Wouldst thou the object of thy love recall
To mortal life, and chance, and change, and pain,
And death, which must be suffered once by all ?

16.

Oh, no, thou say'st - oh, surely not, not so !
I read the answer which those looks express :
For pure and true affection well I know
Leaves in the heart no room for selfishness.

17.

Such love of all our virtues is the gem ;
We bring with us the immortal seed at birth :
Of heaven it is, and heavenly ; woe to them
Who make it wholly earthly and of earth !

18.

What we love perfectly, for its own sake
We love and not our own, being ready thus Whate'er self-sacrifice is ask'd, to make ;
That which is best for it, is best for us.

19.

O Lucy ! treasure up that pious thought !
It hath a balm for sorrow's deadliest darts ;
And with true comfort thou wilt find it fraught,
If grief should reach thee in thy heart of hearts.

Buckland, 1828.

1.

My days among the Dead are past ;
Around me I behold,
Where'er these casual eyes are cast
The mighty minds of old ;
My never-failing friends are they,
With whom I converse day by day.

2.

With them I take delight in weal,
And seek relief in woe ;
And while I understand and feel
How much to them I owe,
My cheeks have often been bedew'd
With tears of thoughtful gratitude.

3.

My thoughts are with the Dead, with them
I live in long-past years,
Their virtues love, their faults condemn,
Partake their hopes and fears,
And from their lessons seek and find
Instruction with an humble mind.

4.

My hopes are with the Dead, anon
My place with them will be,
And I with them shall travel on Through all Futurity ;
Yet leaving here a name, I trust,
That will not perish in the dust.

Kewick, 1818.

IMITATED FROM THE PERSIAN.

Loan ! who art merciful as well as just,
Incline thine ear to me, a child of dust !
Not what I would, O Lord ! I offer thee,
Alas ! but what I can.
Father Almighty, who hast made me man,
And bade me look to Heaven, for Thou art there,
Accept my sacrifice and humble prayer,
Four things which are not in thy treasury,
I lay before thee, Lord, with this petition : . .
My nothingness, my wants,
My sins, and my contrition.

Lowther Castle, 1828.

THE RETROSPECT.

Corston is a small village about three miles from Bath, a little to the left of the Bristol road. The manor was parted with by the monks of Bath, about the reign of Henry I., to Sir Roger de St. Lo, in exchange. It continued in his family till the reign of Edward II., when it passed to the family of Inge, who are said to have been domestics to the St. Los for several generations. In process of time, it came to the Harringtons, and was by them sold to Joseph Langton, whose daughter and heiress brought it in marriage to William Gore Langton, Esq.

The church which, in 1292, was valued at 7 marks, 9s. 4d., was appropriated to the prior and convent of Bath; and a vicarage ordained here by Bishop John de Droghensford, Nov. 1. 1321, decreeing that the vicar and his successors in perpetuum should have a hall, with chambers, kitchen, and bakehouse, with a third part of the garden and curtilage, and a pigeon-house, formerly belonging to the parsonage: that he should have one acre of arable land, consisting of three parcels, late part of the demesne of the said parsonage, together with common pasturage for his swine in such places as the rector of the said church used that privilege; that he should receive from the prior and convent of Bath one quarter of bread-corn yearly, and have all the altarage, and all small tithes of beans and other blade growing in the cottage enclosures and cultivated curtilages throughout the parish; that the religious aforesaid and their successors, as rectors of the said church, should have all the arable land, with a park belonging to the land (the acre above mentioned only excepted), and receive all great tithes, as well of corn as of hay; the said religious to sustain all burdens, ordinary and extraordinary, incumbent on the church as rectors thereof. The prior of Bath had a yearly pension out of the vicarage of 4s."—Collinson's Hist. of Somersetshire, vol. iii. pp. 341—347.

ON as I journey through the vale of years,
By hopes enliven'd, or deprest by fears,
Allow me, Memory, in thy treasured store,
To view the days that will return no more.
And yes! before thine intellectual ray,
The clouds of mental darkness melt away!
As when, at earliest day's awakening dawn,
The hovering mists obscure the dewy lawn,
O'er all the landscape spread their influence chill,
Hang o'er the vale and wood, and hide the hill,
Anon, slow-rising, comes the orb of day,
Slow fade the shadowy mists and roll away,
The prospect opens on the traveller's sight,
And hills and vales and woods reflect the living light.

O thou, the mistress of my future days,
Accept thy minstrel's retrospective lays;
To whom the minstrel and the lyre belong,
Accept, my EDITH, Memory's pensive song.
Of long-past days I sing, ere yet I knew
Or thought of grief, or happiness and you;
Ere yet my infant heart had learnt to prove
The cares of life, the hopes and fears of love.

Corston, twelve years in various fortunes fled
Have pass'd with restless progress o'er my head,
Since in thy vale beneath the master's rule
I dwelt an inmate of the village school.
Yet still will Memory's busy eye retrace
Each little vestige of the well-known place;
Each wonted haunt and scene of youthful joy,
Where merriment has cheer'd the careless boy;
Well-pleased will fancy still the spot survey
Where once he triumph'd in the boyish play,
Without one care where every morn he rose,
Where every evening sunk to calm repose.

Large was the house, though fallen in course of fate
From its old grandeur and manorial state.
Lord of the manor, here the jovial Squire
Once called his tenants round the crackling fire;
Here while the glow of joy suffused his face,
He told his ancient exploits in the chase,
And, proud his rival sportsmen to surpass,
He lit again the pipe, and fill'd again the glass.

But now no more was heard at early morn
The echoing clangor of the huntsman's horn;
No more the eager hounds with deepening cry
Leapt round him as they knew their pastime nigh;
The Squire no more obey'd the morning call,
Nor favourite spaniels fill'd the sportsman's hall;
For he, the last descendant of his race,
Slept with his fathers, and forgot the chase.
There now in petty empire o'er the school
The mighty master held despotic rule;
Trembling in silence all his deeds we saw,
His look a mandate, and his word a law;
Severe his voice, severe and stern his mien,
And wondrous strict he was, and wondrous wise I ween.

Even now through many a long long year I trace
The hour when first with awe I view'd his face;
Even now recall my entrance at the dome,
'Twas the first day I ever left my home!
Years intervening have not worn away
The deep remembrance of that wretched day,
Nor taught me to forget my earliest fears,
A mother's fondness, and a mother's tears;
When close she prest me to her sorrowing heart,
As loth as even I myself to part;
And I, as I beheld her sorrows flow,
With painful effort hid my inward woe.

But time to youthful troubles brings relief,
And each new object weans the child from grief.
Like April showers the tears of youth descend,
Suddenly they fall, and suddenly they end,
And fresher pleasure cheers the following hour,
As brighter shines the sun after the April shower.

Methinks even now the interview I see,
The Mistress's glad smile, the Master's glee;
Much of my future happiness they said,
Much of the easy life the scholars led,
Of spacious play-ground and of wholesome air,
The best instruction and the tenderest care;
And when I followed to the garden-door
My father, till through tears I saw no more, . .
How civilly they sooth'd my parting pain,
And never did they speak so civilly again.

Why loves the soul on earlier years to dwell,
When Memory spreads around her saddening spell,
When discontent, with sullen gloom o'ercast,
Turns from the present and prefers the past?
Why calls reflection to my pensive view
Each trifling act of infancy anew,
Each trifling act with pleasure pondering o'er,
Even at the time when trifles please no more?
Yet is remembrance sweet, though well I know
The days of childhood are but days of woe;
Some rude restraint, some petty tyrant sours
What else should be our sweetest blithest hours;
Yet is it sweet to call those hours to mind, . .
Those easy hours for ever left behind;
Ere care began the spirit to oppress,
When ignorance itself was happiness.

Such was my state in those remember'd years
When two small acres bounded all my fears;
And therefore still with pleasure I recall
The tapestried school, the bright brown-boarded hall,

The murmuring brook, that every morning saw
The due observance of the cleanly law;
The walnuts, where, when favour would allow,
Full oft I went to search each well-stript bough;
The crab-tree, which supplied a secret hoard
With roasted crabs to deck the wintry board;
Those trifling objects then my heart possess'd,
These trifling objects still remain imprest;
So when with unskill'd hand some idle hind
Carves his rude name within a sapling's rind,
In after years the peasant lives to see
The expanding letters grow as grows the tree;
Though every winter's desolating sway
Shake the hoarse grove and sweep the leaves away,
That rude inscription uneffaced will last,
Unalter'd by the storm or wintry blast.

Oh while well pleased the letter'd traveller roams
Among old temples, palaces, and domes,
Strays with the Arab o'er the wreck of time
Where erst Palmyra's towers arose sublime,
Or marks the lazy Turk's lethargic pride,
And Grecian slavery on Ilyssus' side,
Oh be it mine, aloof from public strife,
To mark the changes of domestic life,

The alter'd scenes where once I bore a part.
Where every change of fortune strikes the heart.
As when the merry bells with echoing sound
Proclaim the news of victory around,
Rejoicing patriots run the news to spread
Of glorious conquest and of thousands dead,
All join the loud huzzah with eager breath,
And triumph in the tale of blood and death;
But if extended on the battle-plain,
Cut off in conquest some dear friend be slain,
Affection then will fill the sorrowing eye,
And suffering Nature grieve that one should die.

Cold was the morn, and bleak the wintry blast
Blew o'er the meadow, when I saw thee last.
My bosom bounded as I wander'd round
With silent step the long-remember'd ground,
Where I had loiter'd oft so many an hour,
Chased the gay butterfly, and cull'd the flower,
Sought the swift arrow's erring course to trace,
Or with mine equals vied amid the chase.
I saw the church where I had slept away
The tedious service of the summer day;
Or, hearing sadly all the preacher told,
In winter waked and shiver'd with the cold,
Oft have my footsteps roam'd the sacred ground
Where heroes, kings, and poets sleep around;
Oft traced the mouldering castle's ivied wall,
Or aged convent tottering to its fall;
Yet never had my bosom felt such pain,
As, Corston, when I saw thy scenes again;
For many a long-lost pleasure came to view,
For many a long-past sorrow rose anew;
Where whilom all were friends I stood alone,
Unknowing all I saw, of all I saw unknown.

There, where my little hands were wont to rear
With pride the earliest salad of the year;
Where never idle weed to spring was seen,
Rank thorns and nettles rear'd their heads obscene.
Still all around and sad, I saw no more
The playful group, nor heard the playful roar;
There echoed round no shout of mirth and glee,
It seem'd as though the world were changed like me!

Enough! it hoots not on the past to dwell, . .
Fair scene of other years, a long farewell!
Rouse up, my soul! it hoots not to repine,
Rouse up! for worthier feelings should be thine;
Thy path is plain and straight, . . that light is given, . .
Onward in faith, . . and leave the rest to Heaven.

Oxford, 1794.

HYMN TO THE PENATES.

"Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches; feed me with food convenient for me."

The words of Agur.

ΟΙΚΟΙ βελτιων υμαι, επι βλαβειν τε θυρη.

Hesiod.

Yet one Song more! one high and solemn strain
Ere, Phoebus! on thy temple's ruin'd wall
I hang the silent harp: there may its strings,
When the rude tempest shakes the aged pile,
Make melancholy music. One song more!
PENATES, hear me! for to you I hymn
The votive lay; whether, as sages deem,
Ye dwell in inmost Heaven, the Counsellors²
Of Jove; or if, Supreme of Deities,
All things are yours, and in your holy train
Jove proudly ranks, and Juno, white-arm'd Queen,
And wisest of Immortals, the dread Maid
Athenian Pallas. Venerable Powers,
Hearken your hymn of praise! Though from your rites

Estranged, and exiled from your altars long,
I have not ceased to love you, Household Gods!
In many a long and melancholy hour
Of solitude and sorrow, hath my heart
With earnest longings pray'd to rest at length
Beside your hallow'd hearth, . . . for Peace is there!
Yes, I have loved you long! I call on ye
Yourselves to witness with what holy joy,
Shunning the common herd of humankind,
I have retired to watch your lonely fires
And commune with myself: . . . delightful hours,
That gave mysterious pleasure, made me know
Mine inmost heart, its weakness and its strength,
Taught me to cherish with devoutest care
Its deep unworldly feelings, taught me too
The best of lessons — to respect myself.

Nor have I ever ceased to reverence you,
Domestic Deities! from the first dawn
Of reason, through the adventurous paths of youth
Even to this better day, when on mine ear
The uproar of contending nations sounds
But like the passing wind, and wakes no pulse
To tumult. When a child . . . (for still I love
To dwell with fondness on my childish years,)
When first, a little one, I left my home,
I can remember the first grief I felt,
And the first painful smile that clothed my front
With feelings not its own: sadly at night
I sat me down beside a stranger's hearth;

And when the lingering hour of rest was come,
First wet with tears my pillow. As I grew
In years and knowledge, and the course of time
Developed the young feelings of my heart,
When most I loved in solitude to rove
Amid the woodland gloom; or where the rocks
Darken'd old Avon's stream, in the ivied cave
Recluse to sit and brood the future song, . . .
Yet not the less, PENATES, loved I then
Your altars; not the less at evening hour
Loved I beside the well-trimm'd fire to sit,
Absorb'd in many a dear deceitful dream
Of visionary joys, . . . deceitful dreams, . . .
And yet not vain; for painting purest bliss,
They form'd to Fancy's mould her votary's heart.

By Cherwell's sedgey side, and in the meads
Where Isis in her calm clear stream reflects
The willow's bending boughs, at early dawn,
In the noon-tide hour, and when the night-mist
rose,

I have remember'd you; and when the noise
Of lewd Intemperance on my lonely ear
Burst with loud tumult, as recluse I sate,
Musing on days when man should be redeem'd
From servitude, and vice, and wretchedness,
I bless'd you, Household Gods! because I loved
Your peaceful altars and serenest rites.
Nor did I cease to reverence you, when driven
Amid the jarring crowd, an unfit man
To mingle with the world, still, still my heart
Sigh'd for your sanctuary, and inly pined;
And loathing human converse, I have stray'd
Where o'er the sea-beach chilly howl'd the blast,
And gazed upon the world of waves, and wish'd
That I were far beyond the Atlantic deep,
In woodland haunts, a sojourner with Peace.

Not idly did the ancient poets dream,
Who peopled earth with Deities. They trod
The wood with reverence where the Dryads dwelt;
At day's dim dawn or evening's misty hour
They saw the Oreads on their mountain haunts,
And felt their holy influence; nor impure
Of thought, nor ever with polluted hands,³

¹ Hence one explanation of the name Penates, because they were supposed to reign in the inmost heavens.

² This was the belief of the ancient Etrusci, who called them Concertes and Complices.

³ Μηδὲ πον' αἰνῶν ποταμῶν παλλίσθον ὕδαρ
Ποσει πικρῶ, πρὶν γ' ἐνθ' ἰδῶν ἐς καλὰ μίθρα,
Χιμαρὶ νύμφημος πολυπράτῃ ὕδατι λῶσθαι
Ὅς ποταμῶν διαδῶν, κακοῦντι δι' χιμαρῶν αἰνῶντες,
Τρὶς θύει νύμφησιν, καὶ ἀλγέα δάκρυα σπένδων.—Hesiod.

Touch'd they without a prayer the Nalad's spring;
 Nor without reverence to the River God
 Cross'd in unhappy hour his limpid stream.
 Yet was this influence transient; such brief awe
 Inspiring as the thunder's long loud peal
 Strikes to the feeble spirit. Household Gods,
 Not such your empire! in your votaries' breasts
 No momentary impulse ye awake;
 Nor fleeting, like their local energies,
 The deep devotion that your fanes impart.
 O ye whom Youth has wilder'd on your way,
 Or Pleasure with her siren song hath lured,
 Or Fame with spirit-stirring trump hath call'd
 To climb her summits, . . . to your Household Gods
 Return; for not in Pleasure's gay abodes,
 Nor in the unquiet unsafe halls of Fame
 Doth Happiness abide. O ye who grieve
 Much for the miseries of your fellow-kind,
 More for their vices; ye whose honest eyes
 Scowl on Oppression, — ye whose honest hearts
 Beat high when Freedom sounds her dread alarm;
 O ye who quit the path of peaceful life
 Crusading for mankind . . . a spaniel race
 That lick the hand that beats them, or tear all
 Alike in frenzy; to your Household Gods
 Return! for by their altars Virtue dwells,
 And Happiness with her; for by their fires
 Tranquillity, in no unsocial mood,
 Sits silent, listening to the pattering shower;
 For, so Suspicion¹ sleep not at the gate
 Of Wisdom, Falsehood shall not enter there.

As on the height of some huge eminence,
 Reach'd with long labour, the way-faring man
 Pauses awhile, and gazing o'er the plain
 With many a sore step travell'd, turns him then
 Serious to contemplate the onward road,
 And calls to mind the comforts of his home,
 And sighs that he has left them, and resolves
 To stray no more: I on my way of life
 Muse thus, Penates, and with firmest faith
 Devote myself to you. I will not quit,
 To mingle with the crowd, your calm abodes,
 Where by the evening hearth Contentment sits
 And hears the cricket chirp; where Love delights
 To dwell, and on your altars lays his torch
 That burns with no extinguishable flame.

Hear me, ye Powers benignant! there is one
 Must be mine inmate, . . . for I may not choose
 But love him. He is one whom many wrongs

¹ "Where'er thy feet the river ford essay,
 Whose flowing current winds its limpid way,
 Thy hands amid the pleasant waters lave;
 And lowly gazing on the beauteous wave,
 Appease the River God: if thou perverse
 Pass with unsprinkled hands, a heavy curse
 Shall rest upon thee from the observant skies,
 And after-woes retributive arise." Elton.

² "Oft though Wisdom wake, Suspicion sleeps
 At Wisdom's gate, and to Simplicity
 Resigns her charge, while Goodness thinks no ill
 Where no ill seems." Milton.

³ One of the ways and means of the tyrant Nabils. If one of his subjects refused to lend him money, he commanded

Have sicken'd of the world. There was a time
 When he would weep to hear of wickedness,
 And wonder at the tale; when for the oppressor
 He felt a brother's pity, to the oppressor
 A good man's honest anger. His quick eye
 Betray'd each rising feeling; every thought
 Leapt to his tongue. When first among mankind
 He mingled, by himself he judged of them,
 And loved and trusted them, to Wisdom deaf,
 And took them to his bosom. Falsehood met
 Her unsuspecting victim, fair of front,
 And lovely as Apega's² sculptured form.
 Like that false image caught his warm embrace,
 And pierced his open breast. The reptile race
 Clung round his bosom, and with viper folds
 Encircling, stung the fool who foster'd them.
 His mother was Simplicity, his sire
 Benevolence; in earlier days he bore
 His father's name; the world who injured him
 Call him Misanthropy. I may not choose
 But love him, Household Gods! for we grew up
 Together, and in the same school were bred,
 And our poor fortunes the same course have held,
 Up to this hour.

Penates! some there are
 Who say, that not in the inmost heaven ye dwell,
 Gazing with eye remote on all the ways
 Of man, his Guardian Gods; wiselier they deem
 A dearer interest to the human race
 Links you, yourselves the Spirits of the Dead.
 No mortal eye may pierce the invisible world,
 No light of human reason penetrate
 The depth where Truth lies hid. Yet to this faith
 My heart with instant sympathy assents;
 And I would judge all systems and all faiths
 By that best touchstone, from whose test Decelt
 Shrinks like the Arch-Fiend at Ithuriel's spear;
 And Sophistry's gay glittering bubble bursts,
 As at the spousals of the Nereid's son,
 When that false Florimel³, with her prototype
 Set side by side, in her unreal charms,
 Dissolved away.

Nor can the halls of Heaven
 Give to the human soul such kindred joy,
 As hovering o'er its earthly haunts it feels,
 When with the breeze it dwells around the brow
 Of one beloved on earth; or when at night
 In dreams it comes, and brings with it the Days
 And Joys that are no more. Or when, perchance
 With power permitted to alleviate ill
 And fit the sufferer for the coming woe, him to embrace his Apega; the statue of a beautiful Woman so formed as to clasp the victim to her breast, in which a pointed dagger was concealed.

³ "Then did he set her by that snowy one,
 Like the true saint beside the image set,
 Of both their beauties to make paragone
 And trial whether should the honour get;
 Streightway so soon as both together met.
 The enchanted damself vanish'd into nought;
 Her snowy substance melted as with heat;
 Ne of that goodly hew remain'd ought
 But the empty girdle which about her waist was wrought." Spenser.

Some strange presage the Spirit breathes, and fills
The breast with ominous fear, preparing it
For sorrow, pours into the afflicted heart
The balm of resignation, and inspires
With heavenly hope. Even as a child delights
To visit day by day the favourite plant
His hand has sown, to mark its gradual growth,
And watch all-anxious for the promised flower;
Thus to the blest spirit in innocence
And pure affections like a little child,
Sweet will it be to hover o'er the friends
Beloved; then sweetest, if, as duty prompts,
With earthly care we in their breasts have sown
The seeds of Truth and Virtue, holy flowers
Whose odour reacheth Heaven.

"When my sick Heart
(Sick! with hope long delay'd, than which no care Weighs on the spirit heavier,) from itself
Seeks the best comfort, often have I deem'd
That thou didst witness every inmost thought,
SEWARD! my dear! dear friend! For not in vain,
O early summon'd on thy heavenly course,
Was thy brief sojourn here; me didst thou leave
With strengthen'd step to follow the right path,
Till we shall meet again. Meantime I soothe
The deep regret of nature, with belief,
O EDMUND! that thine eye's celestial ken
Pervades me now, marking with no mean joy
The movements of the heart that loved thee well!

Such feelings Nature prompts, and hence your rites,

Domestic Gods! arose. When for his son
With ceaseless grief Syrophanes bewail'd,
Mourning his age left childless, and his wealth
Heapt for an alien, he with obstinate eye
Still on the imaged marble of the dead
Dwelt, pampering sorrow. Thither from his wrath,
A safe asylum, fled the offending slave,
And garlanded the statue, and implored
His young lost lord to save. Remembrance then Softened the father, and he loved to see
The votive wreath renew'd, and the rich smoke
Curl from the costly censer slow and sweet.
From Egypt soon the sorrow-soothing rites
Divulging spread; before your idol forms¹
By every hearth the blinded Pagan knelt,
Pouring his prayers to these, and offering there
Vain sacrifice or impious, and sometimes
With human blood your sanctuary defiled.
Till the first Brutus, tyrant-conquering chief,
Arose; he first the implous rites put down,
He fittest, who for Freedom lived and died,
The friend of humankind. Then did your feasts
Frequent recur and blameless; and when came
The solemn festival², whose happiest rites
Emblem'd Equality, the holiest truth,
Crown'd with gay garlands were your statues seen,
To you the fragrant censer smoked, to you

¹ "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick." Proverbs.

"Qua non gravior mortalibus addita cura,
Sæpe ubi longa venit." Statius.

² It is not certainly known under what form the Penates

The rich libation flowed: vain sacrifice!
For not the poppy wreath nor fruits nor wine
Ye ask, Penates! nor the altar cleansed
With many a mystic form; ye ask the heart
Made pure, and by domestic Peace and Love
Hallow'd to you.

Hearken your hymn of praise,
Penates! to your shrines I come for rest,
There only to be found. Often at eve,
As in my wanderings I have seen far off
Some lonely light that spake of comfort there,
It told my heart of many a joy of home,
When I was homeless. Often as I gazed
From some high eminence on goodly vales
And cots and villages embower'd below,
The thought would rise that all to me was strange
Amid the scene so fair, nor one small spot
Where my tired mind might rest, and call it Home.
There is a magic in that little word:
It is a mystic circle that surrounds
Comforts and virtues never known beyond
The hallowed limit. Often has my heart
Ached for that quiet haven! Haven'd now,
I think of those in this world's wilderness
Who wander on and find no home of rest
Till to the grave they go: then Poverty,
Hollow-eyed fiend, the child of Wealth and Power,
Had offspring of worse parents, aye afflict,
Cankering with her foul mildews the chill'd heart; . .
Them warring with scorpion scourge drives to the den
Of Guilt: . . them Slaughter for the price of death
Throws to her raven brood. Oh, not on them,
God of eternal Justice! not on them
Let fall thy thunder!

Household Deities!

Then only shall be Happiness on earth
When man shall feel your sacred power, and love
Your tranquil joys; then shall the city stand
A huge void sepulchre, and on the site
Where fortresses and palaces have stood,
The olive grow, there shall the Tree of Peace
Strike its roots deep and flourish. This the state
Shall bless the race redeem'd of Man, when Wealth
And Power and all their hideous progeny
Shall sink annihilate, and all mankind
Live in the equal brotherhood of love.
Heart-calming hope, and sure! for hitherward
Tend all the tumults of the troubled world,
Its woes, its wisdom, and its wickedness
Alike; . . so He hath will'd, whose will is just.

Meantime, all hoping and expecting all
In patient faith, to you, Domestic Gods!
Studious of other lore than song, I come.
Yet shall my Heart remember the past years
With honest pride, trusting that not in vain
Lives the pure song of Liberty and Truth.

ENGLISH ECLOGUES.

THE following Eclogues, I believe, bear no resemblance to any poems in our language. This species of composition has become popular in Germany, and I was induced to attempt it by what was told me of the German Idylls by my friend Mr. William Taylor of Norwich. So far, therefore, these pieces may be deemed imitations, though I am not acquainted with the German language at present, and have never seen any translations or specimens in this kind.

With bad Eclogues I am sufficiently acquainted, from Tityrus and Corydon down to our English Strephons and Thiraissees. No kind of poetry can boast of more illustrious names, or is more distinguished by the servile dulness of imitated nonsense. Pastoral writers, "more silly than their sheep," have, like their sheep, gone on in the same track one after another. Gay struck into a new path. His eclogues were the only ones which interested me when I was a boy, and did not know they were burlesque. The subject would furnish matter for an essay, but this is not the place for it.

THE OLD MANSION-HOUSE.

STRANGER.

OLD friend! why you seem bent on parish duty,
Breaking the highway stones, . . and 'tis a task
Somewhat too hard methinks for age like yours!

OLD MAN.

Why yes! for one with such a weight of years
Upon his back! . . I've lived here, man and boy,
In this same parish, well nigh the full age
Of man, being hard upon threescore and ten.
I can remember sixty years ago
The beautifying of this mansion here,
When my late Lady's father, the old Squire,
Came to the estate.

STRANGER.

Why then you have outlasted
All his improvements, for you see they're making
Great alterations here.

OLD MAN.

Ay . . great indeed!
And if my poor old Lady could rise up . .
God rest her soul! 'twould grieve her to behold
What wicked work is here.

STRANGER.

They've set about it
In right good earnest. All the front is gone;
Here's to be turf, they tell me, and a road
Round to the doog. There were some yew trees too
Stood in the court. . .

OLD MAN.

Ay, Master! fine old trees!
Lord bless us! I have heard my father say
His grandfather could just remember back
When they were planted there. It was my task
To keep them trimm'd, and 'twas a pleasure to me;
All straight and smooth, and like a great green wall!
My poor old lady many a time would come
And tell me where to clip, for she had play'd
In childhood under them, and 'twas her pride
To keep them in their beauty. Plague, I say,
On their new-fangled whimsies! we shall have
A modern shrubbery here stuck full of firs
And your pert poplar trees; . . I could as soon
Have plough'd my father's grave as cut them down!

STRANGER.

But 'twill be lighter and more cheerful now;
A fine smooth turf, and with a carriage road
That sweeps conveniently from gate to gate.
I like a shrubbery too, for it looks fresh;
And then there's some variety about it.
In spring the lilac and the snow-ball flower,
And the laburnum with its golden strings
Waving in the wind: And when the autumn comes
The bright red berries of the mountain-ash,
With pines enough in winter to look green,
And show that something lives. Sure this is better
Than a great hedge of yew, making it look
All the year round like winter, and for ever
Dropping its poisonous leaves from the under boughs
Wither'd and bare.

OLD MAN.

Ay! so the new Squire thinks;
And pretty work he makes of it! What 'tis
To have a stranger come to an old house!

STRANGER.

It seems you know him not?

OLD MAN.

No, Sir, not I.
They tell me he's expected dally now;
But in my Lady's time he never came
But once, for they were very distant kin.
If he had play'd about here when a child
In that fore court, and eat the yew-berries,
And sat in the porch, threading the jessamine flowers
Which fell so thick, he had not had the heart
To mar all thus!

STRANGER.

* Come! come! all is not wrong;
Those old dark windows. . .

OLD MAN.

They're demolish'd too, . .
As if he could not see through casement glass !
The very red-breasts, that so regular
Came to my Lady for her morning crumbs,
We'n't know the windows now !

STRANGER.

Nay they were small,
And then so darken'd round with jessamine,
Harbouring the vermin ; . . yet I could have wish'd
That jessamine had been saved, which canopied
And bower'd and lined the porch.

OLD MAN.

It did one good
To pass within ten yards when 'twas in blossom.
There was a sweet-briar too that grew beside ;
My Lady loved at evening to sit there
And knit ; and her old dog lay at her feet
And slept in the sun ; 'twas an old favourite dog, . .
She did not love him less that he was old
And feeble, and he always had a place
By the fire-side : and when he died at last
She made me dig a grave in the garden for him.
For she was good to all ! a woeful day
'Twas for the poor when to her grave she went !

STRANGER.

They lost a friend then ?

OLD MAN.

You're a stranger here,
Or you wouldn't ask that question. Were they sick ?
She had rare cordial waters, and for herbs
She could have taught the Doctors. Then at winter,
When weekly she distributed the bread
In the poor old porch, to see her and to hear
The blessings on her ! and I warrant them
They were a blessing to her when her wealth
Had been no comfort else. At Christmas, Sir !
It would have warm'd your heart if you had seen
Her Christmas kitchen, . . how the blazing fire
Made her fine pewter shine, and holly boughs
So cheerful red, . . and as for misseltow, . .
The finest bush that grew in the country round
Was mark'd for Madam. Then her old ale went
So bountiful about ! a Christmas cask,
And 'twas a noble one ! . . God help me, Sir !
But I shall never see such days again.

STRANGER.

Things may be better yet than you suppose,
And you should hope the best.

OLD MAN.

It don't look well, . .
These alterations, Sir ! I'm an old man,
And love the good old fashions ; we don't find
Old bounty in new houses. They've destroy'd
All that my Lady loved ; her favourite walk
Grubb'd up, . . and they do say that the great row
Of elms behind the house, which meet a-top,
They must fall too. Well ! well ! I did not think
To live to see all this, and 'tis perhaps
A comfort I shan't live to see it long.

STRANGER.

But sure all changes are not needs for the worse,
My friend ?

OLD MAN.

May-hap they mayn't, Sir ; . . for all that I like what I've been used to. I remember
All this from a child up, and now to lose it,
'Tis losing an old friend. There's nothing left
As 'twas ; . . I go abroad and only meet
With men whose fathers I remember boys ;
The brook that used to run before my door,
That's gone to the great pond ; the trees I learnt
To climb are down ; and I see nothing now
That tells me of old times, . . except the stones
In the churchyard. You are young, Sir, and I hope
Have many years in store, . . but pray to God
You mayn't be left the last of all your friends.

STRANGER.

Well ! well ! you've one friend more than you're aware of.
If the Squire's taste don't suit with yours, I warrant
That's all you'll quarrel with ; walk in and taste
His beer, old friend ! and see if your old Lady
E'er broach'd a better cask. You did not know me,
But we're acquainted now. 'Twould not be easy
To make you like the outside ; but within,
That is not changed, my friend ! you'll always find
The same old bounty and old welcome there.

THE GRANDMOTHER'S TALE.

JANE.

HARRY ! I'm tired of playing. We'll draw round
The fire, and Grandmamma perhaps will tell us
One of her stories.

HARRY.

Ay . . dear Grandmamma !
A pretty story ! something dismal now ;
A bloody murder.

JANE.

Or about a ghost.

GRANDMOTHER.

Nay, nay, I should but frighten ye. You know
The other night when I was telling ye
About the light in the churchyard, how you trembled
Because the screech-owl hooted at the window,
And would not go to bed.

JANE.

Why, Grandmamma,
You said yourself you did not like to hear him.
Pray now ! . . we won't be frightened.

GRANDMOTHER.

Well, well, children !

But you've heard all my stories. . . Let me see, . . .
Did I never tell you how the smuggler murder'd
The woman down at Pill ?

HARRY.

No . . never ! never !

GRANDMOTHER.

Not how he cut her head off in the stable ?

HARRY.

Oh . . . now ! . . . do tell us that !

GRANDMOTHER.

You must have heard

Your mother, children ! often tell of her.
She used to weed in the garden here, and worm
Your uncle's dogs¹, and serve the house with coal ;
And glad enough she was in winter time
To drive her asses here ! It was cold work
To follow the slow beasts through sleet and snow ;
And here she found a comfortable meal
And a brave fire to thaw her, for poor Moll
Was always welcome.

HARRY.

Oh ! 'twas blear-eyed Moll

The collier woman, . . a great ugly woman ;
I've heard of her.

GRANDMOTHER.

Ugly enough, poor soul !

At ten yards' distance you could hardly tell
If it were man or woman, for her voice
Was rough as our old mastiff's, and she wore
A man's old coat and hat : . . and then her face !
There was a merry story told of her,
How when the press-gang came to take her husband
As they were both in bed, she heard them coming,
Drest John up in her night-cap, and herself
Put on his clothes and went before the captain.

JANE.

And so they prest a woman !

GRANDMOTHER.

'Twas a trick

She dearly loved to tell ; and all the country
Soon knew the jest, for she was used to travel
For miles around. All weathers and all hours
She cross'd the hill, as hardy as her beasts,
Bearing the wind and rain and drifting snow.
And if she did not reach her home at night,
She laid her down in the stable with her asses,
And slept as sound as they did.

HARRY.

With her asses !

GRANDMOTHER.

Yes ; and she loved her beasts. For though, poor
She was a terrible reprobate, and swore [wretch,
Like any trooper, she was always good

¹ I know not whether this cruel and stupid custom is common in other parts of England. It is supposed to prevent

To the dumb creatures ; never loaded them
Beyond their strength ; and rather, I believe,
Would stint herself than let the poor beasts want,
Because, she said, they could not ask for food.
I never saw her stick fall heavier on them
Than just with its own weight. She little thought
This tender-heartedness would cause her death !
There was a fellow who had oftentimes,
As if he took delight in cruelty,
Ill-used her beasts. He was a man who lived
By smuggling, and, . . for she had often met him,
Crossing the down at night, . . she threaten'd him,
If ever he abused them more, to inform
Of his unlawful ways. Well . . so it was . .
'Twas what they both were born to ! he provoked her :
She laid an information ; and one morning
They found her in the stable, her throat cut
From ear to ear, till the head only hung
Just by a bit of skin.

JANE.

Oh dear ! oh dear !

HARRY.

I hope they hung the man !

GRANDMOTHER.

They took him up ;

There was no proof, no one had seen the deed,
And he was set at liberty. But God,
Whose eye beholdeth all things, He had seen
The murder ; and the murderer knew that God
Was witness to his crime. He fled the place, . .
But nowhere could he fly the avenging hand
Of Heaven, . . but nowhere could the murderer rest ; . .
A guilty conscience haunted him ; by day,
By night, in company, in solitude,
Restless and wretched, did he bear upon him
The weight of blood. Her cries were in his ears ;
Her stifled groans, as when he knelt upon her,
Always he heard ; always he saw her stand
Before his eyes ; even in the dead of night -
Distinctly seen as though in the broad sun,
She stood beside the murderer's bed, and yawn'd
Her ghastly wound ; till life itself became
A punishment at last he could not bear,
And he confess'd it all, and gave himself
To death ; so terrible, he said, it was
To have a guilty conscience !

HARRY.

Was he hung, then ?

GRANDMOTHER.

Hung and anatomized. Poor wretched man,
Your uncles went to see him on his trial ;
He was so pale, so thin, so hollow-eyed,
And such a horror in his meagre face,
They said he look'd like one who never slept.
He begg'd the prayers of all who saw his end,
And met his death with fears that well might warn
From guilt, though not without a hope in Christ.

the dogs from doing any mischief, should they afterwards become mad.

III.

HANNAH.

PASSING across a green and lonely lane
A funeral met our view. It was not here
A sight of every day, as in the streets
Of some great city, and we stopt and ask'd
Whom they were bearing to the grave. A girl,
They answer'd, of the village, who had pined
Through the long course of eighteen painful months
With such slow wasting, that the hour of death
Came welcome to her. We pursued our way
To the house of mirth, and with that idle talk
Which passes o'er the mind and is forgot,
We wore away the time. But it was eve
When homewardly I went, and in the air
Was that cool freshness, that discolouring shade
Which makes the eye turn inward: hearing then
Over the vale the heavy toll of death
Sound slow, it made me think upon the dead;
I question'd more, and learnt her mournful tale.

She bore unhusbanded a mother's pains,
And he who should have cherish'd her, far off
Sail'd on the seas. Left thus, a wretched one,
Scorn made a mock of her, and evil tongues
Were busy with her name. She had to bear
The sharper sorrow of neglect from him
Whom she had loved too dearly. Once he wrote
But only once that drop of comfort came
To mingle with her cup of wretchedness;
And when his parents had some tidings from him,
There was no mention of poor Hannah there,
Or 'twas the cold inquiry, more unkind
Than silence. So she pined and pined away,
And for herself and baby toil'd and toil'd;
Nor did she, even on her death-bed, rest
From labour, knitting there with lifted arms,
Till she sunk with very weakness. Her old mother
Omitted no kind office, working for her,
Albeit her hardest labour barely earn'd
Enough to keep life struggling, and prolong
The pains of grief and sickness. Thus she lay
On the sick bed of poverty, worn out
With her long suffering and those painful thoughts
Which at her heart were rankling, and so weak,
That she could make no effort to express
Affection for her infant; and the child,
Whose lisping love perhaps had solaced her,
Shunn'd her as one indifferent. But she too
Had grown indifferent to all things of earth,
Finding her only comfort in the thought
Of that cold bed wherein the wretched rest.
There had she now, in that last home, been laid,
And all was over now, . . . sickness and grief,
Her shame, her suffering, and her penitence, . . .
Their work was done. The school-boys as they sport
In the churchyard, for awhile might turn away
From the fresh grave till grass should cover it;
Nature would do that office soon; and none

IV.

THE SAILOR'S MOTHER.

WOMAN.

Sir, for the love of God, some small relief
To a poor woman!

TRAVELLER.

Whither are you bound?

'Tis a late hour to travel o'er these downs,
No house for miles around us, and the way
Dreary and wild. The evening wind already
Makes one's teeth chatter; and the very Sun,
Setting so pale behind those thin white clouds,
Looks cold. 'Twill be a bitter night!

WOMAN.

Ay, Sir,

'Tis cutting keen! I smart at every breath;
Heaven knows how I shall reach my journey's end,
For the way is long before me, and my feet,
God help me! sore with travelling. I would gladly,
If it pleased God, at once lie down and die.

TRAVELLER.

Nay, nay, cheer up! a little food and rest
Will comfort you; and then your journey's end
May make amends for all. You shake your head,
And weep. Is it some mournful business then
That leads you from your home?

WOMAN.

Sir, I am going

To see my son at Plymouth, sadly hurt
In the late action, and in the hospital
Dying, I fear me, now.

TRAVELLER.

Perhaps your fears

Make evil worse. Even if a limb be lost,
There may be still enough for comfort left;
An arm or leg shot off, there's yet the heart
To keep life warm, and he may live to talk
With pleasure of the glorious fight that maim'd him,
Proud of his loss. Old England's gratitude
Makes the maim'd Sailor happy.

WOMAN.

'Tis not that, . . .

An arm or leg . . . I could have borne with that.
It was no ball, Sir, but some cursed thing
Which bursts¹ and burns, that hurt him. Something,
Sir,

right and humane to employ means of destruction, could they be discovered, powerful enough to destroy fleets and armies; but to use any thing that only inflicts additional torture upon the sufferers in war, is altogether wicked.

They do not use on board our English ships,
It is so wicked !

TRAVELLER.

Rascals ! a mean art
Of cruel cowardice, yet all in vain !

WOMAN.

Yes, Sir ! and they should show no mercy to them
For making use of such unchristian arms.
I had a letter from the hospital,
He got some friend to write it, and he tells me
That my poor boy has lost his precious eyes,
Burnt out. Alas ! that I should ever live
To see this wretched day ! . . . They tell me, Sir,
There is no cure for wounds like his. Indeed
'Tis a hard journey that I go upon
To such a dismal end !

TRAVELLER.

He yet may live.

But if the worst should chance, why you must bear
The will of Heaven with patience. Were it not
Some comfort to reflect your son has fallen
Fighting his country's cause ? and for yourself
You will not in unpitied poverty
Be left to mourn his loss. Your grateful country,
Amid the triumph of her victory,
Remembers those who paid its price of blood,
And with a noble charity relieves
The widow and the orphan.

WOMAN.

God reward them !

God bless them ! It will help me in my age, . .
But, Sir ! it will not pay me for my child !

TRAVELLER.

Was he your only child ?

WOMAN.

My only one,

The stay and comfort of my widowhood,
A dear good boy ! . . . When first he went to sea
I felt what it would come to, . . . something told me
I should be childless soon. But tell me, Sir,
If it be true that for a hurt like his
There is no cure ? Please God to spare his life
Though he be blind, yet I should be so thankful !
I can remember there was a blind man
Lived in our village, one from his youth up
Quite dark, and yet he was a merry man,
And he had none to tend on him so well
As I would tend my boy !

TRAVELLER.

Of this be sure,

His hurts are look'd to well, and the best help
The land affords, as rightly is his due,
Ever at hand. How happen'd it he left you ?
Was a seafaring life his early choice ?

WOMAN.

No, Sir ! poor fellow, . . . he was wise enough
To be content at home, and 'twas a home
As comfortable, Sir ! even though I say it,

As any in the country. He was left
A little boy when his poor father died,
Just old enough to totter by himself,
And call his mother's name. We two were all,
And as we were not left quite destitute,
We bore up well. In the summer time I work'd
Sometimes a-field. Then I was famed for knitting,
And in long winter nights my spinning wheel
Seldom stood still. We had kind neighbours too,
And never felt distress. So he grew up
A comely lad, and wondrous well disposed ;
I taught him well ; there was not in the parish
A child who said his prayers more regular,
Or answered readier through his Catechism.
If I had foreseen this ! but 'tis a blessing
We don't know what we're born to !

TRAVELLER.

But how came it

He chose to be a Sailor ?

WOMAN.

You shall hear, Sir ;

As he grew up he used to watch the birds
In the corn, child's work you know, and easily done.
'Tis an idle sort of task ; so he built up
A little hut of wicker-work and clay
Under the hedge, to shelter him in rain :
And then he took, for very idleness,
To making traps to catch the plunderers ;
All sorts of cunning traps that boys can make, . .
Propping a stone to fall and shut them in,
Or crush them with its weight, or else a springe
Swung on a bough. He made them cleverly, . .
And, I, poor foolish woman ! I was pleased
To see the boy so handy. You may guess
What follow'd, Sir, from this unlucky skill.
He did what he should not when he was older :
I warn'd him oft enough ; but he was caught
In wiring hares at last, and had his choice,
The prison or the ship.

TRAVELLER.

The choice at least

Was kindly left him ; and for broken laws
This was, methinks, no heavy punishment.

WOMAN.

So I was told, Sir. And I tried to think so,
But 'twas a sad blow to me ! I was used
To sleep at nights as sweetly as a child, . .
Now if the wind blew rough, it made me start,
And think of my poor boy tossing about
Upon the roaring seas. And then I seem'd
To feel that it was hard to take him from me
For such a little fault. But he was wrong,
Oh very wrong, . . a murrain on his traps !
See what they've brought him to !

TRAVELLER.

Well ! well ! take comfort

He will be taken care of if he lives ;
And should you lose your child, this is a country
Where the brave Sailor never leaves a parent
To weep for him in want.

WOMAN.

Sir, I shall want
No succour long. In the common course of years
I soon must be at rest; and 'tis a comfort,
When grief is hard upon me, to reflect
It only leads me to that rest the sooner.

V.

THE WITCH.

NATHANIEL.

FATHER! here, father! I have found a horse-shoe!
Faith it was just in time; for t'other night
I laid two straws across at Margery's door,
And ever since I fear'd that she might do me
A mischief for't. There was the Miller's boy
Who set his dog at that black cat of hers, . .
I met him upon crutches, and he told me
'Twas all her evil eye.

FATHER.

'Tis rare good luck!
I would have gladly given a crown for one
If 'twould have done as well. But where didst find it?

NATHANIEL.

Down on the common; I was going a-field,
And neighbour Saunders pass'd me on his mare:
He had hardly said "Good day," before I saw
The shoe drop off. 'Twas just upon my tongue
To call him back; . . it makes no difference does it,
Because I know whose 'twas?

FATHER.

Why no, it can't.
The shoe's the same, you know; and you did find it.

NATHANIEL.

That mare of his has got a plaguy road
To travel, father; . . and if he should lame her, . .
For she is but tender-footed, . .

FATHER.

Ay, indeed! . .
I should not like to see her limping back,
Poor beast! . . But charity begins at home,
And, Nat, there's our own horse in such a way
This morning!

NATHANIEL.

Why he han't been rid again!
Last night I hung a pebble by the manger
With a hole through, and every body says
That 'tis a special charm against the hags.

FATHER.

It could not be a proper natural hole then,
Or 'twas not a right pebble; . . for I found him
Smoking with sweat, quaking in every limb,
And panting so! Lord knows where he had been

When we were all asleep, through bush and brake,
Up-hill and down-hill all alike, full stretch
At such a deadly rate! . .

NATHANIEL.

By land and water,
Over the sea, perhaps! . . I have heard tell
'Tis many thousand miles off at the end
Of the world, where witches go to meet the Devil.
They used to ride on broomsticks, and to smear
Some ointment over them, and then away
Out at the window! but 'tis worse than all
To worry the poor beasts so. Shame upon it
That in a Christian country they should let Such creatures live!

FATHER.

And when there's such plain proof!
I did but threaten her because she robb'd
Our hedge, and the next night there came a wind
That made me shake to hear it in my bed.
How came it that that storm unroof'd my barn,
And only mine in the parish? . . Look at her,
And that's enough; she has it in her face! . .
A pair of large dead eyes, sunk in her head,
Just like a corpse, and purs'd with wrinkles round;
A nose and chin that scarce leave room between
For her lean fingers to squeeze in the snuff;
And when she speaks! I'd sooner hear a raven
Croak at my door! . . She sits there, nose and knees,
Smoke-dried and shrivell'd over a starved fire,
With that black cat beside her, whose great eyes
Shine like old Beelzebub's; and to be sure
It must be one of his imps! . . Ay, nail it hard.

NATHANIEL.

I wish old Margery heard the hammer go!
She'd curse the music!

FATHER.

Here's the Curate coming,
He ought to rid the parish of such vermin!
In the old times they used to hunt them out,
And hang them without mercy; but, Lord bless us!
The world is grown so wicked!

CURATE.

Good day, Farmer!
Nathaniel, what art nailing to the threshold?

NATHANIEL.

A horse-shoe, Sir; 'tis good to keep off witchcraft,
And we're afraid of Margery.

CURATE.

Poor old woman!
What can you fear from her?

FATHER.

What can we fear?
Who lamed the Miller's boy? who raised the wind
That blew my old barn's roof down? who d'ye think
Rides my poor horse a' nights? who mocks the hounds?
But let me catch her at that trick again,
And I've a silver bullet ready for her,
One that shall lame her, double how she will.

NATHANIEL.

What makes her sit there moping by herself.
With no soul near her but that great black cat ?
And do but look at her !

CURATE.

Poor wretch ; half blind
And crooked with her years, without a child
Or friend in her old age, 'tis hard indeed
To have her very miseries made her crimes !
I met her but last week in that hard frost
Which made my young limbs ache, and when I ask'd
What brought her out in the snow, the poor old woman
Told me that she was forced to crawl abroad
And pick the hedges, just to keep herself
From perishing with cold, . . . because no neighbour
Had pity on her age : and then she cried,
And said the children pelted her with snow-balls,
And wish'd that she were dead.

FATHER.

I wish she was !
She has plagued the parish long enough !

CURATE.

Shame, Farmer !
Is that the charity your Bible teaches ?

FATHER.

My Bible does not teach me to love witches.
I know what's charity ; who pays his tithes
And poor-rates readier ?

CURATE.

Who can better do it ?
You've been a prudent and industrious man,
And God has blest your labour.

FATHER.

Why, thank God, Sir,
I've had no reason to complain of fortune.

CURATE.

Complain ? why you are wealthy ! All the parish
Look up to you.

FATHER.

Perhaps, Sir, I could tell
Guinea for guinea with the warmest of them.

CURATE.

You can afford a little to the poor ;
And then, what's better still, you have the heart
To give from your abundance.

FATHER.

God forbid
I should want charity !

CURATE.

Oh ! 'tis a comfort
To think at last of riches well employ'd !
I have been by a death-bed, and know the worth
Of a good deed at that most awful hour

When riches profit not.

Farmer, I'm going
To visit Margery. She is sick, I hear ; . .
Old, poor and sick ! a miserable lot,
And death will be a blessing. You might send her
Some little matter, something comfortable,
That she may go down easier to the grave,
And bless you when she dies.

FATHER.

What ! is she going ?
Well God forgive her then, if she has dealt
In the black art ! I'll tell my dame of it,
And she shall send her something.

CURATE.

So I'll say ;
And take my thanks for hers. [Goes]

FATHER.

That's a good man
That Curate, Nat, of ours, to go and visit
The poor in sickness ; but he don't believe
In witchcraft, and that is not like a Christian.

NATHANIEL.

And so old Margery's dying !

FATHER.

But you know
She may recover : so drive t'other nail in.

Westbury, 1798.

VI.

THE RUINED COTTAGE.

AY, Charles ! I knew that this would fix thine eye ; . .
This woodbine wreathing round the broken porch.
Its leaves just withering, yet one autumn flower
Still fresh and fragrant ; and yon holly-hock
That through the creeping weeds and nettles tall
Peers taller, lifting, column-like, a stem
Bright with its roseate blossoms. I have seen
Many an old convent reverend in decay,
And many a time have trod the castle courts
And grass-green halls, yet never did they strike
Home to the heart such melancholy thoughts
As this poor cottage. Look ! its little hatch
Fleeced with that grey and wintry moss ; the roof
Part moulder'd in, the rest o'ergrown with weeds,
House-leek, and long thin grass, and greener moss ;
So Nature steals on all the works of man,
Sure conqueror she, reclaiming to herself
His perishable piles.

I led thee here,
Charles, not without design ; for this hath been
My favourite walk even since I was a boy ;
And I remember, Charles, this ruin here,
The neatest comfortable dwelling-place !
That when I read in those dear books which first
Woke in my heart the love of poesy,
How with the villagers Erminia dwelt,
And Calidore for a fair shepherdess

Forsook his quest to learn the shepherd's lore,
My fancy drew from this the little hut
Where that poor princess wept her hopeless love,
Or where the gentle Calidore at eve
Led Pastorella home. There was not then
A weed where all these nettles overtop
The garden-wall; but sweet-briar, scenting sweet
The morning air; rosemary and marjoram,
All wholesome herbs; and then, that woodbine wreathed

So lavishly around the pillar'd porch
Its fragrant flowers, that when I pass'd this way,
After a truant absence hastening home,
I could not chuse but pass with slacken'd speed
By that delightful fragrance. Sadly changed
Is this poor cottage! and its dwellers, Charles!..
Theirs is a simple melancholy tale,..
There's scarce a village but can follow it:
And yet, methinks, it will not weary thee,
And should not be untold.

A widow here
Dwelt with an orphan grandchild: just removed Above the reach of pinching poverty,
She lived on some small pittance which sufficed,
In better times, the needful calls of life,
Not without comfort. I remember her
Sitting at even in that open doorway,
And spinning in the sun. Methinks I see her
Raising her eyes and dark-rim'd spectacles
To see the passer-by, yet ceasing not
To twirl her lengthening thread; or in the garden,
On some dry summer evening, walking round
To view her flowers, and pointing as she lean'd
Upon the Ivory handle of her stick,
To some carnation whose o'erheavy head
Needed support; while with the watering-pot
Joanna follow'd, and refresh'd and trimm'd
The drooping plant; Joanna, her dear child,
As lovely and as happy then as youth
And innocence could make her.

Charles, it seems
As though I were a boy again, and all
The mediate years with their vicissitudes
A half-forgotten dream. I see the Maid
So comely in her Sunday dress! her hair,
Her bright brown hair, wreathed in contracting curls;

And then her cheek! it was a red and white
That made the delicate hues of art look loathsome.
The countrymen who on their way to church
Were leaning o'er the bridge, loitering to hear
The bell's last summons, and in idleness
Watching the stream below, would all look up
When she pass'd by. And her old Grandam, Charles,..
When I have heard some erring infidel
Speak of our faith as of a gloomy creed,
Inspiring superstitious wretchedness,
Her figure has recurr'd; for she did love
The Sabbath-day; and many a time hath cross'd
These fields in rain and through the winter snows,
When I, a graceless boy, and cold of foot,
Wishing the weary service at its end,
Have wonder'd wherefore that good dame came there,
Who, if it pleased her, might have staid beside
A comfortable fire.

One only care

Hung on her aged spirit. For herself,
Her path was plain before her, and the close
Of her long journey near. But then her child
Soon to be left alone in this bad world,..
That was a thought which many a winter night
Had kept her sleepless: and when prudent love
In something better than a servant's state
Had placed her well at last, it was a pang
Like parting life to part with her dear girl.

One summer, Charles, when at the holidays
Return'd from school, I visited again
My old accustom'd walks, and found in them
A joy almost like meeting an old friend,
I saw the cottage empty, and the weeds
Already crowding the neglected flowers.
Joanna, by a villain's wiles seduced,
Had play'd the wanton, and that blow had reach'd
Her grandam's heart. She did not suffer long;
Her age was feeble, and this mortal grief
Brought her grey hairs with sorrow to the grave.

I pass this ruin'd dwelling oftentimes,
And think of other days. It wakes in me
A transient sadness; but the feelings, Charles,
Which ever with these recollections rise,
I trust in God they will not pass away.

Westbury, 1799.

VII.

THE LAST OF THE FAMILY.

JAMES.

WHAT, Gregory, you are come, I see, to join us
On this sad business.

GREGORY.

Ay, James, I am come,
But with a heavy heart, God knows it, man!
Where shall we meet the corpse?

JAMES.

Some hour from hence;
By noon, and near about the elms, I take it.
This is not as it should be, Gregory,
Old men to follow young ones to the grave!
This morning when I heard the bell strike out,
I thought that I had never heard it toll
So dismally before.

GREGORY.

Well, well! my friend,
'Tis what we all must come to, soon or late.
But when a young man dies, in the prime of life,
One born so well, who might have blest us all
Many long years!..

JAMES.

And then the family
Extinguish'd in him, and the good old name
Only to be remember'd on a tomb-stone!
A name that has gone down from sire to son

So many generations ! . . . Many a time
 Poor master Edward, who is now a corpse,
 When but a child, would come to me and lead me
 To the great family-tree, and beg of me
 To tell him stories of his ancestors,
 Of Eustace, he that went to the Holy Land
 With Richard Lion-heart, and that Sir Henry
 Who fought at Cressy in King Edward's wars ;
 And then his little eyes would kindle so
 To hear of their brave deeds ! I used to think
 The bravest of them all would not out-do
 My darling boy.

GREGORY.

This comes of your great schools
 And college-breeding. Plague upon his guardians,
 That would have made him wiser than his fathers !

JAMES.

If his poor father, Gregory, had but lived,
 Things would not have been so. He, poor good man,
 Had little of book-learning, but there lived not
 A kinder, nobler-hearted gentleman,
 One better to his tenants. When he died
 There was not a dry eye for miles around.
 Gregory, I thought that I could never know
 A sadder day than that : but what was that,
 Compared with this day's sorrow ?

GREGORY.

I remember,
 Eight months ago, when the young Squire began
 To alter the old mansion, they destroy'd
 The martins' nests, that had stood undisturb'd
 Under that roof, . . . ay ! long before my memory.
 I shook my head at seeing it, and thought
 No good could follow.

JAMES.

Poor young man ! I loved him
 Like my own child. I loved the family !
 Come Candlemas, and I have been their servant
 For five-and-forty years. I lived with them
 When his good father brought my Lady home ;
 And when the young Squire was born, it did me good
 To hear the bells so merrily announce
 An heir. This is indeed a heavy blow . . .
 I feel it, Gregory, heavier than the weight
 Of threescore years. He was a noble lad,
 I loved him dearly.

GREGORY.

Every body loved him.
 Such a fine, generous, open-hearted Youth !
 When he came home from school at holidays,
 How I rejoiced to see him ! He was sure
 To come and ask of me what birds there were
 About my fields ; and when I found a covey,
 There's not a testy Squire preserves his game
 More charily, than I have kept them safe
 For Master Edward. And he look'd so well
 Upon a fine sharp morning after them,
 His brown hair frosted, and his cheek so flush'd
 With such a wholesome ruddiness, . . . ah, James,
 But he was sadly changed when he came down
 To keep his birth-day.

JAMES.

Changed ! why, Gregory,
 'Twas like a palsy to me, when he stepp'd

Out of the carriage. He was grown so thin,
 His cheek so delicate fallow, and his eyes
 Had such a dim and rakish hollowness ;
 And when he came to shake me by the hand,
 And spoke as kindly to me as he used,
 I hardly knew the voice.

GREGORY.

It struck a damp
 On all our merriment. 'Twas a noble Ox
 That smoked before us, and the old October
 Went merrily in overflowing cans ;
 But 'twas a skin-deep merriment. My heart
 Seem'd as it took no share. And when we drank
 His health, the thought came over me what cause
 We had for wishing that, and spoilt the draught.
 Poor Gentleman ! to think ten months ago
 He came of age, and now !

JAMES.

I fear'd it then !
 He look'd to me as one that was not long
 For this world's business.

GREGORY.

When the Doctor sent him
 Abroad to try the air, it made me certain
 That all was over. There's but little hope,
 Methinks, that foreign parts can help a man
 When his own mother-country will not do.
 The last time he came down, these bells rung so
 I thought they would have rock'd the old steeple down ;
 And now that dismal toll ! I would have staid
 Beyond its reach, but this was a last duty :
 I am an old tenant of the family,
 Born on the estate, and now that I've outlived it,
 Why 'tis but right to see it to the grave.
 Have you heard ought of the new Squire ?

JAMES.

But little,
 And that not well. But be he what he may Matters not much to me. The love I bore
 To the old family will not easily fix
 Upon a stranger. What's on the opposite hill ?
 Is it not the funeral ?

GREGORY.

'Tis, I think, some horsemen.
 Ay ! there are the black cloaks ; and now I see
 The white plumes on the hearse.

JAMES.

Between the trees ; . .
 'Tis hid behind them now.

GREGORY.

Ay ! now we see it,
 And there's the coaches following, we shall meet
 About the bridge. Would that this day were over !
 I wonder whose turn's next.

JAMES.

God above knows.
 When youth is summon'd what must age expect !
 God make us ready, Gregory, when it comes !

Westbury, 1799.

VIII.

THE WEDDING.

TRAVELLER.

I PRAY you, wherefore are the village bells
Ringing so merrily?

WOMAN.

A wedding, Sir, . .
Two of the village folk. And they are right
To make a merry time on't while they may!
Come twelve-months hence, I warrant them they'd go
To church again more willingly than now,
If all might be undone.

TRAVELLER.

An ill-match'd pair,
So I conceive you. Youth perhaps and age?

WOMAN.

No, . . both are young enough.

TRAVELLER.

Perhaps the man then,
A lazy idler, . . one who better likes
The alehouse than his work?

WOMAN.

Why, Sir, for that
He always was a well-conditioned lad,
One who'd work hard and well; and as for drink,
Save now and then mayhap at Christmas time,
Sober as wife could wish.

TRAVELLER.

Then is the girl
A shrew, or else untidy? . . one to welcome
Her husband with a rude unruly tongue?
Or drive him from a foul and wretched home
To look elsewhere for comfort? Is it so?

WOMAN.

She's notable enough; and as for temper
The best good-humour'd girl! You see yon house,
There by the aspen tree, whose grey leaves shine
In the wind? she lived a servant at the farm.
And often, as I came to weeding here,
I've heard her singing as she milk'd her cows
So cheerfully, . . I did not like to hear her,
Because it made me think upon the days
When I had got as little on my mind,
And was as cheerful too. But she would marry,
And folks must reap as they have sown. God help her!

TRAVELLER.

Why Mistress, if they both are well inclined,
Why should not both be happy?

WOMAN.

They've no money.

TRAVELLER.

But both can work; and sure as cheerfully
She'd labour for herself as at the farm.

And he won't work the worse because he knows
That she will make his fire-side ready for him,
And watch for his return.

WOMAN.

All very well,

A little while.

TRAVELLER.

And what if they are poor?
Riches can't always purchase happiness;
And much we know will be expected there
Where much was given.

WOMAN.

All this I have heard at church!
And when I walk in the church-yard, or have been
By a death-bed, 'tis mighty comforting.
But when I hear my children cry for hunger,
And see them shiver in their rags, . . God help me!
I pity those for whom these bells ring up
So merrily upon their wedding-day,
Because I think of mine.

TRAVELLER.

You have known trouble;
These haply may be happier.

WOMAN.

Why for that
I've had my share; some sickness and some sorrow;
Well will it be for them to know no worse.
Yet I had rather hear a daughter's knell
Than her wedding-peal, Sir, if I thought her fate
Promised no better things.

TRAVELLER.

Sure, sure, good woman,
You look upon the world with jaundiced eyes!
All have their cares; those who are poor want wealth,
They who have wealth want more; so are we all
Dissatisfied, yet all live on, and each
Has his own comforts.

WOMAN.

Sir! d'y'e see that horse
Turn'd out to common here by the way-side?
He's high in bone, you may tell every rib
Even at this distance. Mind him! how he turns
His head, to drive away the flies that feed
On his gall'd shoulder! There's just grass enough
To disappoint his whetted appetite.
You see his comforts, Sir!

TRAVELLER.

A wretched beast!
Hard labour and worse usage he endures
From some bad master. But the lot of the poor
Is not like his.

WOMAN.

In truth it is not, Sir!
For when the horse lies down at night, no cares
About to-morrow vex him in his dreams:
He knows no quarter-day, and when he gets

Some musty hay or patch of hedge-row grass,
He has no hungry children to claim part
Of his half meal!

TRAVELLER.

'Tis idleness makes want,
And idle habits. If the man will go
And spend his evenings by the alehouse fire,
Whom can he blame if there be want at home?

WOMAN.

Ay! idleness! the rich folks never fail
To find some reason why the poor deserve
Their miseries! . . . Is it idleness, I pray you,
That brings the fever or the ague fit?
That makes the sick one's sickly appetite
From dry bread and potatoes turn away?
Is it idleness that makes small wages fall
For growing wants? . . . Six years ago, these bells
Rung on my wedding-day, and I was told
What I might look for, . . . but I did not heed
Good counsel. I had lived in service, Sir;
Knew never what it was to want a meal;
Lay down without one thought to keep me sleepless
Or trouble me in sleep; had for a Sunday
My linen gown, and when the pedlar came
Could buy me a new ribbon. . . . And my husband, . . .
A towardly young man and well to do, . . .
He had his silver buckles and his watch;
There was not in the village one who look'd
Sprucer on holidays. We married, Sir,
And we had children, but while wants increas'd
Wages stood still. The silver buckles went,
So went the watch; and when the holiday coat
Was worn to work, no new! one in its place.
For me . . . you see my rags! but I deserve them,
For wilfully, like this new-married pair,
I went to my undoing.

TRAVELLER.

But the parish . . .

WOMAN.

Ay, it falls heavy there; and yet their pittance
Just serves to keep life in. A blessed prospect,
To slave while there is strength, in age the workhouse,
A parish shell at last, and the little bell
'Toll'd hastily for a pauper's funeral!

TRAVELLER.

Is this your child?

WOMAN.

Ay, Sir; and were he drest
And clean'd, he'd be as fine a boy to look on
As the Squire's young master. These thin rags of his Let comfortably in the summer's wind;
But when the winter comes, it pinches me
To see the little wretch; I've three besides;

¹ A farmer once told the author of Malvern Hills, "that he almost constantly remarked a gradation of changes in those men he had been in the habit of employing. Young men, he said, were generally neat in their appearance, active and cheerful, till they became married and had a family, when he had observed that their silver buttons, buckles, and

And, . . . God forgive me! but I often wish
To see them in their coffins. . . . God reward you!
God bless you for your charity!

TRAVELLER.

You have taught me
To give sad meaning to the village bells!
Bristol, 1800.

IX.

THE ALDERMAN'S FUNERAL.

STRANGER.

Whom are they ushering from the world, with all
This pageantry and long parade of death?

TOWNSMAN.

A long parade, indeed, Sir, and yet here
You see but half; round yonder bend it reaches
A furlong further, carriage behind carriage.

STRANGER.

'Tis but a mournful sight, and yet the pomp
Tempts me to stand a gazer.

TOWNSMAN.

Yonder schoolboy
Who plays the truant, says the proclamation
Of peace was nothing to the show; and even
The chairing of the members at election
Would not have been a finer sight than this;
Only that red and green are prettier colours
Than all this mourning. There, Sir, you behold
One of the red-gown'd worthies of the city,
The envy and the boast of our exchange; . . .
Ay, what was worth, last week, a good half-million,
Screw'd down in yonder hearse!

STRANGER.

Then he was born
Under a lucky planet, who to-day
Puts mourning on for his inheritance.

TOWNSMAN.

When first I heard his death, that very wish
Leapt to my lips; but now the closing scene
Of the comedy hath waken'd wiser thoughts;
And I bless God, that, when I go to the grave,
There will not be the weight of wealth like his
To sink me down.

STRANGER.

The camel and the needle, . . .
Is that then in your mind?

watches gradually disappeared, and their Sunday's clothes became common without any other to supply their place, . . . but," said he, "some good comes from this, for they will then work for whatever they can get."

Note to Cottle's Malvern Hills.

TOWNSMAN.

Even so. The text
Is Gospel-wisdom. I would ride the camel, . . .
Yea leap him flying, through the needle's eye,
As easily as such a pamper'd fool
Could pass the narrow gate.

STRANGER.

Your pardon, Sir,
But sure this lack of Christian charity
Looks not like Christian truth.

TOWNSMAN.

Your pardon too, Sir,
If, with this text before me, I should feel
In the preaching mood ! But for these barren fig-trees,
With all their flourish and their leafiness,
We have been told their destiny and use,
When the axe is laid unto the root, and they
Cumber the earth no longer.

STRANGER.

Was his wealth
Stored fraudfully, . . the spoil of orphans wrong'd,
And widows who had none to plead their right ?

TOWNSMAN.

All honest, open, honourable gains,
Fair legal interest, bonds and mortgages,
Ships to the East and West.

STRANGER.

Why judge you then
"So hardly of the dead ?

TOWNSMAN.

For what he left
Undone ; . . for sins, not one of which is written
In the Ten Commandments. He, I warrant him,
Believed no other Gods than those of the Creed ;
Bow'd to no idols, . . but his money-bags ;
Swore no false oaths, except at the custom-house ;
Kept the Sabbath idle ; built a monument
To honour his dead father ; did no murder ;
Never sustain'd an action for crim-con ;
Never pick'd pockets ; never bore false-witness ;
And never, with that all-commanding wealth,
Coveted his neighbour's house, nor ox, nor ass !

STRANGER.

You knew him then it seems ?

TOWNSMAN.

As all men know
The virtues of your hundred-thousanders ;
They never hide their lights beneath a bushel.

STRANGER.

Nay, nay, uncharitable Sir ! for often
Doth bounty like a streamlet flow unseen,
Freshening and giving life along its course.

TOWNSMAN.

We track the streamlet by the brighter green
And livelier growth it gives ; . . but as for this . .
This was a pool that stagnated and stunk ;
The rains of heaven engendered nothing in it
But slime and foul corruption.

STRANGER.

Yet even these
Are reservoirs whence public charity
Still keeps her channels full.

TOWNSMAN.

Now, Sir, you touch
Upon the point. This man of half a million
Had all these public virtues which you praise :
But the poor man rang never at his door,
And the old beggar, at the public gate,
Who, all the summer long, stands hat in hand,
He knew how vain it was to lift an eye
To that hard face. Yet he was always found
Among your ten and twenty pound subscribers,
Your benefactors in the newspapers
His alms were money put to interest
In the other world, . . donations to keep open
A running charity account with heaven, . .
Retaining fees against the Last Assizes,
When, for the trusted talents, strict account
Shall be required from all, and the old Arch-Lawyer
Plead his own cause as plaintiff.

STRANGER.

I must needs
Believe you, Sir : . . these are your witnesses,
These mourners here, who from their carriages
Gape at the gaping crowd. A good March wind
Were to be pray'd for now, to lend their eyes
Some decent rheum ; the very hireling mute
Bears not a face more blank of all emotion
Than the old servant of the family !
How can this man have lived, that thus his death
Costs not the soiling one white handkerchief !

TOWNSMAN.

Who should lament for him, Sir, in whose heart
Love had no place, nor natural charity ?
The parlour spaniel, when she heard his step,
Rose slowly from the hearth, and stole aside
With creeping pace ; she never raised her eyes
To woo kind words from him, nor laid her head
Upraised upon his knee, with fondling whine.
How could it be but thus ? Arithmetic
Was the sole science he was ever taught ;
The multiplication-table was his Creed,
His Pater-noster, and his Decalogue.
When yet he was a boy, and should have breathed
The open air and sunshine of the fields,
To give his blood its natural spring and play,
He in a close and dusky counting-house
Smoke-dried and scar'd and shrivell'd up his heart.
So from the way in which he was train'd up
His feet departed not ; he toil'd and mowl'd, [ten ;
Poor muck-worm ! through his three-score years and
And when the earth shall now be shovell'd on him,
If that which served him for a soul were still Within its husk, 'twould still be dirt to dirt.

STRANGER.

Yet your next newspapers will blazon him
For industry and honourable wealth
A bright example.

TOWNSMAN.

Even half a million
Gets him no other praise. But come this way
Some twelve months hence, and you will find his virtues
Trimly set forth in lapidary lines,
Faith with her torch beside, and little Cupids
Dropping upon his urn their marble tears.

NONDESCRIPTS.

I.

WRITTEN THE WINTER AFTER THE INSTALLATION AT OXFORD. 1793.

TOLL on, toll on, old Bell! I'll neither pass
The cold and weary hour in heartless rites,
Nor doze away the time. The fire burns bright,
And, bless the maker of this Windsor-Chair!
(Of polish'd cherry, elbow'd, saddle-seated.)
This is the throne of comfort. I will sit
And study here devoutly . . . not my Euclid, . .
For Heaven forbid that I should discompose
That Spider's excellent geometry!
I'll study thee, Puss! Not to make a picture,
I hate your canvass cats and dogs and fools,
Themes that disgrace the pencil. Thou shalt give
A moral subject, Puss. Come, look at me, . .
Lift up thine emerald eyes! Ay, purr away!
For I am praising thee, I tell thee, Puss,
And Cats as well as Kings like flattery.
For three whole days I heard an old Fur-gown
Bepraised, that made a Duke a Chancellor;
Bepraised in prose it was, bepraised in verse;
Lauded in pious Latin to the skies;
Kudos'd egregiously in heathen Greek;
In supplics sweetly incensed; glorified
In proud alcaics; in hexameters
Applauded to the very Galleries
That did applaud again, whose thunder-claps,
Higher and longer with redoubling peals
Rung, when they heard the illustrious furbelow'd
Heroically in Popean rhyme
Tee-ti-tum'd, in Miltonic blank bemouth'd;
Prose, verse, Greek, Latin, English, rhyme and blank,
Apotheosi-chancellor'd in all,
I'll Eulogy, with all her wealth of words,
Grew bankrupt, all-too-prodigious of praise,
And panting Panegyric toil'd in vain
O'er-task'd in keeping pace with such desert.

Though I can poetize right willingly,
Puss, on thy well-streak'd coat, to that Fur-gown
I was not guilty of a single line:
'Twas an old furbelow, that would hang loose,
And wrap round any one, as it were made
To fit him only, so it were but tied
With a blue riband.

What a power there is
In beauty! Within these forbidden walls
Thou hast thy range at will, and when perchance
The Fellows see thee, Puss, they overlook
Inhibitory laws, or haply think
The statute was not made for Cats like thee;
For thou art beautiful as ever Cat

That wanton'd in the joy of kittenhood.
Ay, stretch thy claws, thou democratic beast,
I like thine independence. Treat thee well,
Thou art as playful as young Innocence;
But if we act the governor, and break
The social compact, Nature gave those claws
And taught thee how to use them. Man, methinks,
Master and slave alike, might learn from thee
A salutary lesson: but the one
Abuses wickedly his power unjust,
The other crouches spaniel-like, and licks
The hand that strikes him. Wiser animal,
I look at thee, familiarised, yet free;
And, thinking that a child with gentle hand
Leads by a string the large-limb'd Elephant,
With mingled indignation and contempt
Behold his drivers goad the biped beast.

II.

SNUFF.

A DELICATE pinch! oh how it tingles up
The titillated nose, and fills the eyes
And breast, till in one comfortable sneeze
The full-collected pleasure bursts at last!
Most rare Columbus! thou shalt be for this
The only Christopher in my Kalendar.
Why but for thee the uses of the Nose
Were half unknown, and its capacity
Of joy. The summer gale that from the heath,
At midnoon glowing with the golden gorse,
Bears its balsamic odour, but provokes
Not satisfies the sense; and all the flowers,
That with their unsubstantial fragrance tempt
And disappoint, bloom for so short a space,
That half the year the Nostrils would keep Lent,
But that the kind tobacconist admits
No winter in his work; when Nature sleeps
His wheels roll on, and still administer
A plenitude of joy, a tangible smell.

What are Peru and those Golconda mines
To thee, Virginia? miserable realms,
The produce of inhuman toil, they send
Gold for the greedy, jewels for the vain.
But thine are common comforts! . . . To omit
Pipe-panegyric and tobacco-praise,
Think what the general joy the snuff-box gives,
Europe, and far above Pizarro's name
Write Raleigh in thy records of renown!
Him let the school-boy bless if he behold

His master's box produced, for when he sees
The thumb and finger of Authority
Stuff up the nostrils: when hat, head, and wig
Shake all; when on the waistcoat black, brown dust,
From the oft-reiterated pinch profuse
Profusely scatter'd, lodges in its folds,
And part on the magistral table lights,
Part on the open book, soon blown away,
Full surely soon shall then the brow severe
Relax; and from vituperative lips
Words that of birch remind not, sounds of praise,
And jokes that must be laugh'd at, shall proceed.

COOL REFLECTIONS

DURING A MIDSUMMER WALK FROM WARMINSTER
TO SHAFTESBURY. 1799.

O spare me . . spare me, Phœbus ! if indeed
Thou hast not let another Phœton
Drive earthward thy fierce steeds and fiery car;
Merry ! I melt ! I melt ! No tree, no bush,
No shelter, not a breath of stirring air
East, West, or North, or South ! Dear God of day,
Put on thy nightcap; crop thy locks of light,
And be in the fashion; turn thy back upon us,
And let thy beams flow upward; make it night
Instead of noon; . . one little miracle,
In pity, gentle Phœbus !

What a joy,
Oh what a joy, to be a seal and flounder
On an ice island ! or to have a den
With the white bear, cavern'd in polar snow !
It were a comfort to shake hands with Death, . .
He has a rare cold hand ! to wrap one's self
In the gift shirt Dejanira sent,
Dipt in the blood of Nessus, just to keep
The sun off; or toast cheese for Beelzebub, . .
That were a cool employment to this journey
Along a road whose white intensity
Would now make platina uncongealable
Like quicksilver.

Were it midnight, I should walk
Self-lantern'd, saturate with sunbeams. Jove !
O gentle Jove ! have mercy, and once more
Kick that obdurate Phœbus out of heaven;
Give Boreas the wind-cholic till he roar
For cardamum, and drink down peppermint,
Making what's left as precious as Tokay;
Send Mercury to salivate the sky
Till it dissolve in rain. O gentle Jove !
But some such little kindness to a wretch
Who feels his marrow spoiling his best coat, . .
Who swells with caloric as if a Prester
Had heaven'd every limb with poison-yeast; . .
Lend me thine eagle just to flap his wings
And fan me, and I will build temples to thee,
And turn true Pagan.

Not a cloud nor breeze, . .
O you most heathen Deities ! if ever

My bones reach home (for, for the flesh upon them,
It hath resolved itself into a dew,)
I shall have learnt owl-wisdom. Thou vile Phœbus,
Set me a Persian sun-idolater
Upon this turnpike road, and I'll convert him
With no inquisitorial argument
But thy own fires. Now woe be to me, wretch,
That I was in a heretic country born !
Else might some mass for the poor souls that bleach,
And burn away the oak of their offences
In that great Purgatory crucible,
Help me. O Jupiter ! my poor complexion !
I am made a copper-Indian of already !
And if no kindly cloud will parasol me,
My very cellular membrane will be changed, . .
I shall be negrosed.

A brook ! a brook !

O what a sweet cool sound !

'Tis very nectar !

It runs like life through every strengthen'd limb !
Nymph of the stream, now take a grateful prayer.

IV.

THE PIG.

A COLLOQUIAL POEM.

JACOB ! I do not like to see thy nose
Turn'd up in scornful curve at yonder Pig.
It would be well, my friend, if we, like him,
Were perfect in our kind ! . . And why despise
The sow-born grunter ? . . He is obstinate,
Thou answerest; ugly, and the filthiest beast
That banquets upon offal . . . Now I pray you Hear the Pig's Counsel.

Is he obstinate ?

We must not, Jacob, be deceived by words;
We must not take them as unheeding hands
Receive base money at the current worth,
But with a just suspicion try their sound,
And in the even balance weigh them well.
See now to what this obstinacy comes.
A poor mistreated, democratic beast,
He knows that his unmerciful drivers seek
Their profit, and not his. He hath not learnt
That Pigs were made for Man, . . born to be brawn'd
And baconized: that he must please to give
Just what his gracious masters please to take;
Perhaps his tusks, the weapons Nature gave
For self-defence, the general privilege;
Perhaps, . . hark Jacob ! dost thou hear that horn ?
Woe to the young posterity of pork !
Their enemy is at hand.

Again. Thou say'st

The Pig is ugly. Jacob, look at him !
Those eyes have taught the Lover flattery.
His face, . . nay Jacob, Jacob ! were it fair
To judge a Lady in her dishabille ?
Fancy it drest, and with saltpetre rouged.
Behold his tail, my friend; with curls like that
The wanton hop marries her stately spouse:
So crisp in beauty Amoretta's hair

Rings round her lover's soul the chains of love.
And what is beauty but the aptitude
Of parts harmonious? Give thy fancy scope,
And thou wilt find that no imagined change
Can beautify this beast. Place at his end
The starry glories of the Peacock's pride,
Give him the Swan's white breast; for his horn-hoofs
Shape such a foot and ankle as the waves
Crowded in eager rivalry to kiss
When Venus from the enamour'd sea arose; . .
Jacob, thou canst but make a monster of him!
All alteration man could think, would mar
His Pig-perfection.

The last charge, . . he lives
A dirty life. Here I could shelter him
With noble and right reverend precedents,
And show by sanction of authority
That 'tis a very honourable thing
To thrive by dirty ways. But let me rest
On better ground the unanswerable defence.
The Pig is a philosopher, who knows
No prejudice. Dirt? . . Jacob, what is dirt?
If matter, . . why the delicate dish that tempts
An o'ergorged Epicure to the last morsel
That stuffs him to the throat-gates, is no more.
If matter be not, but as Sages say,
Spirit is all, and all things visible
Are one, the infinitely modified,
Think, Jacob, what that Pig is, and the mire
Wherein he stands knee-deep!

And there! the breeze
Pleads with me, and has won thee to a smile
That speaks conviction. O'er yon blossom'd field
Of beans it came, and thoughts of bacon rise.

THE DANCING BEAR.

RECOMMENDED TO THE ADVOCATES FOR THE SLAVE-TRADE.

RARE music! I would rather hear cat-courtship
Under my bed-room window in the night,
Than this scraped catgut's creak. Rare dancing too!
Alas, poor Bruin! How he foots the pole
And waddles round it with unwieldy steps,
Swaying from side to side! . . The dancing-master
Hath had as profitless a pupil in him
As when he would have tortured my poor toes
To minuet grace, and made them move like clockwork
In musical obedience. Bruin! Bruin!
Thou art but a clumsy biped! . . And the mob
With noisy merriment mock his heavy pace,
And laugh to see him led by the nose! . . themselves
Led by the nose, embroiled, and in the eye
Of Reason from their Nature's purposes
As miserably perverted.

Bruin-Bear!
Now could I sonnetize thy piteous plight,
And prove how much my sympathetic heart
Even for the miseries of a beast can feel,
In fourteen lines of sensibility,
But we are told all things were made for Man;

And I'll be sworn there's not a fellow here
Who would not swear 'twere hanging blasphemy
To doubt that truth. Therefore as thou wert born,
Bruin! for Man, and Man makes nothing of thee
In any other way, . . most logically
It follows, thou wert born to make him sport;
That that great snout of thine was form'd on purpose
To hold a ring; and that thy fat was given thee
For an approved pomatum!

To demur

Were heresy. And politicians say, (Wise men who in the scale of reason give No foolish feelings weight,) that thou art here
Far happier than thy brother Bears who roam
O'er trackless snow for food; that being born
Inferior to thy leader, unto him
Rightly belongs dominion; that the compact
Was made between ye, when thy clumsy feet
First fell into the snare, and he gave up
His right to kill, conditioning thy life
Should thenceforth be his property; . . besides,
'Tis wholesome for thy morals to be brought
From savage climes into a civilized state,
Into the decencies of Christendom. . . .
Bear! Bear! it passes in the Parliament
For excellent logic this! What if we say
How barbarously Man abuses power?
Talk of thy baiting, it will be replied,
Thy welfare is thy owner's interest.
But were thou baited it would injure thee,
Therefore thou art not baited. For seven years
Hear it, O Heaven, and give ear, O Earth!
For seven long years, this precious syllogism
Hath baffled justice and humanity!

Westbury, 1799.

VI.

THE FILBERT.

NAY, gather not that Filbert, Nicholas.
There is a maggot there, . . it is his house, . .
His castle, . . oh commit not burglary!
Strip him not naked, . . 'tis his clothes, his shell,
His bones, the case and armour of his life,
And thou shalt do no murder, Nicholas!
It were an easy thing to crack that nut
Or with thy crackers or thy double teeth,
So easily may all things be destroy'd!
But 'tis not in the power of mortal man
To mend the fracture of a filbert shell.
There were two great men once amused themselves
Watching two maggots run their wriggling race,
And wagering on their speed; but Nick, to us
It were no sport to see the pamper'd worm
Roll out and then draw in his folds of fat,
Like to some Barber's leathern powder-bag
Wherewith he feathers, frosts, or cauliflowers
Spruce Beau, or Lady fair, or Doctor grave.
Enough of dangers and of enemies
Hath Nature's wisdom for the worm ordain'd,
Increase not thou the number! Him the Mouse
Gnawing with nibbling tooth the shell's defence,
May from his native tenement eject;

Him may the Nup-hatch, piercing with strong bill,
Unwittingly destroy; or to his hoard
The Squirrel bear, at leisure to be crack'd.
Man also hath his dangers and his foes
As this poor Maggot hath; and when I muse
Upon the aches, anxieties, and fears,
The Maggot knows not, Nicholas, methinks
It were a happy metamorphosis
To be enkernel'd thus: never to hear
Of wars, and of invasions, and of plots,
Kings, Jacobines, and Tax-commissioners;
To feel no motion but the wind that shook
The Filbert Tree, and rock'd us to our rest;
And in the middle of such exquisite food
To live luxurious! The perfection this
Of snugness! it were to unite at once
Hermit retirement, Aldermanic bliss,
And Stoic independence of mankind.

THE CATARACT OF LODORE.

DESCRIBED IN RHYMES FOR THE NURSERY.

"How does the Water
Come down at Lodore?"
My little boy ask'd me
Thus, once on a time;
And moreover he task'd me
To tell him in rhyme.

Anon at the word,
There first came one daughter
And then came another,
To second and third
The request of their brother,
And to hear how the water
Comes down at Lodore,
With its rush and its roar.
As many a time
They had seen it before.
So I told them in rhyme,
For of rhymes I had store:
And 'twas in my vocation
For their recreation
That so I should sing;
Because I was Laureate
To them and the King.

From its sources which well
In the Tarn on the fell;
From its fountains
In the mountains,
Its rills and its gills;
Through moss and through brake,
It runs and it creeps
For awhile, till it sleeps
In its own little Lake.
And thence at departing,
Awakening and starting,
It runs through the reeds
And away it proceeds,

Through meadow and glade,
In sun and in shade,
And through the wood-shelter,
Among crags in its flurry,
Helter-skelter,
Hurry-scurry.

Here it comes sparkling,
And there it lies darkling;
Now smoaking and frothing
It's tumult and wrath in,
Till in this rapid race
On which it is bent,
It reaches the place
Of its steep descent.

The Cataract strong
Then plunges along,
Striking and raging
As if a war waging
Its caverns and rocks among:
Rising and leaping,
Sinking and creeping,
Swelling and sweeping,
Showering and springing,
Flying and flinging,
Writhing and ringing,
Eddying and whirling,
Spouting and frisking,
Turning and twisting,
Around and around
With endless rebound!
Smiling and fighting,
A sight to delight in;
Confounding, astounding,
Dizzying and deafening the ear with its sound.

Collecting, projecting,
Receding and speeding,
And shocking and rocking,
And darting and parting,
And threading and spreading,
And whizzing and hissing,
And dripping and skipping,
And hitting and splitting,
And shining and twining,
And rattling and battling,
And shaking and quaking,
And pouring and roaring,
And waving and raving,
And tossing and crossing,
And flowing and going,
And running and stunning,
And foaming and roaming,
And dinnning and spinning,
And droppug and hopping,
And working and jerking,
And guggling and struggling,
And heaving and cleaving,
And moaning and groaning;

And glittering and frittering,
And gathering and feathering,
And whitening and brightening,
And quivering and shivering,
And hurrying and skurrying,
And thundering and floundering;

Dividing and gliding and aliding,
And falling and brawling and sprawling,
And driving and riving and striving,
And sprinkling and twinkling and wrinkling,
And sounding and bounding and rounding,
And bubbling and troubling and doubling,
And grumbling and rumbling and tumbling,
And clattering and battering and shattering ;

Retreating and beating and meeting and sheeting,
Delaying and straying and playing and spraying,
Advancing and prancing and glancing and dancing,
Recoiling, turmoiling and toiling and boiling, [ing,
And gleaming and streaming and steaming and beam-
And rushing and flushing and brushing and gushing,
And flapping and rapping and clapping and slapping
And curling and whirling and purling and twirling,
And thumping and plumping and bumping and jumping,
And dashing and flashing and splashing and clashing ;
And so never ending, but always descending,
Sounds and motions for ever and ever are blending,
All at once and all o'er, with a mighty uproar,
And this way the Water comes down at Lodore.

ROBERT THE RHYMER'S

TRUE AND PARTICULAR ACCOUNT OF HIMSELF.

ROBERT the Rhymer who lives at the Lakes
Describes himself thus, to prevent mistakes ;

Or rather, perhaps, be it said, to correct them,
There being plenty about for those who collect them.
He is lean of body, and lank of limb ;
The man must walk fast who would overtake him.
His eyes are not yet much the worse for the wear,
And Time has not thinn'd nor straighten'd his hair,
Notwithstanding that now he is more than halfway
On the road from Grizzle to Gray.
He hath a long nose with a bending ridge ;
It might be worthy of notice on Straasburg bridge.
He sings like a lark when at morn he arises,
And when evening comes he nightingallises,
Warbling house-notes wild from throat and gizzard,
Which reach from A to G, and from G to Izzard.
His voice is as good as when he was young,
And he has teeth enough left to keep-in his tongue.
A man he is by nature merry,
Somewhat Tom-foolish, and comical, very ;
Who has gone through the world, not mindful of pelf,
Upon easy terms, thank Heaven, with himself,
Along bypaths and in pleasant ways,
Caring as little for censure as praise ;
Having some friends whom he loves dearly,
And no lack of foes, whom he laughs at sincerely ;
And never for great, nor for little things,
Has he fretted his guts to fiddle-strings,
He might have made them by such folly
Most musical, most melancholy.

Sic cecinit Robertus, anno ætatis sue 55.

THE DEVIL'S WALK.

ADVERTISEMENT.

AFTER the Devil's Thoughts had been published by Mr. Coleridge in the collection of his Poetical Works, and the statement with which he accompanied it, it might have been supposed that the joint authorship of that Siamese production had been sufficiently authenticated, and that no supposititious claim to it would again be advanced. The following extract, however, appeared in the John Bull of Feb. 14. 1830 :—

“ In the Morning Post of Tuesday, we find the following letter :—

“ To the Editor of the Morning Post.

“ Sir,—Permit me to correct a statement which appeared in a recent number of the John Bull, wherein it is made to appear that Dr. Southey is the author of the Poem entitled The Devil's Walk.

I have the means of settling this question ; since I possess the identical MS. copy of verses, as they were written by my uncle, the late Professor Porson, during an evening party at Dr. Beloe's.

“ I am Sir, your very obedient Servant,

“ R. C. Porson.

“ Baywater Terrace, Feb. 6. 1830.”

“ We are quite sure that Mr. Porson, the writer of the above letter, is convinced of the truth of the statement it contains ; but although The Devil's Walk is perhaps not a work of which either Mr. Southey or Mr. Porson need be very proud, we feel it due to ourselves to re-state the fact of its being from the pen of Mr. Southey. If we are wrong, Mr. Porson may write to Mr. Southey ; for although Mr. Porson's uncle is dead, the Poet Laureate is alive and merry.

“ The Lines—Poem they can scarcely be called—were written by Mr. Southey, one morning before breakfast, the idea having struck him while he was shaving; they were subsequently shown to Mr. Coleridge, who, we believe, pointed some of the stanzas, and perhaps added one or two.

"We beg to assure Mr. R. C. Porson that we recur to this matter out of no disrespect either to the memory of his uncle, which is not likely to be affected one way or another, by the circumstance; or to his own veracity, being, as we said, quite assured that he believes the statement he makes. our only object is to set ourselves right."

"Our readers, perhaps, may smile at the following, which appears in yesterday's Cornhill Journal :—

"We have received a letter, signed 'W. Marshall,' and dated 'York;' claiming for its writer the long-contested authorship of those celebrated verses, which are known by the title of The Devil's Walk on Earth, and to which attention has lately been directed anew, by Lord Byron's imitation of them. There have been so many mystifications connected with the authorship of these clever verses, that, for any thing we know to the contrary, this letter may be only one more."

A week afterward, there was the following notice :—
"We cannot waste any more time about The Devil's Walk. We happen to know that it is Mr. Southey's; but, as he is alive, we refer any body, who is not yet satisfied, to the eminent person himself—we do not mean the Devil—but the Doctor."

The same newspaper contained the ensuing advertisement :—
"On Tuesday next, uniform with Robert Cruikshank's Monieur Tonson, price one shilling: The Devil's Walk, a Poem, by Professor Porson. With additions and variations by Southey and Coleridge; illustrated by seven engravings from R. Cruikshank. London, Marsh and Miller, 137. Oxford Street, and Constable and Co., Edinburgh."

Professor Porson never had any part in these verses as a writer, and it is for the first time that he now appears in them as the subject of two or three stanzas written some few years ago, when the fabricated story of his having composed them during an evening party at Dr. Vincent's (for that was the original habitat of this falsehood) was revived. A friend of one of the authors, more jealous for him than he has ever been for himself, urged him then to put the matter out of doubt (for it was before Mr. Coleridge had done so); and as much to please that friend, as to amuse himself and his domestic circle, in a sportive mood, the part which relates the rise and progress of the Poem was thrown off, and that also touching the aforesaid Professor. The old vein having thus been opened, some other passages were added; and so it grew to its present length.

THE DEVIL'S WALK.

From his brimstone bed at break of day
A walking the Devil is gone,
To look at his little snug farm of the World,
And see how his stock went on.

2.
Over the hill and over the dale,
And he went over the plain;
And backward and forward he swish'd his tail,
As a gentleman swishes a cane.

3.
How then was the Devil drest?
Oh, he was in his Sunday's best,
His coat was red and his breeches were blue,
And there was a hole where his tail came through.

4.
A lady drove by in her pride,
In whose face an expression he spied
For which he could have kiss'd her;
Such a flourishing, fine, clever creature was she,
With an eye as wicked as wicked can be,
I should take her for my Aunt, thought he,
If my dam had had a sister.

5.
He met a lord of high degree,
No matter what was his name;
Whose face with his own when he came to compare
The expression, the look, and the air,
And the character too, as it seem'd to a hair,—
Such a twin-likeness there was in the pair
That it made the Devil start and stare,
For he thought there was surely a looking-glass there,
But he could not see the frame.

6.
He saw a Lawyer killing a viper
On a dunghill beside his stable;
Ho! quoth he, thou put'st me in mind
Of the story of Cain and Abel.

7.
An Apothecary on a white horse
Rode by on his vocation;
And the Devil thought of his old friend
Death in the Revelation.

8.
He pass'd a cottage with a double coach-house,
A cottage of gentility.
And he own'd with a grin
That his favourite sin
Is pride that apes humility.

9.

He saw a pig rapidly
Down a river float;
The pig swam well, but every stroke
Was cutting his own throat;

10.

And Satan gave thereto his tail
A twirl of admiration;
For he thought of his daughter War
And her suckling babe Taxation.

11.

Well enough, in sooth, he liked that truth,
And nothing the worse for the jest;
But this was only a first thought
And in this he did not rest:
Another came presently into his head,
And here it proved, as has often been said,
That second thoughts are best.

12.

For as Piggy plied with wind and tide,
His way with such celerity,
And at every stroke the water dyed
With his own red blood, the Devil cried,
Behold a swimish nation's pride
In cotton-spun prosperity.

13.

He walk'd into London leisurely,
The streets were dirty and dum.
But there he saw Brothers the Prophet,
And Brothers the Prophet saw him.

14.

He entered a thriving book-seller's shop;
Quoth he, We are both of one college,
For I myself sate like a Cormorant once
Upon the Tree of Knowledge.

15.

As he passed through Cold-Bath Fields he look'd
At a solitary cell;
And he was well-pleased, for it gave him a hint
For improving the prisons of Hell.

16.

He saw a turnkey tie a thief's hands
With a cordial tug and jerk;
Nimbly, quoth he, a man's fingers move
When his heart is in his work.

17.

He saw the same turnkey unfettering a man
With little expedition;
And he chuckled to think of his dear slave trade,
And the long debates and delays that were made
Concerning its abolition.

18.

He met one of his favourite daughters
By an Evangelical Meeting;
And forgetting himself for joy at her sight,
He would have accosted her outright,
And given her a fatherly greeting.

19.

But she tipt him a wink, drew back, and cried,
Avant! my name's Religion!
And then she turn'd to the preacher
And leer'd like a love-sick pigeon.

20.

A fine man and a famous Professor was he,
As the great Alexander now may be,
Whose fame not yet o'erpast is;
Or that new Scotch performer
Who is fiercer and warmer,
The great Sir Arch-Bombastes.

21.

With throbs and throes, and ahs and ohs,
Far famed his flock for frightening;
And thundering with his voice, the while
His eyes zigzag like lightning.

22.

This Scotch phenomenon, I trow,
Beats Alexander hollow;
Even when most tame
He breathes more flame
Than ten Fire-Kings could swallow.

23.

Another daughter he prevently met:
With music of fife and drum,
And a consecrated flag,
And shout of tag and rag,
And march of rank and file,
Which had fill'd the crowded aisle
Of the venerable pile,
From church he saw her come.

24.

He call'd her aside, and began to chide,
For what dost thou here? said he;
My city of Rome is thy proper home,
And there's work enough there for thee.

25.

Thou hast confessions to listen,
And bells to chrlsten,
And altars and dolls to dress;
And fools to coax,
And sinners to hoax,
And beads and bones to bless;
And great pardons to sell
For those who pay well,
And small ones for those who pay less.

26.

Nay, Father, I boast, that this is my post,
She answered; and thou wilt allow,
That the great Harlot,
Who is clothed in scarlet,
Can very well spare me now.

27.

Upon her business I am come here,
That we may extend our powers;
Whatever lets down this Church that we hate,
Is something in favour of ours.

1. "After this I was in a vision, having the angel of God near me, and saw Satan walking leisurely into London."—Brothers' Prophecies, part 1. p. 41.

28.

You will not think, great Cosmocrat !
 That I spend my time in fooling ;
 Many irons, my Sir, have we in the fire,
 And I must leave none of them cooling ;
 For you must know state-councils here
 Are held which I bear rule in.
 When my liberal notions
 Produce mischievous motions,
 There's many a man of good intent,
 In either house of Parliament,
 Whom I shall find a tool in ;
 And I have hopeful pupils too
 Who all this while are schooling.

29.

Fine progress they make in our liberal opinions,
 My Utilitarians,
 My all sorts of —inians
 And all sorts of —arians ;
 My all sorts of —ists,
 And my Prigs and my Whigs
 Who have all sorts of twists
 Train'd in the very way, I know,
 Father, you would have them go ;
 High and low,
 Wise and foolish, great and small,
 March-of-Intellect-Boys all.

30.

Well pleased wilt thou be at no very far day
 When the caldron of mischief boils,
 And I bring them forth in battle array
 And bid them suspend their brolls,
 That they may unite and fall on the prey,
 For which we are spreading our toils.
 How the nice boys all will give mouth at the call,
 Hark away ! hark away to the spoils !
 My Macs and my Quacks and my lawless-Jacks,
 My Shiels and O Connells, my pious Mac-Donnells,
 My joke-smith Sydney, and all of his kidney,
 My Humes and my Broughams,
 My merry old Jerry,
 My Lord Kings, and my Doctor Doyles !

31.

At this good news, so great
 The Devil's pleasure grew,
 That with a joyful swish he rent
 The hole where his tail came through.

32.

His countenance fell for a moment
 When he felt the stitches go ;
 Ah ! thought he, there's a job now
 That I've made for my tailor below.

33.

Great news ! bloody news ! cried a newsman ;
 The Devil said, Stop, let me see !
 Great news ? bloody news ? thought the Devil,
 The bloodier the better for me.

34.

So he bought the newspaper, and no news
 At all for his money he had.

Lying varlet, thought he, thus to take in old Nick !
 But it's some satisfaction, my lad,
 To know thou art paid beforehand for the trick,
 For the sixpence I gave thee is bad.

35.

And then it came into his head
 By oracular inspiration,
 That what he had seen and what he had said,
 In the course of this visitation,
 Would be published in the Morning Post
 For all this reading nation.

36.

Therewith in second-sight he saw
 The place and the manner and time,
 In which this mortal story
 Would be put in immortal rhyme.

37.

That it would happen when two poets
 Should on a time be met,
 In the town of Nether Stowey,
 In the shire of Somerset.

38.

There while the one was shaving
 Would be the song begin ;
 And the other when he heard it at breakfast,
 In ready accord join in.

39.

So each would help the other
 Two heads being better than one ;
 And the phrase and conceit
 Would in unison meet,
 And so with glee the verse flow free,
 In ding-dong chime of sing-song rhyme,
 Till the whole were merrily done.

40.

And because it was set to the razor,
 Not to the lute or harp,
 Therefore it was that the fancy
 Should be bright, and the wit be sharp.

41.

But then, said Satan to himself,
 As for that said beginner,
 Against my infernal Majesty
 There is no greater sinner.

42.

He hath put me in ugly ballads
 With libellous pictures for sale ;
 He hath scoff'd at my hoofs and my horns,
 And has made very free with my tail.

43.

But this Mister Poet shall find
 I am not a safe subject for him ;
 For I'll set up a School of my own,
 And my Poets shall set upon him.

44.

He went to a coffee-house to dine,
And there he had soy in his dish;
Having ordered some soles for his dinner,
Because he was fond of flat fish.

45.

They are much to my palate, thought he,
And now guess the reason who can,
Why no bait should be better than place,
When I fish for a Parliament-man.

46.

But the soles in the bill were ten shillings,
Tell your master, quoth he, what I say;
If he charges at this rate for all things,
He must be in a pretty good way.

47.

But mark ye, said he to the waiter,
I'm a dealer myself in this line,
And his business, between you and me,
Nothing like so extensive as mine.

48.

Now soles are exceedingly cheap;
Which he will not attempt to deny,
When I see him at my fish-market,
I warrant him, by and by.

49.

As he went along the Strand
Between three in the morning and four
He observed a queer-looking person
Who staggered from Perry's door.

50.

And he thought that all the world over
In vain for a man you might seek,
Who could drink more like a Trojan
Or talk more like a Greek.

51.

The Devil then he prophesied
It would one day be matter of talk,
That with wine when smitten,
And with wit moreover being happily bitten
This erudite bibber was he who had written
The story of this walk.

52.

A pretty mistake, quoth the Devil;
A pretty mistake I opine!
I have put many ill thoughts in his mouth,
He will never put good ones in mine.

53.

And whoever shall say that to Porson
These best of all verses belong,
He is an untruth-telling whoreson,
And so shall be call'd in the song.

54.

And if seeking an illicit connection with fame,
Any one else should put in a claim,
In this comical competition;
That excellent poem will prove
A man-trap for such foolish ambition,
Where the silly rogue shall be caught by the leg,
And exposed in a second edition.

55.

Now the morning air was cold for him
Who was used to a warm abode;
And yet he did not immediately wish,
To set out on his homeward road.

56.

For he had some morning calls to make
Before he went back to Hell;
So thought he I'll step into a gaming-house,
And that will do as well;
But just before he could get to the door
A wonderful chance befell.

57.

For all on a sudden, in a dark place,
He came upon General ———'s burning face;
And it struck him with such consternation,
That home in a hurry his way did he take,
Because he thought by a slight mistake
'Twas the general conflagration.

"THE three utilities of Poetry: the praise of Virtue and Goodness, the memory of things remarkable, and to invigorate the Affections."—Welsh Triad.

I.

FOR A COLUMN AT NEWBURY.

CALLEST thou thyself a Patriot? . . On this field
Did Falkland fall, the blameless and the brave,
Beneath the banners of that Charles whom thou
Abhorrest for a Tyrant. Dost thou boast
Of loyalty? The field is not far off
Where in rebellious arms against his King
Hambden was kill'd, that Hambden at whose name
The heart of many an honest Englishman
Beats with congenial pride. Both uncorrupt,
Friends to their common country both, they fought,
They died in adverse armies. Traveller!
If with thy neighbour thou shouldst not accord,
Remember these, our famous countrymen,
And quell all angry and injurious thoughts.

Bristol, 1796.

II.

FOR A CAVERN THAT OVERLOOKS THE RIVER AVON.

ENTER this cavern, Stranger! Here awhile
Respiring from the long and steep ascent,
Thou may'st be glad of rest, and haply too
Of shade, if from the summer's westering sun
Shelter'd beneath this beetling vault of rock.
Round the rude portal clasping its rough arms
The antique ivy spreads a canopy,
From whose grey blossoms the wild bees collect
In autumn their last store. The Muses love
This spot; believe a Poet who hath felt
Their visitation here. The tide below
Rising or reflux scarcely sends its sound
Of waters up; and from the heights beyond
Where the high-hanging forest waves and sways,
Varying before the wind its verdant hues,
The voice is music here. Here thou may'st feel
How good, how lovely, Nature! And when hence
Returning to the city's crowded streets,
Thy sickening eye at every step revolts
From scenes of vice and wretchedness, reflect
That Man creates the evil he endures.

Bristol, 1796.

III.

FOR A TABLET AT SILBURY-HILL.

THIS mound in some remote and dateless day
Rear'd o'er a Chieftain of the Age of Hills,
May here detain thee, Traveller! from thy road
Not idly lingering In his narrow house
Some warrior sleeps below, whose gallant deeds
Haply at many a solemn festival
The Scald hath sung; but perish'd is the song
Of praise, as o'er these bleak and barren downs
The wind that passes and is heard no more.
Go, Traveller, and remember when the pomp
Of earthly Glory fades, that one good deed,
Unseen, unheard, unnoted by mankind,
Lives in the eternal register of Heaven.

IV.

FOR A MONUMENT IN THE NEW FOREST.

THIS is the place where William's kingly power
Did from their poor and peaceful homes expel,
Unfriended, desolate, and shelterless,
The habitants of all the fertile track
Far as these wilds extend. He level'd down
Their little cottages, he bade their fields
Lie waste, and forested the land, that so
More royally might he pursue his sports.
If that thine heart be human, Passenger!
Sure it will swell within thee, and thy lips
Will mutter curses on him. Think thou then
What cities flame, what hosts unsepulchred
Pollute the passing wind, when raging Power
Drives on his blood-hounds to the chase of Man;
And as thy thoughts anticipate that day
When God shall judge aright, in charity
Pray for the wicked rulers of mankind.

Bristol, 1796.

V.

FOR A TABLET ON THE BANKS OF A STREAM.

STRANGER! awhile upon this mossy bank
Recline thee. If the Sun rides high, the breeze,

That loves to ripple o'er the rivulet,
Will play around thy brow, and the cool sound
Of running waters soothe thee. Mark how clear
They sparkle o'er the shallows, and behold
Where o'er their surface wheels with restless speed
Yon glossy insect, on the sand below
How its swift shadow flits. In solitude
The rivulet is pure, and trees and herbs
Bend o'er its salutary course refreshing,
But passing on amid the haunts of men,
It finds pollution there, and rolls from thence
A tainted stream. Seek'st thou for HAPPINESS?
Go, Stranger, sojourn in the woodland cot
OF INNOCENCE, and thou shalt find her there.

Bristol, 1796.

VI.

FOR THE CENOTAPH AT ERMENONVILLE

STRANGER! the MAN of NATURE lies not here.
Enshrined far distant by the Scoffers' side
His relics rest, there by the giddy throng
With blind idolatry alike revered
Wise men directed have thy pilgrim feet
Explored the scenes of Ermenonville. ROUSSEAU
Loved these calm haunts of Solitude and Peace,
Here he has heard the murmurs of the Lake,
And the soft rustling of the poplar grove,
When o'er its bending boughs the passing wind
Swept a grey shade. Here, if thy breast be full,
If in thine eye the tear devout should gush,
His SPIRIT shall behold thee, to thine home
From hence returning, purified of heart.

Bristol, 1796.

VII.

FOR A MONUMENT AT OXFORD.

HERE Latimer and Ridley in the flames
Bore witness to the truth. If thou hast walk'd
Uprightly through the world, just thoughts of joy
May fill thy breast in contemplating here
Congenial virtue. But if thou hast swerved
From the straight path of even rectitude,
Fearful in trying seasons to assert
The better cause, or to forsake the worse
Reluctant, when perchance therein enthrall'd
Slave to false shame, oh! thankfully receive
The sharp compunctious motions that this spot
May wake within thee, and be wise in time,
And let the future for the past atone.

Bath, 1797.

VIII.

FOR A MONUMENT IN THE VALE OF EWIAS.

HERE was it, Stranger, that the patron Saint
Of Cambria pass'd his age of penitence,
A solitary man; and here he made
His hermitage, the roots his food, his drink
Of Hodney's mountain stream. Perchance thy youth
Has read with eager wonder how the Knight
Of Wales in Ormandine's enchanted bower
Slept the long sleep and if that in thy veins
Flow the pure blood of Britain, sure that blood
Hath flow'd with quicker impulse at the tale
Of David's deeds, when through the press of war
His gallant comrades follow'd his green crest
To victory Stranger! Hatterill's mountain heights
And this fair vale of Ewias, and the stream
Of Hodney, to thine after-thoughts will rise
More grateful, thus associate with the name
Of David and the deeds of other days.

Bath, 1798

IX.

EPITAPH ON ALGERNON SIDNEY.

HERE Sidney lies, he whom perverted law,
The plant jury and the bloody judge,
Doom'd to a traitor's death. A tyrant King
Required, an abject country saw and shared
The crime. The noble cause of Liberty
He loved in life, and to that noble cause
In death bore witness. But his country rose
Like Samson from her sleep, and broke her chains,
And proudly with her worthies she enroll'd
Her murder'd Sidney's name. The voice of man
Gives honour or destroys; but earthly power
Gives not, nor takes away, the self-applause
Which on the scaffold suffering virtue feels,
Nor that which God appointed its reward.

Westbury, 1798.

X.

EPITAPH ON KING JOHN.

JOHN rests below. A man more infamous
Never hath held the sceptre of these realms,
And bruised beneath the iron rod of Power
The oppressed men of England. Englishman!
Curse not his memory. Murderer as he was,
Coward and slave, yet he it was who sign'd
That Charter which should make thee morn and night
Be thankful for thy birth-place: . . . Englishman!
That holy Charter, which, shouldst thou permit
Force to destroy, or Fraud to undermine,
Thy children's groans will persecute thy soul,
For they must bear the burthen of thy crime.

Westbury, 1798

XI.

IN A FOREST.

STRANGER ! whose steps have reach'd this solitude,
 Know that this lonely spot was dear to one
 Devoted with no unrequited zeal
 To Nature. Here, delighted he has heard
 The rustling of these woods, that now perchance
 Melodious to the gale of summer move ;
 And underneath their shade on yon smooth rock,
 With grey and yellow lichens overgrown,
 Often reclined ; watching the silent flow
 Of this perspicuous rivulet, that steals
 Along its verdant course, . . till all around
 Had fill'd his senses with tranquillity,
 And ever soothed in spirit he return'd
 A happier, better man. Stranger ! perchance,
 Therefore the stream more lovely to thine eye
 Will glide along, and to the summer gale
 The woods wave more melodious. Cleanse thou then
 The weeds and mosses from this letter'd stone.

Westbury, 1798.

XII.

FOR A MONUMENT AT TORDESILLAS.

SPANIARD ! if thou art one who bows the knee
 Before a despot's footstool, hie thee hence !
 This ground is holy : here Padilla died,
 Martyr of Freedom. But if thou dost love
 Her cause, stand then as at an altar here,
 And thank the Almighty that thine honest heart,
 Full of a brother's feelings for mankind,
 Revolts against oppression. Not unheard
 Nor unavailing shall the grateful prayer
 Ascend ; for honest impulses will rise,
 Such as may elevate and strengthen thee
 For virtuous action. Relics silver-shrined,
 And chaunted mass, would wake within the soul
 Thoughts valueless and cold compared with these.

Bristol, 1796.

XIII.

FOR A COLUMN AT TRUXILLO.

PIZARRO here was born ; a greater name
 The list of Glory boasts not. Toll and Pain,
 Famine and hostile Elements, and Hosts
 Embattled, fail'd to check him in his course,
 Not to be wearied, not to be deterr'd,
 Not to be overcome. A mighty realm
 He over-ran, and with relentless arm
 Slew or enslaved its unoffending sons,
 And wealth, and power, and fame, were his rewards.
 There is another world, beyond the Grave,
 According to their deeds where men are judged.

O Reader ! if thy daily bread be earn'd
 By daily labour, . . yea, however low,
 However painful be thy lot assign'd,
 Thank thou, with deepest gratitude, the God
 Who made thee, that thou art not such as he.

Bristol, 1796.

XIV.

FOR THE CELL OF HONORIUS, AT THE CORK
CONVENT, NEAR CINTRA.

HERE cavern'd like a beast Honorius pass'd
 In self-affliction, solitude, and prayer,
 Long years of penance. He had rooted out
 All human feelings from his heart, and fled
 With fear and loathing from all human joys.
 Not thus in making known his will divine
 Hath Christ enjoin'd. To aid the fatherless,
 Comfort the sick, and be the poor man's friend,
 And in the wounded heart pour gospel-balm ;
 These are the injunctions of his holy law,
 Which whoso keeps shall have a joy on earth,
 Calm, constant, still increasing, prelude
 The eternal bliss of Heaven. Yet mock not thou,
 Stranger, the Anchorite's mistaken zeal !
 He painfully his painful duties kept,
 Sincere though erring : Stranger, do thou keep
 Thy better and thine easier rule as well.

Bristol, 1798.

XV.

FOR A MONUMENT AT TAUNTON.

THEY suffer'd here whom Jefferies doom'd to death
 In mockery of all justice, when the Judge
 Unjust, subservient to a cruel King,
 Perform'd his work of blood. They suffer'd here
 The victims of that Judge, and of that King ;
 In mockery of all justice here they bled,
 Unheard. But not unpitied, nor of God
 Unseen, the innocent suffered ; not unheard
 The innocent blood cried vengeance ; for at length,
 The indignant Nation in its power arose,
 Resistless. Then that wicked Judge took flight,
 Disguised in vain : . . not always is the Lord
 Slow to revenge ! A miserable man
 He fell beneath the people's rage, and still
 The children curse his memory. From the throne
 The obdurate bigot who commission'd him,
 Inhuman James, was driven. He lived to drag
 Long years of frustrate hope, he lived to load
 More blood upon his soul. Let tell the Boyne,
 Let Londonderry tell his guilt and shame ;
 And that immortal day when on thy shores,
 La Hogue, the purple ocean dash'd the dead !

Westbury, 1798.

XVI.

FOR A TABLET AT PENSURST.

ARE days of old familiar to thy mind,
O Reader? Hast thou let the midnight hour
Pass unperceived, whilst thou in fancy lived
With high-born beauties and enamour'd chiefs,
Sharing their hopes, and with a breathless joy
Whose expectation touch'd the verge of pain,
Following their dangerous fortunes? If such lore
Hath ever thrill'd thy bosom, thou wilt tread,
As with a pilgrim's reverential thoughts,
The groves of Penshurst. Sidney here was born.
Sidney, than whom no gentler, braver man
His own delightful genius ever feign'd,
Illustrating the vales of Arcady
With courteous courage and with loyal loves.
Upon his natal day an acorn here
Was planted: it grew up a stately oak,
And in the beauty of its strength it stood
And flourish'd, when his perishable part
Had moulder'd, dust to dust. That stately oak
Itself hath moulder'd now, but Sidney's fame
Endureth in his own immortal works.

Westbury, 1799.

EPITAPH.

THIS to a mother's sacred memory
Her son hath hallow'd. Absent many a year
Far over sea, his sweetest dreams were still
Of that dear voice which soothed his infancy;
And after many a fight against the Moor
And Malabar, or that fierce cavalry
Which he had seen covering the boundless plain,
Even to the utmost limits where the eye
Could pierce the far horizon, . . his first thought
In safety was of her, who when she heard
The tale of that day's danger, would retire
And pour her pious gratitude to Heaven
In prayers and tears of joy. The lingering hour
Of his return, long-look'd-for, came at length,
And full of hope he reach'd his native shore.
Vain hope that puts its trust in human life!
For ere he came, the number of her days
Was full. O Reader, what a world were this,
How unendurable its weight, if they
Whom Death hath sunder'd did not meet again!

Keswick, 1810.

XVIII.

EPITAPH.

HERE in the fruitful vales of Somerset
Was Emma born, and here the Maiden grew
To the sweet season of her womanhood
Beloved and lovely, like a plant whose leaf

And bud and blossom all are beautiful.
In peacefulness her virgin years were past;
And when in prosperous wedlock she was given,
Amid the Cumbrian mountains far away
She had her summer Bower. 'Twas like a dream
Of old Romance to see her when she plied
Her little skiff on Derwent's glassy lake;
The roseate evening resting on the hills,
The lake returning back the hues of heaven,
Mountains and vales and waters all imbued
With beauty, and in quietness; and she,
Nymph-like, amid that glorious solitude
A heavenly presence, gliding in her joy.
But soon a wasting malady began
To prey upon her, frequent in attack,
Yet with such flattering intervals as mock
The hopes of anxious love, and most of all
The sufferer, self-deceived. During those days
Of treacherous respite, many a time hath he,
Who leaves this record of his friend, drawn back
Into the shadow from her social board,
Because too surely in her cheek he saw
The insidious bloom of death; and then her smiles
And innocent mirth excited deeper grief
Than when long-look'd for tidings came at last,
That, all her sufferings ended, she was laid
Amid Madeira's orange groves to rest.
O gentle Emma! o'er a lovelier form
Than thine, Earth never closed; nor e'er did Heaven
Receive a purer spirit from the world.

Keswick, 1810.

XIX.

FOR A MONUMENT AT ROLISSA.

TIME has been when Rolissa was a name
Ignoble, by the passing traveller heard
And then forthwith forgotten; now in war
It is renown'd. For when to her ally,
In bondage by perfidious France oppress'd
England sent succour, first within this realm
The fated theatre of their long strife
Confronted, here the hostile nations met.
Laborde took here his stand; upon yon point
Of Mount Saint Anna was his Eagle fix'd;
The veteran chief, disposing well all aid
Of height and glen, possess'd the mountain straits,
A post whose strength thus mann'd and profit'd
Seem'd to defy the enemy and make
The vantage of assailing numbers vain.
Here, too, before the sun should bend his course
Adown the slope of heaven, so had their plans
Been timed, he look'd for Lóison's army, rich
With spoils from Evora and Beja sack'd.
That hope the British Knight areeding well,
With prompt attack prevented; and nor strength
Of ground, nor leader's skill, nor discipline
Of soldiers practised in the ways of war,
Avail'd that day against the British arm.
Resisting long, but beaten from their stand,
The French fell back; they join'd their greater host
To suffer fresh defeat, and Portugal
First for Sir Arthur wreathed her laurels here.

XX.

FOR A MONUMENT AT VIMEIRO.

THIS is Vimeiro; yonder stream which flows
Westward through heathery highlands to the sea,
Is call'd Maceira, till of late a name,
Save to the dwellers of this peaceful vale,
Known only to the coasting mariner;
Now in the bloody page of war inscribed.
When to the aid of injured Portugal
Struggling against the intolerable yoke
Of treacherous France, England, her old ally,
Long tried and always faithful found, went forth,
The embattled hosts in equal strength array'd,
And equal discipline, encountered here.
Junot, the mock Abrantes, led the French,
And confident of skill so oft approved,
And vaunting many a victory, advanced
Against an untried foe. But when the ranks
Met in the shock of battle, man to man,
And bayonet to bayonet opposed,
The flower of France cut down along their line,
Fell like ripe grass before the mower's scythe,
For the strong arm and rightful cause prevail'd.
That day deliver'd Lisbon from the yoke,
And babes were taught to bless Sir Arthur's name.

XXI.

AT CORUÑA.

WHEN from these shores the British army first
Boldly advanced into the heart of Spain,
The admiring people who beheld its march
Call'd it "the Beautiful." And surely well
Its proud array, its perfect discipline,
Its ample furniture of war complete,
Its powerful horse, its men of British mould,
All high in heart and hope, all of themselves
Assured, and in their leaders confident,
Deserved the title. Few short weeks elapsed
Ere hither that disastrous host return'd,
A fourth of all its gallant force consumed
In hasty and precipitate retreat,
Stores treasure and artillery, in the wreck
Left to the fierce pursuer, horse and man
Founder'd, and stiffening on the mountain snows.
But when the exulting enemy approach'd
Boasting that he would drive into the sea
The remnant of the wretched fugitives,
Here ere they reach'd their ships, they turn'd at bay.
Then was the proof of British courage seen;
Against a foe far overnumbering them,
An insolent foe, rejoicing in pursuit,
Sure of the fruit of victory, whatso'er
Might be the fate of battle, here they stood
And their safe embarkation, . . all they sought,
Won manfully. That mournful day avenged
Their sufferings, and redeem'd their country's name;
And thus Coruña, which in this retreat
Had seen the else indelible reproach
Of England, saw the stain effaced in blood.

XXII.

EPITAPH.

HE who in this unconsecrated ground
Obtain'd a soldier's grave, hath left a name
Which will endure in history: the remains
Of Moore, the British General, rest below.
His early prowess Corsica beheld,
When, at Mozello, bleeding, through the breach
He passed victorious; the Columbian isles
Then saw him tried; upon the sandy downs
Of Holland was his riper worth approved;
And leaving on the Egyptian shores his blood,
He gathered there fresh palms. High in repute
A gallant army last he led to Spain,
In arduous times; for moving in his strength,
With all his mighty means of war complete,
The Tyrant Buonaparte bore down all
Before him; and the British Chief beheld,
Where'er he look'd, rout, treason, and dismay,
All sides with all embarrassments beset,
And danger pressing on. Hither he came Before the far out-numbering hosts of France
Retreating to her ships, and close pursued;
Nor were there wanting men who counsel'd him
To offer terms, and from the enemy
Purchase a respite to embark in peace,
At price of such abasement, . . even to this,
Brave as they were, by hopelessness subdued.
That shameful counsel Moore, in happy hour
Remembering what was due to England's name,
Refused; he fought, he conquer'd, and he fell.

XXIII.

TO THE MEMORY OF PAUL BURRARD,

MORTALLY WOUNDED IN THE BATTLE OF CORUÑA.

MYSTERIOUS are the ways of Providence! —
Old men who have grown grey in camps, and wish'd,
And pray'd, and sought in battle to lay down
The burthen of their age, have seen the young
Fall round, themselves untouch'd; and balls beside
The graceless and the unblest head have pass'd,
Harmless as hail, to reach some precious life,
For which clasp'd hands, and supplicating eyes,
Duly at morn and eve were raised to Heaven;
And, in the depth and loneliness of the soul
(Then boding all too truly), midnight prayers
Breathed from an anxious pillow wet with tears.
But blessed, even amid their grief, are they
Who, in the hour of visitation, bow
Beneath the unerring will, and look toward Their Heavenly Father, merciful as just!
They, while they own his goodness, feel that whom
He chastens, them he loves. The cup he gives,
Shall they not drink it? Therefore doth the draught
Resent of comfort in its bitterness,
And carry healing with it. What but this
Could have sustain'd the mourners who were left,
With life-long yearnings, to remember him

Whose early death this monumental verse
 Records? For never more auspicious hopes
 Were nipt in flower, nor finer qualities
 From goodliest fabric of mortality
 Divorced, nor virtues worthier to adorn
 The world transferr'd to heaven, than when, ere time
 Had measured him the space of nineteen years,
 Paul Burrart on Coruña's fatal field
 Received his mortal hurt. Not unprepared
 The heroic youth was found: for in the ways
 Of piety had he been trained; and what
 The dutiful child upon his mother's knees
 Had learnt, the soldier faithfully observed.
 In chamber or in tent, the Book of God
 Was his beloved manual; and his life
 Besem'd the lessons which from thence he drew.
 For, gallant as he was, and blithe of heart,
 Expert of hand, and keen of eye, and prompt
 In intellect, religion was the crown
 Of all his noble properties. When Paul
 Was by, the scoffer, self-abased, restrain'd
 The license of his speech; and ribaldry
 Before his virtuous presence sat rebuked.
 And yet so frank and affable a form
 His virtue wore, that whoso'er he moved
 A sunshine of good-will and cheerfulness
 Enliven'd all around. Oh! marvel not,
 If, in the morning of his fair career,
 Which promised all that honour could bestow
 On high desert, the youth was summon'd hence!
 His soul required no farther discipline,
 Pure as it was, and capable of Heaven.
 Upon the spot from whence he just had seen
 His General borne away, the appointed hall
 Reach'd him. But not on that Gallican ground
 Was it his fate, like many a British heart,
 To mingle with the soil. the sea received
 His mortal relics, . . . to a watery grave
 Consign'd so near his native shore, so near
 His father's house, that they who loved him best,
 Unconscious of its import, heard the gun
 Which fired his knell,—Alas! if it were known,
 When, in the strife of nations, dreadful Death
 Mows down with indiscriminating sweep
 His thousands ten times told, . . . if it were known
 What tics are sever'd then, what ripening hopes
 Blasted, what virtues in their bloom cut off;
 How far the desolating scourge extends;
 How wide the misery spreads, what hearts beneath
 Their grief are broken, or survive to feel
 Always the irremediable loss;
 Oh! who of woman born could bear the thought?
 Who but would join with fervent piety
 The prayer that asketh in our time for peace? —
 Nor in our time alone! — Enable us,
 Father which art in heaven! but to receive
 And keep thy word: thy kingdom then should come,
 Thy will be done on earth; the victory
 Accomplished over Sin as well as Death,
 And the great scheme of Providence fulfill'd.

XXIV.

FOR THE BANKS OF THE DOURO.

Crossing in unexampled enterprize
 This great and perilous stream, the English host
 Effected here their landing, on the day
 When Soult from Porto with his troops was driven.
 No sight so joyful ever had been seen
 From Douro's banks, . . . not when the mountains sent
 Their generous produce down, or homeward fleets
 Entered from distant seas their port desired;
 Nor e'er were shouts of such glad mariners
 So gladly heard, as then the cannon's peal,
 And short sharp strokes of frequent musketry,
 By the delivered habitants that hour.
 For they who beaten then and routed fled
 Before victorious England, in their day
 Of triumph, had, like fiends let loose from hell,
 Fill'd yon devoted city with all forms
 Of horror, all unutterable crimes;
 And vengeance now had reach'd the inhuman race
 Accurst. Oh what a scene did Night behold
 Within those rescued walls, when festal fires,
 And torches, blazing through the bloody streets,
 Stream'd their broad light where horse and man in death
 Unheeded lay outstretch'd! Eyes which had wept
 In bitterness so long, shed tears of joy,
 And from the broken heart thanksgiving mix'd
 With anguish rose to Heaven. Sir Arthur then
 Might feel how precious in a righteous cause,
 Victory, how divine the soldier's meed
 When grateful nations bless the avenging sword!

XXV.

TALAVERA.

FOR THE FIELD OF BATTLE.

Yow wide-extended town, whose roofs and towers
 And poplar avenues are seen far off,
 In goodly prospect over scatter'd woods
 Of dusky ilex, boasts among its sons
 Of Mariana's name, . . . he who hath made
 The splendid story of his country's wars
 Through all the European kingdoms known.
 Yet in his ample annals thou canst find
 No braver battle chronicled, than here
 Was waged, when Joseph of the stolen crown,
 Against the hosts of England, and of Spain
 His veteran armies brought. By veteran chiefs
 Captain'd, a formidable force they came,
 Full fifty thousand. Victor led them on,
 A man grown grey in arms, nor e'er in aught
 Dishonoured, till by this opprobrious cause.
 He over rude Alverche's summer stream
 Winning his way, made first upon the right
 His hot attack, where Spain's raw levies, ranged
 In double line, had taken their strong stand
 In yonder broken ground, by olive groves

Cover'd and flank'd by Tagus. Soon from thence,
 As one whose practised eye could apprehend
 All vantages in war, his troops he drew;
 And on this hill, the battle's vital point,
 Bore with collected power, outnumbering
 The British ranks twice told. Such fearful odds
 Were balanced by Sir Arthur's master mind
 And by the British heart. Twice during night
 The fatal spot they storm'd, and twice fell back,
 Before the bayonet driven. Again at morn
 They made their fiery onset, and again
 Repell'd, again at noon renew'd the strife.
 Yet was their desperate perseverance vain,
 Where skill by equal skill was countervail'd,
 And numbers by superior courage foil'd;
 And when the second night drew over them
 Its sheltering cope, in darkness they retired,
 At all points beaten. Long in the red page
 Of war, shall Talavera's famous name
 Stand forth conspicuous. While that name endures,
 Bear in thy soul, O Spain, the memory
 Of all thou suffer'dst from perfidious France,
 Of all that England in thy cause achieved.

XXVI.

FOR THE DESERTO DE BUSACO.

READER, thou standest upon holy ground
 Which Penitence hath chosen for itself,
 And war disturbing the deep solitude
 Hath left it doubly sacred. On these heights
 The host of Portugal and England stood,
 Arrayed against Massena, when the chief
 Proud of Rodrigoo and Almeida won,
 Press'd forward, thinking the devoted realm
 Full sure should fall a prey. He in his pride
 Scorn'd the poor numbers of the English foe,
 And thought the children of the land would fly
 From his advance, like sheep before the wolf,
 Scattering, and lost in terror. Ill he knew
 The Lusitanian spirit! Ill he knew
 The arm, the heart of England! Ill he knew
 Her Wellington! He learnt to know them here.
 That spirit and that arm, that heart, that mind,
 Here on Busaco gloriously display'd,
 When hence repulsed the beaten boaster wound
 Below, his course circuitous, and left
 His thousands for the beasts and ravenous fowl.
 The Carmelite who in his cell reclusé
 Was wont to sit, and from a skull receive
 Death's silent lesson, wheresoe'er he walk
 Henceforth may find his teachers. He shall find
 The Frenchmen's bones in glen and grove, on rock
 And height, where'er the wolves and carrion birds
 Have strewn them, wash'd in torrents, bare and bleach'd
 By sun and rain and by the winds of heaven.

XXVII.

FOR THE LINES OF TORRES VEDRAS.

THROUGH all Iberia, from the Atlantic shores
 To far Pyrene, Wellington hath left
 His trophies; but no monument records
 To after-time a more enduring praise,
 Than this which marks his triumph here attain'd
 By intellect, and patience to the end
 Holding through good and ill its course assign'd,
 The stamp and seal of greatness. Here the chief
 Perceived in foresight Lisbon's sure defence,
 A vantage ground for all reverse prepared,
 Where Portugal and England might defy
 All strength of hostile numbers. Not for this
 Of hostile enterprise did he abate,
 Or gallant purpose: witness the proud day
 Which saw Soul's murderous host from Porto
 Bear witness Talavera, made by him [driven;
 Famous for ever; and that later fight
 When from Busaco's solitude the birds,
 Then first affrighted in their sanctuary,
 Fled from the thunders and the fires of war.
 But when Spain's feeble counsels, in delay
 As erring, as in action premature,
 Had left him in the field without support,
 And Buonaparte having trampled down
 The strength and pride of Austria, this way turn'd
 His single thought and undivided power,
 Retreating hither the great General came;
 And proud Massena, when the boastful chief
 Of plundered Lisbon dreamt, here found himself
 Stopt suddenly in his presumptuous course.
 From Ericeyra on the western sea,
 By Mafra's princely convent, and the heights
 Of Montichique, and Bucellas famed
 For generous vines, the formidable works
 Extending, rested on the guarded shores
 Of Tagus, that rich river who received
 Into his ample and rejoicing port,
 The harvests and the wealth of distant lands,
 Secure, insulting with the glad display
 The robber's greedy sight. Five months the foe
 Beheld these lines, made inexpugnable
 By perfect skill, and patriot feelings here
 With discipline conjoin'd, courageou hands,
 True spirits, and one comprehensive mind
 All overseeing and pervading all.
 Five months, tormenting still his heart with hope,
 He saw his projects frustrated; the power
 Of the blaspheming tyrant whom he served
 Fail in the proof; his thousands disappear,
 In silent and inglorious war consumed;
 Till hence retreating, madden'd with despite,
 Here did the self-styled Son of Victory leave,
 Never to be redeem'd, that vaunted name.

XXVIII.

AT SANTAREM.

Four months Massena had his quarters here,
 When by those lines deterr'd where Wellington

Defied the power of France, but loth to leave
 Rich Lisbon yet unsack'd, he kept his ground,
 Till from impending famine, and the force
 Array'd in front, and that consuming war
 Which still the faithful nation, day and night,
 And at all hours was waging on his rear,
 He saw no safety, save in swift retreat.
 Then of his purpose frustrated, this child
 Of Hell, . . . so fittler than of Victory call'd,
 Gave his own devilish nature scope, and let
 His devilish army loose. The mournful rolls
 That chronicle the ~~guilt~~ ^{guilt} of humankind,
 Tell not of aught more hideous than the deeds
 With which this monster and his kindred troops
 Track'd their inhuman way; all cruelties,
 All forms of horror, all deliberate crimes,
 Which tongue abhors to utter, ear to hear.
 Let this memorial bear Massena's name
 For everlasting infamy inscribed.

XXIX.

AT FIENES D'ONORO.

Two fountains of Onoro which give name
 To this poor hamlet, were stain'd with blood,
 What time Massena, driven from Portugal
 By national virtue in endurance proved,
 And England's faithful aid, against the Lord
 Not long deliver'd, desperately made
 His last heroic effort here. That day, he break'd
 With slaughter Ota and Agueda ran,
 So deeply had the open veins of war
 Purpled their mountain feeders. Strong in means,
 With rest, and stores, and numbers reinforced,
 Came the ferocious enemy, and wend
 Beneath their formidable cavalry
 To trample down resistance. But there fought
 Against them here, with Britons side by side,
 The children of regenerate Portugal,
 And their own crimes, and all-beholding Heaven.
 Beaten, and hopeless thenceforth of success
 The inhuman Marshal, never to be named
 By Lusitanian lips without a curse
 Of clinging infamy, withdrew and left
 These Fountains famous for his overthrow.

XXX.

AT BARROSA.

Through the four quarters of the world have seen
 The British valour proved triumphantly
 Upon the French, in many a field far-famed,
 Yet may the noble Island in her rolls
 Of glory write Barrosa's name. For there,
 Not by the issue of deliberate plans
 Consulted well, was the fierce conflict won,
 Nor by the leader's eye intuitive,
 Nor force of either arm of war, nor art

Of skill'd artillerist, nor the discipline
 Of troops to absolute obedience train'd;
 But by the spring and impulse of the heart,
 Brought fairly to the trial, when all else
 Seem'd, like a wrestler's garment, thrown aside;
 By individual courage and the sense
 Of honour, their old country's, and their own,
 There to be forfeited, or there upheld; . .
 This warm'd the soldier's soul, and gave his hand
 The strength that carries with it victory.
 More to enhance their praise, the day was fought
 Against all circumstance; a painful march.
 Through twenty hours of night and day prolong'd,
 Forespent the British troops; and hope delay'd
 Had left their spirits pall'd. But when the word
 Was given to turn, and charge, and win the heights;
 The welcome order came to them, like rain
 Upon a traveller in the thirsty sands.
 Rejoicing, up the ascent, and in the front
 Of danger, they with steady step advanced,
 And with the insupportable bayonet
 Drove down the foe. The vanquish'd Victor saw
 And thought of Talavera, and deplored
 His eagle lost. But England saw well-pleased
 Her old ascendancy that day sustain'd;
 And Scotland shouting over all her hills
 Among her worthies rank'd another Graham.

XXXI.

FOR A MONUMENT AT ALBUERA.

SEVEN thousand men lay bleeding on these heights,
 When Beresford in strenuous conflict strove
 Against a foe whom all the accidents
 Of battle favoured, and who knew full well
 To seize all offets that occasion gave.
 Wounded or dead, seven thousand here were stretch'd,
 And on the plain around a myriad more,
 Spaniard and Briton and true Portuguese,
 Alike approved that day; and in the cause
 Of France, with her flagitious sons compell'd,
 Pole and Italian, German, Hollander,
 Men of all climes and countries, hither brought,
 Doing and suffering, for the work of war.
 This point by her superior cavalry
 France from the Spaniard won, the elements
 Aiding her powerful efforts; here awhile
 She seem'd to rule the conflict; and from hence
 The British and the Lusitanian arm
 Dislodged with irresistible assault
 The enemy, even when he deem'd the day
 Was written for his own. But not for Soul,
 But not for France was that day in the rolls
 Of war to be inscribed by Victory's hand,
 Not for the inhuman chief, and cause unjust;
 She wrote for aftertimes in blood the names
 Of Spain and England, Blake and Beresford.

XXXII.

TO THE MEMORY OF SIR WILLIAM MYERS.

SPANIARD, OF Portuguese! tread reverently
Upon a soldier's grave; no common heart
Lies mingled with the clod beneath thy feet.
To honours and to ample wealth was Myers
In England born; but leaving friends beloved,
And all allurements of that happy land,
His ardent spirit to the field of war
Impell'd him. Fair was his career. He faced
The perils of that memorable day,
When through the iron shower and fiery storm
Of death, the dauntless host of Britain made
Their landing at Aboukir; then not less
Illustrated, than when great Nelson's hand,
As if insulted Heaven with its own wrath
Had arm'd him, smote the miscreant Frenchmen's fleet,

And with its wreck wide-floating many a league
Strew'd the rejoicing shores. What then his youth
Held forth of promise, amply was confirm'd
When Wellesley, upon Talavera's plain,
On the mock monarch won his coronet:
There when the trophies of the field were reap'd
Was he for gallant bearing eminent
When all did bravely. But his valour's orb
Shone brightest at its setting. On the field
Of Albuhera he the fusileers
Led to regain the heights, and promised them
A glorious day; a glorious day was given;
The heights were gain'd, the victory was achieved,
And Myers received from death his deathless crown.
Here to Valverde was he borne, and here
His faithful men amid this olive grove,
The olive emblem here of endless peace,
Laid him to rest. Spaniard or Portuguese,
In your good cause the British soldier fell;
Tread reverently upon his honour'd grave.

XXXIII.

EPITAPH.

STEFF is the soldier's path; nor are the heights
Of glory to be won without long toil
And arduous efforts of enduring hope;
Save when Death takes the aspirant by the hand,
And cutting short the work of years, at once
Lifts him to that conspicuous eminence.
Such fate was mine. — The standard of the Buffs
I bore at Albuhera, on that day
When, covered by a shower, and fatally
For friends misdeem'd, the Polish lancers fell
Upon our rear. Surrounding me, they claim'd
My precious charge. — "Not but with life!" I cried,
And life was given for immortality.
The flag which to my heart I held, when wet
With that heart's blood, was soon victoriously
Regain'd on that great day. In former times,
Marlborough beheld it borne at Ramillies;
For Brunswick and for liberty it waded

Triumphant at Culloden; and hath seen
The lilies on the Caribbean shores
Abased before it. Then too in the front
Of battle did it flap exultingly,
When Douro, with its wide stream interposed,
Saved not the French invaders from attack,
Discomfiture, and ignominious rout.
My name is Thomas: undisgraced have I
Transmitted it. He who in days to come
May bear the honour'd banner to the field,
Will think of Albuhera, and of me.

XXXIV.

FOR THE WALLS OF CIUDAD RODRIGO.

HERE Craufurd fell, victorious, in the breach,
Leading his countrymen in that assault
Which won from haughty France these rescued walls;
And here intomb'd far from his native land
And kindred dust, his honour'd relics rest.
Well was he versed in war, in the Orient train'd
Beneath Cornwallis; then for many a year
Following through arduous and ill-fated fields
The Austrian banners; on the sea-like shores
Of Plata next, still by malignant stars
Pursued; and in that miserable retreat,
For which Coruña witness'd on her hills
The pledge of vengeance given. At length he saw,
Long woo'd and well deserved, the brighter face
Of Fortune, upon Coa's banks vouchsafed,
Before Almeida, when Messina found
The fourfold vantage of his numbers foil'd,
Before the Briton, and the Portugal,
There vindicating first his old renown,
And Craufurd's mind that day presiding there.
Again was her auspicious countenance
Upon Busaco's holy heights reveal'd;
And when by Torres Vedras, Wellington,
Wisely secure, defied the boastful French,
With all their power; and when Onoro's springs
Beheld that execrable enemy
Again chastised beneath the avenging arm.
Too early here his honourable course
He closed, and won his noble sepulchre.
Where should the soldier rest so worthily
As where he fell? Be thou his monument,
O City of Rodrigo, yea be thou,
To latest time, his trophy and his tomb!
Sultan, or Pharaohs of the elder world,
Lie not in Mosque or Pyramid enshrined
Thus gloriously, nor in so proud a grave.

XXXV.

TO THE MEMORY OF MAJOR GENERAL MACKINNON.

Son of an old and honourable house,
Henry Mackinnon from the Hebrides
Drew his descent, but upon English ground
An English mother bore him. Dauphiny

Beheld the blossom of his opening years;
 For hoping in that genial clime to save
 A child of feeble frame, his parents there
 Awhile their sojourn fix'd: and thus it chanced
 That in that generous season, when the heart
 Yet from the world is pure and undefiled,
 Napoleon Buonaparte was his friend.
 The adventurous Corsican, like Henry, then
 Young, and a stranger in the land of France,
 Their frequent and their favour'd guest became,
 Finding a cheerful welcome at all hours,
 Kindness, esteem, and in the English youth
 Quick sympathy of apprehensive mind
 And lofty thought heroic. On the way
 Of life they parted, not to meet again.
 Each follow'd war, but, oh! how differently
 Did the two spirits which till now had grown
 Like two fair plants, it seem'd, of kindred seed,
 Develope in that awful element!
 For never had benignant nature shower'd
 More bounteously than on Mackinnon's head
 Her choicest gifts. Form, features, intellect,
 Were such as might at once command and win
 All hearts. In all relationships approved,
 Son, brother, husband, father, friend, his life
 Was beautiful; and when in tented fields,
 Such as the soldier should be in the sight
 Of God and man was he. Poor praise it were
 To speak his worth evinc'd upon the banks
 Of Douro, Talavera's trophied plain,
 Busaco's summit, and what other days,
 Many and glorious all, illustrated
 His bright career. Worthier of him to say
 That in the midst of camps his manly breast
 Retain'd its youthful virtue; that he walk'd
 Through blood and evil uncontaminat'd,
 And that the stern necessity of war
 But nurtur'd with its painful discipline
 Thoughtful compassion in that gentle soul,
 And feelings such as man should cherish still
 For all of woman born. He met his death
 When at Rodrigo on the breach he stood
 Triumphant; to a soldier's wish it came
 Instant, and in the hour of victory.
 Mothers and maids of Portugal, oh bring
 Your garlands here, and strew his grave with flowers;
 And lead the children to his monument,
 Grey-headed sires, for it is holy ground!
 For tenderness and valour in his heart,
 As in your own Nunalures, had made
 Their habitation; for a dearer life
 Never in battle hath been offer'd up,
 Since in like cause and in unhappy day,
 By Zutphen's walls the peerless Sidney fell.
 'Tis said that Buonaparte, when he heard
 How thus, among the multitude whose blood
 Cries out to Heaven upon his guilty head,
 His early friend had fallen, was touch'd with grief.
 If aught it may avail him, be that thought,
 That brief recurrence of humanity
 In his hard heart, remember'd in his hour.

XXXVI.

FOR THE AFFAIR AT ARROYO MOLINOS.

He who may chronicle Spain's arduous strife
 Against the Intruder, hath to speak of fields
 Profuselier fed with blood, and victories
 Borne wider on the wings of glad report;
 Yet shall this town, which from the mill-stream takes
 Its humble name, be storied as the spot
 Where the vain Frenchman, insolent too long
 Of power and of success, first saw the strength
 Of England in prompt enterprise essayed,
 And felt his fortunes ebb, from that day forth
 Swept back upon the reflux tide of war.
 Girard lay here, who late from Caceres,
 Far as his active cavalry could scour,
 Had pillaged and oppress the country round;
 The Spaniard and the Portuguese he scorn'd,
 And deem'd the British soldiers all too slow,
 To seize occasion, unalert in war,
 And therefore brave in vain. In such belief
 Secure at night he laid him down to sleep,
 Nor dreamt that these disparaged enemies
 With drum and trumpet should in martial charge
 Sound his reveille. All day their march severe
 They held through wind and drenching rain; all night
 The autumnal tempest unabating raged,
 While in their comfortless and open camp
 They cheer'd themselves with patient hope: the storm
 Was their ally, and moving in the mist,
 When morning open'd, on the astonish'd foe
 They burst. Soon routed horse and foot, the French
 On all sides scattering, fled, on every side
 Beset, and every where pursued, with loss
 Of half their numbers captured, their whole stores,
 And all their gather'd plunder. 'Twas a day
 Of surest omen, such as fill'd with joy
 True English hearts. . . No happier peals have e'er
 Been roll'd abroad from town and village tower
 Than gladden'd then with their exultant sound
 Salopian vales; and flowing cups were brimm'd
 All round the Wrekin to Sir Rowland's name.

XXXVII.

WRITTEN IN AN UNPUBLISHED VOLUME OF LETTERS
 AND MISCELLANEOUS PAPERS, BY BARRÉ CHARLES ROBERTS.

Nor often hath the cold insensate earth
 Closed over such fair hopes, as when the grave
 Received young Barré's perishable part;
 Nor death destroyed so sweet a dream of life.
 Nature, who sometimes lavisheth her gifts
 With fatal bounty, had conferred on him
 Even such endowments as parental love
 Might in its wisest prayer have ask'd of Heaven;
 An intellect that, choosing for itself
 The better part, went forth into the fields
 Of knowledge, and with never-sated thirst
 Drank of the living springs; a judgement calm
 And clear; a heart affectionate; a soul

Within whose quiet sphere, no vanities
 Or low desires had place. Nor were the seeds
 Of excellence thus largely given, and left
 To struggle with impediment of clime
 Austere, or niggard soil; all circumstance
 Of happy fortune was to him vouchsafed;
 His way of life was as through garden-walks
 Wherein no thorns are seen, save such as grow,
 Types of our human state, with fruits and flowers.
 In all things favoured thus auspiciously,
 But in his father most. An intercourse
 So beautiful no former record shows
 In such relationship displayed, where through
 Familiar friendship's perfect confidence,
 The father's ever-watchful tenderness
 Meets ever in the son's entire respect
 Its due return devout, and playful love
 Mingles with every thing, and sheds o'er all
 A sunshine of its own. Should we then say
 The parents purchased at too dear a cost
 This deep delight, the deepest, purest joy
 Which Heaven hath here assign'd us, when they saw
 Their child of hope, just in the May of life,
 Beneath a slow and cankering malady,
 With irremediable decay consumed,
 Sink to the untimely grave? Oh, think not thus!
 Nor deem that such long anguish, and the grief
 Which in the inmost soul doth strike its roots
 There to abide through time, can overweigh
 The blessings which have been, and yet shall be!
 Think not that He in Whom we live, doth mock
 Our dearest aspirations! Think not love,
 Genius, and virtue should inhere alone
 In mere mortality, and Earth put out
 The sparks which are of Heaven! We are not left
 In darkness, nor devoid of hope. The Light
 Of Faith hath risen to us: the vanquish'd Grave
 To us the great consolatory truth
 Proclaim'd that He who wounds will heal; and Death
 Opening the gates of Immortality,
 The spirits whom it hath dis-severed here,
 In everlasting union re-unite.

Kennick, 1814.

EPITAPH.

TIME and the world, whose magnitude and weight
 Bear on us in this Now, and hold us here
 To earth enthral'd, . . . what are they in the Past?
 And in the prospect of the immortal Soul
 How poor a speck! Not here her resting-place,
 Her portion is not here; and happiest they
 Who, gathering early all that Earth can give,
 Shake off its mortal coil, and speed for Heaven.
 Such fate had he whose relics moulder here.
 Few were his years, but yet enough to teach
 Love, duty, generous feelings, high desires,
 Faith, hope, devotion: and what more could length
 Of days have brought him? What, but vanity,
 Joys frailer even than health or human life;
 Temptation, sin and sorrow, both too sure,
 Evils that wound, and cares that fret the heart.
 Repine not, therefore, ye who love the dead.

XXXIX.

EPITAPH.

SOME there will be to whom, as here they read,
 While yet these lines are from the chisel sharp,
 The name of Clement Francis, will recall
 His countenance benign; and some who knew
 What stores of knowledge and what humble thoughts,
 What wise desires, what cheerful piety,
 In happy union form'd the character
 Which faithfully impress'd his aspect meek.
 And others too there are, who in their hearts
 Will bear the memory of his worth enshrined,
 For tender and for reverential thoughts,
 When grief hath had its course, a life-long theme,
 A little while, and these, who to the truth
 Of this poor tributary strain could bear
 Their witness, will themselves have pass'd away,
 And this cold marble monument present
 Words which can then within no living mind
 Create the ideal form they once evoked;
 This, then, the sole memorial of the dead.
 So be it. Only that which was of earth
 Hath perish'd; only that which was infirm,
 Mortal, corruptible, and brought with it
 The seed connate of death. A place in Time
 Is given us, only that we may prepare
 Our portion for Eternity: the Soul
 Possesseth there what treasures for itself,
 Wise to salvation, it laid up in Heaven.
 O Man, take thou this lesson from the Grave!
 There too all true affections shall revive,
 To fade no more; all losses be restored,
 All griefs be heal'd, all holy hopes fulfill'd.

1. AT CLACHNACHARRY.

ATHWART the island here, from sea to sea,
 Between these mountain barriers, the Great Glen
 Of Scotland offers to the traveller,
 Through wilds impervious else, an easy path,
 Along the shore of rivers and of lakes,
 In line continuous, whence the waters flow
 Dividing east and west. Thus had they held
 For untold centuries their perpetual course
 Unprofit'd, till in the Georgian age
 This mighty work was plann'd, which should unite
 The lakes, control the innavigable streams,
 And through the bowels of the land deduce
 A way, where vessels which must else have braved
 The formidable Cape, and have essayed
 The perils of the Hyperborean Sea,
 Might from the Baltic to the Atlantic deep
 Pass and repass at will. So when the storm
 Careers abroad, may they securely here, [hills,
 Through birchen groves, green fields, and pastoral Pursue their voyage home. Humanity

May boast this proud expenditure, begun
By Britain in a time of arduous war;
Through all the efforts and emergencies
Of that long strife continued, and achieved
After her triumph, even at the time
When national burdens bearing on the state
Were felt with heaviest pressure. Such expense
Is best economy. In growing wealth,
Comfort, and spreading industry, behold
The fruits immediate! And, in days to come,
Fifty shall this great British work be named
With whatsoe'er of most magnificence
For public use, Rome in her plenitude
Of power effected, or all-glorious Greece,
Or Egypt, mother-land of all the arts.

2. AT FORT AUGUSTUS.

Thou who hast reach'd this level where the glade,
Wheeling between the mountains in mid air,
Eastward or westward as his gyre inclines,
Describes the German or the Atlantic Sea,
Pause here; and, as thou seest the ship pursue
Her easy way serene, call thou to mind
By what exertions of victorious art
The way was open'd. Fourteen times upheaved,
The vessel hath ascended, since she changed
The salt sea water for the highland lymph;
As oft in imperceptible descent
Must, step by step, be lower'd, before she woo
The ocean breeze again. Thou hast beheld
What basins, most capacious of their kind,
Enclose her, while the obedient element
Lifts or depones its burthen. Thou hast seen
The torrent hurrying from its native hills
Pass underneath the broad canal inhumed,
Then issue harmless thence; the rivulet
Admitted by its intake peaceably,
Forthwith by gentle overfall discharged.
And haply too thou hast observed the herds
Frequent their vaulted path, unconscious they
That the wide waters on the long low arch
Above them, lie sustained. What other works
Science, audacious in emprise, hath wrought,
Meet not the eye, but well may fill the mind.
Not from the bowels of the land alone,
From lake and stream hath their diluvial wreck
Been scoop'd to form this navigable way;
Huge rivers were controll'd, or from their course
Shoulder'd aside; and at the eastern mouth,
Where the salt ooze denied a resting place
There were the deep foundations laid, by weight
On weight immersed, and pile on pile down-driven,
Till steadfast as the everlasting rocks,
The massive outwork stands. Contemplate now
What days and nights of thought, what years of toil,
What inexhaustive springs of public wealth
The vast design required; the immediate good,
The future benefit progressive still;
And thou wilt pay thy tribute of due praise
To those whose counsels, whose decrees, Whose care,
For after ages formed the generous work.

3. AT BANAVIE.

WHERE these capacious basins, by the laws
Of the subjacent element receive
The ship, descending or upraised, eight times,
From stage to stage with unfelt agency
Translated; fittest may the marble here
Record the Architect's immortal name.
Telford it was, by whose presiding mind
The whole great work was plann'd and perfected;
Telford, who o'er the vale of Cambrian Dee,
Aloft in air, at giddy height upborne,
Carried his navigable road, and hung
High o'er Menai's straits the bending bridge;
Structures of more ambitious enterprize
Than minstrels in the age of old romance
To their own Merlin's magic lore ascribed.
Nor hath he for his native land perform'd
Less in this proud design; and where his piers
Around her coast from many a fisher's creek
Unshelter'd else, and many an ample port.
Repel the assailing storm; and where his roads
In beautiful and sinuous line far seen,
Wind with the vale, and win the long ascent,
Now o'er the deep morass sustain'd, and now
Across ravine, or glen, or estuary,
Opening a passage through the wilds subdued.

EPITAPH IN BUTLEIGH CHURCH.

DIVIDED far by death were they, whose names
In honour here united, as in birth,
This monumental verse records. They drew
In Dorset's healthy vales their natal breath,
And from these shores beheld the ocean first,
Whereon in early youth with one accord
They chose their way of fortune; to that course
By Hood and Bridport's bright example drawn,
Their kinsmen, children of this place, and sons
Of one, who in his faithful ministry
Inculeated within these hallow'd walls
The truths in mercy to mankind reveal'd.
Worthy were these three brethren each to add
New honours to the already honour'd name:
But Arthur, in the morning of his day,
Perish'd amid the Caribbean sea,
When the Pomona, by a hurricane
Whirl'd, riven and overwhelm'd, with all her crew
Into the deep went down. A longer date
To Alexander was assign'd, for hope,
For fair ambition, and for fond regret,
Alas, how short! for duty, for desert,
Sufficing; and while Time preserves the roll
Of Britain's naval feats, for good report.
A boy, with Cook he rounded the great globe;
A youth, in many a celebrated fight
With Rodney had his part; and having reach'd
Life's middle stage, engaging ship to ship,

When the French Hercules, a gallant foe,
Struck to the British Mars his three-striped flag,
Be fell, in the moment of his victory.
Bere his remains in sure and certain hope
Are laid, until the hour when Earth and Sea
Shall render up their dead. One brother yet
Survived, with Keppel and with Rodney train'd
In battles, with the Lord of Nile approved,
Ere in command he worthily upheld
Old England's high prerogative. In the east,
The west, the Baltic and the Midland seas,
Yea, wheresoever hostile fleets have plough'd
The ensanguined deep, his thunders have been heard,
His flag in brave defiance hath been seen;
And bravest enemies at Sir Samuel's name
Felt fatal presage in their inmost heart,
Of unavertible defeat foredoom'd.
Thus in the path of glory he rode on,
Victorious alway, adding praise to praise;
Till full of honours, not of years, beneath
The venom of the infected clime he sunk,
On Coromandel's coast, completing there
His service, only when his life was spent.

To the three brethren, Alexander's son
(Sole scion he in whom their line survived),
With English feeling, and the deeper sense
Of filial duty, consecrates this tomb.

EPITAPH.

To Butler's venerable memory
By private gratitude for public worth
This monument is raised, here where twelve years
Meekly the blameless Prelate exercised
His pastoral charge; and whither, though removed
A little while to Durham's wider See,
His mortal relics were convey'd to rest.
Born in dissent, and in the school of schism
Bred, he withstood the withering influence
Of that unwholesome nurture. To the Church,
In strength of mind mature and judgment clear,
A convert, in sincerity of heart
Seeking the truth, deliberately convinced,
*And finding there the truth he sought, he came.
In honour must his high desert be held
While there is any virtue, any praise;
For he it was whose gifted intellect
First apprehended, and developed first
The analogy connate, which in its course
And constitution Nature manifests
To the Creator's word and will divine;
And in the depth of that great argument
Laying his firm foundation, built thereon
Proofs never to be shaken of the truths
Reveal'd from Heaven in mercy to mankind;
Allying thus Philosophy with Faith,
And finding in things seen and known, the type
And evidence of those within the veil.

DEDICATION OF THE AUTHOR'S COLLOQUIES ON THE PROGRESS AND PROSPECTS OF SOCIETY.

TO THE

MEMORY OF THE REVEREND HERBERT HILL,

Formerly Student of Christ Church, Oxford: successively
Chaplain to the British Factories at Porto and at Lisbon; and late Rector of Streatham; who was released from this life, Sept. 19. 1823, in the 80th year of his age.

Nor upon marble or sepulchral brass
Have I the record of thy worth inscribed,
Dear Uncle! nor from Chantry's chisel ask'd
A monumental statue, which might wear
Through many an age thy venerable form.
Such tribute, were I rich in this world's wealth,
Should rightfully be rendered, in discharge
Of grateful duty, to the world evinc'd
When testifying so by outward sign
Its deep and inmost sense. But what I can
Is rendered piously, prefixing here
Thy perfect lineaments, two centuries
Before thy birth by Holbein's happy hand
Prefigured thus. It is the portraiture
Of More, the mild, the learned, and the good;
Traced in that better stage of human life,
When vain imaginations, troublous thoughts,
And hopes and fears have had their course, and left
The intellect composed, the heart at rest,
Nor yet decay hath touch'd our mortal frame.
Such was the man whom Henry, of desert
Appreciant alway, chose for highest trust;
Whom England in that eminence approved;
Whom Europe honoured, and Erasmus loved.
Such was he ere heart-hardening bigotry
Obscured his spirit, made him with himself
Discordant, and contracting then his brow,
With sour defeature marr'd his countenance.
What he was, in his best and happiest time,
Even such wert thou, dear Uncle! such thy look
Benign and thoughtful; such thy placid mien;
Thine eye serene, significant and strong,
Bright in its quietness, yet brightening oft
With quick emotion of benevolence,
Or flash of active fancy, and that mirth
Which aye with sober wisdom well accords.
Nor ever did true Nature, with more nice
Exactitude, fit to the inner man
The fleshly mould, than when she stamp'd on thine
Her best credentials, and bestow'd on thee
An aspect, to whose sure benignity
Beasts with instinctive confidence could trust,
Which at a glance obtain'd respect from men,
And won at once good will from all the good.

Such as in semblance, such in word and deed
Lisbon beheld him, when for many a year
The even tenour of his spotless life
Adorn'd the English Church, . . her minister
In that strong hold of Rome's Idolatry,
To God and man approved. What Englishman,
Who in those peaceful days of Portugal
Resorted thither, curious to observe

Her cities, and the works and ways of men,
 But sought him, and from his abundant stores
 Of knowledge profited? What stricken one,
 Sent thither to protract a living death,
 Forlorn perhaps, and friendless else, but found
 A friend in him? What mourners, . . who had seen
 The object of their agonizing hopes
 In that sad cypress ground deposited,
 Wherein so many a flower of British growth,
 Untimely faded and cut down, is laid,
 In foreign earth compress'd, . . but bore away
 A life-long sense of his compassionate care,
 His Christian goodness? Faithful shepherd he,
 And vigilant against the wolves, who there,
 If entrance might be won, would straight beset
 The dying stranger, and with merciless zeal
 Bay the death-bed. In every family
 Throughout his fold was he the welcome guest,
 Alike to every generation dear,
 The children's favourite, and the grandsire's friend;
 Tried, trusted and beloved. So liberal too
 In secret alms, even to his utmost means,
 That they who served him, and who saw in part
 The channels where his constant bounty ran,
 Maugre their own uncharitable faith,
 Believed him, for his works, secure of Heaven.
 It would have been a grief for me to think
 The features, which so perfectly express'd
 That excellent mind, should irrevocably
 From earth have pass'd away, existing now
 Only in some few faithful memories
 Insoul'd, and not by any limner's skill
 To be imbodied thence. A blessing then
 On him, in whose prophetic counterfeits
 Preserved, the children now, who were the crown
 Of his old age, may see their father's face,
 Here to the very life pourtray'd, as when
 Spain's mountain passes, and her flex woods,
 And fragrant wildernesses, side by side,
 With him I traversed, in my morn of youth,
 And gather'd knowledge from his full discourse.
 Often in former years I pointed out,
 Well-pleased, the casual portrait, which so well
 Assorted in all points; and haply since,
 While lingering o'er this meditative work,
 Sometimes that likeness, not unconsciously,
 Hath tinged the strain; and therefore, for the sake
 Of this resemblance, are these volumes now
 Thus to his memory properly inscribed.

O friend! O more than father! whom I found
 Forbearing alway, always kind; to whom
 No gratitude can speak the debt I owe;
 Far on their earthly pilgrimage advanced
 Are they who knew thee when we drew the breath
 Of that delicious clime! The most are gone;
 And whoso yet survive of those who then
 Were in their summer season, on the tree
 Of life hang here and there like wintry leaves,
 Which the first breeze will from the bough bring down.

I, too, am in the sear, the yellow leaf.
 And yet, (no wish is nearer to my heart,)
 One arduous labour more, as unto thee
 In duty bound, full fain would I complete,
 (So Heaven permit,) recording faithfully

The heroic rise, the glories, the decline,
 Of that fallen country, dear to us, wherein
 The better portion of thy days was pass'd;
 And where, in fruitful intercourse with thee,
 My intellectual life received betimes
 The bias it hath kept. Poor Portugal,
 In us thou harbouredst no ungrateful guests!
 We loved thee well; Mother magnanimous
 Of mighty intellects and faithful hearts, . .
 For such in other times thou wert, nor yet
 To be despair'd of, for not yet, methinks,
 Degenerate wholly, . . yes, we loved thee well!
 And in thy moving story, (so but life
 Be given me to mature the gathered store
 Of thirty years,) poet and politick,
 And Christian sage, (only philosopher
 Who from the Well of living water drinks
 Never to thirst again,) shall find, I ween,
 For fancy, and for profitable thought,
 Abundant food.

Alas! should this be given,
 Such consummation of my work will now
 Be but a mournful close, the one being gone,
 Whom to have satisfied was still to me
 A pure reward, outweighing far all breath
 Of public praise. O friend revered, O guide
 And fellow-labourer in this ample field,
 How large a portion of myself hath pass'd [reach
 With thee, from earth to Heaven! . . Thus they who Grey hairs die piecemeal. But in good old age
 Thou hast departed; not to be bewail'd, . .
 Oh no! The promise on the Mount vouchsafed,
 Nor abrogate by any later law
 Reveal'd to man, . . that promise, as by thee
 Full piously deserved, was faithfully
 In thee fulfill'd, and in the land thy days
 Were long. I would not, as I saw thee last,
 For a king's ransom, have detain'd thee here, . .
 Bent, like the antique sculptor's limbless trunk,
 By chronic pain, yet with thine eye unquench'd,
 The ear undimm'd, the mind retentive still,
 The heart unchanged, the intellectual lamp
 Burning in its corporeal sepulchre.
 No; not if human wishes had had power
 To have suspended Nature's constant work,
 Would they who loved thee have detain'd thee thus,
 Waiting for death.

That trance is over. Thou
 Art enter'd on thy heavenly heritage;
 And I, whose dial of mortality
 Points to the eleventh hour, shall follow soon,
 Meantime, with dutiful and patient hope,
 I labour that our names conjoin'd may long
 Survive, in honour one day to be held
 Where old Lisboa from her hills o'erlooks
 Expanded Tagus, with its populous shores
 And pine woods, to Palmella's crested height:
 Nor there alone; but in those rising realms
 Where now the offsets of the Lusian tree
 Push forth their vigorous shoots, . . from central plains,
 Whence rivers flow divergent, to the gulph
 Southward, where wild Parana disembogues
 A sea-like stream; and northward, in a world
 Of forests, where huge Orellana clips
 His thousand islands with his thousand arms.

CARMEN TRIUMPHALE,

FOR THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE YEAR 1814.

" Illi justitiam confirmavero triumph!, Præsentes docuere Deos."

Claudian.

I.

In happy hour doth he receive
The Laurel, meed of famous Bards of yore,
Which Dryden and diviner Spenser wore, . .
In happy hour, and well may he rejoice,
Whose earliest task must be
To raise the exultant hymn for victory,
And join a nation's joy with harp and voice,
Pouring the strain of triumph on the wind,
Glory to God, his song, Deliverance for Mankind !

II.

Wake, lute and harp ! My soul take up the strain !
Glory to God ! Deliverance for Mankind !
Joy, . . for all Nations, joy ! But most for thee,
Who hast so nobly fill'd thy part assign'd,
O England ! O my glorious native land !
For thou in evil days didst stand
Against leagu'd Europe all in arms array'd,
Single and undismay'd,
Thy hope in Heaven and in thine own right hand.
Now are thy virtuous efforts overpaid,
Thy generous counsels now their guerdon find, . .
Glory to God ! Deliverance for Mankind !

III.

Dread was the strife, for mighty was the foe
Who sought with his whole strength thy overthrow.
The Nations bow'd before him ; some in war
Subdued, some yielding to superior art ;
Submiss, they follow'd his victorious car.
Their Kings, like Satraps, waited round his throne ;
For Britain's ruin and their own,
By force or fraud in monstrous league combined.
Alone, in that disastrous hour,
Britain stood firm and braved his power ;
Alone she fought the battles of mankind.

¹ "Can any man of sense," said the Edinburgh Review, "does any plain, unaffected man, above the level of a driving courtier or a feeble fanatic, dare to say he can look at this impending contest, without trembling every inch of him, for the result ?"—No. xxiv. p. 441.

With all proper deference to so eminent a critic, I would venture to observe, that trembling has been usually supposed to be a symptom of feebleness, and that the case in point has certainly not belied the received opinion.

² Of Busaco, which is now as memorable in the military, as it has long been in the monastic history of Portugal, I have given an account in the second volume of Omniana. Dona

IV.

O virtue which, above all former fame,
Exalts her venerable name !
O joy of joys for every British breast !
That with that mighty peril full in view,
The Queen of Ocean to herself was true !
That no weak heart, no abject mind possess'd
Her counsels¹, to abase her lofty crest, . .
(Then had she sunk in everlasting shame,)
But ready still to succour the oppress'd,
Her Red Cross floated on the waves unfurl'd,
Offering Redemption to the groaning world.

V.

First from his trance the heroic Spaniard woke ;
His chains he broke,
And casting off his neck the treacherous yoke,
He call'd on England, on his generous foe :
For well he knew that wheresoe'er
Wise policy prevail'd, or brave despair,
Thither would Britain's liberal succours flow,
Her arm be present there.
Then, too, regenerate Portugal display'd
Her ancient virtue, dormant all-too-long.
Rising against intolerable wrong,
On England, on her old ally, for aid
The faithful nation call'd in her distress :
And well that old ally the call obey'd,
Well was that faithful friendship then repaid.

VI.

Say from thy trophied field how well,
Vimeiro ! Rocky Douro tell !
And thou, Busaco, on whose sacred height
The astonished Carmelite,
While those unwonted thunders shook his cell,
Join'd with his prayers the fervour of the fight.²

Bernarda Ferreira's poem upon this venerable place contains much interesting and some beautiful description. The first intelligence of the battle which reached England was in a letter written from this Convent by a Portuguese Commissary. "I have the happiness to acquaint you," said the writer, "that this night the French lost nine thousand men near the Convent of Busaco. . . I beg you not to consider this news as a fiction, . . for I, from where I am, saw them fall. This place appears like the antechamber of Hell." . . What a contrast to the images which the following extracts present !

Bear witness those old Towers³,* where many a day
Waiting with foresight calm the fitting hour,
The Wellesley, gathering strength in wile delay,
Defied the Tyrant's undivided power.

" Es pequeña aquella Iglesia,
Mas para pobres bastante ;
Pobre de todo adereço
Con que el rico suele ornarse.
No ay allí plata, ni oro,
Telas y sedas no valen
Donde reyna la pobreza,
Que no para en bienes tales.
Asperando á los del Cielo
Los demas tiene por males,
Y rica de altos deseos
Menosprecia vanidades.
En el retablo se mira
El soberano estandarte,
Lecho donde con la Iglesia
Quiso Christo desposarse ;
La tabla donde se salva
El misero naufragante
Del piélago de la culpa,
Y á puerto glorioso sale.
Con perfeccion y concierto
Se adereçan los altares
(Por manos de aquellos santos)
De bellas flores suaves.
En toscos vasos de corcho
Lustran texidos con arte
Los variados ramilletes
Mas que en el oro el esmalte.
La florida rama verde
Que en aquellos bosques nace,
Da colgaduras al templo,
Y los brocados abate.
En dias de mayor fiesta
Esto con excesos hazen,
Y al suelo por alcatifas
Diversas flores reparten.
Huele el divino aposento,
Hurtando sutil el ayre
A las rosas y boninas
Mil olores que derrame.
Humildes estan las celdas
De aquellos humildes padres,
Cercando al sacro edificio
Do tienen su caro amante.
Cada celda muy pequeña
Encierra pobreza grande,
Que en competencia sus dueños
Gustan de mortificar.
Despues que allí entro el silencio,
No quiso que mas sonase
Ruydo que aquel que forma
Entre los ramos el ayre ;
El de las fuentes y arroyos,
Y de las parleras aves,
Porque si ellos por Dios lloran,
Ellas sus lagrimas canten.
De corcho tosco las puertas,
Tambien de pobreza imagen,
Son mas bellas en sus ojos
Que los Toscanos portales
Es su cama estrecha tabla
Do apenas tendidos caben,
Porque hasta en ella durmiendo,
Crucificados descansen.
Una Cruz, y calavera
Que tienen siempre delante,

Swore not the boastful Frenchman in his might,
Into the sea to drive his Island-foe ?
Tagus and Zézere, in secret night,
Ye saw that host of ruffians take their flight !⁴

Con asperas disciplinas
Tefidas de propria sangre,
Son alhajas de su casa ;
Y en aquellas soledades
Hablando con sabios mudos
Suelen tal vez aliviarse ;
Que á los hijos de Theresa
Tanto los libros aplacen,
Que en los yermos mas remotos
Les dan del dia una parte.
Tiene cada qual un huerto
(Porque en el pueda ocuparse)
De arboles de espio, y flores
Siempre de olor liberales.
Libres así del tumulto
Que embarça los mortales,
Fervorosas oraciones
Mandan á Dios cada instante.
Sus devotos ejercicios
No se los perturba nadie ;
Ni sus penitencias hallan
Testigos que las estrañen.
Qual con cadenas de puas
Tan duras como diamantes,
Agudas y rigurosas
Clife su adigida carne ;
Qual con cilicios y sogas
Asperrimas, intractables,
De que jamas se les quitan
Las cavernosas senales.

Aquel divino desierto
Que Busaco denomina,
Y es tambien denominado
Del arbol de nuestra vida,
Se muestra sembrado á trechos
De solitarias Ermitas,
Que en espacios desiguales
Unas de las otras distan.
Parece tocan las nubes,
Para servirles de sillas,
Las que coronando peñas
Apenas toca la vista.
Yazen otras por los valles
En las entrañas benignas
De nuestra madre comun
Que humilde se las inclina.
Qual en las concavidades
De las rocas escondida,
Que labro naturaleza
Con perfeccion infinita.
Qual entre las arboledas
De verde rama vestida,
Informandoles de gracias
Sus formas vegetativas.
Qual del cristalino arroyo
Las bellas margenes pisa,
Por lavar los pies descalços
Entre sus candidas guijas.
Qual en el tronco del arbol
Dentro en sus cortezas mismas,
Por vencer en gracia al arte
Naturaleza fabrica.
Unas aprieta con lazos,
Aquella planta lasciva

Patient of loss, profuse of life,
Meantime had Spain endured the strife;

Que hasta las piedras abraça
Con ser tan duras y frías.
Otras de amarillos musgos
Por el techo se matizan,
Verdes, oscuros, y negres,
Y de color de ceniza.
Toscos allí los portales
De yerva y moho se pintan,
Y de salitre se labran
Que en gotas al agua hmlta.
Cada Ermitaño á la puerta
Tiene una pequeña esquila,
En el ramo de algun arbol
Donde pendiente se arrima;
O en el resquicio gracioso
De alguna piedra metida,
Y quando toca la Iglesia
Todas á tocar se aplican.

⁵ Torres Vedras. Turres Vêderes,... a name so old as to have been given when the Latin tongue was the language of Portugal. This town is said to have been founded by the Turduli, a short time before the commencement of the Christian Era.

In remembering the lines of Torres Vedras, the opinion of the wise men of the North ought not to be forgotten, "If they (the French) do not make an effort to drive us out of Portugal, it is because we are better there than any where else. We fear they will not leave us on the Tagus many days longer than suits their own purposes."—Edinburgh Review, No. xxvii. p. 263.

The opinion is delivered with happy precision of language: "... Our troops were indeed, to use the same neat and felicitous expression, "better there than any where else."

4 "Bracons of infamy they light the way,
Where cowardice and cruelty unite,
To damn with double shame their ignominious flight.
O triumph for the Fiends of lust and wrath I
Ne'er to be told, yet ne'er to be forgot,
What wanton horrors mark their wrackful path!
The peasant butcher'd in his ruined cot,
The hoary priest even at the altar shot,
Childhood and age given o'er to sword and flame,
Woman to infamy; no crime forgot,
By which inventive demons might proclaim
Immortal hate to man, and scorn of God's great name.
The rudest centinel, in Britain born,
With horror paused to view the havoc done,
Gave his poor crust to feed some wretch forlorn,
Wiped his stern eye, then fiercer grasped his gun."

Scott's Vision of Don Roderick.

No cruelties recorded in history exceed those which were systematically committed by the French during their retreat from Portugal. "Their conduct," (says Lord Wellington in his dispatch of the 14th of March, 1811,) "throughout this retreat, has been marked by a barbarity seldom equalled, and never surpassed.

"Even in the towns of Torres Novas, Thomar, and Pernes, in which the head-quarters of some of the corps had been for four months, and in which the inhabitants had been induced by promises of good treatment to remain, they were plundered, and many of their houses destroyed on the night the enemy withdrew from their position; and they have since burnt

And though she saw her cities yield,
Her armies scatter'd in the field,
Her strongest bulwarks fall;
The danger undismay'd she view'd,
Knowing that nought could e'er appal
The Spaniards' fortitude.⁶

every town and village through which they have passed. The Convent of Alcobaca was burnt by order from the French head-quarters. The Bishop's Palace, and the whole town of Leyria, in which General Drouet had had his head-quarters, shared the same fate; and there is not an inhabitant of the country, of any class or description, who has had any dealing or communication with the French army who has not had reason to repent of it, or to complain of them. This is the mode in which the promises have been performed, and the assurances have been fulfilled, which were held out in the proclamation of the French commander-in-chief, in which he told the inhabitants of Portugal, that he was not come to make war upon them, but with a powerful army of one hundred and ten thousand men to drive the English into the sea. It is to be hoped, that the example of what has occurred in this country will teach the people of this and other nations what value they ought to place on such promises and assurances, and that there is no security for life or for any thing that renders life valuable, except in decided resistance to the enemy."

As exact an account of these atrocities was collected as it was possible to obtain, . . . and that record will for ever make the French name detested in Portugal. In the single diocese of Coimbra, 2969 persons, men, women, and children, were murdered, . . . every one with some shocking circumstance of aggravated cruelty. . . . "Nem huma só das 2969 mortes commettidas pelo inimigo, deixou de ser atroz e dolorosissima." (Breve Memoria dos Estragos Causados no Bispado de Coimbra pelo Exercito Francez, commandado pelo General Massena. Extrahida das Enformações que duram os Reverendos Parocos, e remetida á Junta dos Socorros da Subscripção Britanica, pelo Reverendo Provisor Governador do mesmo Bispado, p. 12.) Some details are given in this brief Memorial. "A de tel forfaits," says J. J. Rousseau, "celui qui détourne ses regards est un lâche, un déserteur de la justice: la véritable humanité les envisage pour les condamner, pour les juger, pour les détester. (Le Léviite d'Ephraim.) I will not, however, in this place repeat abominations which at once outrage humanity and disgrace human nature.

When the French, in 1792, entered Spire, some of them began to commit excesses which would soon have led to a general sack. Custine immediately ordered a captain, two officers, and a whole company to be shot. This dreadful example, he told the National Convention, he considered as the only means of saving the honour of the French nation, . . . and it met with the approbation of the whole army. But the French armies had not then been systematically brutalized. It was reserved for Buonaparte to render them infamous, as well as to lead them to destruction.

The French soldier, says Capmany, is executioner and robber at the same time: he leaves the unhappy wretch who is delivered over to his mercy, naked to the skin, . . . stripping off the clothes that they may not be torn by the musket-shot! . . . The pen falls from my hand, and I cannot proceed!

"Para que se junte á esta crueldad la mayor infamia, el soldado Frances es verdugo y ladrón en una pieza; dexa en cueros vivos al malaventurado que entregan á su discrecion, quitandole la ropa antes que los fusilazos se la destruyan. La pluma se cae de la mano, y no puedo proseguir."—Critinela, contra Franceses, P. ii. p. 35.

Yet the Edinburgh Review says, "the hatred of the name of a Frenchman in Spain has been such as the reality will by no means justify; and the detestation of the French govern-

Therefore no thought of fear debased

All sufferings, all calamities she bore.
She bade the people call to mind

ment has, among the inferior orders, been carried to a pitch wholly unauthorized by its proceedings towards them."—No. xxvii. p. 262. This passage might be read with astonishment, if any thing absurd, any thing mischievous, or any thing false, could excite surprise when it comes from that quarter.

⁸ Fuentes d'Onoro. This name has sometimes been rendered Fountains of Honour, by an easy mistake, or a pardonable licence.

⁹ "The fate of Spain, we think, is decided, and that fine and misguided country has probably yielded, by this time, to the fate which has fallen on the greater part of continental Europe. Her European dominions have yielded already to the unrelaxing grasp of the insatiable conqueror."—Edinburgh Review, No. xxvi. p. 298.

"The fundamental position which we ventured to lay down respecting the Spanish question was this: . . . that the spirit of the people, however enthusiastic and universal, was in its nature more uncertain and short-lived, more likely to be extinguished by reverses, or to go out of itself amidst the delays of a protracted contest, than the steady, regular, moderate feeling which calls out disciplined troops, and marshals them under known leaders, and supplies them by systematic arrangements: . . . a proposition so plain and obvious, that if it escaped ridicule as a truism, it might have been reasonably expected to avoid the penalties of heresy and paradox. The event has indeed wofully proved its truth."—Edinburgh Review, No. xxvii. p. 246.

These gentlemen could see no principle of permanence in the character of the Spaniards, and no proof of it in their history; . . . and they could discover no principle of dissolution in the system of Buonaparte; . . . a system founded upon force and falsehood, in direct opposition to the interest of his own subjects and to the feelings of human nature.

"Lo he dicho varias veces, y lo repito ahora, que las tres épocas terribles en los annales del mundo son, el diluvio universal, Mahoma, y Buonaparte. El mismo se ha llegado á creer tal, y se ha hecho creer la cobardía y vileza de las naciones que se han dexado subyugar. Thus, in the famous days of yore,
Their fathers triumph'd o'er the Moor.
They gloried in his overthrow,
But touch'd not with reproach his gallant name;
For fairly, and with hostile aim profest,
The Moor had rear'd his haughty crest,
An open, honourable foe;
But as a friend the treacherous Frenchman came,
And Spain received him as a guest.

Think what ye are, in sufferings tried;
And think of what your sons must be . .
Even as ye make them . . slaves or free!

Strains such as these from Spain's three seas,

From every voice the sacred cry was heard, terror de su nombre, que miden la grandeza del poder por la de las atrocidades."—Centinela, contra Franceses, p. 48.

"I have sometimes said, and I repeat it now, that the three terrible epochs in the annals of the world are the General Deluge, Mahommed, and Buonaparte. Mahommed pretended to convert all religions into one, and this man all nations into one, in order to make himself their head. Mahommed preached the unity of God with the scimitar; and this man neither his Unity nor his Trinity, for he neither preaches, nor causes to be preached, anything except his own Divinity, letting his infamous and sacrilegious adorers, the French journalists, give him the appellation of Almighty. He has gone so far as to believe himself such, and the cowardice and baseness of the nations who have suffered themselves to be subdued, have made him believe it. Spain alone has compelled him to know himself, that he neither was formerly nor is now anything more than a mere man, and a very little one, whom blind Fortune has made appear great in the eyes of people astonished at the terror of his name, and measuring the greatness of his power by that of his atrocities."

⁸ The Cid, Rodrigo Diaz de Bivar. The word has been variously explained, but its origin seems to be satisfactorily traced by Verstegan in his explanation of some of our English surnames.

"Camp or Kemp, properly one that fighteth hand to hand, whereunto the name in Teutonic of Kemp-fight accordeth, and in French of Combat."

"Certain among the ancient Germans made profession of being Camp-fighters or Kemp-fighters, for all is one; and among the Danes and Swedes were the like, as Scarcaten, Arngrim, Arnerod, Haldan, and sundry others. They were also called Kempmanas, whereof is derived our name of Campion, which, after the French orthography, some pronounce Champion."

"Dene or Den is the termination of sundry of our surnames, as for example of Camden, which I take anciently to have been Campden, and signifieth the Dene or Dale belonging to some Camp or Camp-fighter (for both is one), in our now used language called a Champion, but in the Teutonic a Campion. A Campion may also have been some place appointed for Campions, Combat-fighters, or men of arms to encounter each other. And so the place became afterward to be the surname of him and his family that owned it, as others in like sort have done."

"Kemp, . . . of his profession of being a Kemper or Combat-fighter, as divers in old time among our ancestors were."

⁹ This feeling is forcibly expressed by Capmany. "O Visperas Sicilianas tan famosas en la historia. quando os po-

Heaven too, to whom the Spaniards look'd for aid,
 A spirit equal to the hour bestow'd;
 And gloriously the debt they paid,
 Which to their valiant ancestors they owed;
 And gloriously against the power of France
 Maintain'd their children's proud inheritance.
 Their steady purpose no defeat could move,
 No horrors could abate their constant mind;
 Hope had its source and resting-place above,
 And they, to loss of all on earth resign'd,
 Suffer'd, to save their country, and mankind.
 What strain heroic might suffice to tell,
 How Zaragoza stood, and how she fell?
 Ne'er since yon sun began his dally round,
 Was higher virtue, holier valour, found,
 Than on that consecrated ground.

XI.

Alone the noble Nation stood,
 When from Coruña, in the main,
 The star of England set in blood.
 Ere long on Talavera's plain,
 That star resplendent rose again;
 And though that day was doom'd to be
 A day of frustrate victory,
 Not vainly bled the brave;
 For French and Spaniard there might see
 That England's arm was strong to save;
 Fair promise there the Wellesley gave,
 And well in sight of Earth and Heaven,
 Did he redeem the pledge which there was given.

XII.

Lord of Conquest, heir of Fame,
 From rescued Portugal he came.
 Rodrigo's walls in vain oppose;
 In vain thy bulwarks, Badajoz;
 And Salamanca's heights proclaim
 The Conqueror's praise, the Wellesley's name.
 Oh, had the sun stood still that hour,
 When Marmont and his broken power
 Fled from their field of shame!
 Spain felt through all her realms the electric blow;
 Cadiz in peace expands her gates again;
 And Betis, who to bondage long resign'd,
 Flow'd mournfully along the silent plain,
 Into her joyful bosom unconfined,
 Receives once more the treasures of the main.

dremos acompañar con completas, para que los Angeles canten laudes en el cielo."—Centinela, contra Franceses, p. 96.

"O Sicilian Vespers! so famous in history, when shall we be able to accompany you with Complines, that the Angels may sing Lauds in Heaven?"

"Ecce iterum Crispinus!" What says the Edinburgh Review concerning Russia? "Considering how little that power has shown itself capable of effecting for the salvation of Europe, . . . how wretched the state of its subjects is under the present government, . . . how trifling an acquisition of strength the common enemy could expect to obtain from the entire possession of its resources, we acknowledge that we should contemplate with great composure any change which might lay the foundation of future improvement, and scatter the forces of France over the dominion of the Czars."—No. XXVIII. p. 460.

This is a choice passage. The reasoning is worthy of the writer's judgement, the feeling perfectly consistent with his liberality, and the conclusion as consistent with his politics.

XIII.

What now shall check the Wellesley, when at length
 Onward he goes, rejoicing in his strength?
 From Douro, from Castille's extended plain,
 The foe, a numerous band,
 Retire; amid the heights which overhang
 Dark Ebro's bed, they think to make their stand.
 He reads their purpose, and prevents their speed;
 And still as they recede,
 Impetuously he presses on their way:
 Till by Vittoria's walls they stood at bay,
 And drew their battle up in fair array.

XIV.

Vain their array, their valour vain:
 There did the practised Frenchman find
 A master arm, a master mind!
 Behold his veteran army driven
 Like dust before the breath of Heaven,
 Like leaves before the autumnal wind!
 Now, Britain, now thy brow with laurels blind;
 Raise now the song of joy for rescued Spain!
 And Europe, take thou up the awakening strain.
 Glory to God! Deliverance for mankind!

XV.

From Spain the living spark went forth:
 The flame hath caught, the flame is spread!
 It warms, . . . it fires the farthest North.
 Behold! the awaken'd Moscovite
 Meets the Tyrant in his might;
 The Brandenburg, at Freedom's call,
 Rises more glorious from his fall;
 And Frederic, best and greatest of the name,
 Treads in the path of duty and of fame.
 See Austria from her painful trance awake!
 The breath of God goes forth, . . . the dry bones shake!
 Up Germany! . . . with all thy nations rise!
 Land of the virtuous and the wise,
 No longer let that free, that mighty mind,
 Endure its shame! She rose as from the dead,
 She broke her chains upon the oppressor's head.
 Glory to God! Deliverance for mankind!

* Hear the Edinburgh Reviewer! "It would be as chimerical to expect a routing among the vassal states of France who are the most impatient of her yoke, as amongst the inhabitants of Bourdeaux, or the conscripts of the year 1808 and 1809. In making this comparison, we are indeed putting the case much more strongly against France than the facts warrant, for with the exception of Holland, and the States into which the conscription has been introduced, either immediately, or by means of large requisitions of men made to their Governments*, the changes effected by the French invasion have been favourable to the individual happiness of the inhabitants†, so that the hatred of France is liable to considerable diminution, inasmuch as the national antipathy and spirit of independence are gradually undermined by the

Open thy gates, O Hanover ! display
 Thy loyal banners to the day ;
 Receive thy old illustrious line once more !
 Beneath an Upstart's yoke oppress,
 Long hath it been thy fortune to deplore
 That line, whose fostering and paternal sway
 So many an age thy grateful children blest.
 The yoke is broken now : . . A mightier hand
 Hath dash'd, . . in pieces dash'd, . . the iron rod.
 To meet her Princes, the deliver'd land

 The happy bells, from every town and tower,
 Roll their glad peals upon the joyful wind ;
 And from all hearts and tongues, with one consent,
 The high thanksgiving strain to heaven is sent, . .
 Glory to God ! Deliverance for Mankind !

XVII.

Egmont and Horn, heard ye that holy cry,
 Martyrs of Freedom, from your seats in Heaven ?
 And William the Deliverer, doth thine eye
 Regard from yon empyreal realm the land
 For which thy blood was given ?
 What ills hath that poor Country suffer'd long !
 Deceiv'd, displac'd, and plunder'd, and oppress'd,
 Mockery and insult aggravating wrong !
 Severely she her errors hath atoned,
 And long in anguish groan'd,
 Wearing the patient semblance of despair,
 While fervent curses rose with every prayer,

solid benefits which the change of masters has conferred."—

Great as a statesman, profound as a philosopher, amiable as an optimist of the Pangloss school, . . but not altogether fortunate as a Prophet !

POSTSCRIPT.

1821.

As a proper accompaniment to the preceding Notes, upon their republication, I subjoin an extract from a William-
Smithie epistle, begun a few years ago upon sufficient provocation, but left unfinished, because better employments delayed its completion till the offence, gross as it was, seemed no longer deserving of a thought.

* * * * *

My fortune has been somewhat remarkable in this respect, that, bestowing less attention than most men upon contemporary literature, I am supposed to concern myself with it in a degree which would leave me no time for any worthier occupation. Half the persons who are wounded in the Quarterly Review fix upon me as the object of their resentment ; some, because they are conscious of having deserved chastisement at my hands ; others, because they give credit to an empty report, a lying assertion, or their own conceited sagacity in discovering a writer by his style. As for the former, they flatter themselves egregiously in supposing that I should throw away my anger upon such subjects. But by the latter I would willingly have it understood, that I heartily disapprove the present fashion of criticism, and sincerely wish that you, Sir, and your friend, had taken out an exclusive patent for it, when you brought it into vogue.

With regard to literary assailants, I should as little think of resenting their attacks in anger, as of making war upon

In mercy Heaven at length its ear inclined ;
 The avenging armies of the North draw nigh,
 Joy for the injured Hollander ! . . the cry
 Of Orange rends the sky !
 All hearts are now in one good cause combined, . .
 Once more that flag triumphant floats on high, . .
 Glory to God ! Deliverance for Mankind !

XVIII.

When shall the Dove go forth ? Oh when Shall Peace return among the Sons of Men ?
 Hasten benignant Heaven the blessed day !
 Justice must go before,
 And Retribution must make plain the way ;
 Force must be crushed by Force,
 The power of Evil by the power of Good,
 Ere Order bless the suffering world once more,
 Or Peace return again.
 Hold then right on in your auspicious course,
 Ye Princes, and ye People, hold right on !
 Your task not yet is done :
 Pursue the blow, . . ye know your foe, . .
 Complete the happy work so well begun.
 Hold on, and be your aim with all your strength
 Loudly proclaim'd and steadily pursued ;
 So shall this fatal Tyranny at length
 Before the arms of Freedom fall subdued.
 Then, when the waters of the flood abate
 The Dove her resting-place secure may find :
 And France restored, and shaking off her chain,
 Shall join the Avengers in the joyful strain,
 Glory to God ! Deliverance for Mankind !

midges and mosquitos. I have therefore never noticed your amiable colleague in his critical capacity. Let him blunder, and misquote, and misrepresent, and contradict himself in the same page, or in the same sentence, with as much ingenuity as he will : " 'Tis his vocation, Hal ! " and some allowances must be made for habit. I remember what Lord Anson's linguist said to him at Canton, upon the detection of some notable act of dishonesty : " Chinaman very great rogue truly : but hab fashion : no can help." Concerning me, and any composition of mine, it is impossible that this gentleman can write wisely unless his nature should undergo a radical change, for it is written in the wisest book which ever proceeded from mere humanity, that " Into a malicious soul, wisdom shall not enter."

You may have seen a mastiff of the right English breed assailed by a little, impertinent, noisy, meddling cur, who runs behind him, snapping and barking at his heels, and sometimes gets staggered by a chance-whisk of his tail. The mastiff continues his way peaceably ; or if he condescends to notice the yelp, it is only by stopping half a minute, and lifting his leg over him. Just such, Sir, is the notice which I bestow upon your colleague in his critical character.

But for F. J. Philomath, and Professor of the Occult Sciences, he is a grave personage, whose political and prophetic pretensions entitle him to high consideration in these days. He is as great a man as Lilly in the time of the Commonwealth, or as Partridge after him. It is well known what infinite pains he bestowed in casting the nativities of Lord Wellington, Buonaparte, and the Emperor of Russia, . . all for the good of mankind ! and it is also notorious that he mistook the aspects, and made some very unfortunate errors in his predictions. At a time when he was considerably indisposed in consequence of this mortification, I took the liberty of administering to him a dose of his own words, mixed, perhaps, Sir, with a few of yours, for you were his fellow-student in astrology, and are known to have assisted him in these his calculations. The medicine was given in the form of extract; but the patient could not have used more wry faces had it been extract of colquintida. And indeed it produced a most unpleasant effect. Ever since that time his paroxysms have been more violent, and he has been troubled with occasional ravings, accompanied with periodical discharges of bile in its most offensive state. Nevertheless, dreadfully bilious as he is, and tormented with acrid humours, it is hoped that by a cool diet, by the proper use of refrigerants, above all, by paying due attention to the state of the primæ viæ, and observing a strict abstinence from the Quarterly Review, the danger of a cholera morbus may be averted.

I have not been travelling out of the record while thus incidentally noticing a personage with whom you, Sir, are more naturally and properly associated than I have been with Mr. Wordsworth, this your colleague and you being the Gog and Magog of the Edinburgh Review. Had it not been for a difference of opinion upon political points between myself and certain writers in that journal who laid claim to the faculty of the second sight, I suspect that I should never have incurred your hostility. What those points of difference were I must here be permitted to set forth for the satisfaction of those readers who may not be so well acquainted with them as you are: they related to the possibility of carrying on the late war to an honourable and successful termination.

It was in our state of feeling, Sir, as well as in our state of knowledge, that we differed, in our desires as much as in our judgement. They predicted for us nothing but disgrace and defeat: predicted is the word; for they themselves assured us that they were "seriously occupied with the destinies of Europe and of mankind;"—

"As who should say I am Sir Oracle!"

They ridiculed "the romantic hopes of the English nation," and imputed the spirit by which the glory of that nation has been raised to its highest point, and the deliverance of Europe accomplished, to "the tricks of a paltry and interested party." They said that events had "verified their predictions," had "more than justified their worst forebodings." They told us in 1810 that the fate of Spain was decided, and that that "misguided" country (misguided in having ventured to resist the most insolent usurpation that ever was attempted) "had yielded to the Conqueror." This manner of speaking of an event in the preter-pluperfect tense, before it has come to pass, may be either a slight grammatical slip, or a prophetic figure of speech: but, as old Dr. Enchard says, "I hate all small ambiguous surmises, all quivering and mincing conjectures: give me the lusty and bold thinker, who when he undertakes to prophesy does it punctually." "It would be blood-thirsty and cruel," they said, "to foment petty insurrections, (meaning the war in Spain and Portugal) after the only contest is over from which any good can spring in the present unfortunate state of affairs." "France has conquered Europe. This is the melancholy truth. Shut our eyes to it as we may, there can be no doubt about the matter. For the present, peace and submission must be the lot of the vanquished." "Let us hear no more of objections to a Buonaparte ruling in Spain."

"Harry, the wish was father to that thought!"

They told us that if Lord Wellington was not driven out of Portugal, it was because the French government thought him "better there than any where else." They told us they were prepared to "contemplate with great composure" the conquest of Russia, by Buonaparte, as a "change which would lay the foundation of future improvement in the dominions of the Cæars."—

"Si mens sit læta tibi credideris esse propheta," says an old Leonine rhymester.—And as for expecting "a MUTINY (hear Germany! for so they qualified it!) amongst the vassal states of France, it would be as chimerical," they said, "as to expect one amongst the inhabitants of Bourdeaux." And here these lucky prophets were peculiarly felicitous; the inhabitants of Bourdeaux having been the first people in France who threw off the yoke of Buonaparte's tyranny, and mounted the white cockade.

"Omnia jam fiunt, fieri quæ posse negabam."

Poor Oracle! the face is double-bronzed; and yet it is but a wooden head!

I stood upon firm ground, while they were sticking in the Slough of Despond. Hinc illæ lacrymæ! I charged them at the time with ignorance, presumption, and pusillanimity. And now, Sir, I ask of you, were they or were they not ignorant? Here are their assertions (— Were they or were they not presumptuous? Here are their predictions!— Were they or were they not pusillanimous? Have they or have they not been confuted, and confounded, and exposed, and shamed, and stultified, by the event?

They who know me will bear witness, that, before a rumour of war was heard from the Peninsula, I had looked toward that quarter as the point where we might hope first to see the horizon open; and that, from the hour in which the struggle commenced, I never doubted of its final success, provided England should do its duty: this confidence was founded upon a knowledge of the country and the people, and upon the principles which were then and there first brought into action against the enemy. At the time when every effort was made (as you, Sir, well know) to vilify and disgust our allies, to discourage the public, to impede the measures of government, to derange its finances, and thereby cut off its means, to paralyse the arm and deaden the heart of England;—when we were told of the irresistible power and perfect policy of Buonaparte, the consummate skill of his generals, and the invincibility of his armies, my language was this: "The one business of England is to abate the power of France: that power she must beat down, or fall herself; that power she will beat down, if she do not strenuously put forth her own mighty means." And again,—"For our soldiers to equal our seamen, it is only necessary for them to be equally well commanded. They have the same heart and soul, as well as the same flesh and blood. Too much, indeed, may be exacted from them in a retreat: but set their face toward a foe, and there is nothing within the reach of human achievement which they cannot perform." And again;—"Carry on the war with all the heart, and with all the soul, and with all the strength, of this mighty empire, and you will beat down the power of France." Was I wrong, Sir? Or has the event corresponded to this confidence?

Ἀνέμειν ἐπὶ τοῖς

Bear witness Torres Vedras, Salamanca, and Vittoria! Bear witness Orthies and Thoulouse! Bear witness Waterloo, and that miserable tyrant, who was then making and unmaking kings with a breath, and now frots upon the rock of St. Helena, like a tiger in his cage!

O D E S.

ODE,

WRITTEN DURING THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH BUONAPARTE, IN JANUARY, 1814.

1.

Who counsels peace at this momentous hour,
When God hath given deliverance to the oppress'd,
And to the injured power?
Who counsels peace, when Vengeance like a flood
Rolls on, no longer now to be repress'd;
When innocent blood
From the four corners of the world cries out
For justice upon one accursed head;
When Freedom hath her holy banners spread
Over all nations, now in one just cause
United; when with one sublime accord
Europe throws off the yoke abhorr'd,
And Loyalty and Faith and Ancient Laws
Follow the avenging sword!

2.

Woe, woe to England! woe and endless shame,
If this heroic land,
False to her feelings and unspotted fame,
Hold out the olive to the Tyrant's hand!
Woe to the world, if Buonaparte's throne
Be suffer'd still to stand!
For by what names shall Right and Wrong be known,...
What new and courtly phrases must we feign
For Falschood, Murder, and all monstrous crimes,
If that perfidious Corsican maintain
Still his detested reign,
And France, who yearns even now to break her chain,
Beneath his iron rule be left to groan?
No! by the innumerable dead,
Whose blood hath for his lust of power been shed,
Death only can for his foul deeds atone;
That peace which Death and Judgement can bestow,
That peace be Buonaparte's, . . that alone!

3.

For sooner shall the Ethiope change his skin,
Or from the Leopard shall her spots depart,
Than this man change his old flagitious heart.
Have ye not seen him in the balance weigh'd,
And there found wanting? On the stage of blood
Foremost the resolute adventurer stood;
And when, by many a battle won,
He placed upon his brow the crown,
Curbing delirious France beneath his sway,
Then, like Octavius in old time,
Fair name might he have handed down,
Effacing many a stain of former crime.
Fool! should he cast away that bright renown!
Fool! the redemption proffer'd should he lose!
When Heaven such grace vouchsafed him that the way
To Good and Evil lay
Before him, which to choose.

4.

But Evil was his Good,
For all too long in blood had he been nurst,
And ne'er was earth with verier tyrant curst.
Bold man and bad,
Remorseless, godless, full of fraud and lies,
And black with murders and with perjuries,
Himself in Hell's whole panoply he clad;
No law but his own headstrong will he knew,
No counsellor but his own wicked heart.
From evil thus portentous strength he drew,
And trampled under foot all human ties,
All holy laws, all natural charities.

5.

O France! beneath this fierce Barbarian's sway
Disgraced thou art to all succeeding times;
Rapine, and blood, and fire have mark'd thy way,
All loathsome, all unutterable crimes.
A curse is on thee, France! from far and wide
It hath gone up to Heaven. All lands have cried
For vengeance upon thy detested head!
All nations curse thee, France! for whoso'er
In peace or war thy banner hath been spread,
All forms of human woe have follow'd there.
The Living and the Dead
Cry out alike against thee! They who bear,
Crouching beneath its weight, thine iron yoke,
Join in the bitterness of secret prayer
The voice of that innumerable throng,
Whose slaughter'd spirits day and night invoke
The Everlasting Judge of right and wrong,
How long, O Lord! Holy and Just, how long!

6.

A merciless oppressor hast thou been,
Thyself remorselessly oppress'd meantime;
Greedy of war, when all that thou couldst gain
Was but to dye thy soul with deeper crime,
And rivet faster round thyself the chain.
O blind to honour, and to interest blind,
When thus in abject servitude resign'd
To this barbarian upstart, thou couldst brave
God's justice, and the heart of human kind!
Madly thou thoughtest to enslave the world,
Thyself the while a miserable slave.
Behold the flag of vengeance is unfurl'd!
The dreadful armies of the North advance;
While England, Portugal, and Spain combined,
Give their triumphant banners to the wind,
And stand victorious in the fields of France.

7.

One man hath been for ten long wretched years
The cause of all this blood and all these tears;
One man in this most awful point of time
Draws on thy danger, as he caused thy crime.

Wait not too long the event,
 For now whole Europe comes against thee bent,
 His wiles and their own strength the nations know :
 Wise from past wrongs, on future peace intent,
 The People and the Princes, with one mind,
 From all parts move against the general foe :
 One act of justice, one atoning blow,
 One execrable head laid low,
 Even yet, O France ! averts thy punishment.
 Open thine eyes ! too long hast thou been blind ;
 Take vengeance for thyself, and for mankind !

8.

France ! if thou lovest thine ancient fame,
 Revenge thy sufferings and thy shame !
 By the bones which bleach on Jaffa's beach ;
 By the blood which on Domingo's shore
 Hath clogg'd the carrion-birds with gore ;
 By the flesh which gorged the wolves of Spain,
 Or stiffen'd on the snowy plain
 Of frozen Moscow ;
 By the bodies which lie all open to the sky,
 Tracking from Elbe to Rhine the Tyrant's flight ;
 By the widow's and the orphan's cry ;
 By the childless parent's misery ;
 By the lives which he hath shed ;
 By the ruin he hath spread ;
 By the prayers which rise for curses on his head ;
 Redeem, O France ! thine ancient fame,
 Revenge thy sufferings and thy shame,
 Open thine eyes ! . . too long hast thou been blind ;
 Take vengeance for thyself, and for mankind !

9.

By those horrors which the night
 Witness'd, when the torches' light
 To the assembled murderers show'd
 Where the blood of Condé flow'd ;
 By thy murder'd Pichegru's fame ;
 By murder'd Wright, . . an English name ;
 By murder'd Palm's atrocious doom ;
 By murder'd Hofer's martyrdom ;
 Oh ! by the virtuous blood thus vilely spilt,
 The Villain's own peculiar private guilt,
 Open thine eyes ! too long hast thou been blind !
 Take vengeance for thyself and for mankind !

ODE,

WRITTEN DURING THE WAR WITH AMERICA,
 1814.

1.

WHEN shall the Island Queen of Ocean lay
 The thunderbolt aside,
 And, twining olives with her laurel crown,
 Rest in the Bower of Peace ?

2.

Not long may this unnatural strife endure
 Beyond the Atlantic deep ;
 Not long may men, with vain ambition drunk,
 And insolent in wrong,

Afflict with their misrule the indignant land
 Where Washington hath left
 His awful memory .
 A light for after times !
 Vile instruments of fallen Tyranny
 In their own annals, by their countrymen,
 For lasting shame shall they be written down.
 Soon may the better Genius there prevail !
 Then will the Island Queen of Ocean lay
 The thunderbolt aside,
 And, twining olives with her laurel crown,
 Rest in the Bower of Peace.

3.

But not in ignominious ease,
 Within the Bower of Peace supine,
 The Ocean Queen shall rest !
 Her other toils await, . .
 A holier warfare, . . nobler victories ;
 And amaranthine wreaths,
 Which, when the laurel crown grows sere,
 Will live for ever green.

4.

Hear me, O England ! rightly may I claim
 Thy favourable audience, Queen of Isles,
 My Mother-land revered !
 For in the perilous hour,
 When weaker spirits stood agast,
 And reptile tongues, to thy dishonour bold,
 Spit their dull venom on the public ear,
 My voice was heard, . . a voice of hope,
 Of confidence and joy, . .
 Yea of such prophecy
 As Wisdom to her sons doth aye vouchsafe,
 When with pure heart and diligent desire
 They seek the fountain springs,
 And of the Ages past
 Take counsel reverently.

5.

Nobly hast thou stood up
 Against the foulest Tyranny that ere,
 In elder or in later times,
 Hath outraged human kind.
 O glorious England ! thou hast borne thyself
 Religiously and bravely in that strife ;
 And happier victory hath blest thine arms
 Than, in the days of yore,
 Thine own Plantagenets achieved,
 Or Marlborough, wise in council as in field,
 Or Wolfe, heroic name.
 Now gird thyself for other war ;
 Look round thee, and behold what ills,
 Remediable and yet unremedied,
 Afflict man's wretched race !
 Put on the panoply of faith !
 Bestir thyself against thine inward foes,
 Ignorance and Want, with all their brood
 Of miseries and of crimes.

6.

Powerful thou art : imperial Rome,
 When in the Augustan age she closed
 The temple of the two-faced God,
 Couldst hast no power like thine.

Less opulent was Spain,
 When Mexico her sumless riches sent
 To that proud monarchy ;
 And Hayti's ransack'd caverns gave their gold ;
 And from Potosi's recent veins
 The unabating stream of treasure flow'd.
 And blest art thou, above all nations blest,
 For thou art Freedom's own beloved Isle !
 The light of Science shines
 Conspicuous like a beacon on thy shores ,
 Thy martyrs purchased at the stake
 Faith uncorrupt for thine inheritance ;
 And by thine hearths Domestic Purity,
 Safe from the infection of a tainted age,
 Hath kept her sanctuaries.
 Yet, O dear England ! powerful as thou art,
 And rich and wise and blest,
 Yet would I see thee, O my Mother-land !
 Mightier and wealthier, wiser, happier still !

7.

For still doth Ignorance
 Maintain large empire here,
 Dark and unblest amid surrounding light ;
 Even as within this favour'd spot,
 Earth's wonder and her pride,
 The traveller on his way
 Beholds with weary eye
 Bleak moorland, noxious fen, and lonely heath,
 In drear extension spread.
 Oh grief ! that spirits of celestial seed,
 Whom ever teeming Nature hath brought forth
 With all the human faculties divine
 Of sense and soul endued, . .
 Disherited of knowledge and of bliss,
 Mere creatures of brute life,
 Should grope in darkness lost !

8.

Must this reproach endure ?
 Honour and praise to him,
 The universal friend,
 The general benefactor of mankind ;
 He who from Coromandel's shores
 His perfected discovery brought ;
 He by whose generous tolls
 This foul reproach ere long shall be effaced,
 This root of evil be eradicate !
 Yea, generations yet unborn
 Shall owe their weal to him,
 And future nations bless
 The honour'd name of Bell.

9.

Now may that blessed edifice
 Of public good be rear'd
 Which holy Edward traced,
 The spotless Tudor, he whom Death
 Too early summon'd to his heavenly throne.
 For Brunswick's line was this great work reserved,
 For Brunswick's fated line ;
 They who from papal darkness, and the thrall
 Of that worst bondage which doth hold
 The immortal spirit chain'd,
 Saved us in happy hour.
 Fitly for them was this great work reserved ;

So, Britain, shall thine aged monarch's wish
 Receive its due accomplishment,
 That wish which with the good,
 (Had he no other praise,)
 Through all succeeding times would rank his name,
 That all within his realms
 Might learn the Book, which all
 Who rightly learn shall live.

10.

From public fountains the perennial stream
 Of public weal must flow.
 O England ! wheresoe'er thy churches stand,
 There on that sacred ground,
 Where the rich harvest of mortality
 Is laid, as in a garner, treasured up,
 There plant the Tree of Knowledge ! Water it
 With thy perpetual bounty ! It shall spread
 Its branches o'er the venerable pile,
 Shield it against the storm,
 And bring forth fruits of life.

11.

Train up thy children, England ! in the ways
 Of righteousness, and feed them with the bread
 Of wholesome doctrine. Where hast thou thy mines
 But in their industry ?
 Thy bulwarks where, but in their breasts ?
 Thy might, but in their arms ?
 Shall not their numbers therefore be thy wealth,
 Thy strength, thy power, thy safety, and thy pride ?
 Oh grief then, grief and shame,
 If, in this flourishing land,
 There should be dwellings where the new-horn babe
 Doth bring unto its parent's soul no joy !
 Where squalid Poverty
 Receives it at its birth,
 And on her wither'd knees
 Gives it the scanty food of discontent !

12.

Queen of the Seas ! enlarge thyself ;
 Redundant as thou art of life and power,
 Be thou the hive of nations,
 And send thy swarms abroad !
 Send them like Greece of old,
 With arts and science to enrich
 The uncultivated earth ;
 But with more precious gifts than Greece or Tyre
 Or elder Egypt, to the world bequeath'd ;
 Just laws, and rightful polity,
 And, crowning all, the dearest boon of Heaven,
 Its word and will reveal'd.
 Queen of the Seas ! enlarge
 The place of thy pavilion. Let them stretch
 The curtains of thine habitations forth ;
 Spare not ; but lengthen thou
 Thy cords, make strong thy stakes.

13.

Queen of the Seas ! enlarge thyself ;
 Send thou thy swarms abroad !
 For in the years to come,
 Though centuries or millenniums intervene,
 Where'er thy progeny,
 Thy language, and thy spirit shall be found, . .

If on Ontario's shores,
Or late-explored Missouri's pastures wide,
Or in that Austral world long sought,
The many-isled Pacific, . . . yea where waves,
Now breaking over coral reefs, affright
The venturous mariner,
When islands shall have grown, and cities risen
In cocoa groves embower'd ; . .
Where'er thy language lives,
By whatsoever name the land be call'd,
That land is English still, and there
Thy influential spirit dwells and reigns.
Thrones fall, and Dynasties are changed ;
Empires decay and sink
Beneath their own unwieldy weight ;
Dominion passeth like a cloud away :
The imperishable mind
Survives all meaner things

14.

Train up thy children, England, in the ways
Of righteousness, and feed them with the bread
Of wholesome doctrine. Send thy swarms abroad !
Send forth thy humanizing arts,
Thy stirring enterprize,
Thy liberal polity, thy Gospel light !
Illumine the dark idolater,
Reclaim the savage ! O thou Ocean Queen !
Be these thy toils when thou hast laid
The thunderbolt aside :
He who hath blest thine arms
Will bless thee in these holy works of Peace !
Father ! thy kingdom come, and as in Heaven
Thy will be done on Earth !

Kenwick.

CARMINA AULICA,

WRITTEN IN 1814,

ON THE ARRIVAL OF THE ALLIED SOVEREIGNS
IN ENGLAND.

Ἐχὼ καλὰ τι φράσαι, τέλμα τι μοι
Εὐθεία γλῶσσαν ἀνέμω λίγην.

Pindar, Olymp. xiii.

ODE

TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE REGENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

1.

PRINCE of the mighty Isle !
Proud day for thee and for thy kingdoms this,
When Britain round her spear
The olive garland twines, by Victory won.

2.

Rightly may'st thou rejoice,
For in a day of darkness and of storms,
An evil day, a day of woe,
To thee the sceptre fell.

The Continent was leagu'd,
Its numbers wielded by one will,
Against the mighty Isle ;
All shores were hostile to the Red Cross flag,
All ports against it closed ;
Save where, behind their ramparts driven,
The Spaniard, and the faithful Portugal,
Each on the utmost limits of his land,
Invincible of heart,
Stood firm, and put their trust
In their good cause and thee.

3.

Such perils menaced from abroad ;
At home worse dangers compass'd thee,
Where shallow counsellors,
A weak but clamorous crew,
Pester'd the land, and with their withering breath
Poison'd the public ear.
For peace the feeble raised their factious cry :
Oh, madness, to resist
The Invincible in arms !
Seek the peace-garland from his dreadful hand !
And at the Tyrant's feet
They would have knelt to take
The wreath of aconite for Britain's brow.
Prince of the mighty Isle !
Rightly may'st thou rejoice,
For in the day of danger thou did'st turn
From their vile counsels thine indignant heart ;
Rightly may'st thou rejoice,
When Britain round her spear
The olive garland twines, by Victory won.

4.

Rejoice, thou mighty Isle,
Queen of the Seas ! rejoice ;
Ring round, ye merry bells,
Till every steeple rock,
And the wide air grow giddy with your joy !
Flow streamers to the breeze !
And ye victorious banners to the sun
Now let the anvil rest ;
Shut up the loom, and open the school-doors,
That young and old may with festivities
Hallow for memory, through all after years,
This memorable time ;
This memorable time,
When Peace, long absent, long deplored, returns.
Not as vile Faction would have brought her home,
Her countenance for shame abased,
In servile weeds array'd,
Submission leading her,
Fear, Sorrow, and Repentance following close ;
And War, scarce deigning to conceal
Beneath the mantle's folds his armed plight,
Dogging her steps with deadly eye intent,
Sure of his victim, in devilish joy
Laughing behind the mask.

5.

Not thus doth Peace return ! . . .
A blessed visitant she comes, . . .
Honour in his right hand
Doth lead her like a bride ;

And Victory goes before ;
 Hope, Safety, and Prosperity, and Strength,
 Come in her joyful train.
 Now let the churches ring
 With high thanksgiving songs,
 And the full organ pour
 * Its swelling peals to Heaven,
 The while the grateful nation bless in prayer
 Their Warriors and their Statesmen and their Prince,
 Whose will, whose mind, whose arm
 Have thus with happy end their efforts crown'd.
 Prince of the mighty Isle,
 Rightly may'st thou rejoice,
 When Britain round her spear
 The olive-garland twines, by Victory won.

6.
 Enjoy thy triumph now,
 Prince of the mighty Isle !
 Enjoy the rich reward, so rightly due,
 When rescued nations, with one heart and voice,
 Thy counsels bless and thee.
 Thou on thine own Firm Island seest the while,
 As if the tales of old Romance
 Were but to typify these splendid days,
 Princes and Potentates,
 And Chiefs renown'd in arms,
 From their great enterprise achieved,
 In friendship and in joy collected here.

7.
 Rejoice, thou mighty Isle !
 Queen of the Seas ! rejoice ;
 For ne'er in elder nor in later times
 Have such illustrious guests
 Honour'd thy silver shores.
 No such assemblage shone in Edward's hall,
 Nor brighter triumphs graced his glorious reign.
 Prince of the mighty Isle,
 Proud day for thee and for thy kingdoms this !
 Rightly may'st thou rejoice.
 When Britain round her spear
 The olive-garland twines, by Victory won.

8.
 Yet in the pomp of these festivities
 One mournful thought will rise within thy mind,
 The thought of Him who sits
 In mental as in visual darkness lost.
 How had his heart been fill'd
 With deepest gratitude to Heaven,
 Had he beheld this day !
 O King of kings, and Lord of lords,
 Thou who hast visited thus heavily
 The anointed head, . .
 Oh ! for one little interval,
 One precious hour,
 Remove the darkness from thy soul,
 That we may know it all,
 And bless thee ere he die.

9.
 Thou also should'st have seen
 This harvest of thy hopes,
 Thou whom the guilty act
 Of a proud spirit overthrown,

Sent to thine early grave in evil hour !
 Forget not him, my country, in thy joy !
 But let thy grateful hand
 With laurel garlands hang
 The tomb of Perceval.
 Virtuous, and firm, and wise,
 The Ark of Britain in her darkest day
 He steer'd through stormy seas ;
 And long shall Britain hold his memory dear,
 And faithful History give
 His meed of lasting praise.

10.
 That earthly meed shall his compeers enjoy,
 Britain's true counsellors,
 Who see with just success their counsels crown'd.
 They have their triumph now, to him denied ;
 Proud day for them is this !
 Prince of the mighty Isle !
 Proud day for them and thee,
 When Britain round her spear
 The olive-garland twines, by Victory won.

ODE

TO HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY, ALEXANDER THE FIRST, EMPEROR OF ALL THE RUSSIAS.

1.
 CONQUEROR, Deliverer, Friend of human-kind !
 The free, the happy, Island welcomes thee ;
 Thee from thy wasted realms,
 So signally revenged ;
 From Prussia's rescued plains ;
 From Dresden's field of slaughter, where the ball,
 Which struck Moreau's dear life,
 Was turn'd from thy more precious head aside ;
 From Leipsic's dreadful day,
 From Elbe, and Rhine, and Seine,
 In thy career of conquest overpass'd ;
 From the proud Capital
 Of haughty France subdued,
 Then to her rightful line of Kings restored ;
 Thee, Alexander ! thee, the Great, the Good,
 The Glorious, the Beneficent, the Just,
 Thee to her honour'd shores
 The mighty Island welcomes in her joy.

2.
 Sixscore full years have pass'd,
 Since to these friendly shores
 Thy famous ancestor,
 Illustrious PETER came.
 Wise traveller he, who over Europe went,
 Marking the ways of men ;
 That so to his dear country, which then rose
 Among the nations in uncultured strength,
 He might bear back the stores
 Of elder polity,
 Its sciences and arts.
 Little did then the industrious German think, . .
 The soft Italian, lapt in luxury, . .
 Helvetia's mountain sons, of freedom proud, . .
 The patient Hollander,
 Prosperous and warlike then, . .

Little thought they that in that farthest North,
From PERSE's race should the Deliverer spring,

Destined by Heaven to save
Art, Learning, Industry,
Beneath the bestial hoof of godless Might
All trampled in the dust.
As little did the French,
Vaunting the power of their Great Monarch then,
(His schemes of wide ambition yet uncheck'd.)

As little did they think,
That from rude Moscovy the stone should come,
To smite their huge Colossus, which bestrode
The subject Continent;
And from its feet of clay,
Breaking the iron limbs and front of brass,
Strew the rejoicing Nations with the wreck.

3.

Roused as thou wert with insult and with wrong,
Who should have blamed thee if, in high-wrought mood
Of vengeance and the sense of injured power,
Thou from the flames which laid
The City of thy Fathers in the dust,
Hadst bid a spark be brought,
And borne it in thy tent,
Religiously by night and day preserved,
Till on Montmartre's height,
When open to thine arms,
Her last defence o'erthrown,
The guilty city lay,
Thou hadst call'd every Russian of thine host
To light his flambeau at the sacred flame,
And sent them through her streets,
And wrapt her roofs and towers,
Temples and palaces,
Her wealth and boasted spoils,
In one wide hood of fire,
Making the hated Nation feel herself
The miseries she had spread.

4.

Who should have blamed the Conqueror for that deed?
Yea, rather would not one exulting cry
Have risen from Elbe to Nile,
How is the Oppressor fallen!
Moscow's re-rising walls
Had rung with glad acclaim;
Thanksgiving hymns had fill'd
Tyrol's rejoicing vales:
How is the Oppressor fallen!
The Germans in their grass-grown marts had met
To celebrate the deed;
Holland's still waters had been starr'd
With festive lights, reflected there
From every house and hut,
From every town and tower;
The Iberian and the Lusitan's injured realms,
From all their mountain-holds,
From all their ravaged fields,
From cities sack'd, from violated fanes,
And from the sanctuary of every heart,
Had pour'd that pious strain,
How is the Oppressor fallen!
Righteous art thou, O Lord!
Thou Zaragoza, from thy sepulchres
Hadst join'd the hymn; and from thine ashes thou,
Manresa, faithful still!

The blood that calls for vengeance in thy streets,
Madrid, and Porto thine,
And that which from the beach
Of Tarragona sent its cry to Heaven,
Had rested then appeased.
Orphans had clapt their hands,
And widows would have wept exulting tears,
And childless parents with a bitter joy
Have blest the avenging deed.

5.

But thou hadst seen enough
Of horrors, . . . amply hadst avenged mankind.
Witness that dread retreat,
When God and nature smote
The Tyrant in his pride!
No wider ruin overtook
Sennacherib's impious host;
Nor when the frantic Persian led
His veterans to the Lybian sands;
Nor when united Greece
O'er the barbaric power that victory won
Which Europe yet may bless.
A fouler Tyrant cursed the groaning earth, . . .
A fearfuller destruction was dispensed.
Victorious armies followed on his flight;
On every side he met
The Cossacks' dreadful spear;
On every side he saw
The injured nation rise,
Invincible in arms.
What myriads, victims of one wicked will,
Spent their last breath in curses on his head,
There where the soldiers' blood
Froze in the festering wound;
And nightly the cold moon
Saw sinking thousands in the snow lie down,
Whom there the morn'ing found
Stiff, as their icy bed.

6.

Rear high the monument!
In Moscow and in proud Petropolis,
The brazen trophy build;
Cannon on cannon piled,
Till the huge column overtop your towers!
From France the Tyrant brought These instruments of death
To work your overthrow;
He left them in his flight
To form the eternal record of his own.
Raise, Russia, with thy spoils,
A nobler monument
Than e'er imperial Rome
Built in her plenitude of pride and power!
Still, Alexander! on the banks of Seine,
Thy noblest monument
For future ages stands —
PARIS SUBDUED AND SPARED.

7.

Conqueror, Deliverer, Friend of human-kind,
The free, the happy Island welcomes thee!
Thee, Alexander! thee, the Great, the Good,
The Glorious, the Beneficent, the Just!
Thee to her honour'd shores
The mighty Island welcomes in her joy.

ODE

TO HIS MAJESTY, FREDERICK WILLIAM THE FOURTH,
KING OF PRUSSIA.

1.

WELCOME to England, to the happy Isle,
Brave Prince of gallant people ! Welcome Thou,
In adverse as in prosperous fortunes tried,
Frederick, the well-beloved !
Greatest and best of that illustrious name,
Welcome to these free shores !
In glory art thou come,
Thy victory perfect, thy revenge complete.

2.

Enough of sorrow hast thou known,
Enough of evil hath thy realm endured,
Oppress'd but not debased,
When thine indignant soul,
Long suffering, bore its weight of heaviest woe.
But still, through that dark day
Unsullied honour was thy counsellor ;
And Hope, that had its trust in Heaven,
And in the heart of man
Its strength, forsook thee not.
Thou hadst thy faithful people's love,
The sympathy of noble minds ;
And wistfully, as one
Who through the weary night has long'd for day,
Looks eastward for the dawn,
So Germany to thee
Turn'd in her bondage her imploring eyes.

3.

Oh, grief of griefs, that Germany,
The wise, the virtuous land,
The land of mighty minds,
Should bend beneath the frothy Frenchman's yoke !
Oh, grief of griefs, to think
That she should groan in bonds,
She who had blest all nations with her gifts !
There had the light of Reformation risen,
The light of Knowledge there was burning clear.
Oh, grief, that her unhappy sons
Should toil and bleed and die,
To quench that sacred light,
The wretched agents of a tyrant's will !
How often hath their blood
In his accursed cause
Reck'd on the Spaniard's blade !
Their mangled bodies fed
The wolves and eagles of the Pyrenees ;
Or stiffening in the snows of Moscow,
Amid the ashes of the watch-fire lay,
Where dragging painfully their frozen limbs,
With life's last effort, in the flames they fell.

4.

Long, Frederick, did'st thou bear
Her sorrows and thine own ;
Seven miserable years
In patience did'st thou feed thy heart with hope ;
Till, when the arm of God
Smote the blaspheming Tyrant in his pride,
And Alexander with the voice of power
Raised the glad cry, Deliverance for Mankind,
First of the Germans, Prussia broke her chains.

5.

Joy, joy for Germany,
For Europe, for the World,
When Prussia rose in arms !
Oh, what a spectacle
For present and for future times was there,
When for the public need
Wives gave their marriage rings,
And mothers, when their sons
The Band of Vengeance join'd,
Bade them return victorious from the field,
Or with their country fall.

6.

Twice o'er the field of death
The trembling scales of Fate hung equipoised :
For France, obsequious to her Tyrant still,
Mighty for evil, put forth all her power ;
And still beneath his hateful banners driven,
Against their father-land
Unwilling Germans bore unnatural arms.
What though the Boaster made his temples ring
With vain thanksgivings for each doubtful day, . .
What though with false pretence of peace
His old insidious arts he tried, . .
The spell was broken ! Austria threw her sword
Into the inclining scale,
And Lepsie saw the wrongs
Of Germany avenged.

7.

Ne'er till that awful time had Europe seen
Such multitudes in arms ;
Nor ever had the rising Sun beheld
Such mighty interests of mankind at stake ;
Nor o'er so wide a scene
Of slaughter e'er had Night her curtain closed.
There, on the battle-field,
With one accord the grateful monarchs knelt,
And raised their voice to Heaven ;
" The cause was thine, O Lord !
" O Lord ! thy hand was here !"
What Conquerors e'er deserved
So proud, so pure a joy !
It was a moment when the exalted soul
Might almost wish to burst its mortal bounds,
Lest all of life to come
Vapid and void should seem
After that high-wrought hour.

8.

But thou hadst yet more toils,
More duties and more triumphs yet in store.
Elbe must not bound thine arms,
Nor on the banks of Rhine
Thine eagles check their flight ;
When o'er that barrier stream,
Awakened Germany
Drove her invaders with such rout and wreck
As overtook the impious Gaul of old,
Laden with plunder, and from Delphi driven.

9.

Long had insulting France
Boasted her arms invincible,
Her soil inviolate ;

At length the hour of retribution comes !
 Avenging nations on all sides move on ;
 In Gascony the flag of Eng^d and flies,
 Triumphant, as of yore,
 When sable Edward led his peerless host.
 Behold the Spaniard and the Portugal,
 For cities burnt, for violated fanes,
 For murders, massacres,
 All monstrous, all unutterable crimes,
 Demanding vengeance with victorious cries,
 Pour from the Pyrenees.
 The Russian comes, his eye on Paris fix'd,
 The flames of Moscow present to his heart ;
 The Austrian to efface
 Ulm, Austerlitz, and Wagram's later shame ;
 Rejoicing Germany
 With all her nations swells the avenging train ;
 And in the field and in the triumph first,
 Thy banner, Frederick, floats.

10.
 Six weeks in daily strife
 The veteran Blücher bore the brunt of war.
 Glorious old man,
 The last and greatest of his master's school,
 Long may he live to hear
 The people bless his name !
 Late be it ere the wreath
 That crowns his silver hair
 Adorn his monument !
 Glorious old man,
 How oft hath he discomfited
 The boasted chiefs of France,
 And foil'd her vaunting Tyrant's desperate rage !
 Glorious old man,
 Who from Silesia's fields,
 O'er Elbe, and Rhine, and Seine,
 From victory to victory marching on,
 Made his heroic way ; till at the gates
 Of Paris, open'd by his arms, he saw
 His King triumphant stand.

11.
 Bear back the sword of Frederick now !
 The sword which France amid her spoils display'd,
 Proud trophy of a day ignobly won.
 With laurels wreath the sword ;
 Bear it in triumph back,
 Thus gloriously regain'd ;
 And when thou lay'st it in its honour'd place,
 O Frederick, well-belov'd,
 Greatest and best of that illustrious name,
 Lay by its side thine own,
 A hollower relic there !

12.
 Frederick, the well-belov'd !
 Welcome to these free shores,
 To England welcome, to the happy Isle !
 In glory art thou come,
 Thy victory perfect, thy revenge complete.

ODE.

THE BATTLE OF ALGIERS.

1.
 ONE day of dreadful occupation more,
 Ere England's gallant ships
 Shall, of their beauty, pomp, and power disrobed,
 Like sea-birds on the sunny main,
 Rock idly in the port.

2.
 One day of dreadful occupation more !
 A work of righteousness,
 Yea, of sublimest mercy, must be done ;
 England will break the oppressor's chain,
 And set the captives free.

3.
 Red cross of England, which all shores have seen
 Triumphant displayed,
 Thou sacred banner of the glorious Isle,
 Known wheresoever keel hath cut
 The navigable deep ;

4.
 Ne'er didst thou float more proudly o'er the storm
 Of havoc and of death,
 Than when, resisting fiercely, but in vain,
 Algiers, her moony standard lowered,
 And sign'd the conqueror's law.

5.
 Oh, if the grave were sentient, as these Moors
 In erring credence hold ;
 And if the victims of captivity
 Could in the silent tomb have heard
 The thunder of the fight ;

6.
 Sure their rejoicing dust upon that day
 Had heaved the oppressive soil,
 And earth been shaken like the mosques and towers,
 When England on those guilty walls
 Her fiery vengeance sent.

7.
 Seldom hath victory given a joy like this, —
 When the delivered slave
 Revisits once again his own dear home,
 And tells of all his sufferings past,
 And blesses Exmouth's name.

8.
 Far, far and wide along the Italian shores,
 That holy joy extends ;
 Sardinian mothers pay their vows fulfill'd ;
 And hymns are heard beside thy banks,
 O Fountain Arethuse !

9.
 Churches shall blaze with lights, and ring with praise,
 And deeper strains shall rise
 From many an overflowing heart to Heaven ;
 Nor will they in their prayers forget
 The hand that set them free.

Keswick.

ODE

ON THE DEATH OF QUEEN CHARLOTTE.

1.

DEATH has gone up into our Palaces !
The light of day once more
Hath visited the last abode
Of mortal royalty,
The dark and silent vault.

2.

But not as when the silence of that vault
Was interrupted last
Doth England raise her loud lament,
Like one by sudden grief
Surprised and overcome.

3.

Then with a passionate sorrow we bewail'd
Youth on the untimely bier ;
And hopes which seem'd like flower-buds full,
Just opening to the sun,
For ever swept away.

4.

The heart then struggled with repining thoughts,
With feelings that almost
Arraign'd the inscrutable decree,
Embittered by a sense
Of that which might have been.

5.

This grief hath no repining ; all is well,
What hath been, and what is.
The Angel of Deliverance came
To one who full of years
Awaited her release.

6.

All that our fathers in their prayers desired,
When first their chosen Queen
Set on our shores her happy feet,
All by indulgent Heaven
Had largely been vouchsafed.

7.

At Court the Household Virtues had their place ;
Domestic Purity
Maintain'd her proper influence there :
The marriage bed was blest,
And length of days was given.

8.

No cause for sorrow then, but thankfulness ;
Life's business well perform'd,
When weary age full willingly
Resigns itself to sleep,
In sure and certain hope !

9.

Oh end to be desired, whene'er, as now,
Good works have gone before,
The seasonable fruit of Faith ;
And good Report, and good
Example have survived.

10.

Her left hand knew not of the ample alms
Which her right hand had done ;
And therefore in the awful hour,
The promises were hers
To secret bounty made.

11.

With more than royal honours to the tomb
Her bier is borne ; with more
Than Pomp can claim, or Power bestow ;
With blessings and with prayers
From many a grateful heart.

12.

Long, long then shall Queen Charlotte's name be dear ;
And future Queens to her
As to their best exemplar look ;
Who imitates her best
May best deserve our love.

Keswick, 1818.

ODE

FOR ST. GEORGE'S DAY.

1.

WILD were the tales which fabling monks of old
Devised to swell their hero's holy fame,
When in the noble army they enroll'd
St. George's doubtful name.
Of arrows and of spears they told
Which fell rebated from his mortal mould ;
And how the burning fiery furnace blast
To him came tempered like a summer breeze,
When at the hour of evening it hath past
O'er gurgling tanks, and groves of lemon trees :
And how the reverential flame
Condensing like a garb of honour, play'd
In gorgeous folds around his glorious frame ;
And how the Heathen in their frantic strife
With water then alike in vain, essay'd
His inextinguishable life.

2.

What marvel if the Christian Knight
Thus for his dear Redeemer's sake
Defied the purpled Pagan's might ?
Such boldness well might he partake,
For he beside the Libyan lake
Silene, with the Infernal King
Had coped in actual fight.
The old Dragon on terrific wing
Assail'd him there with Stygian sting
And arrowy tongue, and potent breath
Exhaling pestilence and death.
Dauntless in faith the Champion stood,
Opposed against the rage of Hell
The Red-Cross shield, and wielding well
His sword, the strife pursued ;
First with a wide and rending wound
Brought the maim'd monster to the ground,
Then pressing with victorious heel
Upon his scaly neck subdued,
Plunged and replunged the searching steel ;

Till from the shameful overthrow
Howling the incarnate Demon fled,
And left that form untenanted,
And hid in Hell his humbled head,
Still trembling in the realm below,
At thought of that tremendous foe.

3.

Such tales monastic fablers taught;
Their kindred strain the minstrels caught;
A web of finer texture they

Wrought in the rich romantic lay;
Of magic caves and woods they sung,
Where Kalyb nursed the boy divine,
And how those woods and caverns rung
With cries from many a demon tongue,
When breaking from the witch's cell,
He bound her in her own strong spell.

And of the bowers of Ormandine
Where thrall'd by art, St. David lay
Sleeping inglorious years away,
Till our St. George, with happier arm
Released him, and dissolved the charm.

But most the minstrels loved to tell
Of that portentous day,

When Sabra at the stake was bound,
Her brow with sweetest garlands crown'd

The Egyptian Dragon's prey;
And how for her the English Knight,
Invincible at such a sight,

Engaged that fiendish beast in fight,
And o'er the monster triple-scaled,
The good sword Askalon prevail'd.

4.

Such legends monks and min-strels feign'd,
And easily the wondrous tales obtain'd,
In those dark days, belief;
Shrines to the Saint were rear'd, and temples rose,
And states and kingdoms for their patron chose
The Cappadocian Chief.

Full soon his sainted name hath won
In fields of war a wide renown;
Spain saw the Moors confounded fly,
Before the well-known slaughter cry,
St. George for Aragon!

And when the Catalans pursued
Their vengeful way with fire and blood,
The Turk and treacherous Greek were dearly taught
That all-appalling shout,
For them with rage and ruin fraught
In many a dolorous rout.

'Twas in this heavenly Guardian's trusted strength,
That Malta's old heroic knights defied
The Ottoman in all his power and pride.
Repulsed from her immortal walls at length
The baffled Misbeliever turn'd with shame;
And when in after years in dreams he heard
That all-too-well remember'd battle-word,
Woke starting at St. George's dreadful name,
And felt cold sweats of fear suffuse his trembling frame.

5.

But thou, O England! to that sainted name
Hast given its proudest praise, its loftiest fame.

Witness the field of Cressy, on that day,
When vollying thunders roll'd unheard on high,
For in that memorable fray,
Broken, confused, and scatter'd in dismay,
France had ears only for the Conqueror's cry,
St. George, St. George for England! St. George and Victory!

Bear witness Poitiers! where again the foe
From that same hand received his overthrow.
In vain essay'd, Mont Joye St. Denis rang
From many a boastful tongue,
And many a hopeful heart in onset brave;
Their courage in the shock of battle quail'd
His dread response, when sable Edward gave,
And England and St. George again prevail'd.
Bear witness Agincourt, where once again
The banner'd lilies on the eusanguined plain
Were trampled by the fierce pursuers' feet;
And France, doom'd ever to defeat
Against that foe, beheld her myriads fly
Before the withering cry
St. George, St. George for England! St. George and Victory!

6.

That cry in many a field of Fame
Through glorious ages held its high renown;
Nor less hath Britain proved the sacred name
Auspicious to her crown.
Troubled too oft her course of fortune ran,
Till when the Georges came
Her happiest age began.
Beneath their just and liberal sway,
Old feuds and factions died away;
One feeling through her realms was known,
One interest of the Nation and the Throne.
Ring, then, ye bells upon St. George's Day,
From every tower in glad accordance ring;
And let all instruments full, strong, or sweet,
With touch of modulated string,
And soft or swelling breath, and sonorous beat,
The happy name repeat,
While heart and voice their joyous tribute bring,
And speak the People's love for George their King.

Kewick, 1820.

ODE

WRITTEN AFTER THE KING'S VISIT TO IRELAND.

1.

How long, O Ireland, from thy guilty ground
Shall innocent blood
Arraign the inefficient arm of Power?
How long shall Murder there,
Leading his banded ruffians through the land,
Range unrepres'd?
How long shall Night
Bring to thy harmless dwellers, in the stead
Of natural rest, the feverish sleep of fear,
Midnight alarms,
Horrible dreams, and worse realities?
How long shall darkness cover, and the eye
Of Morning open upon deeds of death?

2.

In vain art thou by liberal Nature's dower
 Exuberantly blest ;
 The Seasons in their course
 Shed o'er thy hills and vales
 The bounties of a genial clime, in vain ;
 Heaven hath in vain bestowed
 Well-tempered liberty,
 (Its last and largest boon to social man,)
 If the brute Multitude from age to age,
 Wild as their savage ancestors,
 Go irreclaim'd the while,
 From sire to son transmitting still
 In undisturb'd descent,
 (A sad inheritance !)
 Their errors, and their crimes.

3.

Green Island of the West !
 Thy Sister Kingdom fear'd not this
 When thine exultant shores
 Rung far and wide of late,
 And grateful Dublin first beheld her King,
 First of thy Sovereigns he
 Who visited thy shores in peace and joy.

4.

Oh what a joy was there !
 In loud huzzahs prolong'd,
 Surge after surge the tide
 Of popular welcome rose ;
 And in the intervals alone
 Of that tumultuous sound of glad acclaim,
 Could the deep cannon's voice
 Of dutious gratulation, though it spake
 In thunder, reach the ear.
 From every tower the merry bells rung round,
 Peal hurrying upon peal,
 Till with the still reverberating din
 The walls and solid pavement seem'd to shake,
 And every bosom with the tremulous air
 Inhaled a dizzy joy.

5.

Age that came forth to gaze,
 That memorable day
 Felt in its quicken'd veins a pulse like youth ;
 And lisping babes were taught to bless their King ;
 And grandsires bade the children treasure up
 The precious sight, for it would be a tale
 The which in their old age
 Would make their children's children gather round
 Intent, all ears to hear.

6.

Were then the feelings of that generous time
 Ephemeral as the joy ?
 Pass'd they away like summer clouds,
 Like dreams of infancy,
 Like glories of the evening firmament,
 Which fade, and leave no trace ?
 Merciful Heaven, oh let not thou the hope
 Be frustrate, that our Sister Isle may reap
 From the good seed then sown
 Full harvests of prosperity and peace ;

That perfect union may derive its date
 From that auspicious day,
 And equitable ages thence
 Their lasting course begin ;

7.

Green Island of the West,
 While frantic violence delays "
 That happier order, still must thou remain
 In thine own baleful darkness wrapt ;
 As if the Eye divine,
 That which beholdeth all, from thee alone
 In wrath had turn'd away !

8.

But not for ever thus shalt thou endure,
 To thy reproach, and ours,
 Thy misery, and our shame !
 For Mercy shall go forth
 To establish Order, with an arm'd right hand ;
 And firm Authority
 With its all-present strength controul the bad,
 And with its all-sufficient shield
 Protect the innocent ;
 The first great duty this of lawful Power
 Which holds its delegated right from Heaven.

9.

The first great duty this ; but this not all ;
 For more than comes within the scope
 Of Power, is needed here ;
 More than to watch, insidious discontent,
 Curb, and keep curb'd the treasonable tongue,
 And quell the madden'd multitude :
 Labours of love remain ;
 To weed out noxious customs rooted deep
 In a rank soil, and long left seeding there ;
 Pour balm into old wounds, and bind them up ;
 Remove remediable ills,
 Improve the willing mind,
 And win the generous heart.
 Afflicted Country, from thyself
 Must this redemption come ;
 And thou hast children able to perform
 This work of faith and hope.

10.

O for a voice that might recall
 To their deserted hearths
 Thy truant sons ! a voice
 Whose virtuous cogency
 Might with the strength of duty reach their souls ;
 A strength that should compel entire consent,
 And to their glad obedience give
 The impulse and the force of free good-will !
 For who but they can knit
 The severed links of that appointed chain,
 Which when in just cohesion it unites
 Order to order, rank to rank,
 In mutual benefit,
 So binding heart to heart,
 It then connecteth Earth with Heaven, from whence
 The golden links depend.

11.

Nor when the war is waged
 With Error, and the brood
 Of Darkness, will your aid
 Be wanting in the cause of Light and Love,
 Ye Ministers of that most holy Church
 Whose firm foundations on the rock
 Of Scripture rest secure !
 What though the Romanist in numbers strong,
 In misdirected zeal
 And bigotry's blind force,
 Assail your Fortress ; though the sons of Schism
 Join in insane alliance with that old
 Inveterate enemy,
 Weening thereby to wreak
 Their covenanted hatred, and effect
 Your utter overthrow ;
 What though the unbelieving crew,
 For fouler purpose aid the unnatural league ;
 * And Faction's wolfish pack
 Set up their fiercest yell, to augment
 The uproar of assault ;
 Clad in your panoply will ye be found,
 Wielding the spear of Reason, with the sword
 Of Scripture girt ; and from your shield of Truth
 Such radiance shall go forth,
 As when, unable to sustain its beams
 On Arthur's arm unweild,
 Earth-born Orgoglio reel'd, as if with wine ;
 And from her many-headed beast cast down
 Duessa fell, her cup of sorcery spilt,
 Her three-crown'd mitre in the dust devolved,
 And all her secret filthiness exposed.

12.

O thou fair Island, with thy Sister Isle
 Indissolubly link'd for weal and woe ;
 Partaker of her present power,
 Her everlasting fame ;
 Dear pledges hast thou render'd and received
 Of that eternal union ! Bedell's grave
 Is in thy keeping ; and with thee
 Deposited, doth Taylor's holy dust
 Await the Archangel's call.
 O land profuse of genius and of worth,
 Largely hast thou received, and largely given !

13.

Green Island of the West,
 The example of unspotted Ormond's faith
 To thee we owe ; to thee
 Boyle's venerable name :
 Berkeley the wise, the good :
 And that great Orator who first
 Unmask'd the harlot sorceress Anarchy,
 What time, in Freedom's borrowed form profaned,
 She to the nations round
 Her draught of witchcraft gave :
 And him who in the field
 O'erthrew her giant offspring in his strength,
 And brake the Iron rod.
 Proud of such debt,
 Rich to be thus indebted, these,
 Fair Island, Sister Queen
 Of Ocean, Ireland, these to thee we owe.

14.

Shall I then imprecate
 A curse on them that would divide
 Our union ? . . Far be this from me, O Lord !
 Far be it ! What is man,
 That he should scatter curses ? . . King of Kings.
 Father of all, Almighty, Governor
 Of all things ! unto Thee
 Humbly I offer up our holier prayer !
 I pray Thee, not in wrath
 But in thy mercy, to confound
 These men's devices, Lord !
 Lighten their darkness with thy Gospel light
 And thus abate their pride,
 Assuage their malice thus !

Keswick, 1821.

ODE

WRITTEN AFTER THE KING'S VISIT TO SCOTLAND.

1.

At length hath Scotland seen
 The presence long desired ;
 The pomp of royalty
 Hath gladden'd once again
 Her ancient palace, desolate how long !
 From all parts far and near,
 Highland and lowland, glen and fertile carse,
 The silent mountain lake, the busy port,
 Her populous cities, and her pastoral hills,
 In generous joy convened
 By the free impulse of the loyal heart
 Her sons have gather'd, and beheld their King.

2.

Land of the loyal, as in happy hour
 Revisited, so was thy regal seat
 In happy hour for thee
 Forsaken, under favouring stars, when James
 His valediction gave,
 And great Eliza's throne
 Received its rightful heir,
 The Peaceful and the Just.

3.

A more auspicious union never Earth
 From eldest days had seen,
 Than when, their mutual wrongs forgiven,
 And gallant enmity renounced
 With honour, as in honour foster'd long,
 The ancient Kingdoms formed
 Their everlasting league.

4.

Slowly by time matured
 A happier order than for Scotland rose ;
 And where inhuman force,
 And rapine unrestrain'd
 Had lorded o'er the land,
 Peace came, and polity,
 And quiet industry, and frugal wealth ;
 And there the household virtues fix'd
 Their sojourn undisturb'd.

5.

Such blessings for her dowry Scotland drew
 From that benignant union; nor less large
 The portion that she brought.
 She brought security and strength,
 True hearts, and strenuous hands, and noble minds.
 Say, Ocean, from the shores of Camperdown,
 What Caledonia brought! Say thou,
 Egypt! Let India tell!
 And let tell Victory
 From that Brabantine field,
 The proudest field of fame!

6.

Speak ye, too, Works of peace;
 For ye too have a voice
 Which shall be heard by ages! The proud Bridge,
 Through whose broad arches, worthy of their name
 And place, his rising and his reflux tide
 Majestic Thames, the royal river, rolls;
 And that which high in air
 A bending line suspended, shall o'erhang
 Menai's straits, as if
 By Merlin's mighty magic there sustain'd;
 And Pont-Cyssyllt, not less wondrous work;
 Where on gigantic columns raised
 Aloft, a dizzying height,
 The laden barge pursues its even way,
 While o'er his rocky channel the dark Dee
 Hurries below, a raging stream, scarce heard.
 And that huge mole whose deep foundations, firm
 As if by Nature laid,
 Repel the assailing billows, and protect
 The British fleet, securely riding there,
 Though southern storms possess the sea and sky,
 And from its depths commoved,
 Infuriate ocean raves.
 Ye stately monuments of Britain's power,
 Bear record ye what Scottish minds
 Have plann'd and perfected!
 With grateful wonder shall posterity
 See the stupendous works, and Rennie's name,
 And Telford's shall survive, till time
 Leave not a wreck of sublunary things.

7.

Him too may I attest for Scotland's praise,
 Who seized and wielded first
 The mightiest element
 That lies within the scope of man's controul;
 Of evil and of good,
 Prolific spring, and dimly yet discern'd
 The immeasurable results.
 The mariner no longer seeks
 Wings from the wind; creating now the power
 Wherewith he wins his way,
 Right on across the ocean-flood he steers
 Against opposing skies;
 And reaching now the inmost continent,
 Up rapid streams, innavigable else,
 Ascends with steady progress, self-propell'd.

8.

Nor hath the Sister kingdom borne
 In science and in arms
 Alone, her noble part;

There is an empire which survives
 The wreck of thrones, the overthrow of realms,
 The downfall, and decay, and death
 Of Nations. Such an empire in the mind
 Of intellectual man
 Rome yet maintains, and elder Greece, and such
 By indefeasible right
 Hath Britain made her own.
 How fair a part doth Caledonia claim
 In that fair conquest! Wheresoe'er
 The British tongue may spread,
 (A goodly tree, whose leaf
 No winter e'er shall nip;)
 Earthly immortals, there, her sons of fame,
 Will have their heritage.
 In eastern and in occidental Ind;
 The new antarctic world, where sable swans
 Glide upon waters, call'd by British names,
 And plough'd by British keels;
 In vast America through all its length
 And breadth, from Massachusetts's populous coast
 To Western Oregon;
 And from the southern gulph,
 Where the great river with his turbid flood
 Stains the green Ocean, to the polar sea.

9.

There nations yet unborn shall trace
 In Hume's perspicuous page,
 How Britain rose, and through what storms attain'd
 Her eminence of power.
 In other climates, youths and maidens there
 Shall learn from Thomson's verse in what attire
 The various seasons, bringing in their change
 Variety of good,
 Revisit their beloved English ground.
 There Beattie! in thy sweet and soothing strain
 Shall youthful poets read
 Their own emotions. There too, old and young,
 Gentle and simple, by Sir Walter's tales
 Spell-bound, shall feel Imaginary hopes and fears
 Strong as realities,
 And waking from the dream, regret its close.

10.

These Scotland are thy glories; and thy praise
 Is England's, even as her power
 And opulence of fame are thine.
 So hath our happy union made
 Each in the other's weal participant,
 Enriching, strengthening, glorifying both.

11.

O House of Stuart, to thy memory still
 For this best benefit
 Should British hearts in gratitude be bound!
 A deeper tragedy
 Than thine unhappy tale hath never fill'd
 The historic page, nor given
 Poet or moralist his mournful theme.
 O House severely tried,
 And in prosperity alone
 Found wanting, Time hath closed
 Thy tragic story now!
 Errors, and virtues fatally betrayed,

Magnanimous suffering, vice,
Weakness, and head-strong zeal, sincere, tho' blind,
Wrongs, calumnies, heart-wounds,
Religious resignation, earthly hopes,
Fears and affections, these have had their course,
And over them in peace
The all-ingulphing stream of years hath closed.
But this good work endures,
'Stabliſh'd and perfected by length of days,
The indissoluble union stands.

12.

Nor hath the sceptre from that line
Departed, though the name hath lost
Its regal honours. Trunk and root have fall'd:
A scion from the stock
Liveth and flourisheth. It is the Tree
Reneath whose sacred shade,
In majesty and peaceful power serene,
The Island Queen of Ocean hath her seat;
Whose branches far and near
Extend their sure protection; whose strong roots
Are with the Isle's foundations inter-knit;
Whose stately summit when the storm careers
Below, abides unmoved,
Safe in the sunshine and the peace of Heaven,
Kewick, 1822.

THE WARNING VOICE.

ODE I.

1.

TAKE up thy prophecy,
Thou dweller in the mountains, who hast nursed
Thy soul in solitude,
Holding communion with immortal minds,
Poets and sages of the days of old;
And with the sacred food
Of meditation and of lore divine
Hast fed thy heavenly part;
Take up thy monitory strain,
O son of song, a strain severe
Of warning and of woe!

2.

O Britain, O my Mother Isle,
Ocean's imperial Queen,
Thou glory of all lands!
Is there a curse upon thee, that thy sons
Would rush to ruin, drunk
With sin, and in infuriate folly blind?
Hath Hell enlarged itself,
And are the Fiends let loose
To work thine overthrow?

3.

For who is she
That on the many-headed Beast
Triumphantly enthroned,

Doth ride abroad in state,
The Book of her Enchantments in her hand?
Her robes are stain'd with blood,
And on her brazen front
Is written BLASPHEMY.

4.

Know ye not then the Harlot? know ye not
Her shameless forehead, her obdurate eye,
Her meretricious mien,
Her loose immodest garb with slaughter foul?
Your Fathers knew her; when delirious France,
Drunk with her witcheries,
Upon the desecrated altar set
The Sorceress, and with rites
Inhuman and accurs'd,
O'er all the groaning land
Perform'd her sacrifice.

5.

Your Fathers knew her! when the nations round
Receiv'd her maddening spell,
And call'd her Liberty,
And in that name proclaim'd
A jubilee for guilt;
When their blaspheming host defied high Heaven,
And wheresoe'er they went let havoc loose;
Your Fathers knew the Sorceress! They stood firm
And in that hour of trial faithful found,
They raised the Red Cross flag.

6.

They knew her; and they knew
That not in scenes of rapine and of blood,
In lawless riotry,
And wallowing with the multitude obscene,
Would Liberty be found!
Her in her form divine,
Her genuine form they knew;
For Britain was her home,
With Order and Religion there she dwelt;
It was her chosen seat,
Her own beloved Isle.
Think not that Liberty
From Order and Religion e'er will dwell
Apart; companions they
Of heavenly seed connate.

7.

Woe, woe for Britain, woe!
If that society divine,
By lewd and impious uproar driven,
Indignantly should leave
The land that in their presence hath been blest!
Woe, woe! for in her streets
Should grey-hair'd Polity
Be trampled under foot by ruffian force;
And Murder to the noon-day sky
Lift his red hands, as if no God were there!
War would lay waste the realm;
Devouring fire consume
Temples and Palaces;
Nor would the lowliest cot
Escape that indiscriminating storm,
When Heaven upon the guilty nation pour'd
The vials of its wrath.

8.

These are no doubtful ills !
The unerring voice of Time
Warns us that what hath been again shall be ;
And the broad beacon-flame
Of History, casts its light
Upon Futurity.

9.

Turn not thy face away,
Almighty ! from the realm
By thee so highly favoured, and so long.
Thou who in war hast been our shield and strength,
From famine who hast saved us, and hast bade
The Earthquake and the Pestilence go by,
Spare us, O Father ! save us from ourselves !
From insane Faction, who prepares the pit
In which itself would fall ;
From rabid Treason's rage, . .
The poor priest-ridden Papist's erring zeal, . .
The lurking Atheist's wiles, . .
The mad Blasphemer's venom, . . from our foes,
Our follies and our errors, and our sins,
Save us, O Father ! for thy mercy's sake,
Thou who ALONE canst save !

Kenwick, 1819.

ODE II.

1.

In a vision I was seized,
When the elements were hush'd
In the stillness that is felt
Ere the Storm goes abroad ;
Through the air I was borne away :
And in spirit I beheld
Where a City lay beneath,
Like a valley mapp'd below,
When seen from a mountain top.

2.

The night had closed around,
And o'er the sullen sky
Were the wide wings of darkness spread,
The City's myriad lamps
Shone mistily below,
Like stars in the bosom of a lake ;
And its murmurs arose
Incessant and deep,
Like the sound of the sea
Where it rakes on a stony shore.

3.

A voice from the darkness went forth,
" Son of Man, look below !
This is the City to be visited ;
For as a fountain
Casteth its waters,
So casteth she her wickedness abroad ! "
Mine eyes were opened then,
And the veil which conceals
The Invisible World was withdrawn.

4.

I look'd, and behold !
As the Patriarch, in his dream,
Saw the Angels to and fro
Pass from Heaven to Earth,
On their ministry of love ;
So saw I where a way
From that great City, led
To the black abyss of bale,
To the dolorous region of Death.

5.

Wide and beaten was the way,
And deep the descent
To the Adamantine Gates,
Which were thrown on their hinges back.
Wailing and Woe were within,
And the gleam of sulphurous fires,
In darkness and smoke involved.

6.

And through those open gates
The Fiends were swarming forth ;
Hastily, joyfully,
As to a jubilee,
The Spirits accurst were trooping up :
They fill'd the streets,
And they bore with them curses and plagues ;
And they scatter'd lies abroad,
Horror, obscenities,
Blasphemies, treasons,
And the seeds of strife and death.

7.

" Son of Man, look up ! " said the Voice.
I look'd and beheld
The way which Angels tread,
Seen like a pillar of light
That slants from a broken sky.
That heavenly way by clouds was closed,
Heavy, and thick, and dark, with thunder charged ;
And there a Spirit stood,
Who raised in menacing act his awful arm ;
He spak aloud and thrill'd
My inmost soul with fear.

8.

" Woe ! Woe !
Woe to the City where Faction reigns !
Woe to the Land where Sedition prevails !
Woe to the Nation whom Hell deceives !
Woe ! Woe !
They have Eyes, and they will not see !
They have Ears, and they will not hear !
They have Hearts, and they will not feel !
Woe to the People who fasten their eyes !
Woe to the People who deafen their ears !
Woe to the People who harden their hearts !
Woe ! Woe !
The Vials are charged ;
The measure is full ;
The wrath is ripe ; . .
Woe ! Woe !

9.

But from that City then, behold,
A gracious form arose;
Her snow-white wings upon the dusky air
Shone like the waves that glow
Around a midnight keel in liquid light.
Upward her supplicating arms were spread;
And as her face to heaven
In eloquent grief she raised,
Loose, like a Comet's fluent tresses, hung
Her heavenly hair dispersed.

10.

"Not yet, O Lord! not yet,
O merciful as just!
Not yet!" . . the Tutelary Angel cried;
"For I must plead with thee for this poor land,
Guilty, . . but still the seat
Of genuine piety, . .
The mother still of noble minds, . .
The nurse of high desires!
Not yet, O Lord, not yet,
Give thou thine anger way!
Thou who hast set thy Bow
Of Mercy in the clouds,
Not yet, O Lord, pour out
The Vials of thy wrath!"

11.

"Oh, for the sake
Of that religion pure and undefiled,
Here purchased by thy Martyrs' precious blood, . .
Mercy, Oh mercy, Lord!
For that well-order'd frame of equal laws
Time's goodliest monument,
O'er which thy guardian shield
So oft hath been extended heretofore, . .
Mercy, Oh mercy, Lord!
For the dear charities,
The household virtues, that in secret there,
Like sweetest violets, send their fragrance forth,
Mercy, Oh mercy, Lord!"

12.

"Oh wilt thou quench the light,
That should illuminate
The nations who in darkness sit,
And in the shadow of death? . .
Oh wilt thou stop the heart
Of intellectual life? . .
Wilt thou seal the eye of the world? . .

13.

"Not for the guilty few;
Nor for the erring multitude,
The ignorant many, wickedly misled, . .
Send thou thy vengeance down
Upon a land so long the dear abode
Of Freedom, Knowledge, Virtue, Faith, approved, . .
Thine own beloved land!
Oh let not Hell prevail
Against her past deserts, . .
Against her actual worth . .
Against her living hopes, . .
Against the Prayers that rise
From righteous hearts this hour!"

14.

"Plead with me, O ye Dead! whose sacred dust
Is laid in hope within her hallow'd soil,
Plead with me for your Country, suffering now
Beneath such loathsome plagues,
As ancient Egypt in her slime
And hot corruption bred,
Plead with me at this hour
All wise and upright Minds,
All honourable Hearts, . .
*For ye abhor the sins
Which, o'er the guilty land,
Have drawn this gather'd storm!
Plead with me Souls unborn,
Ye who are doomed upon this fateful spot
To pass your pilgrimage
Earth's noblest heritors,
Or children of a ruin'd realm, to shame
And degradation born, . .
(For this is on the issue of the hour!)
Plead with me, unborn Spirits! that the wrath Deserved, may pass away!"

15.

"Join in my supplication, Seas and Lands, . .
I call upon you all!
Thou, Europe, in whose cause,
Alone and undismay'd,
The generous nation strove;
For whose deliverance in the Spanish fields
Her noblest blood was pour'd
Profusely; and on that Brabantine plain,
(The proudest fight that e'er
By virtuous victory
Was hallowed to all time.)
Join, with me, Africa!
For here hath thy redemption had its birth; . .
Thou, India, who art blest
With peace and equity
Beneath her easy sway; . .
And thou, America, who owest
The large and inextinguishable debt
Of filial love! . . And ye,
Remote Antarctic Isles and Continent,
Where the glad tidings of the Gospel truth,
Her children are proclaiming faithfully;
Join with me now to wrest
The thunderbolt from that relenting arm! . .
Plead with me, Earth and Ocean, at this hour,
Thou, Ocean, for thy Queen,
And for thy benefactress, thou, O Earth!"

16.

The Angel ceased;
The vision fled;
The wind arose,
The clouds were rent,
They were drifted and scatter'd abroad;
And as I look'd, and saw
Where through the clear blue sky the silver Moon
Moved in her light serene,
A healing influence reach'd my heart,
And I felt in my soul
That the voice of the Angel was heard.

ODE

THE PORTRAIT OF BISHOP HEBER.

1.

Yes, . . such as these were Heber's lineaments ;
 Such his capacious front,
 His comprehensive eye,
 His open brow serene.
 Such was the gentle countenance which bore
 Of generous feeling, and of golden truth,
 Sure Nature's sterling impress ; never there
 Unruly passion left
 Its ominous marks infix'd,
 Nor the worse die of evil habit set
 An inward stain ingrain'd.
 Such were the lips whose salient playfulness
 Enliven'd peaceful hours of private life ;
 Whose eloquence
 Held congregations open-ear'd,
 As from the heart it flow'd, a living stream
 Of Christian wisdom, pure and undimmed.

2.

And what if there be those
 Who in the cabinet
 Of memory hold enshrined
 A livelier portraiture,
 And see in thought, as in their dreams,
 His actual image verily produced ;
 Yet shall this counterfeit convey
 To strangers, and preserve for after-time,
 All that could perish of him, . . all that else
 Even now had pass'd away :
 For he hath taken with the Living Dead
 His honourable place, . .
 Yea, with the Saints of God
 His holy habitation. Hearts, to which Through ages he shall speak,
 Will yearn towards him ; and they too, (for such
 Will be,) who gird their loins
 With truth to follow him,
 Having the breast-plate on of righteousness,
 The helmet of salvation, and the shield
 Of faith, . . they too will gaze
 Upon his effigy
 With reverential love.
 Till they shall grow familiar with its lines,
 And know him when they see his face in Heaven.

3.

Ten years have held their course
 Since last I look'd upon
 That living countenance,
 When on Llangedwin's terraces we paced
 Together, to and fro.
 Partaking there its hospitality,
 We with its honoured master spent,
 Well-pleased, the social hours ;
 His friend and mine, . . my earliest friend, whom I
 Have ever, through all changes, found the same,
 From boyhood to grey hairs,
 In goodness, and in worth and warmth of heart.
 Together then we traced

The grass-grown site, where armed feet once trod
 The threshold of Glendower's embattled hall ;
 Together sought Melangel's lonely Church,
 Saw the dark yews, majestic in decay,
 Which in their flourishing strength
 Cyvellloc might have seen ;
 Letter by letter traced the lines
 On Yorwerth's fabled tomb ;
 And curiously observed what vestiges,
 Mouldering and mutilate,
 Of Monacella's legend there are left,
 A tale humane, itself
 Well-nigh forgotten now :
 Together visited the ancient house
 Which from the hill-slope takes
 Its Cymric name euphonious ; there to view,
 Though drawn by some rude limner inexpert,
 The faded portrait of that lady fair,
 Beside whose corpse her husband watch'd,
 And with perverted faith,
 Preposterously placed,
 Thought, obstinate in hopeless hope, to see
 The beautiful dead, by miracle, revive.

4.

The sunny recollections of those days
 Full soon were overcast, when Heber went
 Where half this wide world's circle lay
 Between us interposed.
 A messenger of love he went,
 A true Evangelist ;
 Not for ambition, nor for gain,
 Nor of constraint, save such as duty lays
 Upon the disciplined heart,
 Took he the overseeing on himself,
 Of that wide flock dispersed,
 Which, till these latter times,
 Had there been left to stray
 Neglected all too long.
 For this great end devotedly he went,
 Forsaking friends and kin,
 His own loved paths of pleasantness and peace,
 Books, leisure, privacy,
 Prospects (and not remote), of all wherewith
 Authority could dignify desert ;
 And, dearer far to him,
 Pursuits that with the learned and the wise
 Should have assured his name its lasting place.

5.

Large, England, is the debt
 Thou owest to Heathendom ;
 To India most of all, where Providence,
 Giving thee thy dominion there in trust,
 Upholds its baseless strength.
 All seas have seen thy red-cross flag
 In war triumphantly display'd ;
 Late only hast thou set that standard up
 On pagan shores in peace !
 Yea, at this hour the cry of blood
 Riseth against thee, from beneath the wheels
 Of that seven-headed Idol's car accurst ;
 Against thee, from the widow's funeral pile
 The smoke of human sacrifice
 Ascends, even now, to Heaven !

6.

The debt shall be discharged ; the crying sin
Silenced ; the foul offence
For ever done away.

Thither our saintly Heber went,
In promise and in pledge
That England, from her guilty torpor roused,
Should zealously and wisely undertake
Her awful task assign'd :
Thither, devoted to the work, he went,
There spent his precious life,
There left his holy dust.

7.

How beautiful are the feet of him
That bringeth good tidings,
That publisheth peace,
That bringeth good tidings of good,
That proclaimeth salvation for men !
Where'er the Christian Patriarch went,
Honour and reverence heralded his way,
And blessings followed him.
The Malabar, the Moor, the Cingalese,
Though unillumin'd by faith,
Yet not the less admired
The virtue that they saw.
The European soldier, there so long
Of needful and consolatory rites
Injuriouly deprived,
Felt, at his presence, the neglected seed
Of early piety
Refresh'd, as with a quickening dew from Heaven.
Native believers wept for thankfulness,
When on their heads he laid his hallowing hands ;
And, if the Saints in bliss
Be cognizant of aught that passeth here,
It was a joy for Schwartz
To look from Paradise that hour
Upon his earthly flock.

8.

Rum boweth down,
Creeshna and Seeva stoop ;
The Arabian Moon must wane to wax no more :
And Ishmael's seed redeem'd,
And Esau's . . . to their brotherhood,
And to their better birthright then restored,
Shall within Israel's covenant be brought.
Drop down, ye Heavens, from above !
Ye skies, pour righteousness !
Open, thou Earth, and let Salvation be brought forth !
And sing ye, O ye Heavens, and shout, O Earth,
With all thy hills and vales,
Thy mountains and thy woods,
Break forth into a song, a jubilant song,
For by Himself the Lord hath sworn
That every tongue to Him shall swear,
To Him that every knee shall bow.

9.

Take comfort, then, my soul !
Thy latter days on earth,
Though few, shall not be evil, by this hope
Supported, and enlighten'd on the way.
O Reginald, one course,
Our studies, and our thoughts,
Our aspirations held,
Wherein, but mostly in this blessed hope,
We had a bond of union, closely knit
In spirit, though in this world's wilderness
Apart our lots were cast.
Seldom we met ; but I knew well
That whatsoe'er this never-idle hand
Sent forth would find with thee
Benign acceptance, to its full desert.
For thou wert of that audience, . . . fit, though few,
For whom I am content
To live laborious days,
Assured that after years will ratify
Their honourable award.

10.

Hadst thou revisited thy native land,
Mortality and Time,
And Change, must needs have made
Our meeting mournful. Happy he
Who to his rest is borne
In sure and certain hope,
Before the hand of age
Hath chill'd his faculties,
Or sorrow reach'd him in his heart of hearts !
Most happy if he leave in his good name
A light for those who follow him,
And in his works a living seed
Of good, prolific still.

11.

Yes, to the Christian, to the Heathen world,
Heber, thou art not dead, . . . thou canst not die !
Nor can I think of thee as lost.
A little portion of this little isle
At first divided us ; then half the globe :
The same earth held us still ; but when,
O Reginald, wert thou so near as now !
'Tis but the falling of a wither'd leaf, . . .
The breaking of a shell, . . .
The rending of a veil !
Oh when that leaf shall fall, . . .
That shell be burst, . . . that veil be rent, . . . may then
My spirit be with thine !

Who fix one's name for public sale beneath
 A set of features slanderously unlike,
 Are the worst libellers. Against the wrong
 Which they inflict Time hath no remedy.
 Injuries there are which Time redresseth best,
 Being more sure in judgement, though perhaps
 Slower in process even than the court
 Where justice, tortoise-footed and mole-eyed,
 Sleeps undisturb'd, fann'd by the lulling wings
 Of harpies at their prey. We soon live down
 Evil or good report, if undeserv'd.
 Let then the dogs of Faction bark and bay,
 Its bloodhounds, savaged by a cross of wolf,
 Its full-bred kennel from the Blatant-beast;
 And from my lady's gay veganda, let
 Her pamp'r'd lap-dog with his fetid breath
 In bold bray'd join, and snap and growl,
 With petulant consequentialness elate,
 There in his imbecility at once
 Ridiculous and safe; though all give cry,
 Whiggery's sleek spaniels, and its lurchers lean,
 Its poodles by unlucky training marr'd,
 Mongrel and cur and bob-tail, let them yelp
 Till weariness and hoarseness shall at length
 Silence the noisy pack; meantime be sure
 I will not stoop for stones to cast among them.
 The fourmarts and the skunks may be secure
 In their own scent; and for that viler swarm,
 The vermin of the press, both those that skip,
 And those that creep and crawl, I do not catch
 And pin them for exposure on the page,
 Their filth is their defence.

But I appeal
 Against the limner's and the graver's wrong;
 Their evil works survive them. Bilderdijk,
 Whom I am privileged to call my friend,
 Suffering by graphic libels in likewise,
 Gave his wrath vent in verse. Would I could give
 The life and spirit of his vigorous Dutch,
 As his dear consort hath transfused my strains
 Into her native speech; and made them known
 On Rhine and Yssel, and rich Amstel's banks;
 And wheresoe'er the voice of Vondel still
 Is heard, and still Antonides and Hooft
 Are living agencies; and Father Cats,
 The household poet, teacheth in his songs
 The love of all things lovely, all things pure:
 Best poet, who delights the cheerful mind
 Of childhood, stores with moral strength the heart
 Of youth, with wisdom maketh mid-life rich,
 And fills with quiet tears the eyes of age.

Hear then in English rhyme how Bilderdijk
 Describes his wicked portraits, one by one.

"A madman who from Bedlam hath broke loose;
 An honest fellow of the numskull race;
 And pappyer-headed still, a very goose
 Staring with eyes agast and vacant face;
 A Frenchman who would mirthfully display
 On some poor idiot his malicious wit;
 And lastly, one who, train'd up in the way
 Of worldly craft, hath not forsaken it,
 But hath served Mammon with his whole intent,
 A thing of Nature's worst materials made,
 Low-minded, stupid, base and insolent.

I, . . . I, . . . A Poet, . . . have been thus pourtray'd.

Can ye believe that my true effigy

Among these vile varieties is found?

What thought, or line, or word, hath fallen from me

In all my numerous works whereon to ground

The opprobrious notion? Safely I may smile

At these, acknowledging no likeness here.

But worse is yet to come; so, soft awhile!

For now in potter's earth must I appear,
 And in such workmanship, that, sooth to say,

Humanity disowns the imitation,

And the dolt image is not worth its clay.

Then comes there one who will to admiration

In plastic wax my perfect face present;

And what of his performance comes at last?

Folly itself in every lineament!

Its consequential features overcast

With the coxcombical and shallow laugh

Of one who would, for condescension, hide,

Yet in his best behaviour, can but half

Suppress the scornfulness of empty pride."

"And who is Bilderdijk?" methinks thou sayest,

A ready question; yet which, trust me, Allan,
 Would not be ask'd, had not the curse that came
 From Babel, clipt the wings of Poetry.

Napoleon ask'd him once with cold fix'd look,

"Art thou then in the world of letters known?"

"I have deserved to be," the Hollander

Replied, meeting that proud imperial look

With calm and proper confidence, and eye

As little wont to turn away abash'd

Before a mortal presence. He is one

Who hath received upon his constant breast

The sharpest arrows of adversity;

Whom not the clamours of the multitude,

Demanding in their madness and their might

Iniquitous things, could shake in his firm mind;

Nor the strong hand of instant tyranny,

From the straight path of duty turn aside.

But who in public troubles, in the wreck

Of his own fortunes, in proscription, exile,

Want, obloquy, ingratitude, neglect,

And what severer trials Providence

Sometimes inflicteth, chastening whom it loves,

In all, through all, and over all, hath borne

An equal heart, as resolute toward

The world, as humbly and religiously

Beneath his heavenly Father's rod resign'd.

Right-minded, happy-minded, righteous man,

True lover of his country and his kind;

In knowledge, and in inexhaustive stores

Of native genius rich; philosopher,

Poet, and sage. The language of a State

Inferior in illustrious deeds to none,

But circumscribed by narrow bounds, and now

Sinking in irrecoverable decline,

Hath pent within its sphere a name wherewith

Europe should else have rung from side to side.

Such, Allan, is the Hollander to whom

Esteem and admiration have attach'd

My soul, not less than pre-consent of mind,

And gratitude for benefits, when being

A stranger, sick, and in a foreign land,

He took me like a brother to his house,

And ministered to me, and made a time

Which had been wearisome and careful else,
So pleasurable, that in my kalendar
There are no whiter days. "Twill be a joy
For us to meet in Heaven, though we should look Upon each other's earthly face no more.
.. This is this world's complexion! "cheerful
thoughts

Bring sad thoughts to the mind," and these again
Give place to calm content, and steadfast hope,
And happy faith assured. . . Return we now,
With such transition as our daily life
Imposes in its wholesome discipline,
To a lighter strain; and from the gallery
Of the Dutch Poet's mis-resemblances
Pass into mine; where I shall show thee, Allan,
Such an array of villainous visages,
That if among them all there were but one
Which as a likeness could be proved upon me,
It were enough to make me in mere shame
Take up an alias, and forswear myself.

Whom have we first? A dainty gentleman,
His sleepy eyes half-closed, and countenance
To no expression stronger than might suit
A simper, capable of being moved:
Sawney and sentimental; with an air
So lack-thought and so lackadaisical,
You might suppose the volume in his hand
Must needs be Zimmermann on Solitude.

Then comes a jovial landlord, who hath made it
Part of his trade to be the shocing horn
For his commercial customers. God Bacchus
Hath not a thirstier votary. Many a pipe
Of Porto's vintage hath contributed
To give his cheeks that deep carmine engrain'd,
And many a runlet of right Nantes, I ween,
Hath suffer'd percolation through that trunk,
Leaving behind it in the boozy eyes
A swoln and red suffusion, glazed and dim.

Our next is in the evangelical line,
A leaden-visaged specimen; demure,
Because he hath put on his Sunday's face;
Dull by formation, by complexion sad,
By bile, opinions, and dyspepsy sour.
One of the sons of Jack. . . I know not which,
For Jack hath a most numerous progeny. . .
Made up for Mr. Colburn's Magazine
This pleasant composite; a bust supplied
The features; look, expression, character. . .
Are of the artist's fancy and free grace.
Such was that fellow's birth and parentage,
The rascal proved prolific; one of his breed,
By Docteur Pichot introduced in France,
Passes for Monsieur Sooté; and another. . .
An uglier miscreant too. . . the brothers Schumann
And their most cruel copper-scratcher Zschoch,
From Zwickau sent abroad through Germany.
I wish the Schumen and the copper-scratcher
No worse misfortune for their recompence,
Than to encounter such a cut-throat face
In the Black Forest or the Odenwald.

And now is there a third derivative
From Mr. Colburn's composite, which late
The Arch-Pirate Galignani hath prefix'd,

A spurious portrait to a faithless life,
And bearing lyingly the libell'd name
Of Lawrence, impudently there insculpt.

The bust that was the innocent forefather
To all this base, abominable brood,
I blame not, Allan. 'Twas the work of Smith,
A modest, mild, ingenious man, and errs,
Where erring, only because over-true,
Too close a likeness for similitude;
Fixing to every part and lineament
Its separate character, and missing thus
That which results from all.

Sir Smug comes next;

Allan, I own Sir Smug! I recognize
That visage with its dull sobriety;
I see it duly as the day returns,
When at the looking-glass with lather'd chin
And razor-weapon'd hand I sit, the face
Composed and apprehensively intent
Upon the necessary operation
About to be perform'd, with touch, alas,
Not always confident of hair-breadth skill.
Even in such sober sadness and constrain'd
Composure cold, the faithful Painter's eye
Had fix'd me like a spell, and I could feel
My features stiffen as he glanced upon them.
And yet he was a man whom I loved dearly,
My fellow-traveller, my familiar friend,
My household guest. But when he look'd upon me,
Anxious to exercise his excellent art,
The countenance he knew so thoroughly
Was gone, and in its stead there sat Sir Smug.

Under the graver's hand, Sir Smug became
Sir Smouch. . . a son of Abraham. Now albeit,
For rather would I trace my lineage thence
Than with the oldest line of Peers or Kings
Claim consanguinity, that cast of features
Would ill accord with me, who in all forms
Of pork, baked, roasted, toasted, boil'd or broil'd,
Fresh, salted, pickled, seasoned, moist or dry,
Whether ham, bacon, sausage, souse or brawn,
Leg, bladebone, baldrib, griskin, chine, or chop,
Profess myself a genuine Philopig.

It was, however, as a Jew whose portion
Had fallen unto him in a goodly land
Of loans, of omnium, and of three per cents,
That Messrs. Percy of the Anecdote-firm
Presented me unto their customers.
Poor Smouch endured a worse judaization
Under another hand! In this next stage
He is on trial at the Old Bailey, charged
With dealing in base coin. That he is guilty
No Judge or Jury could have half a doubt
When they saw the culprit's face; and he himself,
As you may plainly see, is comforted
By thinking he has just contrived to keep
Out of rope's reach, and will come off this time
For transportation.

Stand thou forth for trial,
Now, William Darton, of the Society
Of Friends called Quakers; thou who in 4th month
Of the year 24, on Holborn Hill,
At No. 58., didst wilfully,
Falsely, and knowing it was falsely done,

Publish upon a card, as Robert Southey's,
A face which might be just as like Tom Fool's,
Or John, or Richard Any-body-else's!
What had I done to thee, thou William Darton,
That thou shouldst for the lucre of base gain,
Yea, for the sake of filthy fourpences,
Palm on my countrymen that face for mine?
O William Darton, let the Yearly Meeting
Deal with thee for that falseness! All the rest
Are traceable; Smug's Hebrew family;
The German who might properly adorn
A gibbet or a wheel, and Monsieur Soote,
Sons of Fitzbust the Evangelical; . . .
I recognize all these unlikenesses,
Spurious abominations though they be,
Each filiated on some original;
But thou, Friend Darton, and . . . observe me, man,
Only in courtesy, and quasi Quaker,
I call thee Friend! . . . hadst no original;
No likeness or unlikeness, silhouette,
Outline, or plaster, representing me,
Whereon to form thy misrepresentation.
If I guess rightly at the pedigree
Of thy bad groatsworth, thou didst get a barber
To personate my injured Laureateship;
An advertising barber, . . . one who keeps
A bear, and when he puts to death poor Bruin
Sells his carcass fresh as from the carcass cut,
For bono-vocatus, the price per pound
Twelve shillings and no more. From such a barber,
O unfriend Darton! was that portrait made
I think, or peradventure from his block.

Next comes a minion worthy to be set
In a wooden frame; and here I might invoke
Avenging Nemesis, if I did not feel
Just now God Cynthus pluck me by the ear.
But, Allan, in what shape God Cynthus comes,
And wherefore he admonisheth me thus,
Nor thou nor I will tell the world; hereafter
The commentators, my Malones and Reids,
May if they can. For in my gallery
Though there remaineth undescribed good store,
Yet "of enough enough, and now no more,"
(As honest old George Gascoigne said of yore,)
Save only, a last couplet to express
That I am always truly yours,

OP EENE VERZAMELING VAN MIJNE AFBEELDINGEN.

"In pejus vultu proponi cœvus usquam."—Horat.

EEN Wildeman, het dolhuis uitgevlogen :²
Een goede Hals, maar zonder ziel of kracht :³
Een Sukelaar, die met verwonderde oogen
Om alles met verbeten weêrzin lacht :⁴

¹ The main subject of this epistle having been suggested by a poem of Bilderdijk's, part only of which I have incorporated, in a compressed and very inadequate translation, I annex here the original, in justice to my deceased friend, —

Een Franschmans lach op halfverwongen kaken,
Die geest beduift op 't aanzicht van een bloed :⁵
En, om 't getal dier fraaiheen vol te maken,
Eens Financiers verwaande domme snoet.⁶
En dat moet ik, dat moet een Dichter wezen!
Geloof gy 't oolt, die deze monsters ziet?
Geeft, wat ik schreef, één trek daar van te lezen
Zoo zeg gerust : "Hy kent zich zelven niet."

Maar zacht een poos! . . . Hoe langer hoe verkeerder!
Men vormt my na uit Pottebakkers aard ;⁷
Doch de Adamskop beschaamt den kunstbootseerder,
En 't zelloos ding is zelfs den klei niet waard. . .
Nu komt er een, die zal u 't echte leven
In lenig wasch met volle lijk'nis geven ;
En deze held, wat spreidt hy ons ten toon?
De knorrigheid in eigen hoofdpersoon ;
Met zulk een lach van meêlij' op de lippen,
Als 't zelfgevoel eens Trotzaarts af laat glippen
Verachting spreidt op al wat hem omringt,
En half in spijt, zich tot vernedring dwingt.⁸

Mijn God ! is 't waar, zijn dít mijn wezenstrekken,
En is 't mijn hart, dat ze aan my-zelf ontdekken ?
Of maaldet gy, wier kunst my dus herteelt,
Ur eigen aart onwetend in mijn beeld ?
Het moog zoo zijn. De Rubens en Van Dijken ;
Zijn lang voorby, die zielen deên gelijken :
Wier ogg hun ziel een heldre spiegel was,
En geest en hart in elken vezel las.
Niet, dagen lang, op 't uiterlijk bleef staren,
Maar d'eersten blik in 't harte kon bewaren,
Dien blik getrouw in klei of verfen bracht,
En spreken deed tot Tijd-en-Nageslacht.

Die troffen, ja ! die wisten af te malen
Wat oog en mond, wat elke zenuw sprak ;
Wier borst, doorstroomd van hooger idealen,
Een hand bewoog die 't voorwerp noort, ontbrak.
Doch, wat maalt gy ? . . . 't Misnoegen van 't vervelen
Voor Rust der ziel in zalig zelfgenot ;
Met Ongeduld om 't haatlijk tijdonstelen ;
En-Bitterheid, die met uw wanklap spot
Wen ge, om den mond iets vriendelijks af te prachen,
(Of slaaprigheid of mijmrende ernst verstoort,
En door uw boert het aanzicht tergt tot lachen
Met zotterny, slechts wreevlig aangehoord.

Maar HODGES ! gy, die uit vervlogen eeuwen
De Schilderkunst te rug riept op 't panceel,
Gern mond mismaakt door 't zielverteerd geeuwen,
Maar kunstgesprek vereenigt aan 't penceel !
Zoo 't Noodlot wil dat zich in later dagen
Mijn naam bewaar in 't onwijs Vaderland,
En eenig beeld mijn leest moet overdragen,
Het zij geschetst door uw begaafde hand.
In uw saeel, bevredigd met my-zelven,
Ontdek ik 't hart dat lof noch laster acht ;
En, die daaruit mijn ziel weet op te delven
Miskent in my noch inborst noch geslacht.⁹

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

Παιγματος ακριβής η ελευθερία, και νομος τις, το δεξιον εν παντι.
Lucian, Quomodo Hist. Scribenda.

PREFACE TO THE FOURTH EDITION.

Is the continuation of the Arabian Tales, the Don-daniel is mentioned; a seminary for evil magicians, under the roots of the sea. From this seed the present romance has grown. Let me not be supposed to prefer the rhythm in which it is written, abstractedly considered, to the regular blank verse; the noblest measure, in my judgement, of which our admirable language is capable. For the following Poem I have preferred it, because it suits the varied subject: it is the Arabesque ornament of an Arabian tale.

The dramatic sketches of Dr. Sayers, a volume which no lover of poetry will recollect without pleasure, induced me, when a young versifier, to practise in this rhythm. I felt that while it gave the poet a wider range of expression, it satisfied the ear of the reader. It were easy to make a parade of learning, by enumerating the various feet which it admits: it is only needful to observe that no two lines are employed in sequence which can be read into one. Two six-syllable lines, it will perhaps be answered, compose an Alexandrine: the truth is, that the Alexandrine, when harmonious, is composed of two six-syllable lines.

One advantage this metre assuredly possesses, — the dullest reader cannot distort it into discord: he may read it prosaically, but its flow and fall will still be perceptible. Verse is not enough favoured by the English reader: perhaps this is owing to the obtrusiveness, the regular Jew's harp twing-twang, of what has been foolishly called heroic measure. I do not wish the improvisatore's tune; — but something that denotes the sense of harmony, something like the accent of feeling, — like the tone which every poet necessarily gives to poetry

Centra, October, 1800.

¹ Henry More had a similar picture in his mind when he wrote of,

"Vast plains with lowly cottages forlorn,
 Rounded about with the low-wavering sky."

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

THE FIRST BOOK.

"... Worse and worse, young Orphans, be thy payne,
 If thou due vengeance doe forbear,
 Till guiltie blood her guerdon do obtayne."
Fairy Queen, B. ii. Can. 1.

1.

How beautiful is night!
 A dewy freshness fills the silken air;
 No mist obscures, nor cloud, nor speck, nor stain,
 Breaks the serene of heaven;
 In full-orb'd glory yonder Moon divine
 Rolls through the dark blue depths.
 Beneath her steady ray
 The desert-circle spreads,
 Like the round ocean, girdled with the sky.¹
 How beautiful is night!

2.

Who at this untimely hour
 Wanders o'er the desert sands?
 No station is in view,
 Nor palm-grove, islanded amid the waste.
 The mother and her child,
 The widow'd mother and the fatherless boy,
 They at this untimely hour
 Wander o'er the desert sands.

3.

Alas! the setting sun
 Saw Zelnah² in her bliss,
 Hodeirah's wife beloved.
 Alas! the wife beloved,
 The fruitful mother late,
 Whom when the daughters of Arabia named,
 They wish'd their lot like hers,
 She wanders o'er the desert sands
 A wretched widow now;
 The fruitful mother of so fair a race,
 With only one preserved,
 She wanders o'er the wilderness.

² It may be worth mentioning, that, according to Pietro della Valle, this is the name of which the Latins have made Zenobia.

4.
No tear relieved the burthen of her heart;
Stunn'd with the heavy woe, she felt like one
Half-waken'd from a midnight dream of blood.

But sometimes when the boy
Would wet her hand with tears,
And, looking up to her fix'd countenance,
Sob out the name of Mother! then she groan'd.
At length collecting, Zeinab turn'd her eyes
To heaven, and praised the Lord;
"He gave, he takes away!"
The pious sufferer cried,
"The Lord our God is good!"

5.
"Good is He!" quoth the boy;
"Why are my brethren and my sisters slain?
Why is my father kill'd?
Did ever we neglect our prayers,
Or ever lift a hand unclean to Heaven?
Did ever stranger from our tent
Unwelcomed turn away?
Mother, He is not good!"

6.
Then Zeinab beat her breast in agony,
"O God, forgive the child!
He knows not what he says;
Thou know'st I did not teach him thoughts like these;
O Prophet, pardon him!"

7.
She had not wept till that assuaging prayer, . .
The fountains of her grief were open'd then,
And tears relieved her heart.
She rais'd her swimming eyes to Heaven,
"Allah, thy will be done!
Beneath the dispensations of that will
I groan, but murmur not.
A day will come, when all things that are dark
Will be made clear; . . then shall I know, O Lord!
Why in thy mercy thou hast stricken me;
Then see and understand what now
My heart believes and feels."

8.
Young Thalaba in silence heard reproof;
His brow in manly frowns was knit,
With manly thoughts his heart was full.
"Tell me who slew my father?" cried the boy.
Zeinab replied and said,
"I knew not that there lived thy father's foe.
The blessings of the poor for him
Went daily up to Heaven;

¹ "The Lord gave, and the Lord taketh away; blessed be the name of the Lord." — Job, i. 21.

I have placed a Scripture phrase in the mouth of a Mahomedan; but it is a saying of Job, and there can be no impropriety in making a modern Arab speak like an ancient one. Designation is particularly inculcated by Mahomed, and of all his precepts it is that which his followers have best observed; it is even the vice of the East. It had been easy to have made Zeinab speak from the Koran, if the same language of the Koran could be remembered by the few who have access through its dull tautology. I thought it better to ex-

9.
"But I will hunt him through the world!"
Young Thalaba exclaim'd.
"Already I can bend my father's bow;
Soon will my arm have strength
To drive the arrow-feathers to his heart."

10.
Zeinab replied, "O Thalaba, my child,
Thou lookest on to distant days,
And we are in the desert, far from men!"

11.
Not till that moment her afflicted heart
Had leisure for the thought.
She cast her eyes around,
Alas! no tents were there
Beside the bending sands,
No palm-tree rose to spot the wilderness;
The dark blue sky closed round,
And rested like a dome
Upon the circling waste.
She cast her eyes around,
Famine and Thirst were there;
And then the wretched Mother bow'd her head,
And wept upon her child.

12.
A sudden cry of wonder
From Thalaba aroused her;
She rais'd her head, and saw
Where high in air a stately palace rose.
Amid a grove embower'd
Stood the prodigious pile;
Trees of such ancient majesty
Tower'd not on Yemen's happy hills,
Nor crown'd the lofty brow of Lebanon:
Fabric so vast, so lavishly enrich'd,
For Idol, or for Tyrant, never yet
Raised the slave race of man,
In Rome, nor in the elder Babylon,
Nor old Persepolis,
Nor where the family of Greece
Hymn'd Eleutherian Jove.

Here with white splendour floods the silver wall.
Less wondrous pile and less magnificent
Sennamar built at Hirah¹, though his art
Seal'd with one stone the ample edifice,
And made its colours, like the serpent's skin,

14.

They enter'd, and through aromatic paths
Wondering they went along.
At length, upon a mossy bank,
Beneath a tall mimosa's shade,
Which o'er him bent its living canopy,
They saw a man reclined.
Young he appear'd, for on his cheek there shone
The morning glow of health,
And the brown beard curl'd close around his chin.
He slept, but at the sound
Of coming feet awaking, fix'd his eyes
In wonder, on the wanderer and her child.
"Forgive us," Zeinab cried,
"Distress hath made us bold.
Relieve the widow and the fatherless!
Blessed are they who succour the distress;
For them hath God appointed Paradise."

15.

He heard, and he look'd up to heaven,
And tears ran down his cheeks:
"It is a human voice!
I thank thee, O my God! . . .
How many an age hath pass'd
Since the sweet sounds have visited my ear!
I thank thee, O my God,
It is a human voice!"

16.

To Zeinab turning then, he said,
"O mortal, who art thou,

Whose gifted eyes have pierced
The shadow of concealment that hath wrapt
These bowers, so many an age,
From eye of mortal man?
For countless years have pass'd,
And never foot of man
The bowers of Irem trod, . . .
Save only I, a miserable wretch
From Heaven and Earth shut out!"

17.

Fearless, and scarce surprised,
For grief in Zeinab's soul
All other feebler feelings overpower'd,
She answer'd, "Yesterday
I was a wife beloved,
The fruitful mother of a numerous race.
I am a widow now,
Of all my offspring this alone is left.
Praise to the Lord our God,

18.

Then said the stranger, "Not by Heaven unseen,
Nor in unguided wanderings, hast thou reach'd
This secret place, be sure!
Nor for light purpose is the veil,
That from the Universe has long shut out
These ancient bowers, withdrawn.
Hear thou my words, O mortal, in thine heart
Treasure what I shall tell;
And when amid the world
Thou shalt emerge again,
Repeat the warning tale.
Why have the fathers suffer'd, but to make
The children wisely safe?"

common upon Oriental buildings. At Boghar in Bactria our old traveller Jenkinson* saw "many houses, temples, and monuments of stone, sumptuously builded and gilt."

In Pegu "they consume about their Varelly or idol houses great store of leaf-gold, for that they overlay all the tops of the houses with gold, and some of them are covered with gold from the top to the foot; in covering whereof there is a great store of gold spent, for that every ten years they new overlay them with gold, from the top to the foot, so that with this vanitie they spend great abundance of golde. For every ten years the rain doth consume the gold from these houses." — Cæsar Frederick, in Hakluyt.

A waste of ornament and labour characterises all the works of the Orientalists. I have seen illuminated Persian manuscripts that must each have been the toil of many years, every page painted, not with representations of life and manners, but usually like the curves and lines of a Turkey carpet, conveying no idea whatever, as absurd to the eye as nonsense-verses to the ear. The little of their literature that has reached us is equally worthless. Our barbarian scholars have called Ferdusi the Oriental Homer. Mr. Champion has published a specimen of his poem; the translation is said to be bad and certainly must be unfaithful, for it is in rhyme; but the vilest copy of a picture at least represents the subject and the composition. To make this liad of the East, as they have sacrilegiously styled it, a good poem, would be realizing the dreams of alchemy, and transmuting lead into gold.

The Arabian Tales certainly abound with genius; they have lost their metaphorical rubbish in passing through the filter of a French translation.

An African colony had been settled in the north of Ireland long before the arrival of the Neimheids. It is recorded, that Neimheidh had employed four of their artificers to erect for him two sumptuous palaces, which were so highly finished, that, jealous lest they might construct others on the same, or perhaps a grander plan, he had them privately made away with, the day after they had completed their work. — O'Dalloran's History of Ireland.

² The tribe of Ad were descended from Ad, the son of Aus or Uz, the son of Irem, the son of Sham, the son of Noah.

Alas! in the days of my youth,
The hum of mankind
Was heard in yon wilderness waste;
O'er all the winding sands!
The tents of Ad were pitch'd;
Happy Al-Ahkâf then,
For many and brave were her sons,
Her daughters were many and fair.

20.

"My name was Aswad then
Alas! alas! how strange
The sound so long unheard!
Of noble race I came,
One of the wealthy of the earth my sire.
An hundred horses in my father's stall,
Stood ready for his will;
Numerous his robes of silk;
The number of his camels was not known.
These were my heritage,
O God! thy gifts were these;

who, after the confusion of tongues, settled in Al-Ahkâf, or the Winding Sands, in the province of Hadramaut, where his posterity greatly multiplied. Their first King was Shedad, the son of Ad, of whom the eastern writers deliver many fabulous things, particularly that he finished the magnificent city his father had begun; wherein he built a fine palace, adorned with delicious gardens, to embellish which he spared neither cost nor labour, proposing thereby to create in his subjects a superstitious veneration of himself as a god. This garden or paradise was called the garden of Irem, and is mentioned in the Koran, and often alluded to by the Oriental writers. The city, they tell us, is still standing in the deserts of Aden, being preserved by Providence as a monument of divine justice, though it be invisible, unless very rarely, when God permits it to be seen: a favour one Colabah pretended to have received in the reign of the Khalif Moawiyah, who sending for him to know the truth of the matter, Colabah related his whole adventure: that, as he was seeking a camel he had lost, he found himself on a sudden at the gates of this city, and entering it, saw not one inhabitant; at which being terrified, he stayed no longer than to take with him some fine stones, which he showed the Khalif. — See.

The descendants of Ad in process of time falling from the worship of the true God into idolatry, God sent the prophet Houd (who is generally agreed to be Heber) to preach the unity of this essence, and reclaim them. Houd preached for many years to this people without effect, till God at last was weary of waiting for their repentance. The first punishment which he inflicted was a famine of three years' continuance, during all which time the heavens were closed upon them. This, with the evils which it caused, destroyed a great part of this people, who were then the richest and most powerful of all in Arabia.

The Adites seeing themselves reduced to this extremity, and receiving no succour from their false gods, resolved to make a pilgrimage to a place in the province of Heglaz, where at present Mecca is situated. There was then a hillock of red sand there, around which a great concourse of different people might always be seen; and all these nations, the faithful as well as the unfaithful, believed that by visiting this spot with devotion, they should obtain from God whatever they petitioned for, respecting the wants and necessities of life.

The Adites having then resolved to undertake this religious journey, chose seventy men, at whose head they appointed Mortadh and Kail, the two most considerable personages of the country, to perform this duty in the name of

But better had it been for Aswad's soul
Had he ask'd alms on earth
And begg'd the crumbs which from his table fell,
So he had known thy Word.

21.

"Boy, who hast reach'd my solitude,
Fear the Lord in the days of thy youth!
My knee was never taught
To bend before my God;
My voice was never taught
To shape one holy prayer.
We worshipp'd Idols, wood and stone,
The work of our own foolish hands,
We worshipp'd in our foolishness.
Vainly the Prophet's voice
Its frequent warning raised,
'REPENT AND BE FORGIVEN!'.
We mock'd the messenger of God,
We mock'd the Lord, long-suffering, slow to wrath.

the whole nation, and by this means procure rain from Heaven, without which their country must be ruined. The deputies departed, and were hospitably received by Moawiyah, who at that time reigned in the province of Heglaz. They explained to him the occasion of their journey, and demanded leave to proceed and perform their devotions at the Red Hillock, that they might procure rain.

Mortadh, who was the wisest of this company, and who had been converted by the prophet Houd, often remonstrated with his associates, that it was useless to take this journey for the purpose of praying at this chosen spot, unless they had previously adopted the truths which the Prophet preached, and seriously repented of their unbelief. For how, said he, can you hope that God will shed upon us the abundant showers of his mercy, if we refuse to hear the voice of him whom he hath sent to instruct us?

Kail, who was one of the most obstinate in error, and consequently of the Prophet's worst enemies, hearing the discourses of his colleague, requested King Moawiyah to detain Mortadh prisoner, whilst he and the remainder of his companions proceeded to make their prayers upon the Hillock. Moawiyah consented, and, detaining Mortadh captive, permitted the others to pursue their journey, and accomplish their vow.

Kail, now the sole chief of the deputation, having arrived at the place, prayed thus: "Lord, give to the people of Ad such rains as it shall please thee." And he had scarcely finished when there appeared three clouds in the sky, one white, one red, the third black. At the same time these words were heard to proceed from Heaven: "Choose which of the three thou wilt." Kail chose the black, which he imagined the fullest, and most abundant in water, of which they were in extreme want. After having chosen, he immediately quitted the place, and took the road to his own country, congratulating himself on the happy success of his pilgrimage.

As soon as Kail arrived in the valley of Magaith, a part of the territory of the Adites, he informed his countrymen of the favourable answer he had received, and of the cloud which was soon to water all their lands. The senseless people all came out of their houses to receive it; but this cloud, which was big with the divine vengeance, produced only a wind, most cold and most violent, which the Arabs call Sarsar; it continued to blow for seven days and seven nights, and exterminated all the unbelievers of the country, leaving only the prophet Houd alive, and those who had heard him and turned to the faith. — D'Herbelot.

Al-Ahkâf signifies the Winding Sands.

"A mighty work the pride of Shedad plann'd,
Here in the wilderness to form
A Garden more surpassing fair
Than that before whose gate
The lightning of the Cherub's fiery sword
Waves wide to bar access,
Since Adam, the transgressor, thence was driven.
Here, too, would Shedad build
A kingly pile sublime,
The palace of his pride.
For this exhausted mines
Supplied their golden store;
For this the central caverns gave their gems;
For this the woodman's axe
Open'd the cedar forest to the sun:
The silkworm of the East
Spun her sepulchral egg;
The hunter Afri
Provok'd the danger of the Elephant's rage;
The Ethiope, keen of scent,
Detects the ebony,¹
That deep-inearth'd, and hating light,
A leafless tree and barren of all fruit,
With darkness feeds its boughs of raven grain.
Such were the treasures lavish'd in you pile;
Ages have pass'd away,
And never mortal eye
Gazed on their vanity.

23.

"The Garden, . . . copious springs
Blest that delightful spot,
And every flower was planted there
That makes the gale of evening sweet.
He spake, and bade the full-grown forest rise,
His own creation; should the King
Wait for slow Nature's work?
All trees that bend with luscious fruit,
Or wave with feathery boughs,
Or point their spiring heads to heaven,

¹ "I have heard from a certain Cyprian botanist, that the Ebony does not produce either leaves or fruit, and that it is never seen exposed to the sun: that its roots are indeed under the earth, which the Ethiopians dig out; and that there are men among them skilled in finding the place of its concealment."—Pausanias, translated by Taylor.

² The Adites worshipp'd four idols, Saklah the dispenser of rain, Hatedah the protector of travellers, Razekah the giver of food, and Salemah the preserver in sickness.—D'Herbelot, Sale.

³ Mecca was thus called. Mahommed destroyed the other superstitions of the Arabs, but he was obliged to adopt their old and rooted veneration for the Well and the Black Stone, and transfer to Mecca the respect and reverence which he had designed for Jerusalem.

"Mecca is situated in a barren place (about one day's journey from the Red Sea) in a valley, or rather in the midst of many little hills. The town is surrounded for several miles with many thousands of little hills, which are very near one to the other. I have been on the top of some of them, near Mecca, where I could see some miles about, but yet was not able to see the farthest of the hills. They are all stony-rock, and blackish, and pretty near of a bigness, appearing at a distance like cocks of hay, but all pointing towards Mecca. Some of them are half a mile in circumference, &c., but all near of one height. The people here

Hither, uprooted with their native soil,
The labour and the pain of multitudes, . .
Mature in beauty, bore them.
Here, frequent in the walks
The marble statue stood
Of heroes and of chiefs.
The trees and flowers remain,
By Nature's care perpetuate and self-sown.
The marble statues long have lost all trace
Of heroes and of chiefs;
Huge shapeless stones they lie,
O'ergrown with many a flower.

24.

"The work of pride went on;
Often the Prophet's voice
Denounced impending woe:
We mock'd at the words of the Seer,
We mock'd at the wrath of the Lord.
A long-continued drought first troubled us;
Three years no cloud had form'd,
Three years no rain had fallen;
The wholesome herb was dry,
The corn matured not for the food of man,
The wells and fountains fall'd.
O hard of heart, in whom the punishment
Awoke no sense of guilt!
Headstrong to ruin, obstinately blind,
We to our Idols still applied for aid;²
Sakia we invoked for rain,
We called on Razekah for food;
They did not hear our prayers, they could not hear!
No cloud appear'd in Heaven,
No nightly dews came down.

have an odd and foolish sort of tradition concerning them, viz., that when Abraham went about building the Beit-Allah, God by his wonderful providence did so order it, that every mountain in the world should contribute something to the building thereof; and accordingly every one did send its proportion. Though there is a mountain near Algiers, which is called Corra Dog, i. e. Black Mountain; and the reason of its blackness, they say, is, because it did not send any part of itself towards building the Temple at Mecca. Between these hills is good and plain travelling, though they stand near one to another."—A faithful Account of the Religion and Manners of the Mahomedans, by Joseph Pitts of Exon.

"Adam after his fall was placed upon the mountain of Iassam, in the eastern region of the globe. He was banished to a place, since called Djidda, which was the first of mothers (the celebrated port of Gedda, on the coast of Arabia). The Serpent was cast into the most barren desert of the East, and the spiritual tempter, who seduced him, was exiled to the coasts of Ebieth. This fall of our first parent was followed by the infidelity and sedition of all the spirits, Djinn, who were spread over the surface of the earth. Then God sent against them the great Azazel, who with a legion of angels chased them from the continent, and dispersed them among the isles, and along the different coasts of the sea. Some time after, Adam, conducted by the Spirit of God, tra-

 We sent to call on God ;
 Ah fools ! unthinking that from all the earth
 The soul ascends to him.
 We sent to call on God ;
 Ah fools ! to think the Lord
 Would hear their prayers abroad,
 Who made no prayers at home !

26.

" Meantime the work of pride went on,
 And still before our Idols, wood and stone,
 We bow'd the impious knee.
 ' Turn, men of Ad, and call upon the Lord,'
 The Prophet loud exclaim'd ;
 ' Turn men of Ad, and look to Heaven,
 And fly the wrath to come.' —
 We mock'd the Prophet's words ; . .
 ' Now dost thou dream, old man,
 Or art thou drunk with wine ?
 Future woe and wrath to come,
 Still thy prudent voice forebodes ;
 When it comes will we believe,
 Till it comes will we go on
 In the way our fathers went.

velled into Arabia, and advanced as far as Mecca. His footsteps diffused on all sides abundance and fertility. His figure was enchanting, his stature lofty, his complexion brown, his hair thick, long, and curled ; and he then wore a beard and mustachios. After a separation of a hundred years, he rejoined Eve on Mount Arafath, near Mecca ; an event which gave that mount the name of Arafath, or Arafat, that is, the Place of Remembrance. This favour of the Eternal Deity was accompanied by another not less striking. By his orders the angels took a tent, Khaymr, from Paradise, and pitched it on the very spot where afterwards the Kaaba was erected. This is the most sacred of the tabernacles, and the first temple which was consecrated to the worship of the Eternal Deity by the first of men, and by all his posterity. Seth was the founder of the sacred Kaaba ; in the same place where the angels had pitched the celestial tent, he erected a stone edifice, which he consecrated to the worship of the Eternal Deity." — D'Ohsson.

" Bowed down by the weight of years, Adam had reached the limit of his earthly existence. At that moment he longed eagerly for the fruits of Paradise. A legion of angels attended upon his latest sigh, and, by the command of the Eternal Being, received his soul. He died on Friday the 7th of April, Nissan, at the age of nine hundred and thirty years. The angels washed and purified his body ; which was the origin of funeral ablutions. The archangel Michael wrapped it in a sheet, with perfumes and aromatics ; and the archangel Gabriel, discharging the duties of the Imameth, performed, at the head of the whole legion of angels, and of the whole family of this first of the patriarchs, the Salath ul-Djenaze ; which gave birth to funeral prayers. The body of Adam was deposited at Gharaat-Kass (the grotto of treasure), upon the mountain Djebel el-Koudryss, which overlooks Mecca. His decease, at his death, amounted to forty thousand souls." — D'Ohsson.

" When Noah entered the ark, he took with him, by the command of the Eternal, the body of Adam, inclosed in a stone coffin. After the waters had abated, his first care was to deposit it in the same grotto from whence it had been removed." — D'Ohsson.

¹ Some of the Pagan Arabs, when they died, had their Camels tied by their Sepulchre, and so left without meat or drink to perish, and accompany them to the other world,

Now are thy words from God ?
 Or dost thou dream, old man,
 Or art thou drunk with wine ?

27.

" So spake the stubborn race,
 The unbelieving ones.
 I too, of stubborn unbelieving heart,
 Heard him, and heeded not.
 It chanced, my father went the way of man,
 He perish'd in his sins.
 The funeral rites were duly paid,
 We bound a Camel to his grave,
 And left it there to die,
 So if the resurrection came¹
 Together they might rise.
 I pass'd my father's grave,
 I heard the Camel moan.
 She was his favourite beast,
 One who had carried me in infancy,
 The first that by myself I learn'd to mount.
 Her limbs were lean with famine, and her eyes
 Ghastly and sunk and dim.
 She knew me as I pass'd,
 She stared me in the face ;²

lest they should be obliged at the Resurrection to go on foot, which was accounted very scandalous.

" All affirmed that the pious, when they come forth from their sepulchres, shall find ready prepared for them white-winged Camels with saddles of gold. Here are some footsteps of the doctrine of the ancient Arabians." — Saif.

² This line is in one of the most beautiful passages of our old Ballads, so full of beauty. I have never seen the ballad in print, and with some trouble have procured only an imperfect copy from memory. It is necessary to insert some of the preceding stanzas. The title is,

" OLD POULTER'S MARE.

" At length old age came on her,
 And she grew faint and poor ;
 Her master he fell out with her,
 And turn'd her out of door,
 Saying, if thou wilt not labour,
 I prithre go thy way, —
 And never let me see thy face
 Until thy dying day.

" These words she took unkind,
 And on her way she went,
 For to fulfil her master's will Always was her intent ;
 The hills were very high,
 The valleys very bare,
 The summer it was hot and dry, —
 It starved Old Poulter's Mare.

" Old Poulter he grew sorrowful,
 And said to his kinsman Will,
 I'd have thee go and seek the Mare
 O'er valley and o'er hill ;
 Go, go, go, go, says Poulter,
 And make haste back again,
 For until thou hast found the Mare,
 In grief I shall remain.

" Away went Will so willingly,
 And all day long he sought ;
 Till when it grew towards the night,
 He in his mind bethought,

My heart was touch'd, . . had it been human else ?
I thought that none was near, and cut her bonds,
And drove her forth to liberty and life.
The Prophet Houd had seen ;
He lifted up his voice,
' Blessed art thou, young man,
Blessed art thou, O Aswad, for the deed !
In the Day of Visitation,
In the fearful hour of Judgement,
God will remember thee ! '

28.

" The Day of Visitation was at hand,
The fearful hour of Judgement hastened on.
Lo ! Shedad's mighty pile complete,

He would go home and rest him,
And come again to-morrow,
For if he could not find the Mare,
His heart would break with sorrow.

" He went a little farther
And turn'd his head aside,
And just by godman Whitfield's gate,
Oh, there the Mare he spied.
He ask'd her how she did,
She sturd him in the face,
Then down she laid her head again —
She was in wretched case."

¹ Concerning the Pyramids, " I shall put down," says Greaves, " that which is contended by the Arabian writers to be the most probable relation, as is reported by Ibn Abd Alh skm, whose words out of the Arabic are these: — ' The greatest part of chronologers agree, that he which built the Pyramids was Saurid Ibn Sallouk, King of Egypt, who lived three hundred years before the flood. The occasion of this was, because he saw, in his sleep, that the whole earth was turned over with the inhabitants of it, the men lying upon their faces, and the stars falling down and striking one another, with a terrible noise, and being troubled, he conceived it. After this he saw the fixed stars falling to the earth, in the similitude of white fowl, and they snatched up men, carrying them between two great mountains; and these mountains closed upon them, and the shining stars were made dark. Awaking with great fear, he assembles the chief priests of all the provinces of Egypt, an hundred and thirty priests; the chief of them was called Aclimum. Relating the whole matter to them, they took the altitude of the stars, and making their prognostication, foretold of a deluge. The King said, Will it come to our country? they answered, Yea, and will destroy it. And there remained a certain number of years for to come, and he commanded in the mean space to build the Pyramids, and a vault to be made, into which the river Nilus entering, should run into the countries of the west, and into the land Al-Said. And he filled them with *treasures, and with strange things, and with riches and treasures, and the like. He engraved in them all things that were told him by wise men, as also all profound sciences, the names of alakakirs†, the uses and hurts of them; the science of astrology and of arithmetic, and of geometry, and of physic. All this may be interpreted by him that knows their characters and language. After he had given order for this building, they cut out vast columns

* That which the Arabians commonly mean by treasures, are certain sigills, or amulets, made under such and such an aspect, or configuration of the stars and planets, with several characters: a cordly inscribed.

† Alakakir, amongst other significations, is the name of a precious stone; and therefore in Abul-da it is joined with pearl, a ruby. I imagine it here to signify some magical spell, which, it may be, was engraved on this stone.

The Palace of his pride.
Would ye behold its wonders, enter in !
I have no heart to visit it.
Time hath not harm'd the eternal monument ;
Time is not here, nor days, nor months, nor years,
An everlasting now of solitude ! . .

" Ye must have heard their fame ;
Or likely ye have seen
The mighty Pyramids, . .
For sure those awful piles have overlived
The feeble generations of mankind.
What though unmoved they bore the deluge weight, !
Survivors of the ruined world ?

and wonderful stones. They fetcht many stones from the Ethiopians, and made with these the foundation of the three Pyramids, fastening them together with lead and iron. They built the gates of them forty cubits under ground, and they made the height of the Pyramids one hundred royal cubits, which are fifty of ours in these times; he also made each side of them an hundred royal cubits. The beginning of this building was in a fortunate horoscope. After that he had finished it, he covered it with coloured satten from the top to the bottom; and he appointed a solemn festival, at which were present all the inhabitants of his kingdom. Then he built in the western Pyramid thirty treasures, filled with store of riches, and utensils, and with signatures made of precious stones, and with instruments of iron, and vessels of earth, and with arms that rust not, and with glass which might be broken, and yet not broken, and with several kinds of alakakirs, single and double, and with deadly poisons, and with other things besides. He made also in the east Pyramid divers celestial spheres and stars, and what they severally operate in their aspects, and the perfumes which are to be used to them, and the books which treat of these matters. He also put in the coloured Pyramid the commentaries of the Priests in chests of black marble, and with every Priest a book, in which were the wonders of his profession, and of his actions, and of his nature, and what was done in his time, and what is, and what shall be, from the beginning of time to the end of it. He placed in every Pyramid a treasurer. The treasurer of the westerly Pyramid was a statue of marble stone, standing upright with a lance, and upon his head a serpent, wreathed. He that came near it, and stood still, the serpent bit him on one side, and wreathing round about his throat and killing him, returned to his place. He made the treasurer of the east Pyramid, an idol of black agate, his eyes open and shining, sitting upon a throne with a lance; when any looked upon him, he heard of one side of him a voice, which took away his sense, so that he fell prostrate upon his face, and ceased not till he died. He made the treasurer of the coloured Pyramid a statue of stone, called Abut, sitting; he which looked towards it was drawn by the statue, till he stuck to it, and could not be separated from it, till such time as he died. The Copites write in their books, that there is an inscription engraven upon them, the exposition of which, in Arabic, is this, " I KING SAURID built the Pyramids in such and such a time, and finished them in six years; he that comes after me, and says that he is equal to me, let him destroy them in six hundred years; and yet it is known, that it is easier to pluck down, than to build up: I also covered them, when I had finished them, with satten; and let him cover them with matta." After that ALMAMON the Calif entered Egypt, and saw the Pyramids, he desired to know what was within, and therefore would have them opened. They told him it could not possibly be done. He replied, I will have it certainly done. And that hole was opened for him, which stands open to this day, with fire and vinegar. Two smiths prepared and sharp-

"Here emerald columns o'er the marble courts
Shed their green rays, as when amid a shower
The sun shines loveliest on the vernal corn.
Here Shedad bade the sapphire floor be laid.

used the iron and engines, which they forced in, and there was a great expense in the opening of it. The thickness of the walls was found to be twenty cubits; and when they came to the end of the wall, behind the place they had digged, there was an ewer of green emerald: in it were a thousand dinars very weighty, every dinar was an ounce of our ounces; they wondered at it, but knew not the meaning of it. Then ALAMON said, Cast up the account how much hath been spent in making the entrance; they cast it up, and lo it was the same sum which they found; it neither exceeded nor was defective. Within they found a square well, in the square of it there were doors, every door opened into a house (or vault), in which there were dead bodies wrapped up in linen. They found towards the top of the Pyramid, a chamber, in which there was a hollow stone: in it was a statue of stone like a man, and within it a man, upon whom was a breast-plate of gold set with jewels; upon his breast was a sword of invaluable price, and at his head a carbuncle of the bigness of an egg, shining like the light of the day; and upon him were characters written with a pen, no man knows what they signify. After ALAMON had opened it, men entered into it for many years, and descended by the slippery passage which is in it; and some of them came out safe, and others died."—Greaves's Pyramidographia.

1 The Carbuncle is to be found in most of the subterranean palaces of Romance. I have no where seen so circumstantial an account of its wonderful properties as in a passage of Thuanus, quoted by Stephanus in his Notes to Saxo-Græmæticus.

"Whilst the King was at Bologna, a stone, wonderful in its species and nature, was brought to him from the East Indies, by a man unknown, who appeared by his manners to be a Barbarian. It sparkled as though all burning with an incredible splendour, flashing radiance, and shooting on every side its beams, it filled the surrounding air to a great distance with a light scarcely by any eyes endurable. In this also it was wonderful, that being most impatient of the earth, if it was confined, it would force its way, and immediately fly aloft; neither could it be contained by any art of man, in a narrow place, but appeared only to love those of ample extent. It was of the utmost purity, stained by no soil nor spot. Certain shape it had none, for its figure was inconstant and momentarily changing, and though at a distance it was beautiful to the eye, it would not suffer itself to be handled with impunity, but hurt those who obstinately struggled with it, as many persons before many spectators experienced. If by chance any part of it was broken off, for it was not very hard, it became nothing less."—Thuanus, lib. viii.

* Since this note was written, I have found in Fejlo the history of this stone. It was invented as a riddle or allegory of fire, by a French physician, called Fernello by the Spanish author, and published by him in a Diálogo, De abditis rerum causis. From hence it was extracted, and sent as a trick to Mizalzo, another physician, who had written a credulous work, De Arcanis Naturæ; and a copy of this letter came into the hands of Thuanus. He discovered the deception too late, for a second edition of his history had been previously published at Frankfort.

Here self-suspended hangs in air,
As its pure substance loathed material touch,
The living carbuncle;¹
Sun of the lofty dome,
Darkness hath no dominion o'er its beams;
Intense it glows, an ever-flowing spring
Of radiance, like the day-flood in its source.

Yet innocent it grew;²

In the Mirror of Stones, Carbuncles are said to be male and female. The females throw out their brightness: the stars appear burning within the males.

Like many other jewels, the Carbuncle was supposed to be an animal substance, formed in the serpent. The serpent's ingenious method of preserving it from the song of the charmer, is related in an after-note. Book ix.

² "Adam," says a Moorish author, "after having eaten the forbidden fruit, sought to hide himself under the shade of the trees that form the bowers of Paradise: the Gold and Silver trees refused their shade to the father of the human race. God asked them, why they did so? 'Because,' replied the Trees, 'Adam has transgressed against your commandment. 'Ye have done well,' answered the Creator; 'and that your fidelity may be rewarded, 'tis my decree that men shall hereafter become your slaves, and that in search of you they shall dig into the very bowels of the earth.'"—Chémier.

"The black lead of Borrodale is described as lying in the mine in the form of a tree; it hath a body or root, and veins or branches fly from it in different directions: the root or body is the finest black lead, and the branches at the extremities the worse the further they fly. The veins or branches sometimes shoot out to the surface of the ground."—Hutchinson's Hist. of Cumberland.

"They have found by experience, that the vein of gold is a living tree, and that the same by all wales that it spreadeth and springeth from the roots by the soft pores and passages of the earth, putteth forth branches, even unto the uppermost parts of the earth, and ceaseth not until it discover itself unto the open air: at which time it sheweth forth the certain beautiful colours in the steele of floures, round stones of golden earth in the steele of fruites; and thinne plates instead of leaves. They say that the roots of the golden tree extendeth to the center of the earth, and there taketh nourishment of increase: for the deeper that they dig, they finde the trunks thereof to be so much the greater, as farre as they may followe it, for abundance of water springing in the mountains.² (Of the branches of this tree, they finde some as small as a thread, and others as bigge as a man's finger, according to the largenes or straightnesse of the riftes and cleftes. They have sometimes chanced upon whole caves, sustained and borne up as it were with golden pillers, and this in the wales by the which the branches ascende: the which being filled with the substance of the trunk creeping from beneath, the branche maketh itself wale by whiche it male pass out. It is oftentimes divided, by encountering with some kinde of harde stone; yet is it in other cleftes nourished by the exhalations and virtue of the roots."—Pietro Martire.

"Metals," says Herrera, (5. 3. 15.) "are like plants hidden in the bowels of the earth, with their trunk and boughs, which are the veins; for it appears in a certain manner, that like plants they go on growing, not because they have any inward life, but because they are produced in the entrails of the earth by the virtue of the sun and of the planets; and so they go on increasing. And as metals are thus, as it were, plants hidden in the earth; so plants are animals fixed to one place, sus-

Here tower'd the palm, a silver trunk,
The fine gold net-work¹ growing out
Loose from its rugged boughs.
Tall as the cedar of the mountain, here
Rose the gold branches, hung with emerald leaves,
Blossom'd with pearls, and rich with ruby fruit.

"O Ad! my country! evil was the day
That thy unhappy sons
Crouch'd at this Nimrod's throne,²
And placed him on the pedestal of power,
And laid their liberties beneath his feet,
Robbing their children of the heritage
Their fathers handed down.
What was to him the squander'd wealth?
What was to him the burthen of the land,
The lavish'd misery?
He did but speak his will,
And, like the blasting Siroc of the sands,
The ruin of the royal voice
Found its way every-where.
I marvel not that he, whose power
No earthly law, no human feeling curb'd,
Mock'd at the living God!

"And now the King's command went forth
Among the people, bidding old and young,
Husband and wife, the master and the slave,
All the collected multitudes of Ad,

That he might see his people, they behold
Their King's magnificence and power.

tained by the aliment which Nature has provided for them at their birth: And to animals, as they have a more perfect being, a sense and knowledge hath been given, to go about and seek their aliment. So that barren earth is the support of metal, and fertile earth of plants, and plants of animals: the less perfect serving the more perfect."

¹ "A great number of stringy fibres seem to stretch out from the boughs of the Palm, on each side, which cross one another in such a manner that they take out from between the boughs a sort of bark like close net-work, and ~~the~~ they spin out with the hand, and with it make cords of all sizes, which are mostly used in Egypt. They also make of it a sort of brush for clothes"—Pococke.

² Shedad was the first King of the Adites. I have ornamented his palace less profusely than the Oriental writers who describe it. In the notes to the Bakar-Danush is the following account of its magnificence from the Tafat al Mujalis.

"A pleasant and elevated spot being fixed upon, Shuddaad dispatched an hundred chiefs to collect skilful artists and workmen from all countries. He also commanded the monarchs of Syria and Ormus to send him all their jewels and precious stones. Forty camel-loads of gold, silver, and jewels, were daily used in the building, which contained a thousand spacious quadrangles of many thousand rooms. In the areas were artificial trees of gold and silver, whose leaves were emeralds, and fruits clusters of pearls and jewels. The

The day of festival arrived;
Hither they came, the old man and the boy,
Husband and wife, the master and the slave,
Hither they came. From yonder high tower top,
The loftiest of the Palace, Shedad look'd
Down on his tribe: their tents on yonder sands
Rose like the countless billows of the sea;
Their tread and voices like the ocean roar,
One deep confusion of tumultuous sounds.
They saw their King's magnificence, beheld
His palace sparkling like the Angel domes
Of Paradise, his Garden like the bowers
Of early Eden, and they shouted out,
'Great is the King! a God upon the earth!'

34.

"Intoxicate with joy and pride,
He heard their blasphemies;
And in his wantonness of heart he bade
The Prophet Houd be brought;
And o'er the marble courts,
And o'er the gorgeous rooms
Glittering with gems and gold,
He led the Man of God.
'Is not this a stately pile?'
Cried the monarch in his joy.
'Hath ever eye beheld,
Hath ever thought conceived,
Place more magnificent?
Houd, they say that Heaven imparteth
Words of wisdom to thy lips;
Look at the riches round,
And value them aright,
If so thy wisdom can.'

35.

"The Prophet heard his vaunt,
And, with an awful smile, he answer'd him,
'O Shedad! only in the hour of death'
We learn to value things like these aright.'

ground was strowed with ambergris, musk, and saffron. Between every two of the artificial trees was planted one of delicious fruit. This romantic abode took up five hundred years in the completion. When finished, Shuddaad marched to view it; and, when arrived near, divided two hundred thousand youthful slaves, whom he had brought with him from Damascus, into four detachments, which were stationed in cantonments prepared for their reception on each side of the garden, towards which he proceeded with his favourite courtiers. Suddenly was heard in the air a voice like thunder, and Shuddaad, looking up, beheld a personage of majestic figure and stern aspect, who said, 'I am the Angel of Death, commissioned to seize thy impure soul.' Shuddaad exclaimed, 'Give me leisure to enter the garden;' and was descending from his horse, when the seizer of life snatched away his impure spirit, and he fell dead upon the ground. At the same time lightnings flashed, and destroyed the whole army of the infidel; and the rose-garden of Irim became concealed from the sight of man."

³ Lamai relates, that a great Monarch, whom ~~he~~ does not name, having erected a superb Palace, wished to show it to every man of talents and taste in the city: he therefore invited them to a banquet, and after the repast was finished, asked them if they knew any building more magnificent, and more perfect, in the architecture, in the ornaments, and in the furniture. All the guests contented themselves with expressing their admiration, and lavishing praise, except one,

36.

"Hast thou a fault to find
In all thine eyes have seen?"
With unadmonished pride, the King exclaim'd.
'Yea!' said the Man of God;
'The walls are weak, the building ill secure.
Azrael can enter in!
The Sarsar can pierce through,
The Icy Wind of Death.'

37.

"I was beside the Monarch when he spake;
Gentle the Prophet spake,
But in his eye there dwelt
A sorrow that disturb'd me while I gazed.
The countenance of Shedad fell,
And anger sat upon his paler lips.
He to the high tower-top the Prophet led,
And pointed to the multitude,
And as again they shouted out,
'Great is the King! a God upon the Earth!'
With dark and threatening smile to Houd he turn'd,
'Say they aright, O Prophet? is the King
Great upon earth, a God-among mankind?'
The Prophet answer'd not;
Over that infinite multitude
He roll'd his ominous eyes,
And tears which could not be suppress gush'd forth.

38.

"Sudden an uproar rose,
A cry of joy below;
'The messenger is come!
Kaïl from Mecca comes,
He brings the boon obtain'd!'

39.

"Forth as we went we saw where overhead
There hung a deep black cloud,
To which the multitude
With joyful eyes look'd up,
And blest the coming rain.
The Messenger address the King
And told his tale of joy.

40.

"To Mecca I repair'd,
By the Red Hillock knelt,
And call'd on God for rain.
My prayer ascended, and was heard;
Three clouds appear'd in heaven,

who led a retired and austere life, and was one of those persons whom the Arabians call Zahed.

This man spoke very freely to the Prince, and said to him, "I find a great defect in this building; it is, that the foundation is not good, nor the walls sufficiently strong, so that Azrael can enter on every side, and the Sarsar can easily pass through." And when they showed him the walls of the Palace ornamented with azure and gold, of which the marvelous workmanship surpassed in costliness the richness of the materials, he replied, "There is still a great inconvenience here; it is, that we can never estimate these works well till we are laid backwards." Signifying by these words, that we never understand these things rightly till we are upon our death-bed, when we discover their vanity. — D'Herbelot.

One white, and like the flying cloud of noon,
One red, as it had drunk the evening beams,
One black and heavy with its load of rain.

A voice went forth from Heaven,
'Choose, Kaïl, of the three!'
I thank'd the gracious Power,
And chose the black cloud, heavy with its wealth.
'Right! right!' a thousand tongues exclaim'd,
And all was merriment and joy.

41.

"Then stood the Prophet up, and cried aloud,
'Woe, woe to Irem! woe to Ad!
Death is gone up into her palaces!
Woe! woe! a day of guilt and punishment;
A day of desolation!' — As he spake,
His large eye roll'd in horror, and so deep
His tone, it seem'd some Spirit from within Breathed through his moveless lips the unearthly voice.'

42.

"All looks were turn'd to him. 'O Ad!' he cried,
'Dear native land, by all remembrances
Of childhood, by all joys of manhood dear;
O Vale of many Waters; morn and night
My age must groan for you, and to the grave
Go down in sorrow. Thou wilt give thy fruits,
But who shall gather them? thy grapes will ripen,
But who shall tread the wine-press? Fly the wrath,
Ye who would live and save your souls alive!
For strong is his right hand that bends the Bow,
The Arrows that he shoots are sharp,
And err not from their aim!'

43.

"With that a faithful few
Prest through the throng to join him. Then arose
Mockery and mirth; 'Go, bald head!' and they mix'd
Curses with laughter. He set forth, yet once
Look'd back: . . . his eye fell on me, and he call'd
'Aswad! . . . it startled me . . . it terrified; . . .
'Aswad!' again he call'd, . . . and I almost
Had follow'd him. . . O moment fled too soon!
O moment irrecoverably lost!
The shouts of mockery made a coward of me;
He went, and I remain'd, in fear of Man!

44.

"He went, and darker grew
The deepening cloud above.

1 "Las horrendas palabras parecian salir por una trompa resonante, y que los yertos labios no movian."

Lupeccio Leonardo.

2 "Death is come up into our windows, and entered into our palaces, to cut off the children from without, and the young men from the streets." — Jeremiah, ix. 21.

"The Trees shall give fruit, and who shall gather them? The Grapes shall ripen, and who shall tread them? for all places shall be desolate of men." — 2 Esdras, xvi. 25.

"For strong is his right hand that bends the Bow, his arrows that he shooteth are sharp, and shall not miss when they begin to be shot into the ends of the world." — 2 Esdras, xvi. 13.

At length it open'd, and . . . O God ! O God !
There were no waters there !
There fell no kindly rain !
The Sarsar from its womb went forth,
The Icy Wind of Death.

45.

" They fell around me ; thousands fell around,
The King and all his people fell ;
All ! all ! they perish'd all !
I . . . only I . . . was left.
There came a Voice to me and said,
' In the Day of Visitation,
In the fearful hour of Judgement,
God hath remember'd thee.'

46.

" When from an agony of prayer I rose,
And from the scene of death
Attempted to go forth,
The way was open, I could see
No barrier to my steps.
But round these bowers the Arm of God
Had drawn a mighty chain,
A barrier that no human force might break.
Twice I essay'd to pass ;
With that a Voice was heard,
' O Aswad, be content, and bless the Lord !
One charitable deed hath saved
Thy soul from utter death.
O Aswad, sinful man !
When by long penitence
Thou feel'st thy soul prepared
Breathe up the wish to die,
And Azrael comes in answer to thy prayer.'

47.

" A miserable man
From Earth and Heaven shut out,
I heard the dreadful Voice.
I look'd around my prison-place,
The bodies of the dead were there,
Where'er I look'd they lay,
They moulder'd, moulder'd here, . . .
Their very bones have crumbled into dust,
So many years have pass'd !
So many weary ages have gone by !
And still I linger here,
Still groaning with the burthen of my sins,
Not yet have dared to breathe
The prayer to be released.

48.

" Oh ! who can tell the unspeakable misery
Of solitude like this !
No sound hath ever reach'd my ear
Save of the passing wind,
The fountain's everlasting flow,
The forest in the gale,
The pattering of the shower,

Sounds dead and mournful all.
No bird hath ever clos'd her wing
Upon these solitary bowers,
No insect sweetly buzz'd amid these groves,
From all things that have life,
Save only me, conceal'd.
This Tree alone, that o'er my head
Hangs down its hospitable boughs,
And bends its whispering leaves
As though to welcome me,
Seems to partake of life ;¹
I love it as my friend, my only friend !

49.

" I know not for what ages I have dragg'd
This miserable life ;
How often I have seen
These ancient trees renew'd ;
What countless generations of mankind
Have risen and fallen asleep,
And I remain the same !
My garment hath not waxen old,
And the sole of my shoe is not worn.

50.

" Sinner that I have been,
I dare not offer up a prayer to die.
O merciful Lord God ! . . .
But when it is thy will,
But when I have atoned
For mine iniquities,
And sufferings have made pure
My soul with sin defiled,
Release me in thine own good time ; . . .
I will not cease to praise thee, O my God ! "

51.

Silence ensued awhile ;
Then Zeinab answer'd him ;
" Blessed art thou, O Aswad ! for the Lord,
Who saved thy soul from Hell,
Will call thee to him in his own good time.
And would that when my soul
Breathed up the wish to die,
Azrael might visit me !
Then would I follow where my babes are gone,
And join Hodeirah now ! "

52.

She ceased ; and the rushing of wings
Was heard in the stillness of night,
And Azrael, the Death-Angel, stood before them.
His countenance was dark,
Solemn, but not severe,
It awed, but struck no terror to the heart.
" Zeinab, thy wish is heard !
Aswad, thine hour is come ! "
They fell upon the ground and blest the voice ;
And Azrael from his sword
Let fall the drops of bitterness and death.²

¹ " There are several trees or shrubs of the genus Mimosa. One of these trees drops its branches whenever any person approaches it, seeming as if it saluted those who retire under its shade. This mute hospitality has so endeared this tree to the Arabians, that the injuring or cutting of it down is strictly prohibited."—Niebuhr.

² " The Angel of Death," say the Rabbis, "holdeth his sword in his hand at the bed's head, having on the end thereof three drops of gall ; the sick man spying this deadly Angel, openeth his mouth with fear, and then those drops fall in, of which one killeth him, the second maketh him pale, the third rotteth and purifieth."—Purchas.

Possibly the expression—to taste the bitterness of death, may refer to this.

53.

"Me too! me too!" young Thalaba exclaim'd,
As wild with grief he kiss'd
His Mother's livid hand,
His Mother's livid lips;
"O Angel! take me too!"

54.

"Son of Hodeirah!" the Death-Angel said,
"It is not yet the hour.
Son of Hodeirah, thou art chosen forth
To do the will of Heaven;
To avenge thy father's death,
The murder of thy race;
To work the mightiest enterprize
That mortal man hath wrought.
Live! and REMEMBER DESTINY
HATH MARK'D THEE FROM MANKIND!"

55.

He ceased, and he was gone.
Young Thalaba look'd round, . .
The Palace and the groves were seen no more,
He stood amid the Wilderness, alone.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

THE SECOND BOOK.

"Sint licet expertes vitæ sensusque, capessunt Jussa tamen superum venti."

Mambruni Constantinus.

1.

Nor in the desert,
Son of Hodeirah,
Thou art abandon'd!
The co-existent fire,
Which in the Dens of Darkness burnt for thee,
Burns yet, and yet shall burn.

2.

In the Domdaniel caverns,
Under the Roots of the Ocean,
Met the Masters of the Spell.
Before them in the vault,
Blazing unfuel'd from its floor of rock,
Ten magic flames arose.
"Burn, mystic fires;" Abdaldar cried;
"Burn while Hodeirah's dreaded race exist.
This is the appointed hour,
The hour that shall secure these dens of night."

The manner how the Teraphim were made is fondly conceiv'd thus among the Rabbles. They killed a man that was a first-born son, and wrung off his head, and seasoned it with salt and spices, and wrote, upon a plate of gold, the name of 3.

"Dim they burn!" exclaim'd Lobaba;
"Dim they burn, and now they waver!
Okba lifts the arm of death:
They waver, . . they go out!"

4.

"Curse on his hasty hand!"
Khawla exclaim'd in wrath,
The woman-fiend exclaim'd,
"Curse on his hasty hand, the fool hath fall'd Eight only are gone out."

5.

A Teraph stood against the cavern-side,¹
A new-born infant's head,
Which Khawla at its hour of birth had seized,
And from the shoulders wrung.
It stood upon a plate of gold,
An unclean Spirit's name inscrib'd beneath.
The cheeks were deathly dark,
Dark the dead skin upon the hairless skull;
The lips were blueey pale;
Only the eyes had life,
They gleam'd with demon light.

6.

"Tell me!" quoth Khawla, "is the Fire gone out
That threatens the Masters of the Spell?"
The dead lips moved and spake,
"The Fire still burns that threatens
The Masters of the Spell."

7.

"Curse on thee, Okba!" Khawla cried,
As to the den the Sorcerer came;
He bore the dagger in his hand,
Red from the murder of Hodeirah's race.
"Behold those unextinguish'd flames!
The Fire still burns that threatens
The Masters of the Spell!
Okba, wert thou weak of heart?
Okba, wert thou blind of eye?
Thy fate and ours were on the lot,
And we believ'd the lying Stars,
That said thy hand might seize the auspicious hour!
Thou hast let slip the reins of Destiny,
Curse thee, curse thee, Okba!"

8.

The Murderer, answering, said,
"O versed in all enchanted lore,
Thou better knowest Okba's soul!
Eight blows I struck, eight home-driven blows,
Needed no second stroke
From this envenom'd blade.
Ye frown at me as if the will had fail'd;
As if ye did not know
My double danger from Hodeirah's race,
The deeper hate I feel,
The stronger motive that inspir'd my arm!

an unclean spirit, and put it under the head upon a wall, and lighted candles before it, and worshipped it."—Godwyn's Moses and Aaron.

By Rabbi Elcasar, it is said to be the head of a child.

Ye frown as if my hasty fault,
My ill-directed blow,
Had spared the enemy;
And not the Stars that would not give,
And not your feeble spells
That could not force, the sign
Which of the whole was he.
Did ye not bid me strike them all?
Said ye not root and branch should be destroy'd?
I heard Hodeirah's dying groan,
I heard his Children's shriek of death,
And sought to consummate the work;
But o'er the two remaining lives
A cloud unperceivable had risen,
A cloud that mock'd my searching eyes.
I would have probed it with the dagger-point,
The dagger was repell'd;
A Voice came forth and said,
'Son of Perdition, cease! Thou canst not change
What in the Book of Destiny is written.'

9.

Khawla to the Teraph turn'd,
"Tell me where the Prophet's hand
Hides our destined enemy?"
The dead lips spake again,
"I view the seas, I view the land,
I search the Ocean and the Earth!
Not on Ocean is the Boy,
Not on Earth his steps are seen."

10.

"A mightier power than we," Lobaba cried,
"Protects our destined foe.
Look! look! one Fire burns dim!
It quivers! it goes out!"

11.

It quiver'd, it was quench'd.
One Flame alone was left,
A pale blue Flame that trembled on the floor,

"The Devil, whom Mahommed names Eblis, from his despair, was once one of those angels who are nearest to God's presence, called Azazil; and fell (according to the doctrine of the Koran) for refusing to pay homage to Adam at the command of God."—Salc.

"God created the body of Adam of Salzal, that is, of dry but unbaked clay; and left it forty nights, according to others, forty years, lying without a soul; and the Devil came to it, and kicked it, and it sounded. And God breathed into it a soul with his breath, sending it in at the eyes; and he himself saw his nose still dead clay, and the soul running through him, till it reached his feet, when he stood upright."—Maracci.

In the Nuremberg Chronicle is a print of the creation of Adam; the body is half made growing out of a heap of clay under the Creator's hands. A still more absurd print represents Eve half-way out of his side.

The fullest Mahommedan Genesis is to be found in Rabadan the Morisco's Poem.

"God, designing to make known to his whole choir of Angels, high and low, his scheme concerning the Creation, called the Archangel Gabriel, and delivering to him a pen and paper, commanded him to draw out an instrument of fealty and homage; in which, as God had dictated to his Secretary Gabriel, were specified the pleasures and delights he ordained to his creatures in this world; the term of years he would allot them; and how, and in what exercises, their time in

A hovering light, upon whose shrinking edge
The darkness seem'd to press.
Stronger it grew, and spread
Its lucid swell around,
Extending now where all the ten had stood
With lustre more than all.

12.

At that portentous sight
The Children of Evil trembled,
And terror smote their souls.
Over the den the Fire
Its fearful splendour cast,
The broad base rolling up in wavy streams,
Bright as the summer lightning when it spreads
Its glory o'er the midnight heaven.
The Teraph's eyes were dimm'd,
Which like two twinkling stars
Shone in the darkness late.
The Sorcerers on each other gazed,
And every face, all pale with fear,
And ghastly, in that light was seen
Like a dead man's by the sepulchral lamp.

13.

Even Khawla, fiercest of the enchanter brood,
Not without effort drew
Her fear-suspended breath.
Anon a deeper rage
Inflamed her reddening eye.
"Mighty is thy power, Mahommed!"
Loud in blasphemy she cried;
"But Eblis would not stoop to Man,
When Man, fair-statured as the stately palm
From his Creator's hand
Was undefiled and pure.
Thou art mighty, O Son of Abdallah!
But who is he of woman born
That shall vie with the might of Eblis?
That shall rival the Prince of the Morning?"

this life was to be employed. This being done, Gabriel said, 'Lord, what more must I write? The pen resisteth, and refuseth to be guided forwards!' God then took the deed, and before he folded it, signed it with his sacred hand, and affixed thereunto his royal signet, as an indication of his incontestable and irrevocable promise and covenant. Then Gabriel was commanded to convey what he had written throughout the hosts of Angels; with orders that they all, without exception, should fall down and worship the same: and it was so abundantly replenished with glory, that the angelical potentates universally revered and paid homage thereunto. Gabriel returning, said, 'O Lord! I have obeyed thy commands; what else am I to do?' God replied, 'Close up the writing in this crystal; for this is the inviolable covenant of the fealty the mortals I will hereafter create shall pay unto me, and by the which they shall acknowledge me.' Et Hassan tells us, that no sooner had the blessed Angel closed the said crystal, but so terrible and astonishing a voice issued out thereof, and it cast so unusual and glorious a light, that, with the surprise of so great and unexpected a mystery, the Angel remained fixed and immovable; and although he had almost ardent desire to be let into the secret arcana of that wonderful prodigy, yet all his innate courage and heavenly magnanimity, were not sufficient to furnish him with assurance, or power, to make the enquiry.

"All being now completed, and put in order, God said to his 14.

She said, and raised her skinny hand
As in defiance to high Heaven,
And stretch'd her long lean finger forth,
And spake aloud the words of power.
The Spirits heard her call,
And lo! before her stands
Her Demon Minister.

Angels, 'Which of you will descend to the Earth, and bring me up a handful thereof?' When immediately such infinite numbers of celestial spirits departed, that the universal surface was covered with them; where, consulting among themselves, they unanimously confirmed their loathing and abhorrence to touch it, saying, 'How dare we be so presumptuous as to expose, before the throne of the Lord, so glorious and sovereign as ours is, a thing so filthy, and of a form and composition so vile and despicable!' and in effect, they all returned, fully determined not to meddle with it. After these went others, and then more; but not one of them, either first or last, dared to defile the purity of their hands with it. Upon which Azrael, an Angel of an extraordinary stature, flew down, and, from the four corners of the Earth, brought up a handful of it which God had commanded. From the south and the north, from the west and from the east, took he it; of all which four different qualities human bodies are composed.

'The Almighty, perceiving in what manner Azrael had signalled himself in this affair, beyond the rest of the Angels, and taking particular notice of his goodly form and stature, said to him, 'O Azrael, it is my pleasure to constitute thee to be Death itself; thou shalt be him who separateth the souls from the bodies of those creatures I am about to make: Thou henceforth shalt be called Azrael Malec el Moul, or Azrael, the Angel of Death.'

'Then God caused the Earth, which Azrael had brought, to be washed and purified in the fountains of Heaven: and El Hassan tells us, that it became so resplendently clear, that it cast a more shining and beautiful light than the Sun in its utmost glory. Gabriel was then commanded to convey this lovely, though as yet inanimate, lump of clay, throughout the Heavens, the Earth, the Centres, and the Seas; to the intent, and with a positive injunction, that whatsoever had life might behold it, and pay homage and reverence thereunto.

'When the Angels saw all these incomprehensible mysteries, and that so beautiful an image, they said, 'Lord! if it will be pleasing in thy sight, we will, in thy most high and mighty name, prostrate ourselves before it.' To which voluntary proposal, God replied; 'I am content you pay adoration to it; and I command you so to do: when instantly they all bowed, inclining their shining celestial countenances at his feet; only Eblis detained himself, obstinately refusing; proudly and arrogantly valuing himself upon his heavenly composition. To whom God sternly said, 'Prostrate thyself to Adam.' He made a show of so doing, but remained only upon his knees, and then rose up, before he had performed what God had commanded him. When the Angels beheld his insolence and disobedience, they a second time prostrated themselves, to complete what the haughty and presumptuous Angel had left undone. From hence it is that in all our prayers, at each inclination of the body, we make two prostrations, one immediately after the other. God being highly incensed against the rebellious Eblis, said unto him, 'Why dost thou not reverence this statue which I have made, as the other Angels all have done?' To which Eblis replied, 'I will never lessen nor disparage my grandeur so much, as to humble myself to a piece of clay; I, who am an immortal Seraphim, of so apparently a greater excellency than that; I, whom thou didst create out of the celestial fire, what

"Spirit!" the Enchantress cried,
"Where lives the Boy, coeval with whose life
Yon magic Fire must burn?"

DEMON.

Mistress of the mighty Spell,
Not on Ocean, not on Earth,

an indignity would it be to my splendor, to pay homage to a thing composed of so vile a metal! The irritated Monarch, with a voice of thunder, then pronounced against him this direful anathema and malediction: 'Begone, enemy; depart, Rebel, from my abode! Thou no longer shalt continue in my celestial dominions.—Go, thou accursed flaming thunderbolt of fire! My curse pursue thee! My condemnation overtake thee! My torments afflict thee! And my chastisement accompany thee!—Thus fell this enemy of God and mankind, both he, and all his followers and abettors, who sided or were partakers with him in his pride and presumptuous disobedience.

'God now was pleased to publish and make manifest his design of animating Man, out of that beautiful and resplendent crystal; and accordingly commanded Gabriel to breathe into the body of clay, that it might become flesh and blood: But at the instant, as the immaculate Spirit was going to enter therein, it returned, and humbling itself before the Lord, said, 'O Merciful King! for what reason is it that thou intendest to inclose me in this loathsome prison? I, who am thy servant, thou shuttest up within mine enemy, where my purity will be defiled, and where, against my will, I shall disobey thee, without being able to resist the instigation and power of this rebellious flesh; whereby I shall become liable to suffer thy rigorous punishment, insupportable and unequal to my strength, for having perpetrated the enormities obnoxious to the frailty of human flesh; Spare me, O Lord! spare me! suffer me not to taste of this bitter draught! To thee it belongs to command, and to me to suppliance thee.'

'Thus spoke the pure and unspotted Spirit, when God, to give it some satisfaction to these complaints, and that it might contentedly resign itself to obey his commands, ordered it should be conducted near his throne, where, in innumerable and infinite parts thereof, it beheld certain letters decriphered up and down, importing, Mahomet the triumphant leader! And over all the seven heavens, on their gates, and in all their books, he saw those words stamped, exceedingly bright and resplendent. This was the blazon which all the Angels and other celestial beings carried between their beautiful eyes, and for their devices on their apparel.

'The Spirit having seen all this, returned to the throne of glory, and being very desirous to understand the signification of those cyphers and characters, he asked, What name was that which shined so in every place? To which question, God answered: 'Know, that from thee, and from that flesh, shall proceed a chieftain, a leader, who shall bear that name, and use that language: by whom, and for whose sake, I the Lord, the heavens, the earths, and the seas, shall be honoured, as shall likewise all who believe in that name.'

'The Spirit, hearing these wonders, immediately conceived so mighty a love to the body, a love not to be expressed, nor even imagined, that it longed with impatience to enter into it; which it had no sooner done, but it miraculously and artistically was influenced and distilled into every individual part and member thereof, whereby the body became animated."—Rabadan.

It is to be regretted that the original of this very curious poem has not been published, and that it did not meet with a more respectable translator. How well would the erudition of Sale have been employed in elucidating it!

Only eyes that view
Allah's glory-throne,
See his hiding-place.
From some believing Spirit, ask and learn.

16.
"Bring the dead Hodeirah here,"
Khawla cried, "and he shall tell!"
The Demon heard her bidding, and was gone
A moment pass'd, and at her feet
Hodeirah's corpse was laid,
His hand still held the sword he grasp'd in death,
The blood not yet had clotted on his wound.

17.
The Sorceress look'd, and with a smile
That kindled to more fiendishness
Her hideous features, cried,
"Where art thou, Hodeirah, now?"
Is thy soul in Zemzem well?¹
Is it in the Eden groves?
Waits it for the judgement-blast
In the trump of Israh!²
Is it, plumed with silver wings,
Underneath the throne of God?
Even though beneath His throne,
Hodeirah, thou shalt hear
Thou shalt obey my voice!"

18
She said, and mutter'd charms which Hell in fear,
And Heaven in horror heard
Soon the stiff eye-balls roll'd,
The muscles with convulsive motion shook,
The white lips quiver'd Khawla saw, her soul
Exult'd, and she cried,
"Prophet! behold my power!"

¹ These lines contain the various opinions of the Mahomedans respecting the intermediate state of the Blessed till the Day of Judgement

² Hagar being near her time, and not able any longer to endure the ill-treatment she received from Sara, resolved to run away Abraham coming to hear of her discontent and fearing she might make away with the child, especially if she came to be delivered without the assistance of some other women, followed her, and found her already delivered of a son, who, dancing with his little feet upon the ground, had made way for a spring to break forth. But the water of the spring came forth in such abundance, as also with such violence, that Hagar could make no use of it to quench her thirst, which was then very great Abraham coming to the place, commanded the spring to glide more gently, and to suffer that water might be drawn out of it to drink, and having thereupon stayed the course of it with a little bank of sand, he took of it, to make Hagar and her child drink The said spring is to this day called Semam, from Abraham making use of that word to stay it.—Occarius.

³ Excepting in this line, I have avoided all resemblance to the powerful poetry of Lucan.

"*Aspicit astantem projecti corporis umbram,
Exanimis artus, inviasque claustra timentem
Carceris antiqui, pavet ire in pectus apertum,
Visceraque, et ruptas telluri vulnere fibras
Ah miser, extremum cui mortis munus inique
Eripitur, non posse mori!*" miratur Erichtho

Not even death secures
Thy slaves from Khawla's spell!
Where, Hodeirah, is thy child?"

19.
Hodeirah groan'd and closed his eyes,
As if in the night and the blindness of death
He would have hid himself.

20.
"Speak to my question!" she exclaim'd,
"Or in that mangled body thou shalt live
Ages of torture! Answer me!
Where can we find the boy?"

21.
"God! God!" Hodeirah cried,
"Release me from this life,
From this intolerable agony!"

22.
"Speak!" cried the Sorceress, and she snatch'd
A Viper from the floor
And with the living reptile lash'd his neck;
Wreath'd round him with the blow,
The reptile tighter drew her folds,
And raised her wrathful head,
And fix'd into his face
Her deadly teeth and shed
Poison in every wound
In vain! for Allah heard Hodeirah's prayer,
And Khawla on a corpse
Had wreak'd her baffled rage.
The fated Fire moved on,
And round the body wrapt its funeral flames.
The flesh and bones in that portentous pile
Consumed, the sword alone,
Circled with fire, was left.

*Has satis licuisse moras iratque morti

A curious instance of French taste occurs in this part of Brebeuf's translation The re-animated corpse is made the corpse of Burrhus, of whose wife Octavia Sextus is enamoured Octavia hears that her husband has fallen in battle; she seeks his body, but in vain A light at length leads her to the scene of Erichtho's incantations, and she beholds Burrhus, to all appearance, living The witch humanely allows them time for a long conversation, which is very complimentary on the part of the husband

Brebeuf was a man of genius. The Pharsalia is as well told in his version as it can be in the detestable French heroic couplet, which epigrammatizes every thing. He had courage enough, though a Frenchman, to admire Lucan,—and yet could not translate him without introducing a love-story.

Where is the Boy for whose hand it is destined ?
 Where the Destroyer who one day shall wield
 The Sword that is circled with fire ?
 Race accursed, try your charms !
 Masters of the mighty Spell,
 Mutter o'er your words of power !
 Ye can shatter the dwellings of man ;
 Ye can open the womb of the rock ;
 Ye can shake the foundations of earth,
 But not the Word of God :
 But not one letter can ye change
 Of what his Will hath written.

24.

Who shall seek through Araby
 Hodeirah's dreaded son ?
 They mingle the Arrows of Chance,¹
 The lot of Abdalzar is drawn.
 Thirteen moons must wax and wane
 Ere the Sorcerer quit his quest.
 He must visit every tribe
 That roam the desert wilderness,
 Or dwell beside perennial streams ;
 Nor leave a solitary tent unsearch'd,
 Till he hath found the Boy, . . .
 The dreaded Boy, whose blood alone
 Can quench that fated Fire.

25.

A crystal ring Abdalzar wore ;
 The powerful gem² condensed
 Primeval dews, that upon Caucasus
 Felt the first winter's frost.
 Ripening there it lay beneath
 Rock above rock, and mountain ice up-piled
 On mountain, till the incumbent mass assumed,
 So huge its bulk, the Ocean's azure hue. *

26.

* With this he sought the inner den
 Where burnt the Eternal Fire.
 Like waters gushing from some channell'd rock
 Full through a narrow opening, from a chasm
 The Eternal Fire stream'd up.
 No eye beheld the spring
 Of that up-flowing Flame,
 Which blazed self-nurtured, and for ever, there.

The mode of divining by arrows was seen by Pietro Della Valle at Aleppo. The Mahomedan conjurer made two persons sit down, one facing the other, and gave each of them four arrows, which they were to hold perpendicularly, the point toward the ground. After questioning them concerning the business of which they wished to be informed, he muttered his invocations ; and the eight arrows, by virtue of these charms, altered their posture, and placed themselves point to point. Whether those on the left, or those on the right, were the others, decided the question.

These imagine that the crystal is snow turned to ice, and has been hardening thirty years, and is turned to a new age. — Mirror of Stones, by Camillus Teconardus, physician of Pinaro, dedicated to Caesar Borgia.

"In the cabinet of the Prince of Monaco, among other

It was no mortal element ; the Abyss
 Supplied it, from the fountains at the first Prepared. In the heart of earth it lives and glows
 Her vital heat, till, at the day decreed,
 The voice of God shall let its billows loose,
 To deluge o'er with no abating flood
 Our consummated World ;
 Which must from that day in infinity
 Through endless ages roll,
 A penal orb of Fire.

27.

Unturban'd and unsandal'd there,
 Abdalzar stood before the Flame,
 And held the Ring beside, and spake
 The language that the Elements obey.
 The obedient Flame detach'd a portion forth,
 Which, in the crystal entering, was condensed,
 Gem of the gem³, its living Eye of fire.
 When the hand that wears the spell
 Shall touch the destined Boy,
 Then shall that Eye be quench'd,
 And the freed Element
 Fly to its sacred and remember'd Spring.

28. *

Now go thy way, Abdalzar !
 Servant of Eblis,
 Over Arabia
 * Seek the Destroyer !
 Over the sands of the scorching Tehama,
 Over the waterless mountains of Nayd ;
 In Arud pursue him, and Yemen the happy,
 And Hejaz, the country beloved by believers,
 Over Arabia,
 Servant of Eblis,
 Seek the Destroyer !

29.

From tribe to tribe, from town to town,
 From tent to tent, Abdalzar pass'd.
 Him every morn the all-beholding Eye
 Saw from his couch, unhallow'd by a prayer,
 Rise to the scent of blood ;
 And every night lie down,
 That rankling hope within him, that by day
 Goaded his steps, still stinging him in sleep,
 And startling him with vain accomplishment

rarities, are two pieces of crystal, each larger than both hands clenched together. In the middle of one is about a glassful of water, and in the other is some moss, naturally inclosed there when the crystals congealed. These pieces are very curious. — Tavernier.

"Crystal, precious stones, every stone that has a regular figure, and even flints in small masses, and consisting of concentric coats, whether found in the perpendicular fissures of rocks, or elsewhere, are only exudations, or the concreting juices of flint in large masses ; they are, therefore, new and spurious productions, the genuine stalactites of flint or of granite." — Buffon.

³ Burguillos, or Lope de Vega, makes an odd metaphor from such an illustration :

"Es Verbo de Dios diamante
 En esquinillo de cobre
 De nuestro círculo pobre."

From visions still the same,
Many a time his wary hand
To many a youth applied the Ring;
And still the imprison'd Fire
Within its crystal socket lay compress'd,
Impatient to be free.

30.

At length to the cords of a tent,
That were stretch'd by an Island of Palms,
In the desolate sea of the sands,
The seemingly traveller came.
Under a shapely palm,
Herself as shapely, there a Damsel stood;
She held her ready robe,
And look'd towards a Boy,
Who from the tree above,
With one hand clinging to its trunk,
Cast with the other down the cluster'd dates.

31.

The Magician approach'd the Tree,
He lean'd on his staff, like a way-faring man,
And the sweat of his travel was seen on his brow
He ask'd for food, and lo!
The Damsel proffers him her lap of dates;
And the Stripling descends, and runs to the tent,
And brings him forth water, the draught of delight.

32.

Anon the Master of the tent,
The Father of the family,
Came forth, a man in years, of aspect mild.
To the stranger approaching he gave
The friendly saluting of peace,

And bade the skin be spread.
Before the tent they spread the skin,¹
Under a Tamarind's shade,
That, bending forward, stretch'd
Its boughs of beauty far.

33.

They brought the Traveller rice,
With no false colours² tinged to tempt the eye,
But white as the new-fallen snow,
When never yet the sullyng Sun
Hath seen its purity,
Nor the warm zephyr touch'd and tainted it.
The dates of the grove before their guest
They laid, and the luscious fig,
And water from the well.

34.

The Damsel from the Tamarind tree
Had pluck'd its acid fruit,
And steep'd it in water long;
And whoso drank of the cooling draught,³
He would not wish for wine.
This to their guest the Damsel brought,
And a modest pleasure kindled her cheek,
When raising from the cup his moisten'd lips,
The stranger smiled, and praised, and drank again.

35.

Whither is gone the Boy?
He had pierced the Melon's pulp,⁴
And closed with wax the wound,
And he had duly gone at morn
And watch'd its ripening rind,
And now all joyfully he brings

¹ "With the Arabs either a round skin is laid on the ground for a small company or large coarse woollen cloths for a great number spread all over the room, and about ten dishes repeated six or seven times over, laid round at a great feast, and whole sheep and lambs boiled and roasted in the middle. When one company has done, another sits round, even to the meanest, till all is consumed. And an Arab Prince will often dine in the street before his door, and call to all that pass, even beggars, in the usual expression, Bismillah, that is, in the name of God; who come and sit down, and when they have done, give their Hamdellillah, that is, God be praised; for the Arabs, who are great levellers, put every body on a footing with them, and it is by such generosity and hospitality that they maintain their interest."—Foote.

² "Tis the custom of Persia to begin their feasts with fruits and preserves. We spent two hours in eating only those and drinking beer, hydromel, and aquavite. Then was brought up the meat in great silver dishes; they were full of rice of divers colours, and upon that, several sorts of meat, boiled and roasted, as beef, mutton, tame fowl, wild ducks, fish, and other things, all very well ordered, and very delicate."

"The Persians use no knives at table, but the cooks send up the meat ready cut up into little bits, so that it was no trouble to us to accustom ourselves to their manner of eating. Rice serves them instead of bread. They take a mouthful of it, with the two fore-fingers and the thumb, and so put it into their mouths. Every table had a carver, whom they call Suffret-si, who takes the meat brought up in the great dishes, to put it into lesser ones, which he fills with three or four sorts of meat, so as that every dish may serve two, or at most three persons. There was but little drunk till towards the end of the repast, and then the cups went about roundly, and the dinner was concluded with a vessel of porcelain, full of a hot blackish kind of drink, which they call Kahawa (Coffee)."

— Ambassador's Travels.

"They laid upon the floor of the Ambassador's room a fine silk cloth, on which there were set one-and-thirty dishes of silver, filled with several sorts of preserves, dry and liquid, and raw fruits, as Melons, Citrons, Quinces, Pears, and some others not known in Europe. Some time after, that cloth was taken away, that another might be laid in the room of it, and upon this was set rice of all sorts of colours, and all sorts of meat, boiled and roasted, in above fifty dishes of the same metal."— Ambassador's Travels.

"There is not any thing more ordinary in Persia than rice soaked in water; they call it Plau, and eat of it at all their meals, and serve it up in all their dishes. They sometimes put thereto a little of the juice of pomegranates, or cherries and saffron, inasmuch that commonly you have rice of several colours in the same dish."— Ambassador's Travels.

⁴ "Of pumpkins and melons several sorts grow naturally in the woods, and serve for feeding Camels. But the proper melons are planted in the fields, where a great variety of them is to be found, and in such abundance, that the Arabians of all ranks use them, for some part of the year, as their principal article of food. They afford a very agreeable liquor. When its fruit is nearly ripe, a hole is pierced into the pulp; this hole is then stopp'd with wax, and the melon left upon the stalk. Within a few days the pulp is, in consequence of this process, converted into a delicious liquor."— Niebuhr.

The treasure now matured;
His dark eyes sparkling with a boy's delight,
As out he pours its liquid lusciousness,
And proffers to the guest.

36.

Abdaldar ate, and he was satisfied :
And now his tongue discoursed
Of regions far remote,
As one whose busy feet had travell'd long.
The father of the family,
With a calm eye and quiet smile,
Sate pleased to hearken him.
The Damsel who removed the meal,
She loiter'd on the way,
And listen'd with full hands !
A moment motionless.

37.

All eagerly the Boy
Watches the Traveller's lips;
And still the wily man
With seemingly kindness, to the eager Boy
Directs his winning tale.
Ah, cursed one ! if this be he,
If thou hast found the object of thy search,
Thy hate, thy bloody aim, . . .
Into what deep damnation wilt thou plunge
Thy miserable soul ! . . .

1 "L'aspect imprévu de tant de Castillans,
D'étonnement, d'effroi, peint ses regards brillans ;
Ses mains du choix des fruits se formant une étude,
Demeurent un moment dans la même attitude."
Madame de Staël. La Colomnade.

2 "The Arabians divide their day into twenty-four hours, and reckon them from one setting sun to another. As very few among them know what a watch is, and as they conceive but imperfectly the duration of an hour, they usually determine time almost as when we say, it happened about noon, about evening, &c. The moment when the sun disappears is called Magrib; about two hours afterwards they call it El asha; two hours later, El Märfä; midnight, Nus el lejl; the dawn of morning, El fedjer; sun rise, Es subhh. They eat about nine in the morning, and that meal is called El ghadda; noon, Ed duhr; three hours after noon, El asr. Of all these divisions of time, only noon and midnight are well ascertained; they both fall upon the twelfth hour. The others are earlier or later, as the days are short or long. The five hours appointed for prayer are Magrib, Nus el lejl, El fedjer, Duhr, and El asr." — Niebuhr, Desc. de l'Arabie.

"The Turks say, in allusion to their canonical hours, that prayer is a tree which produces five sorts of fruit, two of which the sun sees, and three of which he never sees." — Pietro della Valle.

3 The use of the bath was forbidden the Moriscos in Spain, as being an anti-christian custom ! I recollect no superstition but the Romish in which cleanliness is accounted a virtue ; "as if," says Jortin, "purity and filth were synonymous, and religion, like the itch, could be caught by wearing foul clothes."

4 "The effects of the Simoom are instant suffocation to every living creature that happens to be within the sphere of its activity, and immediate putrefaction of the carcasses of the dead. The Arabians discern its approach by an unusual redness in the air, and they say that they feel a smell of sulphur as it passes. The only means by which any person

Look ! how his eye delighted watches thine ! . .
Look ! how his open lips
Gape at the winning tale ! . .
And nearer now he comes,
To lose no word of that delightful talk.
Then, as in familiar mood,
Upon the stripling's arm
The Sorcerer laid his hand,
And the Fire of the Crystal fled.

39.

While the sudden shoot of joy
Made pale Abdaldar's cheek,
The Master's voice was heard ;
"It is the hour of prayer,² . .
My children, let us purify ourselves,
And praise the Lord our God !"
The Boy the water brought ;
After the law they purified themselves,³
And bent their faces to the earth in prayer.

40.

All, save Abdaldar ; over Thalaba
He stands, and lifts the dagger to destroy.
Before his lifted arm received
Its impulse to descend,
The Blast of the Desert came.
Prostrate in prayer, the pious family
Felt not the Simoom pass,⁴
They rose, and lo ! the Sorcerer lying dead,
Holding the dagger in his blasted hand.

can preserve himself from suffering by these noxious blasts, is by throwing himself down with his face upon the earth, till this whiffwind of poisonous exhalations has blown over, which always moves at a certain height in the atmosphere. Instinct even teaches the brutes to incline their heads to the ground on these occasions." — Niebuhr.

"The Arabs of the desert call these winds Simoom, or poison, and the Turks Shamyria, or wind of Syria, from which is formed the Samel."

"Their heat is sometimes so excessive, that it is difficult to form any idea of its violence without having experienced it ; but it may be compared to the heat of a large oven at the moment of drawing out the bread. When these winds begin to blow, the atmosphere assumes an alarming aspect. The sky, at other times so clear in this climate, becomes dark and heavy ; the sun loses his splendour, and appears of a violet colour. The air is not cloudy, but grey and thick, and is in fact filled with an extremely subtle dust, which penetrates every where. This wind, always light and rapid, is not at first remarkably hot, but it increases in heat in proportion as it continues. All animated bodies soon discover it, by the change it produces in them. The lungs, which a too rarefied air no longer expands, are contracted, and become painful. Respiration is short and difficult, the skin parched and dry, and the body consumed by an internal heat. In vain is recourse had to large draughts of water ; nothing can restore perspiration. In vain is coolness sought for ; all bodies in which it is usual to find it, deceive the hand that touches them. Marble, iron, water, notwithstanding the sun no longer appears, are hot. The streets are deserted, and the dead silence of night reigns every where. The inhabitants of houses and villages shut themselves up in their houses, and those of the desert in their tents, or in pits they dig in the earth, where they wait the termination of this destructive heat. It usually lasts three days ; but if it exceeds that time, it becomes insupportable. Woe to the traveller whom this wind surprises remote from shelter ! he must suffer all its

THE THIRD BOOK.

"Time will produce events of which thou ~~canst~~ have no idea; and he to whom thou gavest no commission, will bring thee unexpected news." — Moallakat. Poem of Tarafat.

1.

THALABA.

ONEIZA, look! the dead man has a ring, . .
Should it be buried with him?

ONEIZA.

Oh yes . . yes!
A wicked man! whate'er is his must needs
Be wicked too!

THALABA.

But see, . . the sparkling stone?
How it hath caught the glory of the Sun,
And shoots it back again in lines of light!

ONEIZA.

Why do you take it from him, Thalaba?
And look at it so close? . . it may have charms
To blind, or poison; . . throw it in the grave!
I would not touch it!

THALABA.

And around its rim
Strange letters. . .

ONEIZA.

Bury it . . oh! bury it!

THALABA.

It is not written as the Koran is:
Some other tongue perchance; . . the accursed man
Said he had been a traveller. . .

MOATH (coming from the tent).

Thalaba,
What hast thou there?

dreadful consequences, which sometimes are mortal. The danger is most imminent when it blows in squalls, for then the rapidity of the wind increases the heat to such a degree as to cause sudden death. This death is a real suffocation; the lungs, being empty, are convulsed, the circulation disordered, and the whole mass of blood driven by the heart towards the head and breast; whence that hemorrhage at the nose and mouth which happens after death. This wind is especially fatal to persons of a plethoric habit, and those in whom fatigue has destroyed the tone of the muscles and the vessels. The corpse remains a long time warm, swells, turns blue, and is easily separated; all which are signs of that putrid fermentation which takes place in animal bodies when

THALABA.

A ring the dead man wore;
Perhaps, my father, you can read its meaning.

MOATH.

No, Boy; . . the letters are not such as ours.
Heap the sand over it! a wicked man
Wears nothing holy.

THALABA.

Nay! not bury it!
It may be that some traveller, who shall enter
Our tent, may read it: or if we approach
Cities where strangers dwell and learned men,
They may interpret.

MOATH.

It were better hid
Under the desert sands. This wretched man,
Whom God hath smitten in the very purpose
And impulse of his unpermitted crime,
Belike was some magician, and these lines
Are of the language that the Demons use.

ONEIZA.

Bury it! bury it . . dear Thalaba!

MOATH.

Such cursed men there are upon the earth,
In league and treaty with the Evil powers,
The covenanted enemies of God
And of all good; dear purchase have they made
Of rule and riches, and their life-long sway,
Masters, yet slaves of Hell. Beneath the roots
Of Ocean, the Domdaniel caverns lie,
Their impious meeting; there they learn the words
Unutterable by man who holds his hope
Of heaven; there brood the pestilence, and let
The earthquake loose.

THALABA.

And he who would have kill'd me
Was one of these?

MOATH.

I know not; . . but it may be
That on the Table of Destiny, thy name
Is written their Destroyer, and for this
Thy life by yonder miserable man
So sought, so saved by interfering Heaven.

THALABA.

His ring has some strange power then?

the humours become stagnant. These accidents are to be avoided by stopping the nose and mouth with handkerchiefs: an efficacious method likewise is that practised by the camels, who bury their noses in the sand, and keep them there till the squall is over.

"Another quality of this wind is its extreme aridity; which is such, that water sprinkled on the floor evaporates in a few minutes. By this extreme dryness, it withers and strips all the plants; and by exhaling too suddenly the emanations from animal bodies, crisps the skin, closes the pores, and causes that feverish heat which is the invariable effect of suppressed perspiration." — Volney.

MOATH.

Every gem,
 So sages say, hath virtue¹; but the science,
 Of difficult attainment; some grow pale,
 Conscious of poison², or with sudden change
 Of darkness, warn the wearer; some preserve
 From spells, or blunt the hostile weapon's edge;³
 Some open rocks and mountains, and lay bare
 Their buried treasures; others make the sight
 Strong to perceive the presence of those Beings
 Through whose pure essence as through empty air
 The unaided eye would pass;
 And in yon stone I deem
 Some such mysterious quality resides,

THALABA.

My father, I will wear it.

Thalaba!

¹ From the Mirror of Stones I extract a few specimens of the absurd ideas once prevalent respecting precious stones.

"The Amethyst drives away drunkenness; for, being bound on the navel, it restrains the vapour of the wine, and so dissolves the ebriety.

"Alectoris is a stone of a crystalline colour, a little darkish, somewhat resembling limpid water; and sometimes it has veins of the colour of flesh. Some call it Gallinacrus, from the place of its generation, the intestines of capons, which were castrated at three years old, and had lived seven; before which time the stone ought not to be taken out, for the older it is, so much the better. When the stone is become perfect in the capon, he don't drink. However, it is never found bigger than a large bean. The virtue of this stone is, to render him who carries it invisible. Being held in the mouth, it allays thirst, and therefore is proper for wrestlers; makes a woman agreeable to her husband; bestows honours, and preserves those already acquired; it frees such as are bewitched; it renders a man eloquent, constant, agreeable, and amiable; it helps to regain a lost kingdom, and acquire a foreign one.

"Borax, Nota, Crapondinus, are names of the same stone, which is extracted from a toad. There are two species: that which is the best is rarely found; the other is black or dun with a cerulean glow, having in the middle the similitude of an eye, and must be taken out while the dead toad is yet panting; and these are better than those which are extracted from it after a long continuance in the ground. They have a wonderful efficacy in poisons. For whoever has taken poison, let him swallow this, which being down, it rolls about the bowels, and drives out every poisonous quality that is lodged in the intestines, and then passes through the fundament, and is preserved.

"Corvia or Corvina, is a stone of a reddish colour, and accounted artificial. On the calends of April boil the eggs, taken out of a Crow's nest, till they are hard; and, being cold, let them be placed in the nest as they were before. When the crow knows this, she flies a long way to find the stone; and, having found it, returns to the nest; and the eggs being touched with it, they become fresh and prolific. The stone must immediately be snatched out of the nest. Its virtue is to increase riches, to bestow honours, and to foretell many future events.

"Kinocetus is a stone not wholly useless, since it will cast out devils."

³ "Glafar, the founder of the Barmecides, being obliged to fly from Persia, his native country, took refuge at Damascus, and implored the protection of the Caliph Soliman. When he was presented to that prince, the Caliph suddenly changed

So Thalaba drew on
 The written ring of gold.
 Then in the hollow grave
 They laid Abdaldar's corpse,
 And level'd over him the desert dust.

3.

The Sun arose, ascending from beneath
 The horizon's circling line.
 As Thalaba to his ablutions went,
 Lo! the grave open, and the corpse exposed!
 It was not that the winds of night
 Had swept away the sands which cover'd it;

colour, and commanded him to retire, suspecting that he had poison about him. Soliman had discovered it by means of ten stones which he wore upon his arm. They were fastened there like a bracelet, and never failed to strike one against the other, and make a slight noise when any poison was near. Upon enquiry it was found that Glafar carried poison in his ring, for the purpose of self-destruction, in case he had been taken by his enemies." — Marigny.

These foolish old superstitions have died away, and gems are now neither poudered as poison, nor worn as antidotes. But the old absurdities respecting poisons have been renewed in our days, by authors who have revived the calumnies alleged against the Knights-Templar, as if with the hope of exciting a more extensive persecution.

We are obliged to jewellers for our best accounts of the East. In Tavernier there is a passage curiously characteristic of his profession. A European at Delhi complained to him that he had polished and set a large diamond for Orong-zebe, who had never paid him for his work. But he did not understand his trade, says Tavernier; for if he had been a skilful jeweller, he would have known how to take two or three pieces out of the stone, and pay himself better than the Mogul would have done.

The desert dust lay dark and close around ;
And the night air had been so calm and still,
It had not from the grove
Shaken a ripe date down.

4.

Amazed to hear the tale,
Forth from the tent came Moath and his child.
Awhile he stood contemplating the corpse
Silent and thoughtfully ;
Then turning, spake to Thalaba, and said,
" I have heard that there are places by the abode
Of holy men, so holily possess'd,¹
That should a corpse be laid irreverently
Within their precincts, the insulted ground,
Impatient of pollution, heaves and shakes
The abomination out.

¹ " And Elisha died, and they buried him. And the bands of the Moabites invaded the land at the coming in of this year.

" And it came to pass as they were burying a man, that behold they spied a band of men ; and they cast the man into the sepulchre of Elisha : and when the man was let down, and touched the bones of Elisha, he revived and stood up on his feet."— 2 Kings. xiii. 20, 21.

" It happened the dead corpse of a man was cast ashore at Chatham, and, being taken up, was buried decently in the churchyard. Now there was an image or rood in the church, called our Lady of Chatham. This Lady, say the Monks, went the next night and roused up the clerk, telling him that a sinful person was buried near the place where she was worshipped, who offended her eyes with his ghastly grinning ; and unless he were removed, to the great grief of good people she must remove from thence, and could work no more miracles. Therefore she desired him to go with her to take him up, and throw him into the river again : which being done, soon after the body floated again, and was taken up and buried in the churchyard ; but from that time all miracles ceased, and the place where he was buried did continually sink downwards. This tale is still remembered by some aged people, receiving it by tradition from the popish times of darkness and idolatry."— Admirable Curiosities, Rarities, and Wonders in England.

" When Albuquerque wintered at the Isle of Camaram, in the Red Sea, a man at arms, who died suddenly, was thrown overboard. In the night the watch felt several shocks, as though the ship were striking on a sand bank. They put out the boat, and found the dead body clinging to the keel by the rudder. It was taken up and buried on shore ; and in the morning it was seen lying on the grave. Frey Francisco was then consulted. He conjectured that the deceased had died under excommunication, and therefore absolved him. They interred him again, and then he rested in the grave."— João de Barros. Dec. 2. §. 3.

² Matthew of Westminster says, the story of the Old Woman of Berkeley will not appear incredible, if we read the dialogue of St. Gregory, in which he relates how the body of a man buried in the church was thrown out by the devils. Charles Martel also, because he had appropriated great part of the tithes to pay his soldiers, was most miserably, by the wicked spirits, taken bodily out of his grave.

" The Turks report, as a certain truth, that the corpse of Heyradin Barbarossa was found, four or five times, out of the ground, lying by his sepulchre, after he had been there inhumed ; nor could they possibly make him lie quiet in his grave, till a Greek wizard counselled them to bury a black dog together with the body ; which done, he lay still and gave them no farther trouble."— Morgan's History of Algiers.

Have then in elder times the happy feet
Of Patriarch, or of Prophet bless'd the place,
Ishmael, or Houd, or Saleah, or than all,
Mahommed, hollier name ? Or is the man
So foul with magic and all blasphemy,
That Earth, like Heaven, rejects him ?² It is best
Forsake the station. Let us strike our tent.
The place is tainted . . . and behold
The Vulture hovers yonder³, and his scream
Chides us that still we scare him from the prey.
So let the accursed one,
Torn by that beak obscene,
Find fitting sepulchre."

5.

Then from the pollution of death
With water they made themselves pure ;

In supernatural affairs, seals and dogs seem to possess a sedative virtue. When peace was made, about the year 1170, between the Earls of Holland and Flanders, " it was concluded, that Count Floris should send unto Count Philip a thousand men, expert in making of ditches, to stop the hole which had been made neere unto Dam, or the Sluce, whereby the countrey was drowned round about at everie high sea ; the which the Flemings could by no means fill up, neither with wood, nor any other matter, for that all sunke as in a gulfe without any bottome ; whereby, in succession of time, Bruges, and all that jurisdiction, had been in danger to have bin lost by inundation, and to become all sea, if it were not speedily repaired. Count Floris having taken possession of the isle of Walcharen, returned into Holland, from whence hee sent the best workmen he could find in all his countries, into Flanders, to make dikes and causees, and to stop the hole neere unto this Dam, or Sluce, and to recover the drowned land. These diggers being come to the place, they found at the entrie of this bottomless hole, a Sea-dog, the which for six dayes together, did nothing but erie out and howle very fearfully. They, not knowing what it might signifie, having consulted of this accident, they resolved to cast this dog into the hole. There was a mad-headed Hollander among the rest, who, going into the bottome of the dike, tooke the dogge by the taile, and cast him into the midst of the gulfe ; then speedily they cast earth and torfe into it, so as they found a bottome, and by little and little filled it up. And for that many workmen came to the repairing of this dike, who, for that they would not be far from their worke, coucht in Cabines, which seemed to be a pretie towne, Count Philip gave unto all these Hollanders, Zealanders, and others, that would inhabit there, as much land as they could recover from Dam to Ardenbourg, for them and their successors, for ever, with many other immunities and freedoms. By reason whereof many planted themselves there, and in succession of time, made a good towne there, the which by reason of this dog, which they cast into the hole, they named Hondsdam, that is to say, a dog's sluce ; Dam in Flemish signifying a sluce, and Hondt dog ; and therefore at this day, the said towne (which is simply called Dam) carrieth a dog in their armes and blason."— Grimestone's Historie of the Netherlands, 1608.

³ " The Vulture is very serviceable in Arabia, clearing the earth of all carcases, which corrupt very rapidly in hot countries. He also destroys the field mice, which multiply so prodigiously in some provinces, that, were it not for this assistance, the peasant might cease from the culture of the fields as absolutely vain. Their performance of these important services induced the ancient Egyptians to pay those birds divine honours, and even at present it is held unlawful to kill them in all the countries which they frequent."— Niebuhr.

And Thalaba drew up
The fastening of the cords;
And Moath fur'd the tent;
And from the grove of palms Oneiza led
The Camels, ready to receive their load.

6.

The dews had ceased to stream
Toward the climbing Sun,
When from the Isle of Palms they went their way;
And when the Sun had reach'd his southern height,
As back they turn'd their eyes,
The distant Palms arose
Like to the top-sails of some fleet far-off
Distinctly seen, where else
The Ocean bounds had blended with the sky;
And when the eve came on,
The sight returning reach'd the grove no more.
They planted the pole of their tent,
And they laid them down to repose.

7.

At midnight Thalaba started up,
For he felt that the ring on his finger was moved;
He call'd on Allah aloud,
And he call'd on the Prophet's name.
Moath arose in alarm;
"What ails thee, Thalaba?" he cried,
"Is the robber of night at hand?"
"Dost thou not see," the youth exclaim'd,
"A Spirit in the tent?"
Moath look'd round and said,
"The moon-beam shines in the tent,
I see thee stand in the light,
And thy shadow is black on the ground."

8.

Thalaba answer'd not.
"Spirit!" he cried, "what brings thee here?
In the name of the Prophet, speak,
In the name of Allah, obey!"

9.

He ceased, and there was silence in the tent.
"Dost thou not hear?" quoth Thalaba;
The listening man replied,
"I hear the wind, that flaps
The curtain of the tent."

10.

"The Ring! the Ring!", the youth exclaim'd.
"For that the Spirit of Evil comes;
By that I see, by that I hear.
In the name of God, I ask thee,
Who was he that slew my Father?"

DEMON.

Master of the powerful Ring!
Okba, the dread Magician, did the deed.

THALABA.

Where does the Murderer dwell?

DEMON.

In the Dondankel caverns,
Under the Roots of the Ocean.

THALABA.

Why were my Father and my brethren slain?

DEMON.

We knew from the race of Hodehrah
The destined Destroyer would come.

THALABA.

Bring me my father's sword!

DEMON.

A Fire surrounds the fatal sword;
No Spirit or Magician's hand
Can pierce that fated Flame.

THALABA.

Bring me his bow and his arrows!

11.

Distinctly Moath heard the youth, and She
Who, through the Veil of Separation, watch'd
The while in listening terror, and suspense
All too intent for prayer.
They heard the voice of Thalaba;
But when the Spirit spake, the motionless air
Felt not the subtle sounds,
Too fine for mortal sense.

12.

On a sudden the rattle of arrows was heard,
And a quiver was laid at the feet of the youth,
And in his hand they saw Hodehrah's bow.
He eyed the bow, he twang'd the string,
And his heart bounded to the joyous tone.
Anon he raised his voice and cried,
"Go thy way, and never more,
Evil spirit, haunt our tent!
By the virtue of the Ring,
By Mahommed's holier might,
By the hollest name of God,
Thee, and all the Powers of Hell,
I adjure and I command
Never more to trouble us!"

13.

Nor ever from that hour
Did rebel Spirit on the tent intrude
Such virtue had the Spell.

14.

Thus peacefully the vernal years
Of Thalaba pass'd on,
Till now, without an effort, he could bend
Hodehrah's stubborn bow.
Black were his eyes and bright,
The sunny hue of health
Glow'd on his tawny cheek,
His lip was darken'd by maturing life;
Strong were his shapely limbs, his stature tall;
Peerless among Arabian youths was he.

15.

Compassion for the child
Had first old Moath's kindly heart possess'd,
An orphan, wailing in the wilderness;
But when he heard his tale, his wondrous tale,
Told by the Boy, with such eye-speaking truth

Now with sudden burst of anger,
Now in the agony of tears,
And now with flashes of prophetic joy,
What had been pity became reverence then,
And, like a sacred trust from Heaven,
The Old Man cherish'd him.
Now, with a father's love,
Child of his choice, he loved the Boy,
And, like a father, to the Boy was dear.
Oneiza call'd him brother; and the youth
More fondly than a brother loved the maid;
The loveliest of Arabian maidens she.
How happily the years
Of Thalaba went by!

16.
It was the wisdom and the will of Heaven,
That in a lonely tent had cast
The lot of Thalaba;
There might his soul develope best
Its strengthening energies;
There might he from the world
Keep his heart pure and uncontaminated,
Till at the written hour he should be found
Fit servant of the Lord, without a spot.

17.
Years of his youth, how rapidly ye fled
In that beloved solitude!
Is the morn fair, and doth the freshening breeze
Flow with cool current o'er his cheek?
Lo! underneath the broad-leaved sycamore
With little half-closed he lies,
Dreaming of days to come.
His dog beside him, in mute blandishment,
Now licks his listless hand;
Now lifts an anxious and expectant eye,
Courting the wonted caress.

18.
Or comes the Father of the Rains?²
From his caves in the uttermost West,
Comes he in darkness and storms?

¹ "The Bedouins, who at all points are less superstitious than the Turks, have a breed of very tall greyhounds, which likewise mount guard around their tents; but they take great care of these useful servants, and have such an affection for them, that to kill the dog of a Bedouin would be to endanger your own life."—Sonnais.

² "The Arabs call the West and South-west winds which prevail from November to February, the fathers of the rains."—Pottery.

⁴ "The Doum, or wild palm-tree, grows in abundance, from which these people, when necessity renders them industrious, find great advantage. The shepherds, mule-drivers, camel-drivers, and travellers, gather the leaves, of which they make mats, fringes, baskets, hats, shooaris, or large wallets to carry corn, twine, ropes, girths, and covers for their pack-saddles. This plant, with which they also heat their ovens, produces a mild and resinous fruit, that ripens in September and

When the blast is loud;
When the waters fill
The traveller's tread in the sands;
When the pouring shower
Streams down the roof;
When the door-curtain hangs in heavier folds;
When the out-strain'd tent flags loosely:
Within there is the embers' cheerful glow,
The sound of the familiar voice,
The song that lightens toil,
Domestic Peace and Comfort are within.
Under the common shelter, on dry sand,
The quiet Camels ruminate their food;
The lengthening cord from Moath falls.
As patiently the Old Man
Entwines the strong palm-fibres⁵; by the hearth
The Damsel shakes the coffee-grains,
That with warm fragrance fill the tent;
And while, with dexterous fingers, Thalaba
Shapes the green basket⁶, haply at his feet
Her favourite kidding gnaws the twig,
Forgiven plunderer, for Oneiza's sake.

19.
Or when the winter torrent rolls
Down the deep-channel'd rain-course, foamingly,
Dark with its mountain spoils,
With bare feet pressing the wet sand,
There wanders Thalaba,
The rushing flow, the flowing roar,
Filling his yielded faculties,
A vague, a dizzy, a tumultuous joy.

20.
Or lingers it a vernal brook⁷
Gleaming o'er yellow sands?
Beneath the lofty bank reclined,
With idle eye he views its little waves,
Quietly listening to the quiet flow;
While in the breathings of the stirring gale,
The tall canes bend above,
Floating like streamers on the wind
Their lank uplifted leaves.

October. It is in form like the raisin, contains a kernel, and is astringent, and very proper to temper and counteract the effects of the watery and laxative fruits, of which these people in summer make an immoderate use. That Power which is ever provident to all, has spread this wild plant over their deserts to supply an infinity of wants that would otherwise heavily burden a people so poor."—Chenier.

⁵ "We passed two of those valleys so common in Arabia, which, when heavy rains fall, are filled with water, and are then called wadi or rivers, although perfectly dry at other times of the year.—We now drew nearer to the river, of which a branch was dry, and having its channel filled with reeds growing to the height of 20 feet, served as a line of road, which was agreeably shaded by the reeds."—Niebuhr.

"My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook, and as the stream of brooks they pass away."

"Which are blackish by reason of the ice, and wherein the snow is hid:

"What time they wax warm they vanish; when it is hot they are consumed out of their place."

"The paths of their way are turned aside; they go to nothing, and perish."—Job, vi. 15—18.

21.

Nor rich, nor poor, was Moath¹; God hath given Enough, and blest him with a mind content.

No hoarded gold disquieted his dreams:²

But ever round his station he beheld
Camels that knew his voice,

And home-birds, grouping at Oneiza's call,

And goats that, morn and eve,

Came with full udders to the Damsel's hand.

Dear child! the tent beneath whose shade they dwelt

It was her work; and she had twined

His girdle's many hues;

And he had seen his robe

Grow in Oneiza's loom.³

How often, with a memory-mingled joy

¹—The simplicity, or, perhaps, more properly, the poverty, of the lower class of the Bedouins, is proportionate to that of their chiefs.—All the wealth of a family consists of moveables, of which the following is a pretty exact inventory. A few male and female camels, some goats and poultry, a mare and her bridle and saddle, a tent, a lance sixteen feet long, a crooked sabre, a rusty musket, with a flint or matchlock; a pipe, a portable mill, a pot for cooking, a leathern bucket, a small coffee roaster; a mat, some clothes, a mantle of black woollen, and a few glass or silver rings, which the women wear upon their legs and arms: if none of these are wanting, their furniture is complete. But what the poor man stands most in need of, and what he takes most pleasure in, is his mare; for this animal is his principal support. With his mare the Bedouin makes his excursions against hostile tribes, or seeks plunder in the country, and on the highways. The mare is preferred to the horse, because she does not neigh, is more docile, and yields milk, which, on occasion, satisfies the thirst and even the hunger of her master."—Volney.

²—The Sheikh," says Volney, "with whom I resided in the country of Gasa, about the end of 1784, passed for one of the most powerful of those districts; yet it did not appear to me that his expenditure was greater than that of an opulent Frenchman. His personal effects, consisting in a few pelisses, capotes, arms, horses, and camels, could not be estimated at more than fifty thousand livres (a little above two thousand pounds); and it must be observed, that in this calculation, four mares of the breed of racers are valued at six thousand livres, (two hundred and fifty pounds), and each camel at ten pounds sterling. We must not therefore, when we speak of the Bedouins, suffix to the words Prince and Lord, the ideas they usually convey; we should come nearer the truth, by comparing them to substantial farmers, in mountainous countries, whose simplicity they resemble in their dress, as well as in their domestic life and manners. A Sheikh, who has the command of five hundred horse, does not disdain to saddle and bridle his own, nor to give him his barley and chopped straw. In his tent, his wife makes the coffee, kneads the dough, and superintends the dressing of the victuals. His daughters and kinswomen wash the linen, and go with pitchers on their heads, and veils over their faces, to draw water from the fountain. These manners agree precisely with the descriptions in Homer, and the history of Abraham, in Genesis. But it must be owned, that it is difficult to form a just idea of them without having ourselves been eye-witnesses."—Volney.

⁴—The chief manufacture among the Arabs is the making of Hykes, as they call woollen blankets, and webs of goats' hair for their tents. The women alone are employed in this work, as Andromache and Penelope were of old; who make no use

Or fix'd it on the glowing oven's side
With bare wet arm⁵, and safe dexterity.

"Then let my wife grind unto another."—Job, xxxi. 9, 10.

⁵—I was much amused by observing the dexterity of the Arab women in baking their bread. They have a small place built with clay, between two and three feet high, having a hole at the bottom, for the convenience of drawing out the ashes, something similar to that of a lime-kiln. The oven (which I think is the most proper name for this place) is usually about fifteen inches wide at the top, and gradually grows wider to the bottom. It is heated with wood, and when sufficiently hot, and perfectly clear from smoke, having nothing but clear embers at bottom, (which continue to reflect great heat,) they prepare the dough in a large bowl, and mould the cakes to the desired size on a board or stone placed near the oven. After they have kneaded the cake to a proper consistence, they pat it a little, then toss it about with great dexterity in one hand, till it is as thin as they choose to make it. They then wet one side of it with water, at the same time wetting the hand and arm, with which they put it into the oven. The wet side of the cake adheres fast to the side of the oven till it is sufficiently baked, when, if not paid sufficient attention to, it would fall down among the embers. If they were not exceedingly quick at this work, the heat of the oven would burn the skin from off their hands and arms; but with such amazing dexterity do they perform it, that one woman will continue keeping three or four cakes at a time in the oven till she has done baking. This mode, let me add, does not require half the fuel that is made use of in Europe."—Jackson.

⁶—Tamarinds grow on great trees, full of branches, whereof the leaves are not bigger than, nor unlike to, the leaves of pimpernel, only something longer. The flower at first is like the peaches, but at last turns white, and puts forth its fruit at the end of certain strings; as soon as the sun is set, the leaves close up the fruit, to preserve it from the dew, and open as soon as that luminary appears again. The fruit at first is green, but ripening it becomes of a dark grey, drawing towards a red, inclosed in husks, brown or tawny, of taste a little bitter, like our prunelloses. The tree is as big as a walnut-tree, full of leaves, bearing its fruit at the branches, like the sheath of a knife, but not so straight, rather bent like a bow."—Mandelslo.

¹ "The Mosques, which they pronounce Mosg-jid, are built exactly in the fashion of our churches, where, instead of such seats and benches as we make use of, they only strew the floor with mats, upon which they perform the several sittings and prostrations that are enjoined in their religion. Near the middle, particularly of the principal Mosque of each city, there is a large pulpit erected, which is ballustraded round, with about half-a-dozen steps leading up to it. Upon these (for I am told none are permitted to enter the pulpit) the Mufty, or one of the Im-ams, placeth himself every Friday, the day of the congregation, as they call it, and from thence either explaineth some part or other of the Koran, or else exhorteth the people to piety and good works. That end of these Mosques, which regards Mecca, whither they direct themselves throughout the whole course of their devotions, is called the Kiblah, in which there is commonly a niche, representing, as a judicious writer conjectures, the presence, and at the same time the inviolability of the Deity. There is usually a square tower erected at the other end, with a flag-staff upon the top of it. Hither the crier ascends at the appointed times, and, displaying a small flag, adviseth the people, with a loud voice, from each side of the battlements, of the hour of prayer. These places of the Mahometan worship, together with the Mufty, Im-ams, and other persons belonging to them, are maintained out of certain revenues arising from the rents of lands and houses, either left by will, or set apart by the public for that use." — Shaw.

"All the Mosques are built nearly in the same style. They are of an oblong square form, and covered in the middle with a large dome, on the top of which is fixed a gilt crescent. In front there is a handsome portico covered with several small cupolas, and raised one step above the pavement of the court. The Turks sometimes, in the hot season, perform their devotions there; and between the columns, upon cross iron bars, are suspended a number of lamps, for illuminations on the Thursday nights, and on all festivals. The entrance into the Mosque is by one large door. All these edifices are solidly built of freestone, and in several the domes are covered with lead. The minarets stand on one side, adjoining to the body of the Mosque. They are sometimes square, but more commonly round and taper. The gallery for the mazzens, or criers, projecting a little from the column near the top, has some resemblance to a rude capital; and from this the spire, tapering more in proportion than before, soon terminates in a point crowned with a crescent." — Russet's Aleppo.

The inhabitants of Mecca, who enjoy the happiness of contemplating the Keabé, are obliged, when they pray, to fix their eyes upon the sanctuary; but they who are at a distance from this valuable privilege, are required only, during ³ "The Bedouens live in tents, called Hymas, from the shade they afford the inhabitants, and Bet el Shor, Houses of Hair, from the matter they are made of. They are the same with what the ancients called Mapalia, which being then, as they are to this day, secured from the heat and inclemency of the weather, by a covering only of such hair-cloth as our coal sacks are made of, might very justly be described by Virgil to have thin roofs. When we find any number of them together (and I have seen from three to three hundred), then they are usually placed in a circle, and constitute a Dou-war. The fashion of each tent is the same, being of an oblong figure, not unlike the bottom of a ship turned upside down, as Sallust hath long ago described them. However, they differ in bigness, according to the number of people who live in them: and are accordingly supported, some with one pillar, others with two or three: whilst a curtain or carpet placed, upon occasion, at each of these divisions, separateth the whole into so many apartments. The pillar, which I have mentioned, is a straight pole, 8 or 10 feet high, and 3 or 4 inches in thickness, serving not only to support the tent, but being full of hooks fixed there for the purpose, the Arabs hang upon it their clothes, baskets, saddles, and accoutrements of war. Holofernes, as we read in Judith, xlii. 6., made the like use of the pillar of his tent, by hanging his fasces upon it; it is there called the pillar of the bed, from the custom, perhaps, that hath always prevailed, of having the upper end of the carpet, mattress, or whatever else they lie upon, turned from the skirts of the tent that way. But the Kanassas, Canopy, as we render it (ver. 9.), should, I presume, be rather called the goat or muskeeta net, which is a close curtain of gauze or fine linen, used all over the Levant, by people of better fashion, to keep out the flies. The Arabs have nothing of this kind; who, in taking their rest, lie horizontally upon the ground, without bed, mattress, or pillow, wrapping themselves up only in their Hykes, and lying, as they find room, upon a mat or carpet, in the middle or corner of the tent. Those who are married have each of them a corner of the tent, cantoned off with a curtain." — Shaw.

"The tents of the Moors are somewhat of a conic form, are seldom more than 8 or 10 feet high in the centre, and from 20 to 25 in length. Like those of the remotest antiquity, their figure is that of a ship overset, the keel of which is only seen. These tents are made of twine, composed of goat's hair, camel's wool, and the leaves of the wild palm, so that they keep out water; but, being black, they produce a disagreeable effect at a distant view." — Chénier.

⁴ "In the kingdom of Imam, the men of all ranks shave their heads. In some other countries of Yemen, all the Arabs, even the Sheiks themselves, let their hair grow, and wear neither bonnet nor Sasch, but a handkerchief instead, in which they tie their hair behind. Some let it fall upon their shoulders, and bind a small cord round their heads instead of a turban. The Bedouins, upon the frontiers of Hedjass and of Yemen, wear a bonnet of palm leaves, neatly platted." — Niebuhr.

Or if he strung the pearls of Poesy,¹

² "The Arabs have the Cassaba, or cane, which is only a piece of large cane or reed, with stops or holes, like a flute, and somewhat longer, which they adorn with tassels of black silk, and play upon like the German flute."—Morgan's Hist. of Algiers.

"The young fellows, in several towns, play prettily enough on pipes made, and sounding very much like our flageolet, of the thigh-bones of cranes, storks, or such large fowl."—Ib.

"How great soever may have been the reputation the Libyans once had of being famous musicians, and of having invented the pipe or flute, called by Greek authors Hippophorhos, I fancy few of them would be now much liked at our Opera. As for this tibicen, flute or pipe, it is certainly lost, except it be the gayta, somewhat like the hautbois, called zurra, in Turkish, a martial instrument. Julius Pollux, in a chapter entitled De tibicinarum specie, says, 'Hippophorhos quam quidem Libyes Scenetas inveniunt; et' again, showing the use and quality thereof, 'Hæc verò apud equorum pascua utuntur, ejusque materia decoratissima laurus est, cor eunt ligni extractum acutissimum dat sonum.' The sound of the gayta agrees well with this description, though not the name. Several poets mention the tibicen Libycus and Arabicus; and Athenæus quotes Duris, and says, 'Libycas tibia Poetæ appellant, ut inquit Duris, libro secundo de rebus gestis Agathocles, quod Scirites, primus, ut credunt, tibicenum artis inventor, è gente Nomadum Libyæorum fuerit, primusque tibia Cereallum hymnorum cantor.'—Ib.

Again, in the same work—"he began to weigh his stored pearls in the scales of delivery."

Abu Temam, who was a celebrated poet himself, used to say, "that fine sentiments, delivered in prose, were like gems scattered at random; but that when they were confined in a poetical measure, they resembled bracelets and strings of pearls."—Sir W. Jones, Essay on the Poetry of the Eastern Nations.

In Mr. Carlyle's translation from the Arabic, a Poet says of his friends and himself,

"They are a row of Pearls, and I
The silken thread on which they lie."

I quote from memory, and recollect not the Author's name. It is somewhat remarkable, that the same metaphor is among the quaintnesses of Fuller:—"Benevolence is the silken thread that should run through the pearl chain of our virtues."—Holy State.

"It seems the Arabs are still great rhymers, and their verses are sometimes rewarded; but I should not venture to say that there are great Poets among them. Yet I was assured in Yemen that it is not uncommon to find them among the wandering Arabs in the country of Dsjâf. It is some few years since a Sheikh of these Arabs was in prison at Sana: seeing by chance a bird upon a roof opposite to him, he recollected that the devout Mahomedans believe they perform an action agreeable to God in giving liberty to a bird engaged. He thought therefore he had as much right to liberty as a bird, and made a poem upon the subject, which was first learnt by his guards, and then became so popular, that at last it reached the Imam. He was so pleased with it, that he liberated the Sheikh, whom he had arrested for his robberies."—Niebuhr, Desc. de l'Arabie.

³ "They are fond of singing with a forced voice in the high tones, and one must have lungs like theirs to support the effort for a quarter of an hour. Their airs, in point of character and execution, resemble nothing we have heard in Europe, except the Seguidillas of the Spaniards. They have divisions more laboured even than those of the Italians, and cadences and inflections of tone impossible to be imitated by European throats. Their performance is accompanied with signs and gestures, which paint the passions in a more lively manner than we should venture to allow. They may be said to excel most in the melancholy strain. To behold an Arab with his head inclined, his hand applied to his ear, his eyebrows knit, his eyes languishing; to hear his plaintive tones, his lengthened notes, his sighs and sobs, it is almost impossible to refrain from tears, which, as their expression is, are far from bitter: and indeed they must certainly find a pleasure in shedding them, since among all their songs they constantly prefer that which excites them most, as among all accomplishments singing is that they most admire."—Volney.

"All their literature consists in reciting tales and histories in the manner of the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. They have a peculiar passion for such stories, and employ in them almost all their leisure, of which they have a great deal. In the evening they seat themselves on the ground at the door of their tents, or under cover if it be cold, and there, ranged in a circle, round a little fire of dung, their pipes in

He recounts the sufferings of the young lover, so wasted with desire and passion, that his body no longer yields any shadow. At length, after detailing his various attempts to see his mistress, the obstacles on the part of the parents, the invasions of the enemy, the captivity of the two lovers, &c., he terminates, to the satisfaction of the audience, by restoring them, united and happy, to the paternal tent, and by receiving the tribute paid to his eloquence, in the *maska aliah he has merited. The Bedouins have likewise their love-songs, which have more sentiment and nature in them than those of the Turks and inhabitants of the towns; doubtless because the former, whose manners are chaste, know what love is; while the latter, abandoned to debauchery, are acquainted only with enjoyment."—Volney.

"We read in an old Arabian Manuscript, that when the Ostrich would hatch her eggs, she does not cover them as other fowls do, but both the male and female contribute to hatch them by the efficacy of their looks only; and therefore when one has occasion to go to look for food, it advertises its companion by its cry, and the other never stirs during its absence, but remains with its eyes fixed upon the eggs, till the return of its mate, and then goes in its turn to look for food: and this care of theirs is so necessary, that it cannot be suspended for a moment; for, if it should, their eggs would immediately become addle."—Fanshawe.

This is said to emblem the perpetual attention of the Creator to the Universe.

"She had laid aside the rings which used to grace her ankles, lest the sound of them should expose her to calamity."—Asiatic Researches.

"Most of the Indian women have on each arm, and also above the ankle, ten or twelve rings of gold, silver, ivory, or coral. They spring on the leg, and, when they walk, make a noise, with which they are much pleased. Their hands and toes are generally adorned with large rings."—Somerset.

The Hinna, says the translator of the Bahar-Danush, is esteemed not merely ornamental, but medicinal; and I have myself often experienced in India a most refreshing coolness through the whole habit, from an embrocation, or rather plaster of Hinna, applied to the soles of my feet, by prescription of a native physician. The effect lasted for some days. Bruce says it is used not only for ornament, but as an astringent to keep the hands and feet dry.

This unnatural fashion is extended to animals.

"Departing from the town of Anna, we met, about five hundred paces from the gate, a young man of good family, followed by two servants, and mounted, in the fashion of the country, upon an ass, whose rump was painted red."—Tavernier.

In Persia, "they dye the tails of those horses which are of a light colour with red or orange."—Hanway.

All, the Moor, to whose capricious cruelty Mungo Park was so long exposed, "always rode upon a milk-white horse with its tail dyed red."

When Pietro della Valle went to Jerusalem, all his camels were made orange-colour with henna. He says he had seen in Rome the manes and tails of certain horses which came from Poland and Hungary coloured in like manner. He conceived it to be the same plant, which was sold in a dry or pulverised state, at Naples, to old women, to dye their grey hairs flaxen.

Alfenado, a word derived from Alfena, the Portuguese or Moorish name of this plant, is still used in Portugal as a phrase of contempt for a fop.

One morn, as was their wont, in sportive mood,
The youth and damsel bent Hodeirah's bow ;
For with no feeble hand, nor erring aim,
Oneiza could let loose the obedient shaft.
With head back-bending, Thalaba
Shot up the aimless arrow high in air,
Whose line in vain the aching sight pursued,
Lost in the depth of Heaven.

"When will the hour arrive," exclaimed the youth,
"That I shall aim these fated shafts
To vengeance long delay'd ?
Have I not strength, my father, for the deed ?
Or can the will of Providence
Be mutable like man ?
Shall I never be call'd to the task ?"

28.

"Impatient boy !" quoth Moath, with a smile :
"Impatient Thalaba !" Oneiza cried,
And she too smiled ; but in her smile
A mild reproachful melancholy mix'd.

29.

Then Moath pointed where a cloud
Of locusts, from the desolated fields

1 "The large locusts, which are near three inches long, are not the most destructive ; as they fly, they yield to the current of the wind, which hurries them into the sea, or into sandy deserts, where they perish with hunger or fatigue. The young locusts, that cannot fly, are the most ruinous ; they are about fifteen lines in length, and the thickness of a goose quill. They creep over the country in such multitudes, that they leave not a blade of grass behind ; and the noise of their feeding announces their approach at some distance. The devastations of locusts increase the price of provisions, and often occasion famines ; but the Moors find a kind of compensation in making food of these insects ; prodigious quantities are brought to market, salted and dried like red herrings. They have an oily and rancid taste, which habit only can render agreeable : they are eaten here, however, with pleasure." — Chénier.

"In 1778, the empire of Morocco was ravaged by these insects. In the summer of that year, such clouds of locusts came from the south, that they darkened the air, and devoured a part of the harvest. Their offspring, which they left on the ground, committed still much greater mischief. Locusts appeared, and bred anew in the following year, so that in the spring the country was wholly covered, and they crawled one over the other in search of their subsistence.

"It has been remarked, in speaking of the climate of Morocco, that the young locusts are those which are the most mischievous ; and that it seems almost impossible to rid the land of these insects and their ravages, when the country once becomes thus afflicted. In order to preserve the houses and gardens in the neighbourhood of cities, they dig a ditch two feet in depth, and as much in width. This they palisade with reeds close to each other, and inclined inward toward the ditch ; so that the insects, unable to climb up the slippery reed, fall back into the ditch, where they devour one another.

"This was the means by which the gardens and vineyards of Rabat, and the city itself, were delivered from this scourge, in 1778. The intrenchment, which was, at least, a league in extent formed a semicircle from the sea to the river, which separates Rabat from Salée. The quantity of young locusts here as-

Onward they came, the winds impell'd them on,
Their work was done, their path of ruin past,¹
Their graves were ready in the wilderness.

"Behold the mighty army !" Moath cried,
"Blindly they move, impell'd sembled was so prodigious, that, on the third day, the ditch could not be approached because of the stench. The whole country was eaten up, the very bark of the fig, pomegranate, and orange tree, bitter, hard, and corrosive as it was, could not escape the voracity of these insects.

"The lands, ravaged throughout all the western provinces, produced no harvest ; and the Moors being obliged to live on their stores, which the exportation of corn (permitted till 1774) had drained, began to feel a dearth. Their cattle, for which they make no provision, and which, in these climates, have no other subsistence than that of daily grazing, died with hunger ; nor could any be preserved but those which were in the neighbourhood of mountains, or in marshy grounds, where the re-growth of pasturage is more rapid.

"In 1780, the distress was still farther increased. The dry winter had checked the products of the earth, and given birth to a new generation of locusts, who devoured whatever had escaped from the inclemency of the season. The husbandman did not reap even what he had sowed, and found himself destitute of food, cattle, or seed corn. In this time of extreme wretchedness, the poor felt all the horrors of famine. They were seen wandering over the country to devour roots, and, perhaps, abridged their days, by digging into the entrails of the earth in search of the crude means by which they might be preserved.

"Vast numbers perished of indigestible food and want. I have beheld country people in the roads, and in the streets, who had died of hunger, and who were thrown across asses to be taken and buried. Fathers sold their children. The husband, with the consent of his wife, would take her into another province, there to bestow her in marriage, as if she were his sister, and afterwards come and reclaim her when his wants were no longer so great. I have seen women and children run after camels and rake in their dung, to seek for some indigested grain of barley, which, if they found, they devoured with avidity." — Chénier.

3 "The Amelec, or eater of locusts or grasshoppers, is a bird which better deserves to be described, perhaps, than most others of which travellers have given us an account,

Both passive instruments
Of his all-acting will,
Sole mover He, and only spring of all."

32.
While thus he spake, Onceiz's eye looks up
Where one toward her flew,
Satiated, for so it seem'd, with sport and food.
The Bird flew over her,
And as he pass'd above,
From his relaxing grasp a Locust fell; . .
It fell upon the Maiden's robe,
And feebly there it stood, recovering slow.

33.
The admiring girl survey'd
His out-spread sails of green;

because the facts relating to it are not only strange in themselves, but so well and distinctly attested, that however surprising they may seem, we cannot but afford them our belief. The food of this creature is the locust or the grasshopper; it is of the size of an ordinary hen, its feathers black, its wings large, and its flesh of a greyish colour. They fly generally in great flocks, as the starlings are wont to do with us. But the thing which renders these birds wonderful is, that they are so fond of the water of a certain fountain in Corasoon, or Bactria, that wherever that water is carried, they follow; on which account it is carefully preserved; for wherever the locusts fall, the Armenian priests, who are provided with this water, bring a quantity of it and place it in jars, or pour it into little channels in the fields: the next day whole troops of these birds arrive, and quickly deliver the people from the locusts." — Universal History.

Sir John Chardin has given us the following passage from an ancient traveller in relation to this bird. "In Cyprus, about the time that the corn was ripe for the sickle, the earth produced such a quantity of cavallettes, or locusts, that they obscured sometimes the splendour of the sun. Wherever these came, they burnt and eat up all. For this there was no remedy, since, as fast as they were destroyed, the earth produced more: God, however, raised them up a means for their deliverance, which happened thus. In Persia, near the city of Cuersch, there is a fountain of water, which has a wonderful property of destroying these insects; for a pitcher full of this being carried in the open air, without passing through house or vault, and being set on an high place, certain birds which follow it, and fly and cry after the men who carry it from the fountain, come to the place where it is fixed. These birds are red and black, and fly in great flocks together, like starlings; the Turks and Persians call them Mussulmans. These birds no sooner came to Cyprus, but they destroyed the locusts with which the island was infested; but if the water be spilt or lost, these creatures immediately disappear; which accident fell out when the Turks took this island; for one of them going up into the temple of Famagusta, and finding there a pitcher of this water, he, fancying that it contained gold or silver, or some precious thing, broke it, and spilt what was therein: since which the Cypriots have been as much tormented as ever by the locusts."

"On the confines of the Medes and of Armenia, at certain times, a great quantity of birds are seen who resemble our blackbirds, and they have a property sufficiently curious to make me mention it. When the corn in these parts begins to grow, it is astonishing to see the number of locusts with which all the fields are covered. The Armenians have no other method of delivering themselves from these insects, than by going in procession round the fields, and sprinkling them with a particular water, which they take care to preserve in their houses, for this water comes from a great distance. They fetch it from a well belonging to one of their convents near the frontiers, and they say that the bodies of

His gauzy underwings,
One closely to the grass-green body fur'd,
One ruffled in the fall, and half unclosed.
She view'd his jet-orb'd eyes,
His glossy gorget bright,
Green glittering in the sun;
His plummy pliant horns,
That, nearer as she gazed,
Bent tremblingly before her breath.
She mark'd his yellow-circled front
With lines mysterious vein'd;
And "know'st thou what is here inscribed,
My father?" said the Maid.
"Look, Thalaba! perchance these lines
Are in the letters of the Ring.
Nature's own language written here."

many Christian martyrs were formerly thrown into this well. These processions, and the sprinkling continue three or four days; after which, the birds that I have mentioned come in great flights; and whether it be that they eat the locusts or drive them away, in two or three days the country is cleared of them." — Tavernier.

"At Mosul and at Haleb," says Niebuhr, "I heard much of the locust bird, without seeing it. They there call it Samarmog, or, as others pronounce it, Samarmog. It is said to be black, larger than a sparrow, and no ways pleasant to the palate. I am assured that it every day destroys an incredible number of locusts; they pretend, nevertheless, that the locusts sometimes defend themselves, and devour the bird with its feathers, when they have overpowered it by numbers. When the children in the frontier towns of Arabia catch a live locust, they place it before them and cry Samarmog! And because it stoops down terrified at the noise, or at the motion of the child or clings more closely to its place, the children believe that it fears the name of its enemy, that it hides itself, and attempts to throw stones. The Samarmog is not a native of Mosul or Haleb, but they go to seek it in Khorasan with much ceremony. When the locusts multiply very greatly, the government sends persons worthy of trust to a spring near the village of Samaran, situated in a plain between four mountains, by Mesched, or Musa cr ridda, in that province of Persia. The deputies, with the ceremonies prescribed, fill a chest with this water, and pitch the chest so that the water may neither evaporate nor be spilt before their return. From the spring to the town whence they were sent, the chest must always be between heaven and earth; they must neither place it on the ground, nor under any roof, lest it should lose all its virtue. Mosul being surrounded with a wall, the water must not pass under the gateway, but it is received over the wall, and the chest placed upon the Mosque Nebbi Gurgis, a building which was formerly a church, and which, in preference to all the other buildings, has had from time immemorial the honour to possess this chest upon its roof. When this precious water has been brought from Khorasan with the requisite precautions, the common Mahomedans, Christians, and Jews of Mosul, believe that the Samarmog follows the water, and remains in the country as long as there is a single drop left in the chest of Nebbi Gurgis. Seeing one day a large stork's nest upon this vessel, I told a Christian of some eminence in the town, how much I admired the quick smell of the Samarmog, who perceived the smell of the water through such a quantity of ordure; he did not answer me, but was very much scandalised that the government should have permitted the stork to make her nest upon so great a treasure, and still more angry, that for more than nine years, the government had not sent to procure fresh water." — Niebuhr, Desc. de l'Arabie.

Dr. Russel describes this bird as about the size of a starling; the body of a flesh colour, the rest of its plumage black, the bill and legs black also.

The youth bent down, and suddenly
 He started, and his heart
 Sprung, and his cheek grew red,
 For these mysterious lines were legible,¹.
 WHEN THE SUN SHALL BE DARKENED AT NOON,
 SON OF HODERAH, DEPART.
 And Moath look'd, and read the lines aloud ;
 The Locust shook his wings and fled,
 And they were silent all.

35.

Who then rejoiced but Thalaba ?
 Who then was troubled but the Arabian Maid ?
 And Moath sad of heart,
 Though with a grief suppress, beheld the youth
 Sharpen his arrows now,
 And now new-plume their shafts,
 Now, to beguile impatient hope,
 Feel every sharpen'd point.

36.

"What's that anxious look," Oneiza ask'd,
 "Still upward cast at noon ?
 Is Thalaba weary of our tent ?"
 "I would be gone," the youth replied,
 "That I might do my task,
 And full of glory to the tent return,
 Whence I should part no more."

37.

But on the noontide sun,
 As anxious and as oft, Oneiza's eye
 Was upward glanced in fear.
 And now, as Thalaba replied, her cheek
 Lost its fresh and lively hue ;
 For in the Sun's bright edge
 She saw, or thought she saw, a little speck.

¹ "The locusts are remarkable for the hieroglyphic that they bear upon the forehead ; their colour is green throughout the whole body, excepting a little yellow rim that surrounds their head, which is lost at their eyes. This insect has two upper wings pretty solid ; they are green like the rest of the body, except that there is in each a little white spot. The locust keeps them extended like great sails of a ship going before the wind ; it has besides two other wings underneath the former, and which resemble a light transparent stuff pretty much like a cobweb, and which it makes use of in the manner of smack sails that are along a vessel ; but when the locust reposes herself, she does like a vessel that lies at anchor, for she keeps the second sails furled under the first." — Norden.

The Mahomedans believe some mysterious meaning is contained in the lines upon the locust's forehead.

I compared the description in the poem with a locust which was caught in Leicestershire. It is remarkable that a single insect should have found its way so far inland.

² An Arabian expression from the Mosallakat : — "She turns her right side, as if she were in fear of some large-headed screeamer of the night." — Poem of Antara.

³ In the ninth volume of the Spectator is an account of the

The sage Astronomer

Who, with the love of science full,
 Trembled that day at every passing cloud, . .
 He had not seen it, 'twas a speck so small.

38.

Alas ! Oneiza sees the spot increase !
 And lo ! the ready youth
 Over his shoulder the full quiver slings,
 And grasps the slacken'd bow.
 It spreads, and spreads, and now
 Hath shadow'd half the sun,
 Whose crescent-pointed horns
 Now momentarily decrease.

39.

The day grows dark, the birds retire to rest :
 Forth from her shadowy haunt
 Flies the large-headed screamer of the night.²
 Far off the affrighted African,
 Deeming his God deceased,
 Falls on his knees in prayer,
 And trembles as he sees
 The fierce hyena's eyes
 Glare in the darkness of that dreadful noon.³

40.

Then Thalaba exclaim'd, "Farewell,
 My father ! my Oneiza !" the Old Man
 Felt his throat swell with grief.
 "Where wilt thou go, my child ?" he cried,
 "Wilt thou not wait a sign
 To point thy destined way ?"
 "God will conduct me !" said the faithful youth
 He said, and from the tent,
 In the depth of the darkness departed.
 They heard his parting steps,
 The quiver rattling as he pass'd away.

total Eclipse of the Sun, Friday, April 22. 1715. It is in a strain of vile bombast ; yet some circumstances are so fine, that even such a writer could not spoil them : — "The different modifications of the light formed colours the eye of man has been five hundred years unacquainted with, and for which I can find no name, unless I may be allowed to call it a dark gloomy sort of light, that scattered about a more sensible and genuine horror, than the most consummate darkness. All the birds were struck dumb, and hung their wings in moody sorrow ; some few pigeons, that were on the wing, were afraid of being benighted even in the morn, alighted, and took shelter in the houses. The heat went away by degrees with the light. But when the rays of the sun broke out afresh, the joy and the thanks that were in me, that God made to us these signs and marks of his power before he exercised it, were exquisite, and such as never worked upon me so sensibly before. With my own ears I heard a cock crow as at the dawn of day, and he welcomed with a strange gladness, which was plainly discoverable by the cheerful notes of his voice, the sun at its second rising, and the returning light."

The Paper is signed B., and is perhaps by Sir Richard Blackmore.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

THE FOURTH BOOK.

— "Fas est quoque brutæ Telluri, docilem monitis celestibus esse."
Mambrani Constantinus.

1.

Whose is yon dawning form,
That in the darkness meets
The delegated youth?
Dim as the shadow of a fire at noon,
Or pale reflection on the evening brook
Of glow-worm on the bank,
Kindled to guide her winged paramour.

2.

A moment, and the brightening image shaped
His Mother's form and features. "Go," she cried,
"To Babylon, and from the Angels learn
What talisman thy task requires."

3.

The Spirit hung toward him when she ceased,
As though with actual lips she would have given
A mother's kiss. His arms outstretch'd,
His body bending on,
His mouth unclosed and trembling into speech,
He prest to meet the blessing, . . . but the wind
Play'd on his cheek. He look'd, and he beheld
The darkness close. "Again I again!" he cried,
"Let me again behold thee!" from the darkness
His Mother's voice went forth;
"Thou shalt behold me in the hour of death."

4.

Day dawns, the twilight gleam dilates,
The Sun comes forth, and like a god
Rides through rejoicing heaven.
Old Moath and his daughter, from their tent,
Behold the adventurous youth,
Dark-moving o'er the sands,
A lessening image, trembling through their tears.
Visions of high enprize
Beguiled his lonely road;
And if sometimes to Moath's tent
The involuntary mind recurr'd,
Fancy, impatient of all painful thoughts,
Pictured the bliss should welcome his return.
In dreams like these he went,
And still of every dream
Oneiza form'd a part,
And hope and memory made a mingled joy.

5.

In the eve he arrived at a Well;
An Acacia bent over its side,
Under whose long light-hanging boughs
He chose his night's abode.

There, due ablutions made, and prayers perform'd,
The youth his mantle spread,
And silently produced
His solitary meal.
The silence and the solitude recall'd
Dear recollections; and with folded arms,
Thinking of other days, he sate, till thought
Had left him, and the Acacia's moving shade
Upon the sunny sand,
Had caught his idle eye
And his awaken'd ear
Heard the grey Lizard's chirp,
The only sound of life.

6.

As thus in vacant quietness he sate,
A Traveller on a Camel reach'd the Well,
And courteous greeting gave.
The mutual salutation past,
He by the cistern too his garment spread,
And friendly converse cheer'd the social meal.*

7.

The Stranger was an ancient man,
Yet one whose green old age
Bore the fair characters of temperate youth.
So much of manhood's strength his limbs retain'd,
It seem'd he needed not the staff he bore.
His beard was long, and grey, and crisp;
Lively his eyes and quick,
And reaching over them
The large broad eye-brow curi'd.
His speech was copious, and his winning words
Enrich'd with knowledge, that the attentive youth
Sate listening with a thirsty joy.

8.

So in the course of talk,
The adventurer youth enquired
Whither his course was bent?
The Old Man answered, "To Bagdad I go."
At that so welcome sound, a flash of joy
Kindled the eye of Thalaba;
"And I too," he replied,
"Am journeying thitherward;
Let me become companion of thy way!"
Courteous the Old Man smiled,
And willing in assent.

9.

OLD MAN.
Son, thou art young for travel.

THALABA.
Until now
I never pass'd the desert boundary.

OLD MAN.
It is a noble city that we seek.
Thou wilt behold magnificent palaces,
And lofty minarets, and high-domed Mosques,
And rich Bazars, whither from all the world
Industrious merchants meet, and market there
The World's collected wealth.

THALABA.
Stands not Bagdad
Near to the site of ancient Babylon
And Nimrod's impious temple?

OLD MAN.
From the walls
'Tis but a long day's distance.

THALABA.
And the ruins?

OLD MAN.
A mighty mass remains; enough to tell us
How great our fathers were, how little we.¹
Men are not what they were; their crimes and follies
Have dwarf'd them down from the old hero race
To such poor things as we!

THALABA.
At Babylon
I have heard the Angels expiate their guilt,
Haruth and Maruth.

OLD MAN.
'Tis a history
Handed from ages down; a nurse's tale . .
Which children open-eyed and mouth devour;
And thus as garrulous ignorance relates,
We learn it and believe. . . But all things feel

¹ "The Mussuhamans are immutably preposessed, that as the Earth approaches its dissolution, its sons and daughters gradually decrease in their dimensions. As for Dagial, they say, he will find the race of mankind dwindled into such diminutive pigmies, that their habitations in cities and all the best towns, will be of no other fabric than the shoes and slippers made in these present ages, placed in rank and file, in seemly and regular order; allowing one pair for two round families."—Morgan's Hist. of Algiers.

"The Cady then asked me, 'If I knew when Hagiuge was to come?' 'I have no wish to know anything about him,' said I; 'I hope those days are far off, and will not happen in my time.' 'What do your books say concerning him?' said he, affecting a look of great wisdom. 'Do they agree with ours?' 'I don't know that,' said I, 'till I hear what is written in your books.' 'Hagiuge Magiuge,' says he, 'are little people not so big as bees, or like the zimb, or fly of Sennaar, that came in great swarms out of the earth, ay, in multitudes that cannot be counted; two of their chiefs are to ride upon an ass, and every hair of that ass is to be a pipe, and every pipe is to play a different kind of music, and all that hear and follow them are to be carried to hell.' 'I know them not,' said I; 'and in the name of the Lord, I fear them not, were they twice as little as you say they are, and twice as numerous. I trust in God I shall never be so fond of music as to go to hell after an ass, for all the tunes that he or they can play.'"—Bruce.

These very little people, according to Thevenot, are to be great drinkers, and will drink the sea dry.

² The story of Haruth and Maruth, as in the Poem, may be found in D'Herbelot, and in Sale's notes to the Koran. Of the different accounts, I have preferred that which makes Zohara originally a woman, and metamorphoses her into the planet Venus, to that which says the planet Venus descended as Zohara to tempt the Angels.

The Arabians have so childish a love of rhyme, that when two names are usually coupled, they make them jingle, as in

The power of Time and Change; thistles and grass
Usurp the desolate palace, and the weeds
Of falsehood root in the aged pile of Truth.
How have you heard the tale?

THALABA.
Thus . . on a time
The Angels at the wickedness of man
Express'd indignant wonder; that in vain
Tokens and signs were given, and Prophets sent, . .
Strange obstinacy this! a stubbornness
Of sin, they said, that should for ever bar
The gates of mercy on them. Allah heard
Their unforgiving pride, and bade that two
Of these untempted Spirits should descend,
Judges on Earth. Haruth and Maruth went,
The chosen Sentencers; they fairly heard
The appeals of men to their tribunal brought,
And rightfully decided. At the length
A Woman came before them; beautiful
Zohara was, as yonder Evening Star,
In the mild lustre of whose lovely light?
Even now her beauty shines. They gazed on her
With fleshly eyes, they tempted her to sin.
The wily woman listen'd, and required
A previous price, the knowledge of the name
'Of God.' She learnt the wonder-working name,
And gave it utterance, and its virtue bore her
Up to the glorious Presence, and she told
Before the awful Judgement-Seat her tale

the case of Haruth and Maruth. Thus they call Cain and Abel, Abel and Kabel. I am informed that the Koran is crowded with rhymes, more particularly at the conclusion of the chapters.

³ The Ism-Ablah—The Science of the Name of God.

"They pretend that God is the lock of this science, and Mahommed the key; that consequently none but Mahomedans can attain it; that it discovers what passes in distant countries; that it familiarises the possessor with the Genii, who are at the command of the initiated, and who instruct them; that it places the winds and the seasons at their disposal; that it heals the bite of serpents, the lame, the maimed, and the blind. They say, that some of their greatest Saints, such as Abdulkadir, Cheilani of Bagdad, and Ibn Alwan, who resided in the south of Yemen, were so far advanced in this science by their devotion, that they said their prayers every noon in the Kaba of Mecca, and were not absent from their own houses any other part of the day. A merchant of Mecca who had learnt it in all its forms from Mahommed el Djandadsenji (at present so famous in that city), pretended that he himself being in danger of perishing at sea, had fastened a billet to the mast, with the usual ceremonies, and that immediately the tempest ceased. He showed me, at Bombay, but at a distance, a book which contained all sorts of figures and mathematical tables, with instructions how to arrange the billets, and the appropriate prayers for every circumstance. But he would neither suffer me to touch the book, nor copy the title.

"There are some Mahomedans who shut themselves up in a dark place without eating and drinking for a long time, and there with a loud voice repeat certain short prayers till they faint. When they recover, they pretend to have seen not only a crowd of spirits, but God himself, and even the Devil. But the true initiated in the Ism-Allah do not seek these visions. The secret of discovering hidden treasures belongs also, if I mistake not, to the Ism-Allah."—Nicbahr.

OLD MAN.

I know the rest. The accused Spirits were call'd;
 Unable of defence, and penitent,
 They own'd their crime, and heard the doom deserved.
 Then they besought the Lord, that not for ever
 His wrath might be upon them; and implored
 That penal ages might at length restore them
 Clean from offence; since then by Babylon,
 In the cavern of their punishment, they dwell.
 Runs the conclusion so?

THALABA.

So I am taught.

OLD MAN.

The common tale! And likely thou hast heard
 How that the bold and bad, with impious rites
 Intrude upon their penitence, and force,
 Albeit from loathing and reluctant lips,
 The sorcery-secret?

THALABA.

Is it not the truth?

OLD MAN.

Son, thou hast seen the Traveller in the sands
 Move through the dizzy light of hot noon-day,
 Huge as the giant race of elder times;¹
 And h's Camel, than the monstrous Elephant,
 Seem of a vaster bulk.

THALABA.

A frequent sight.

OLD MAN.

And hast thou never, in the twilight, fancied
 Familiar object into some strange shape
 And form uncouth?

¹ "One of the Arabs, whom we saw from afar, and who was mounted upon a camel, seemed higher than a tower, and to be moving in the air; at first this was to me a strange appearance: however, it was only the effect of refraction: the Camel which the Arab was upon touching the ground like all others. There was nothing then extraordinary in this phenomenon, and I afterwards saw many appearances exactly similar in the dry countries."—Nicbuhr.

"They surprised you, not indeed by a sudden assault; but they advanced, and the sultry vapour of noon, through which you saw them, increased their magnitude."—Moallakat. Poem of Harith.

² "One of these Hykes is usually six yards long and five or six feet broad, serving the Arab for a complete dress in the day, and for his bed and covering in the night. It is a loose but troublesome kind of garment, being frequently disconcerted and falling upon the ground, so that the person who wears it is every moment obliged to tuck it up, and fold it anew about his body. This shows the great use there is for a girdle in attending any active employment; and in consequence thereof, the force of the Scripture injunction alluding thereunto, of having our loins girded. The method of wearing these garments, with the use they are at other times put to, in serving for coverlets to their beds, should induce us to take the finer sort of them, at least, such as are worn by the ladies and persons of distinction, to be the peplus of the ancients. It is very probable, likewise, that the loose folding garment (the Toga I take it to be) of the Romans, was of this kind; for if the drapery of their statues is to instruct us,

THALABA.

Ay! many a time.

OLD MAN.

 The abused sight.

THALABA.

But of these Angels' fate
 Thus in the uncreated book is written.

OLD MAN.

Wisely from legendary fables, Heaven
 Inculcates wisdom.

THALABA.

How then is the truth?
 Is not the dungeon of their punishment
 By ruin'd Babylon?

OLD MAN.

By Babylon
 Haruth and Maruth may be found.

THALABA.

And there
 Magicians learn their impious sorcery?

OLD MAN.

Son, what thou say'st is true, and it is false.
 But night approaches fast; I have travell'd far,
 And my old lids are heavy; . . . on our way
 We shall have hours for converse; . . . let us now
 Turn to our due repose. Son, peace be with thee!

10.

So in his loosen'd cloak
 The Old Man wrapt himself;

this is actually no other than what the Arabs appear in, when they are folded up in their Hykes. Instead of the fibula, they join together, with thread or a wooden bodkin, the two upper corners of this garment, which being first placed over one of their shoulders, they fold the rest of it afterwards round their bodies."—Shaw.

"The employment of the women is to prepare their wool, spin, and weave in looms hung lengthways in their tents. Those looms are formed by a list of an ell and a half long, to which the threads of the warp are fixed at one end, and at the other on a roller of equal length; the weight of which, being suspended, keeps them stretched. The threads of the warp are so hung as to be readily intersected. Instead of shuttles, the women pass the thread of the woof through the warp with their fingers, and with an iron comb, having a handle, press the woof to give a body to their cloth. Each piece, of about five ells long, and an ell and a half wide, is called a haik; it receives neither dressing, milling, nor dyeing, but is immediately fit for use. It is the constant dress of the Moors of the country, is without seam, and incapable of varying, according to the caprices of fashion: when dirty, it is washed. The Moor is wrapped up in it day and night; and this haik is the living model of the drapery of the ancients."—Chenier.

"If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the Sun goeth down.

"For that is his covering only, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep?"—Ecclesiastes, xxii. 26, 27.

And laid his limbs at length ;
 And Thalaba in silence laid him down.
 Awhile he lay, and watch'd the lovely Moon,
 O'er whose broad orb the boughs
 A mazy fretting framed,
 Or with a pale transparent green
 Lighting the restless leaves,
 The thin Acacia leaves that play'd above.
 The murmuring wind, the moving leaves,
 Soothed him at length to sleep,
 With mingled lullabies of sight and sound.

11.

Not so the dark Magician by his side,
 Lobaba, who from the Domdaniel caves
 Had sought the dreaded youth.
 Silent he lay, and simulating sleep,
 Till by the long and regular breath he knew
 The youth beside him slept.
 Carefully then he rose,
 And bending over him, survey'd him near ;
 And secretly he cursed
 The dead Abdaldar's ring,
 Arm'd by whose amulet
 He slept from danger safe.

12.

Wrapt in his mantle Thalaba reposed,
 His loose right arm pillowing his easy head.
 The Moon was on the Ring,
 Whose crystal gem return'd
 A quiet, moveless light.
 Vainly the Wizard vile put forth his hand,
 And strove to reach the gem ;
 Charms, strong as hell could make them, kept it safe.
 He call'd his servant-fiends,
 He bade the Genii rob the sleeping youth.
 By the virtue of the King,
 By Mahommed's holier power,
 By the holiest name of God,
 Had Thalaba disarm'd the evil race.

13.

Baffled and weary, and convinced at length,
 Anger, and fear, and rancour gnawing him,
 The accursed Sorcerer ceased his vain attempts,
 Content perforce to wait
 Temptation's likelier aid.
 Restless he lay, and brooding many a wile,
 And tortured with impatient hope,
 And envying with the bitterness of hate
 The innocent youth, who slept so sweetly by.

14.

The ray of morning on his eye-lids fell,
 And Thalaba awoke,
 And folded his mantle around him,
 And girded his loins for the day ;
 Then the due rites of holiness observed.
 His comrade too arose,
 And with the outward forms
 Of righteousness and prayer insulted God.

They fill'd their water skin, they gave
 The Camel his full draught.
 Then on the road, while yet the morn was young,
 And the air was fresh with dew,
 Forward the travellers went,
 With various talk beguiling the long way.
 But soon the youth, whose busy mind
 Dwelt on Lobaba's wonder-stirring words,
 Renew'd the unfinish'd converse of the night.

15.

THALABA.

Thou said'st that it is true, and yet is false,
 That men accurst attain at Babylon
 Forbidden knowledge from the Angel pair : . . .
 How mean you ?

LOBABA.

All things have a double power,
 Alike for good and evil. The same fire
 That on the comfortable hearth at eve
 Warm'd the good man, flames o'er the house at night ;
 Should we for this forego
 The needful element ?

Because the scorching summer Sun
 Darts fever, would'st thou quench the orb of day ?
 Or deemest thou that Heaven in anger form'd
 Iron to till the field, because when man
 Had tip'd his arrows for the chase, he rush'd
 A murderer to the war ?

THALABA.

What follows hence ?

LOBABA.

That nothing in itself is good or evil,
 But only in its use. Think you the man
 Praiseworthy, who by painful study learns
 The knowledge of all simples, and their power,
 Healing or harmful ?

THALABA.

All men hold in honour
 The skilful Leech. From land to land he goes
 Safe in his privilege ; the sword of war
 Spares him ; Kings welcome him with costly gifts ;
 And he who late had from the couch of pain
 Lifted a languid look to him for aid,
 Beholds him with glad eyes, and blesses him
 In his first thankful prayer.

1 "The Arabians attribute to Solomon a perpetual enmity and warfare against wicked Genii and Giants; on the subject of his wonder-working Ring, their tales are innumerable. They have even invented a whole race of Pre-Adamite Solomons, who, according to them, governed the world successively, to the number of 40, or, as others affirm, as many as 72. All these made the evil Genii their unwilling drudges."
—D'Herbelot.

"Anchieta was going in a canoe to the mouth of the river Aldea, a delightful spot, surrounded with mango trees, and usually abounding with birds called goarazes, that breed there. These birds are about the size of a hen, their colour a rich purple inclining to red. They are white when hatched, and soon become black; but as they grow larger, lose that colour, and take this rich and beautiful purple. Our navigators had reached the place, but when they should have enjoyed the fine prospect which delights all who pass it, the sun was excessively hot; and this eye-pleasure was purchased dearly, when the whole body was in a profuse perspiration, and the rowers were in a fever. Their distress called upon Joseph, and the remedy was no new one to him. He saw three or four of these birds perched upon a mango, and calling to them in the Brazilian language, which the rowers understood, said, 'Go you, call your companions, and come to shade these hot servants of the Lord. The birds stretched out their necks as if in obedience, and away they went to seek for others, and in a short time they came flying in the shape of an elegant cloud, and they shadowed the canoe a good league out to sea, till the fresh sea-breeze sprung up. Then he told them they might go about their business; then they separated with a clamour of rude, but joyful sounds, which were only understood by the Author of Nature, who created them. This was a greater miracle than that of the cloud with which God defended his chosen people in the wilderness from the heat of the sun, inasmuch as it was a more elegant and fanciful parasol. 'Acho que foy maior portento este que o da nuvem, com que Deos defendeo no deserto a seu Povo mimoso do calor do sol, tanto quanto mais tem de gracioso et aprasivel este chapeo de sol, que aquello.'"

This was one of Anchieta's common miracles. Jacob Biderman has an epigram upon the subject, quoted in the Jesuit's Life:—

"Hesperii peterent cum barbara littora myste,
Et scilicet æger pluribus unus erat,
Ile suum extincto, Phœbi quia lampadis æstu
Occultoque uri, questus ab igne caput;
Quæsit in prora, si quam daret angulus umbram,
Nulla sed in proræ partibus umbra fuit.
Quæsit in puppi, nihil umbræ puppis habebat,
Summa sed urebant solis, et ima faces.

Aera per medium tendere vidit avem.

O'erlook'd them, day and night pursued their toil,
So dreadful was his power.

The Jesuits probably stole this miracle from the Arabian story of Solomon; not that they are by any means deficient in invention; but they cannot be suspected of ignorance.

In that rare book, the Margarita Philosophica Basilie, 1535, is an account of a parasol more convenient, though not so elegant a taste, as that of the wonder-working Anchieta. There is said to be a nation of one-legged men; and one of these unipedes is represented in a print, lying on his back, under the shade of his own great foot.

The most curious account of Solomon's wisdom is in Du Bartas:—

"Hee knows:—"

Whether the Heaven's sweet-sweating kisse appear
To be Pearls parent, and the Oysters pheeer,
And whether, dusk, it makes them dim withall
Clear breeds the cleer, and stormy brings the pale;
Whether from sea the amber-greece be sent,
Or be some fishes pleasant excrement;
He knowes why the Earth's immoveable and round,
The lees of Nature, centre of the mound;
Hee knowes her measure; and hee knows beside
How Coloquintida (duely apply'd)
Within the darknesse of the Conduit-pipes,
Amid the winding of our inward tripes,
Can so discreetly the white humour take."

Sylvester's Du Bartas.

3 "And we made the wind⁴ subject unto Solomon; it blew in the morning for a month, and in the evening for a month. And we made a fountain of molten brass to flow[†] for him.

* They say that he had a carpet of green silk, on which his throne was placed, being of a prodigious length and breadth, and sufficient for all his forces to stand on, the men placing themselves on his right hand, and the spirits on his left; and that when all were in order, the wind, at his command, took up the carpet, and transported it, with all that were upon it, wheresoever he pleased; the army of birds at the same time flying over their heads, and forming a kind of canopy to shade them from the sun.

† A fountain of molten brass.—This fountain, they say, was in Yemen, and flowed three days in a month.

And some of the Genii were obliged to work in his presence, by the will of his Lord; and whoever of them turned aside from our command, we will cause him to taste the pain of hell-fire.* They made for him whatever he pleased, of palaces and statues†, and large dishes like fish-ponds‡, and cauldrons standing firm on their trevets. And we said, Work righteousness, O family of David, with thanksgiving;

* We will cause him to taste the pain of hell-fire; or, as some expound the words, we caused him to taste the pain of burning; by which they understand the correction the disobedient Genii received at the hands of the Angel set over them, who whipped them with a whip of fire.

† Statues.—Some suppose these were images of the Angels and Prophets, and that the making of them was not forbidden, or else that they were not such images as were forbidden by the law. Some say these Spirits made him two lions, which were placed at the foot of his throne, and two eagles, which were set above it; and that when he mounted it, the lions stretched out their paws, and when he sat down, the eagles shaded him with their wings.

‡ Dishes like fish-ponds; being so monstrously large, that a thousand men might eat out of each of them at once.

§ And cauldrons standing firm on their trevets.—These cauldrons, they say, were cut out of the mountains of Yemen, and were so vastly big, that they could not be moved; and people went up to them by steps.

The unsuspecting Youth
Held forth his finger to draw off the spell.
Even whilst he held it forth,
There settled there a Wasp,
And just above the Gem infix'd its dart;
All purple-swollen the hot and painful flesh
Rose round the tighten'd Ring.
The baffled Sorcerer knew the hand of Heaven,
And inwardly blasphemed.

17.

Ere long Lobaba's heart,
Fruitful in wiles, devised new stratagem.
A mist arose at noon,
Like the loose hanging skirts
Of some low cloud that, by the breeze impell'd,
Sweeps o'er the mountain side.
With joy the thoughtless youth
That grateful shadowing hall'd;
For grateful was the shade,
While through the silver-lighted haze,
Guiding their way, appear'd the beamless Sun.
But soon that beacon fail'd;
A heavier mass of cloud,
Impenetrably deep,
Hung o'er the wilderness.
"Knowest thou the track?" quoth Thalaba,
"Or should we pause, and wait the wind

for few of my servants are thankful. And when we had decreed that Solomon should die, nothing discovered his death unto them, except the creeping thing of the earth, which gnawed his staff. ||

"And when his body fell down, the Genii plainly perceived that if they had known that which is secret, they had not continued in a vile punishment." — Koran, chap. xxxiv.

us, that David, having laid the foundations of the temple of Jerusalem, which was to be in lieu of the tabernacle of Moses, when he died, left it to be finished by his son Solomon, who employed the Genii in the work: that Solomon, before the edifice was completed, perceiving his end drew nigh, begged of God, that his death might be concealed from the Genii, till they had entirely finished it: that God therefore so ordered it, that Solomon died as he stood at his prayers, leaning on his staff, which supported the body in that posture a full year; and the Genii, supposing him to be alive, continued their work during that term; at the expiration whereof, the temple being perfectly completed, a worm, which had gotten into the staff, eat it through, and the corpse fell to the ground, and discovered the king's death.

Possibly this fable of the temple being built by Genii, and not by men, might take its rise from what is mentioned in Scripture, that the house was built of stone, made ready before it was brought thither: so that there was neither hammer nor axe, nor tool of iron heard in the house while it was building.

To scatter this bewildering fog?"
The Sorcerer answer'd him,
"Now let us hold right on, . . . for if we stray,
The Sun to-morrow will direct our course."
So saying, he toward the desert depths
Misleads the youth deceived.

18.
Earlier the night came on,
Nor moon, nor stars, were visible in heaven;
And when at morn the youth unclosed his eyes,
He knew not where to turn his face in prayer.

"What shall we do?" Lobaba cried,
"The lights of heaven have ceased
To guide us on our way.
Should we remain and wait
More favourable skies,
Soon would our food and water fail us here:
And if we venture on,
There are the dangers of the wilderness!"

19.
"Sure it were best proceed!"
The chosen youth replies;
"So haply we may reach some tent, or grove
(Of dates, or station'd tribe.
But idly to remain,
Were yielding effortlessness, and waiting death."
The wily sorcerer willingly assents,
And farther in the sands,
Elate of heart, he leads the credulous youth.

20.
Still o'er the wilderness
Settled the moveless mist.
The timid Antelope, that heard their steps,
Stood doubtful where to turn in that dim light;
The Ostrich, blindly hastening, met them full.
At night, again in hope,
Young Thalaba lay down;
The morning came, and not one guiding ray
Through the thick mist was visible,
The same deep moveless mist that mantled all.

21.
Oh for the Vulture's scream,
Who haunts for prey the abode of humankind!
Oh for the Plover's pleasant cry¹
To tell of water near!
Oh for the Camel-driver's song²
For now the water-skin grows light,
Though of the draught, more eagerly desired,
Imperious prudence took with sparing thirst.
Oft from the third night's broken sleep,

As in his dreams he heard
The sound of rushing winds,
Started the anxious youth, and look'd abroad,
In vain! for still the deadly calm endured.
Another day pass'd on;
The water-skin was drain'd;
But then one hope arrived,
For there was motion in the air!
The sound of the wind arose anon,
That scatter'd the thick mist,
And lo! at length the lovely face of Heaven!

22.
Alas! . . . a wretched scene
Was open'd on their view.
They look'd around, no wells were near,
No tent, no human aid!
Flat on the Camel lay the water-skin,
And their dumb servant difficultly now,
Over hot sands and under the hot sun,
Dragg'd on with patient pain.

23.
But oh the joy! the blessed sight!
When in that burning waste the Travellers
Saw a green meadow, fair with flowers besprent,
Azure and yellow, like the beautiful fields
Of England, when amid the growing grass
The blue-bell bends, the golden king-cup shines,
And the sweet cowslip scents the genial air,
In the merry month of May!
Oh joy! the Travellers
Gaze on each other with hope-brighten'd eyes,
For sure through that green meadow flows
he living stream! And lo! their famish'd beast
Sees the restoring sight!
Hope gives his feeble limbs a sudden strength,
He hurries on! . . .

24.
The herbs so fair to eye
Were Senna, and the Gentian's blossom blue,
And kindred plants, that with unwater'd root
Fed in the burning sand, whose bitter leaves
Even frantic Famine loathed.³

25.
In uncommunicating misery
Silent they stood. At length Lobaba said,
"Son, we must slay the Camel, or we die
For lack of water! thy young hand is firm, . . .
Draw forth the knife and pierce him!" Wretch accurst!
Who that beheld thy venerable face,
Thy features stiff with suffering, the dry lips,

¹ "In places where there was water, we found a beautiful variety of the plover." — Niebuhr.

² "The camels of the hot countries are not fastened one to the tail of the other as in cold climates, but suffered to go at their will, like herds of cows. The camel-driver follows singing, and from time to time giving a sudden whistle. The louder he sings and whistles, the faster the camels go, and they stop as soon as he ceases to sing. The camel-drivers, to relieve each other, sing alternately; and when they wish their beasts to browse for half an hour on what they can find, they amuse themselves by smoking a pipe: after which, beginning again to sing, the camels immediately proceed." — Tavernier.

³ "At four in the afternoon we had an unexpected entertainment which filled our hearts with a very short-lived joy. The whole plain before us seemed thick covered with green grass and yellow daisies. We advanced to the place with as much speed as our lame condition would suffer us; but how terrible was our disappointment, when we found the whole of that verdure to consist in senna and colocintida, the most nauseous of plants, and the most incapable of being substituted as food for man or beast." — Bruce.

The feverish eyes, could deem that all within
 Was magic ease, and fearlessness secure;
 And wiles of hellish import? The young man
 Paused with reluctant pity: but he saw
 His comrade's red and painful countenance,
 And his own burning breath came short and quick,
 And at his feet the gasping beast
 Lies, over-worn with want.

26.

Then from his girdle Thalaba took the knife
 With stern compassion, and from side to side
 Across the Camel's throat,²
 Drew deep the crooked blade.
 Servant of man, that merciful deed
 For ever ends thy suffering; but what doom
 Waits thy deliverer? "Little will thy death
 Avail us!" thought the youth,

1 "The girdles of these people are usually of worsted, very artfully woven into a variety of figures, and made to wrap several times about their bodies; one end of them, by being doubled and sewn along the edges, serves them for a purse, agreeable to the acceptance of the word Zawr, in the Holy Scriptures: the Turks and Arabs make a further use of their girdles, by fixing their knives and poniards in them; whilst the Hojlas, i. e. the writers and secretaries, are distinguished by having an inkhorn, the badge of their office, suspended in the like situation." — Shaw.

2 "On the road we passed the skeleton of a camel, which now and then happens in the desert. These are poor creatures that have perished with fatigue; for those which are killed for the sustenance of the Arabs are carried away, bones and altogether. Of the hides are made the soles of the slippers which are worn in Egypt, without any dressing, but what the sun can give them. The circumstances of this animal's death, when his strength fails him on the road, have something in them affecting to humanity. Such are his patience and perseverance, that he pursues his journey without flagging as long as he has power to support his weight; and such are his fortitude and spirit, that he will never give out, until nature sinks beneath the complicated ills which press upon him. Then, and then only, will he resign his burden and body to the ground. Nor stripes, nor carresses, nor food, nor rest, will make him rise again! His vigour is exhausted, and life ebbs out apace. This the Arabs are very sensible of, and kindly plunge a sword into the breast of the dying beast, to shorten his pangs. Even the Arab feels remorse when he commits this deed; his hardened heart is moved at the loss of a faithful servant." — Eyles Irwin.

In the Monthly Magazine for January, 1800, is a letter from Professor Heering recommending the introduction of these animals at the Cape; but the camel is made only for level countries. "The animal is very ill qualified to travel upon the snow or wet ground; the breadth in which they carry their legs, when they slip, often occasions their splitting themselves; so that when they fall with great burdens, they seldom rise again." — Jonas Hanway.

"The African Arabs say, if one should put the question, 'Which is best for you, O Camel, to go up hill or down?' he will make answer, 'God's curse light on 'em both, wheresoever they are to be met with.' — Morgan's Hist. of Algiers.

"No creature seems so peculiarly fitted to the climate in which it exists. We cannot doubt the nature of the one has been adapted to that of the other by some disposing intelligence. Designing the Camel to dwell in a country where he can find little nourishment, nature has been sparing of her materials in the whole of his formation. She has not bestowed upon him the plump fleshiness of the ox, horse, or elephant; but limiting herself to what is strictly necessary, she has given him a small head without ears, at the end of a long neck without flesh. She has taken from his legs and thighs every muscle not immediately requisite for motion; and, in short, has bestowed on his withered body only the vessels and tendons necessary to connect his frame together. She has furnished him with a strong jaw, that he may grind the hardest aliments; but lest he should consume too much, she has contracted his stomach, and obliged him to chew the cud. She has lined his foot with a lump of flesh, which, sliding in the mud, and being no way adapted for climbing, fits him only for a dry, level, and sandy soil, like that of Arabia. She has evidently destined him likewise to slavery, by refusing him every sort of defence against his enemies. Destitute of the horns of the bull, the hoofs of the horse, the tooth of the elephant, and the swiftness of the stag, how can the camel resist or avoid the attacks of the lion, the tiger, or even the wolf? To preserve the species, therefore, nature has concealed him in the depths of the vast deserts, where the want of vegetables can attract no game, and whence the want of game repels every voracious animal." Tyranny must have expelled man from the habitable parts of the earth, before the Camel could have lost his liberty. Become domestic, he has rendered habitable the most barren soil the world contains. He alone supplies all his master's wants. The milk of the Camel nourishes the family of the Arab, under the various forms of curds, cheese, and butter; and they often feed upon his flesh. Slippers and harness are made of his skin, and tents and clothing of his hair. Heavy burdens are transported by his means, and when the earth denies forage to the horse, so valuable to the Redoubt, the she-camel supplies that deficiency by her milk, at no other cost, for so many advantages, than a few stalks of brambles or wormwood, and pounded date kernels. So great is the importance of the Camel to the desert, that were it deprived of that useful animal, it must infallibly lose every inhabitant." — Folney.

3 "Where any part of these Deserts is sandy and level, the horizon is as fit for astronomical observations as the sea, and appears, at a small distance, to be no less a collection of water. It was likewise equally surprising to observe in what an extraordinary manner every object appeared to be magnified within it; inasmuch, that a shrub seemed as big as a tree, and a flock of Archibobas might be mistaken for a caravan of Camels. This seeming collection of water always advances about a quarter of a mile before us, whilst the intermediate space appears to be in one continued glow, occasioned by the quivering undulating motion of that quick succession of vapours and exhalations, which are extracted by the powerful influence of the sun." — Shaw.

In the Bakar Dawson is a metaphor drawn from this optical deception. "It is the ancient custom of Fortune, and time has long established the habit, that she at first bewilders the thirsty travellers in the path of desire, by the misty vapours of disappointment; but when their distress and misery has reached extremity, suddenly relieving them from the dark windings of confusion and error, she conducts them to the fountains of enjoyment."

"The burning heat of the sun was reflected with double violence from the hot sand, and the distant ridges of the hills, seen through the ascending vapours, seemed to wave and fluctuate like the unsettled sea." — Mungo Park.

"I shake the lash over my camel, and she quickens her pace, while the sultry vapour rolls in waves over the burning clods." — Moullakat. Poem of Tarafa.

¹ Perhaps no traveller but Mr. Park ever survived to relate similar sufferings.

"I pushed on as fast as possible, in hopes of reaching some watering-place in the course of the night. My thirst was by this time become insufferable; my mouth was parched and inflamed, a sudden dimness would frequently come over my eyes, with other symptoms of fainting; and my horse being very much fatigued, I began seriously to apprehend that I should perish of thirst. To relieve the burning pain in my mouth and throat, I chewed the leaves of different shrubs, but found them all bitter, and of no service to me.

"A little before sunset, having reached the top of a gentle rising, I climbed a high tree, from the topmost branches of which I cast a melancholy look over the barren wilderness, but without discovering the most distant trace of a human dwelling. The same dismal uniformity of shrubs and sand every where presented itself, and the horizon was as level and uninterrupted as that of the sea.

"Descending from the tree, I found my horse devouring the stubble and brushwood with great avidity, and as I was now too faint to attempt walking, and my horse too much fatigued to carry me, I thought it but an act of humanity, and perhaps the last I should ever have it in my power to perform, to take off his bridle, and let him shift for himself; in doing which I was suddenly affected with sickness and giddiness, and falling upon the sand, felt as if the hour of death was fast approaching. Here then, thought I, after a short but ineffectual struggle, terminate all my hopes of being useful in my day and generation; here must the short span of my life come to an end. — I cast (as I believed) a last look on the surrounding scene, and whilst I reflected on the awful change that was about to take place, this world, with its enjoyments, seemed to vanish from my recollection. Nature, however, at length resumed its functions; and, on recovering my senses, I found myself stretched upon the sand with the bridle still in my hand, and the sun just sinking behind the trees. I now summoned all my resolution, and determined to make another effort to prolong my existence. And as the evening

Whilst he spake, Lobaba's eye,
Upon the distance fix'd,
Attended not his speech.
Its fearful meaning drew
The looks of Thalaba;
Columns of sand came moving on,

was somewhat cool, I resolved to travel as far as my limbs would carry me, in hopes of reaching (my only resource) a watering-place. With this view I put the bridle on my horse, and driving him before me, went slowly along for about an hour, when I perceived some lightning from the north-east, a most delightful sight, for it promised rain. The darkness and lightning increased very rapidly; and in less than an hour I heard the wind roaring among the bushes. I had already opened my mouth to receive the refreshing drops which I expected, but I was instantly covered with a cloud of sand, driven with such force by the wind, as to give a very disagreeable sensation to my face and arms, and I was obliged to mount my horse and stop under a bush to prevent being suffocated. — The sand continued to fly in amazing quantities, for near an hour, after which I again set forward, and travelled with difficulty until ten o'clock. About this time I was agreeably surprised by some very vivid flashes of lightning, followed by a few heavy drops of rain. In a little time the sand ceased to fly, and I alighted and spread out all my clean clothes to collect the rain, which at length I saw would certainly fall. — For more than an hour it rained plentifully, and I quenched my thirst by wringing and sucking my clothes." — Park's Travels in the Interior of Africa.

² "All the time I was in Barbary I could never get sight of above three or four Dromedaries. These the Arabs call Mehera, the singular is Meheri. They are of several sorts and degrees of value, some worth many common Camels, others scarce worth two or three. To look on, they seem little different from the rest of that species, only I think the excrescence on a Dromedary's back is somewhat less than that of a Camel. What is reported of their sleeping, or rather seeming scarce alive, for some time after coming into this world, is no fable. The longer they lie so, the more excellent they prove in their kind, and consequently of higher price and esteem. None lie in that trance more than ten days and nights. These that do are pretty rare, and are called Aashari, from Aashara, which signifies ten in Arabic. I saw one such, perfectly white all over, belonging to Lella Oumane, Princess of that noble Arab Neja, named Heyl ben Ali, I spoke of, and upon which she put a very great value, never sending it abroad but upon some extraordinary occasion, when the greatest expedition was required; having others, inferior in swiftness, for more ordinary messages. They say that one of these Aasharies will, in one night, and through a level country, traverse as much ground as any single horse can perform in ten, which is no exaggeration of the matter, since many have affirmed to me, that it makes nothing of holding its rapid pace, which is a most violent hard trot, for four-and-twenty hours upon a stretch, with-

High . . high in heaven upcure'd
 The dreadful sand-spouts moved :
 Swift as the whirlwind that impell'd their way,
 They came toward the travellers !
 The old Magician shriek'd,
 And lo ! the foremost bursts,
 Before the whirlwind's force,
 Scattering afar a burning shower of sand.
 " Now by the virtue of the Ring, out showing the least sign of weariness, or inclination to halt, and that having then swallowed a ball or two of a sort of paste, made up of barley-meal, and may-be a little powder of dates among it, with a bowl of water, or Camel's milk, if to be had, and which the courier seldom forgets to be provided with, in skins, as well for the sustenance of himself as of his Pegasus, the indefatigable animal will seem as fresh as at first setting out, and ready to continue running at the same scarce credible rate for as many hours longer, and so on from one extremity of the African Deserts to the other, provided its rider could hold out without sleep or other refreshment. This has been averred to me by, I believe, more than a thousand Arabs and Moors, all agreeing in every particular.

" I happened to be, once in particular, at the tent of that Princess, with Ali ben Mahamoud, the Bey, or Vice-Roy, of the Algerine Eastern Province, when he went thither to celebrate his nuptials with Ambarca, her only daughter, if I mistake not. Among other entertainments she gave her guests, the favourite white Dromedary was brought forth, roady saddled and bridled. I say bridled, because the thong, which serves instead of a bridle, was put through the hole purposely made in the gristle of the creature's nose. The Arab appointed to mount, was straitly laced, from the very loins quite to his throat, in a strong leathern jacket, they never riding these animals any otherwise accoutred, so impetuously violent are the convulsions the rider undergoes, during that rapid motion, that were he to be loose, I much question whether a few hours such unintermitting agitation would not endanger the bursting of some of his entrails, and this the Arabs scruple not to acknowledge. We were to be diverted with seeing this fine Aashari run against some of the swiftest bars in the whole Neja, which is famed for having good ones, of the true Libyan breed, shaped like greyhounds, and which will sometimes run down an ostrich, which few of the very best can pretend to do, especially upon a hard ground, perfectly level. We all started like racers, and for the first spurt most of the best mounted among us kept up pretty well, but our grass-fed horses soon flagged: several of the Libyan and Numidian runners held pace till we, who still followed upon a good round hand-gallop, could no longer discern them, and then gave out; as we were told after their return. When the Dromedary had been out of our sight about half an hour, we again espied it flying towards us with an amazing velocity, and in a very few moments was among us, and seemingly nothing concerned; while the horses and mares were all in a foam, and scarce able to breathe, as was likewise a fleet tall greyhound bitch of the young Prince, who had followed and kept pace the whole time, and was no sooner got back to us, but lay down panting as if ready to expire. I cannot tell how many miles we went, but we were near three hours in coming leisurely back to the tents, yet made no stop in the way. The young prince Hamet ben al Guydom ben Sakhari, and his younger brother Messoud, told their new brother-in-law, that they defied all the potentates of Africa to show him such an Aashari; and the Arab who rode it challenged the Bey to lay his lady a wager of 1000 ducats, that he did not bring him an answer to a letter from the Prince of Wargala, in less than four days, though Leo Africanus, Marmol, and several others, assure us, that it is no less than forty Spanish

Save us ! " Lobaba cried,
 " While yet thou hast the power,
 Save us ! O save us ! now ! "
 The youth made no reply,
 Gazing in aweful wonder on the scene.

leagues, of four miles each, south of Tuggart, to which place, upon another occasion, as I shall observe, we made six tedious days march from the neighbourhood of Biscara, north of which we were then, at least thirty hours riding, if I remember rightly. However, the Bey, who was a native of Biscara, and consequently well acquainted with the Sahara, durst not take him up. By all circumstances, and the description given us, besides what I know of the matter myself, it could not be much less than 400 miles, and as many back again, the fellow offered to ride in so short a time; nay, many other Arabs boldly proffered to venture all they were worth in the world, that he would perform it with all the ease imaginable."—Morgan's History of Algiers.

Chemer says, " the Dromedary can travel 60 leagues in a day: his motion is so rapid, that the rider is obliged to be girthed to the saddle, and to have a handkerchief before his mouth to break the current of the wind." These accounts are probably much exaggerated.

" The royal couriers in Persia wear a white sash girded from the shoulders to their waist many times round their bodies, by which means they are enabled to ride for many days without great fatigue."—Hawney.

" We were here at once surprised and terrified by a sight surely the most magnificent in the world. In that vast expanse of desert, from W. and to N. W. of us, we saw a number of prodigious pillars of sand at different distances, at times moving with great celerity, at others stalking with a majestic slowness: at intervals we thought they were coming in a very few moments to overwhelm us, and small quantities of sand did actually, more than once, reach us. Again they would retreat so as to be almost out of sight, their tops reaching to the very clouds. There the tops often separated from the bodies, and these once disjointed, dispersed in the air, and did not appear more. Sometimes they were broken near the middle, as if struck with a large cannon shot. About noon, they began to advance with considerable swiftness upon us, the wind being very strong at north. Eleven of them ranged along side of us about the distance of three miles. The greatest diameter of the largest appeared to me at that distance, as if it would measure ten feet. They retired from us with a wind at S. E. leaving an impression upon my mind to which I can give no name; though surely one ingredient in it was fear, with a considerable deal of wonder and astonishment. It was in vain to think of flying, the swiftest horse, or the fastest sailing ship, could be of no use to carry us out of this danger, and the full persuasion of this riveted me as if to the spot where I stood.

" On the 15th, the same appearance of moving pillars of sand presented themselves to us, only they seemed to be more in number, and less in size. They came several times in a direction close upon us; that is, I believe, within less than two miles. They began immediately after sun-rise, like a thick wood, and almost darkened the sun. His rays shining through them for near an hour, gave them an appearance of pillars of fire. Our people now became desperate: the Greeks shrieked out, and said it was the day of judgement. Ismael pronounced it to be hell, and the Tucorories that the world was on fire."—Bruce.

"Ha! do I know thee, Infidel accurst?"
Exclaim'd the awaken'd youth.
"And thou hast led me hither, Child of Sin!
That fear might make me sell
My soul to endless death!"

34.

"Fool that thou art!" Lobaba cried,
"Call upon Him whose name
Thy charmed signet bears,
Or die the death thy foolishness deserves!"

35.

"Servant of Hell! die thou!" quoth Thalaba.
And leaning on his bow
He fitted the loose string
And laid the arrow in its resting-place.
"Bow of my Father, do thy duty now!"
He drew the arrow to its point
True to his eye it fled,
And full upon the breast
It smote the Sorcerer.
Astonish'd Thalaba beheld
The blunted point recoil.

36.

A proud and bitter smile
Wrinkled Lobaba's cheek.
"Try once again thine earthly arms!" he cried.
"Rash Boy! the Power I serve
Abandons not his votaries.
It is for Allah's wretched slaves, like thou,
To serve a master, who in the hour of need
Forsakes them to their fate!
I leave thee!" . . . and he shook his staff, and call'd
The Chariot of his charms.

37.

Swift as the viewless wind
Self-moved, the Chariot came;
The Sorcerer mounts the seat,
"Yet once more weigh thy danger!" he resumed,
"Ascend the car with me,
And with the speed of thought
We pass the desert bounds."
The indignant youth vouchsafed not to reply,
And lo! the magic car begins its course!

38.

Hark! hark! . . . he shrieks. . . Lobaba shrieks!
What, wretch, and hast thou raised
The rushing terrors of the Wilderness
To fall on thine own head?
Death! death! inevitable death!
Driven by the breath of God,
A column of the Desert met his way.

¹ "The Pelican makes choice of dry and desert places to lay her eggs; when her young are hatched, she is obliged to bring water to them from great distances. To enable her to perform this necessary office, Nature has provided her with a large sack, which extends from the tip of the under mandible of her bill to the throat, and holds as much water as will supply her brood for several days. This water she pours into the nest, to cool her young, to allay their thirst, and to teach them to swim. Lions, Tigers, and other rapacious

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

THE FIFTH BOOK.

"Thou hast girded me with strength unto the battle; thou hast subdued under me those that rose up against me."
Psalms xviii. 39.

I.

WHEN Thalaba from adoration rose,
The air was cool, the sky
With welcome clouds o'ercast,
Which soon came down in rain.
He lifted up his fever'd face to heaven,
And bared his head and stretch'd his hands
To that delightful shower,
And felt the coolness permeate every limb,
Freshening his powers of life.

2.

A loud quick panting! Thalaba looks up,
He starts, and his instinctive hand
Grasps the knife hilt; for close beside
A Tiger passes him.
An indolent and languid eye
The passing Tiger turn'd;
His head was hanging down,
His dry tongue lolling low,
And the short panting of his breath
Came through his hot parch'd nostrils painfully.
The young Arabian knew
The purport of his hurried pace,
And following him in hope,
Saw joyful from afar
The Tiger stoop and drink.

3.

A desert Pelican had built her nest
In that deep solitude,
And now, return'd from distant flight,
Fraught with the river-stream,
Her load of water had disburthen'd there.
Her young in the refreshing bath
Dipt down their callow heads,
Fill'd the swollen membrane from their plumless throat
Pendant, and bills yet soft;
And buoyant with arch'd breast,
Plied in unpractised stroke
The oars of their broad feet.
They, as the spotted prowler of the wild
Laps the cool wave¹, around their another crowd, animals, resort to these nests, and drink the water, and are said not to injure the young."—Smellie's Philosophy of Natural History.

It is perhaps from this power of carrying a supply of water that the pelican is called Jimmel el Bahar, the Camel of the River. Bruce notices a curious blunder upon this subject in the translation of Norden's Travels. "On looking into Mr. Norden's Voyage," says he, "I was struck at first sight with this paragraph: 'We saw, this day, abundance of camels; but

And nestle underneath her outspread wings.
The spotted prowler of the wild
Lapt the cool wave, and satiate, from the nest,
Guiltless of blood, withdrew.

4.
The mother-bird had moved not,
But cowering o'er her nestlings,
Sate confident and fearless,
And watch'd the wonted guest.
But when the human visitant approach'd,
The alarmed Pelican
Retiring from that hostile shape
Gathers her young, and menaces with wings,
And forward thrusts her threatening neck,
Its feathers ruffling in her wrath,
Bold with maternal fear.
Thalaba drank, and in the water-skin
Hoarded the precious element.
Not all he took, but in the large nest left
Store that sufficed for life;
And journeying onward, blest the Carrier Bird,
And blest, in thankfulness,
Their common Father, provident for all.

they did not come near enough for us to shoot them.' I thought with myself, to shoot camels in Egypt, would be very little better than to shoot men, and that it was very lucky for him the camels did not come near, if that was the only thing that prevented him. Upon looking at the note, I see it is a small mistake of the translator, who says, that in the original it is Chameaux d'eau, Water Camels; but whether they are a particular species of camels, or a different kind of animal, he does not know."

¹ These prominent features of an Oriental city will be found in all the views of Sir John Chardin.

"The mosques, the minarets, and numerous cupolas, form a splendid spectacle; and the flat roofs of the houses, which are situated on the hills, rising one behind another, present a succession of hanging terraces, interspersed with cypress and poplar trees."—Russel's Nat. Hist. of Aleppo.

"The circuit of Ispahan, taking in the suburbs, is not less than that of Paris; but Paris contains ten times the number of its inhabitants. It is not, however, astonishing that this city is so extensive and so thinly peopled, because every family has its own house, and almost every house its garden; so that there is much void ground. From whatever side you arrive, you first discover the towers of the mosques, and then the trees which surround the houses: at a distance, Ispahan resembles a forest more than a town."—Tavernier.

Of Alexandria, Volney says, "the spreading palm-trees, the terraced houses, which seem to have no roof, the lofty slender minarets, all announce to the traveller that he is in another world."

² "Almanzor, riding one day with his courtiers along the banks of the Tigris, where Seleucia formerly stood, was so delighted with the beauty of the country, that he resolved there to build his new capital. Whilst he was conversing with his attendants upon this project, one of them, separating from the rest, met a hermit, whose cell was near, and entered into talk with him, and communicated the design of the Caliph. The Hermit replied, well knew, by a tradition of the country, that a city would one day be built in that plain, but that its founder would be a man called Moclus, a name very different from both those of the Caliph, Claffar and Almanzor.

"The Officer rejoined Almanzor, and repeated his conversation with the Hermit. As soon as the Caliph heard the name of Moclus, he descended from his horse, prostrated himself, and returned thanks to God, for that he was chosen to execute his orders. His courtiers waited for an explana-

Till after the long toil of many a day,
At length Bagdad appear'd,
The City of his search.

ation of this conduct with eagerness, and the Caliph told them thus: 'During the Caliphate of the Omniades, my brothers and myself being very young, and possessing very little, were obliged to live in the country, where each in rotation was to provide sustenance for the whole. On one of my days, as I was without money, and had no means of procuring food, I took a bracelet belonging to my nurse, and pawned it. This woman made a great outcry, and, after much search, discovered that I had been the thief. In her anger she abused me plentifully, and, among other terms of reproach, she called me Moclus, the name of a famous robber in those days; and, during the rest of her life, she never called me by any other name. Therefore I know that God has destined me to perform this work.'—Marigny.

Almanzor named his new city Dar-al-Salam, the City of Peace, but it obtained the name of Bagdad, from that of this Hermit, who dwelt upon its site.

³ Almanzor signifies the Victorious.

"Bagdad was founded in consequence of a singular superstition. A sect called Ravendiens conceived, that they ought to render those honours to the Caliphs which the Moslem hold should only be paid to the Deity. They therefore came in great numbers to Ilaschemia, where the Caliph Almanzor usually resided, and made around his palace the same processions and ceremonies which the Moslem make around the Temple at Mecca. The Caliph prohibited this, commanding them not to profane a religious ceremony which ought to be reserved solely to the Temple at Mecca. The Ravendiens did not regard the prohibition, and continued to act as before.

"Almanzor, seeing their obstinacy, resolved to conquer it, and began by arresting a hundred of these fanatics. This astonished them; but they soon recovered their courage, took arms, marched to the prison, forced the doors, delivered their friends, and then returned to make their procession round the palace in reverence of the Caliph.

"Enraged at this insolence, the Caliph put himself at the head of his guards, and advanced against the Ravendiens, expecting that his appearance would immediately disperse them. Instead of this, they resisted and repulsed him so vigorously, that he had nearly fallen a victim. But timely succours arrived, and after a great slaughter, these fanatics were expelled the town. This singular rebellion, arising from excess of loyalty, so disgusted Almanzor, that he determined to forsake the town which had witnessed it, and accordingly laid the foundation of Bagdad."—Marigny.

At Tauris, he says, "there are the fairest Basars that are in any place of Asia; and it is a lovely sight to see their vast extent, their largeness, their beautiful Duomos, and the arches over them."

"At Bagdad the Bazars are all vaulted, otherwise the merchants could not remain in them on account of the heat. They are also watered two or three times a-day, and a number of the poor are paid for rendering this service to the public." — Tavernier.

² "On the other side of the river, towards Arabia, over against the city, there is a faire place or towne, and in it a fair Bazar for merchants, with very many lodgings, where the greatest part of the merchants strangers which come to Babylon do lie with their merchandize. The passing over Tygris from Babylon to this Borough is by a long bridge, made of boates, chained together with great chaines, provided, that when the river waxeth great with the abundance of raine that falleth, then they open the bridge in the middle, where the one-half of the bridge falleth to the walles of Babylon, and the other to the brinks of this Borough, on the other side of the river; and as long as the bridge is open, they passe the river in small boats, with great danger, because of the smallness of the boats, and the overlading of them, that with the fiercenesse of the stream they be overthrowen, or els the streame doth carry them away; so that by this meanes many people are lost and drowned." — Cesar Frederick in Hakluyt.

"Here are great store of victuals, which come from Armenia down the river of Tygris. They are brought upon rafts made of goats' skines blown full of wind, and bordes layde upon them; which being discharged, they open their skines, and carry them backe by Camels." — Ralph Fitch in Hakluyt.

³ In Tavernier's time there were five Mosques at Bagdad, two of them fine, their large domes covered with varnished tiles of different colours.

⁴ At Bagdad are many cranes, who build their nests upon the tops of the minarets, and the loftiest houses.

Hath been his daily thought, his nightly dream,

The many-coloured domes³
Yet wore one dusky hue;
The Cranes upon the Mosque
Kept their night-clatter still;⁴
When through the gate the early Traveller pass'd,
And when at evening o'er the swampy plain

Distinct in darkness seen
Above the low horizon's lingering light,
Rose the near ruins of old Babylon.

"At Adanaqui, cranes are so abundant, that there is scarcely a house which has not several nests upon it. They are very tame, and the inhabitants never molest them. When any thing disturbs these birds, they make a violent clatter with their long beaks, which is some time repeated by the others all over the town; and this noise will sometimes continue for several minutes. It is as loud as a watchman's rattle, and not much unlike it in sound." — Jackson.

"The cranes were now arrived at their respective quarters, and a couple had made their nest, which is bigger in circumference than a bushel, or a dome close by our chamber. This pair stood, side by side, with great gravity, showing no concern at what was transacting beneath them, but at intervals twisting about their long necks, and clattering with their beaks, turned behind them upon their backs, as it were in concert. This was continued the whole night. An owl, a bird also unmolested, was perched hard by, and as frequently booted. The crane is tall, like a heron, but much larger; the body white, with black pinions, the neck and legs very long, the head small, and the bill thick. The Turks call its friend and brother, believing it has an affection for their nation, and will accompany them into the countries they shall conquer. In the course of our journey we saw one hopping on a wall with a single leg, the maimed stump wrapped in linen." — Chandler's Travels in Asia Minor.

⁵ "I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of Hosts, and cut off from Babylon the name and remnant, and son and nephew, saith the Lord. I will also make it a possession for the Bittern, and pools of water." — Isaiah, xiv. 22, 23.

2 Our early Travellers have given us strange and circumstantial accounts of what they conceive to have been the Temple of Belus.

" The Tower of Nimrod or Babel, is situate on that side of Tygris that Arabia is, and in a very great plaine distant from Babylon seven or eight miles : which tower is ruinated on every side : and with the falling of it there is made a great mountain, so that it hath no forme at all ; yet there is a great part of it standing, which is compassed, and almost covered, with the aforesaid fallings. This Tower was builded and made of four-square bricks ; which bricks were made of earth, and dried in the Sunne in maner and forme following : First they layed a lay of bricks, then a mat made of cones, square as the bricks, and, instead of lime, they daubed it with earth. These mats of canes are at this time so strong, that it is a thing wonderfull to beholde, being of such great antiquity. I have gone round about it, and have not found any place where there hath bene any door or entrance. It may be, in my judgement, in circuit about a mile, and rather less than more.

" This Tower, in effect, is contrary to all other things which are seene afar off ; for they seeme small, and the more nere a man commeth to them, the bigger they be : but this Tower, afar off, seemeth a very great thing, and the nerer you come to it the lesser. My judgement and reason of this is, that because the Tower is set in a very great plaine, and hath nothing more about to make any shew saving the ruines of it, which it hath made round about ; and for this respect, deserying it afarre off, that piece of the Tower which yet standeth with the mountaine that is made of the substance that hath fallen from it, maketh a greater shew than you shall finde coming nere to it." — Cæsar Frederick.

John Eldred notices the same deception : " Being upon a plaine ground, it seemeth afarre off very great ; but the nerer you come to it, the lesser and lesser it appeareth. Sundry times I have gone thither to see it, and found the remnants yet standing, about a quarter of a mile in compass, and almost as high as the stone-woke of St. Paul's steeple in London, but it sheweth much bigger." — Hakluyt.

" In the middle of a vast ~~and~~ level plain, about a quarter of a league from the Euphrates, which in that place runs westward, appears a heap of ruined buildings, like a huge mountain, the materials of which are so confounded together, that one knows not what to make of it. Its figure is square, and rises in form of a tower or pyramid, with four fronts, which answer to the four quarters of the compass ; but it seems longer from north to south than from east to west, and is, as far as I could judge by my pacing it, a large quarter of a league. Its situation and form correspond with that pyramid which Strabo calls the tower of Belus : and is, in all likelihood, the tower of Nimrod in Babylon or Babel, as that place is still called. In that author's time it had nothing remaining of the stairs, and other ornaments mentioned by Herodotus, the greatest part of it having been ruined by Xerxes ; and Alexander, who designed to have restored it to its former lustre, was prevented by death. There appear no marks of ruins without the compass of that huge mass, to convince one that so great a city as Babylon had ever stood there ; all one discovers within fifty or sixty paces of it, being only the remains, here and there, of some foundations of buildings ; and the country round about it is so flat and level, that one can hardly believe it should be chosen for the situation of so great and noble a city as Babylon, or that there were ever any remarkable buildings on it : but, for my part, I am astonished there appears so much as there does, considering it is at least 4000 years since that city was built ; and that Diodorus Siculus tells us, it was reduced almost to nothing in his time. The height of this mountain of ruins is not in every part equal, but exceeds the highest palace in Naples : it is a mishapen mass, wherein there is no appearance of regularity ; in some places it rises in points, is craggy and inaccessible ; in others it is smoother, and is of easier ascent ; there are also tracks of torrents from the top to the bottom, caused by the rains ; and both withinside, and upon it, one sees parts some higher and some lower. It is not to be discovered whether ever there were any steps to ascend it, or any doors to enter into it ; whence one may easily judge that the stairs ran winding about on the outside ; and that being the less solid parts, they were soonest demolished, so that not the least sign of any appears at present.

" Withinside one finds some grottos, but so ruined that one can make nothing of them, whether they were built at the same time with that work, or made since by the peasants for shelter : which last seems to be the most likely. The Mahomedans believe that these caverns were appointed by God as places of punishment for Harut and Marut, two angels, who they suppose were sent from Heaven to judge the crimes of men, but did not execute their commissions as they ought. It is evident from these ruins, that the tower of Nimrod was built with great and thick bricks, as I carefully observed, causing holes to be dug in several places for the purpose ; but they do not appear to have been burnt, but dried in the sun, which is extreme hot in those parts. In laying these bricks, neither lime nor sand was employed, but only earth tempered and petrified ; and in those parts which made the floors, there had been mingled with that earth, which served instead of lime, bruised reeds, or hard straw, such as large mats are made of, to strengthen the work. Afterwards one perceives at certain distances, in diverse places, especially where the strongest buttresses were to be, several other bricks of the same size, but more solid, and burnt in a kiln, and set in good lime, or bitumen ; nevertheless, the greatest number consists of those which are only dried in the sun.

" I make no doubt but this ruin was the ancient Babel, and the tower of Nimrod ; for, besides the evidence of its situation, it is acknowledged to be such by the people of the country, being vulgarly called Babil by the Arabs." — Pietro delle Valle. Universal History.

—— " Eight towers arise,
Each above each, immeasurable height,
A monument, at once, of Eastern pride
And slavish superstition. Round, a scale
Of circling steps entwines the conic pile ;
And at the bottom, on vast hinges grate
Four brazen gates, toward the four winds of heaven,
Placed in the solid square."

Alone unchanged, a free and bridgeless tide,
Euphrates rolls along,
Eternal Nature's work.

11.
Through the broken portal,
Over weedy fragments,
Thalaba went his way.
Cautious he trod, and felt
The dangerous ground before him with his bow.
The Jackal started at his steps ;
The Stork, alarm'd at sound of man,
From her broad nest upon the old pillar top,
Affrighted fled on flapping wings :
The Adder, in her haunts disturb'd,
Lanced at the intruding staff her arrowy tongue.

12.
Twilight and moonshine dimly mingling gave
An awful light obscure,
Evening not wholly closed,
The Moon still pale and faint :
An awful light obscure,
Broken by many a mass of blackest shade ;
Long column stretching dark through weeds and moss,
Broad length of lofty wall,
Whose windows lay in light,
And of their former shape, low arch'd or square,
Rude outline on the earth
Figured, with long grass fringed.

13.
Reclined against a column's broken shaft,
Unknowing whitherward to bend his way,
He stood, and gazed around.
The Ruins closed him in ;
It seem'd as if no foot of man
For ages had intruded there.

14.
Soon at approaching step
Startling, he turn'd and saw
A Warrior in the moon-beam drawing near Forward the Stranger came,
And with a curious eye
Perused the Arab youth.

1 " And Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah.

" It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation: neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there, neither shall the Shepherds make their fold there."—Isaiah, xlii. 19, 20.

2 The stupid superstition of the Turks with regard to hidden treasures, is well known: it is difficult, or even dangerous, for a traveller to copy an inscription in sight of those barbarians.

" On a rising ground, at a league's distance from the river Shelliff, is Memoun-turkey, as they call an old square 15.

" And who art thou," the Stranger cried,
" That at an hour like this
Wanderest in Babylon ?
A way-bewilder'd traveller, seekest thou
The ruinous shelter here ?
Or comest thou to hide
The plunder of the night ?
Or hast thou spells to make
These ruins, yawning from their rooted base,
Disclose their secret wealth ? " 2

16.
The youth replied, " Nor wandering traveller,
Nor robber of the night,
Nor skill'd in spells am I.
I seek the Angels here,
Haruth and Maruth. Stranger, in thy turn,
Why wanderest thou in Babylon,
And who art thou, the questioner ? "

17.
The man was fearless, and the temper'd pride
Which toned the voice of Thalaba
Displeased not him, himself of haughty heart.
Heedless he answered, " Knowest thou
Their cave of punishment ? "

18.
THALABA.
Vainly I seek it.

STRANGER.
Art thou firm of foot
To tread the ways of danger ?

THALABA.
Point the path !

STRANGER.
Young Arab ! if thou hast a heart can beat
Evenly in danger ; if thy bowels yearn not
With human fears, at scenes where undisgraced
The soldier tried in battle might look back
And tremble, follow me ! . . for I am bound
Into that cave of horrors.

19
Thalaba
Gazed on his comrade : he was young, of port
Stately and strong ; belike his face had pleased
A woman's eye ; but the youth read in it
Unrestrain'd passions, the obdurate soul
Bold in all evil daring ; and it taught, tower, formerly a sepulchral monument of the Romans. This, like many more ancient edifices, is supposed by the Arabs to have been built over a treasure ; agreeably to which account, they tell us, these mystical lines were inscribed upon it. Prince Maimoun Tizai wrote this upon his tower :—

" ' My Treasure is in my Shade,
And my Shade is in my Treasure.
Search for it ; despair not :
Nay despair ; do not search.' "—Shaw.
So of the ruins of the ancient Tubuna :—
" The Treasure of Tubnah lyeth under the shade of what is shaded. Dig for it: alas ! it is not there."—Shaw.

By Nature's irresistible instinct, doubt
Well-timed and wary. Of himself assured,
Fearless of man, and firm in faith,
"Lead on!" cried Thalaba.
Mohareb led the way;
And through the ruin'd streets,
And through the farther gate,
They pass'd in silence on.

20.

What sound is borne on the wind?
Is it the storm that shakes
The thousand oaks of the forest?
But Thalaba's long locks
Flow down his shoulders moveless, and the wind
In his loose mantle raises not a fold.
Is it the river's roar
Dash'd down some rocky descent?
Along the level plain
Euphrates glides unheard.
What sound disturbs the night,
Loud as the summer forest in the storm,
As the river that roars among rocks?

21.

And what the heavy cloud
That hangs upon the vale,
Thick as the mist o'er a well-water'd plain
Settling at evening when the cooler air
Lets its day-vapours fall;
Black as the sulphur-cloud,
That through Vesuvius, or from Hecla's mouth,
Rolls up, ascending from the infernal fires.

22.

From Ait's bitumen-lake¹
That heavy cloud ascends;

¹ "The springs of bitumen called Oyun Hit, the fountains of Hit, are much celebrated by the Arabs and Persians; the latter call it Cheshmeh kir, the fountain of pitch. This liquid bitumen they call Nafta; and the Turks, to distinguish it from pitch, give it the name of hara sakiz, or black mastich. A Persian geographer says, that Nafta issues out of the springs of the earth, as ambergris issues out of those of the sea. All the modern travellers, except Rauwolf, who went to Persia and the Indies by the way of the Euphrates, before the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope, mention this fountain of liquid bitumen as a strange thing. Some of them take notice of the river mentioned by Herodotus, and assure us that the people of the country have a tradition, that when the tower of Babel was building, they brought the bitumen from hence; which is confirmed by the Arab and Persian historians.

"Hit, Hët, Et, Ait, or Idt, as it is variously written by travellers, is a great Turkish town, situate upon the right or west side of the Euphrates, and has a castle; to the south-west of which, and three miles from the town, in a valley, are many springs of this black substance; each of which makes a noise like a smith's forge, incessantly puffing and blowing out the matter so loud, that it may be heard a mile off; wherefore the Moors and Arabs call it Bab al Jehennem, that is, hell-gate. It swallows up all heavy things; and many camels, from time to time, fall into the pits, and are irrecoverably lost. It issues from a certain lake, sending forth a filthy smoke, and continually boiling over with the pitch, which spreads itself over a great field, that is always full of it. It is free for every one to take; they use it to caulk or

That everlasting roar
From where its gushing springs
Boll their black billows up.
Silent the Arabian youth,
Along the verge of that wide lake,
Follow'd Mohareb's way,
Toward a ridge of rocks that bank'd its side.
There from a cave, with torrent force,
And everlasting roar,
The black bitumen roll'd.
The moonlight lay upon the rocks;
Their crags were visible,
The shade of jutting cliffs,
And where broad lichens whiten'd some smooth spot,
And where the ivy hung
Its flowing tresses down.
A little way within the cave
The moonlight fell, glossing the sable tide
That gush'd tumultuous out.
A little way it entered, then the rock
Arching its entrance, and the winding way,
Darken'd the unseen depths.

23.

No eye of mortal man,
If unenabled by enchanted spell,
Had pierced those fearful depths;
For mingling with the roar
Of the portentous torrent, oft were heard
Shrieks, and wild yells that scared
The brooding Eagle from her midnight nest.
The affrighted countrymen
Call it the Mouth of Hell;
And ever when their way leads near,
They hurry with averted eyes,
And dropping their beads fast,² Pronounce the Holy Name.

pitch their boats, laying it on two or three inches thick, which keeps out the water: with it also they pitch their houses, made of palm-tree branches. If it was not that the inundations of the Euphrates carry away the pitch, which covers all the sands from the place where it rises to the river, there would have been mountains of it long since. The very ground and stones thereabouts afford bitumen; and the fields abundance of sulphur.—Universal History.

² "The Mussulmans use, like the Roman Catholics, a rosary of beads, called Tushah, or implement of praise. It consists, if I recollect aright, of ninety-nine beads; in dropping which through the fingers, they repeat the attributes of God, as, 'O Creator, O Merciful, O Forgiving, O Omnipotent, O Omnicient,' &c. &c. This act of devotion is called Taleel, from the repetition of the letter L, or Laum, which occurs in the word Allah (God), always joined to the epithet or attribute, as, 'Ya Allah Khalick,' 'O God, the Creator;' 'Ya Allah Kerrem,' 'O God, the Merciful,' &c. &c. The devotees may be seen muttering their beads as they walk the streets, and in the intervals of conversation in company. The rosaries of persons of fortune and rank have the heads of diamonds, pearls, rubies, and emeralds. Those of the humble are strung with berries, coral, or glass beads."—Note to the Bahar-Danush.

"The ninety-nine beads of the Mahomedan rosary are divided into three equal lengths, by a little string, at the end of which hangs a long piece of coral, and a large bead of the same. The more devout or hypocritical Turks, like the Catholics, have usually their bead-strings in their hands."—Tavernier.

There pausing at the cavern-mouth,
Mohareb turn'd to Thalaba :
" Now darest thou enter in ? "
" Behold ! " the youth replied,
And leading in his turn the dangerous way,
Set foot within the cave.

25.

" Stay, Madman ! " cried his comrade : " Wouldst thou rush
Headlong to certain death ?
Where are thine arms to meet
The Keeper of the Passage ? " A loud shriek,
That shook along the windings of the cave,
Scatter'd the youth's reply.

26.

Mohareb, when the long re-echoing ceased,
Exclaim'd, " Fate favour'd thee,
Young Arab ! when she wrote upon thy brow !
The meeting of to-night ;
Else surely had thy name
This hour been blotted from the Book of Life ! "

27.

So saying, from beneath
His cloak a bag he drew :

1 " The Mahummedans believe, that the decreed events of every man's life are impressed in divine characters on his forehead, though not to be seen by mortal eye. Hence they use the word Nusseeb anglicè stamped, for destiny. Most probably the idea was taken up by Mahummed from the sealing of the Elect, mentioned in the Revelations."—Note to the Bahar-Danush.

" The scribe of decree chose to ornament the edicts on my forehead with these flourishes of disgrace."—Bahar-Danush.
The Spanish physiognomical phrase, traïrlo escrito en la frente, "to have it written on the forehead," is perhaps of Arabian origin.

" Rajah Chunder of Cashmeer was blest with a Vizier, endowed with wisdom and fidelity ; but the wicked, envying his virtues, propagated unfavourable reports regarding him. On these occasions the great are generally staggered in their opinions, and make no use of their reason ; forgetting every thing which they have read in history on the direful effects of envy. Thus Rajah Burjin gave ear to the stories fabricated against his vizier, and dismissed him from his office. The faithful vizier bore his disgrace with the utmost submission ; but his enemies, not satisfied with what they compassed against him, represented to the Rajah that he was plotting to raise himself to the throne ; and the deluded prince ordered him to be crucified. A short time after the execution, the Vizier's peer (his spiritual guide) passed the corpse, and read it decreed in his forehead as follows : ' That he should be dismissed from his office, be sent to prison, and then crucified ; but that, after all, he should be restored to life, and obtain the kingdom.' Astonished at what he beheld, he took down the body from the cross, and carried it to a secret place. Here he was incessantly offering up prayers to heaven for the restoration of his life, till one night the aerial spirits assembled together, and restored the body to life, by repeating incantations. He shortly after mounted the throne, but, despising worldly pomp, soon abdicated it."—Ayeen Akbery.

2 Zohak was the fifth King of the Pischadian dynasty, literally descended from Shedâd, who perished with the tribe of Ad. Zohak murdered his predecessor, and invented the punishments of the cross, and of faying alive. The Devil, who had long served him, requested at last, as a recompence, permission to kiss his shoulders ; immediately two serpents

" Young Arab ! thou art brave," he cried,
" But thus to rush on danger unprepared,
As lions spring upon the hunter's spear,
Is blind, brute courage. Zohak keeps the cave ?
Against that Giant of primeval days :
No force can win the passage." Thus he said,
And from his wallet drew a human hand,
Shrivell'd and dry and black ;
And fitting as he spake
A taper in its hold,
Pursued : " A murderer on the stake had died !
I drove the Vulture from his limbs, and lopt
The hand that did the murder, and drew up
The tendon-strings to close its grasp,
And in the sun and wind
Parch'd it, nine weeks exposed.
The Taper, . . but not here the place to impart,
Nor hast thou undergone the rites,
That fit thee to partake the mystery.
Look ! it burns clear, but with the air around,
Its dead ingredients mingle deathliness.
This when the Keeper of the Cave shall feel,
Maugre the doom of Heaven,
The salutary spell³
Shall lull his penal agony to sleep,
And leave the passage free."

grew there, who fed upon his flesh, and endeavoured to get at his brain. The Devil now suggested a remedy, which was to quiet them by giving them every day the brains of two men, killed for that purpose : this tyranny lasted long ; till a blacksmith of Ispahan, whose children had been nearly all slain to feed the King's serpents, raised his leathern apron as the standard of revolt, and deposed Zohak. Zohak, say the Persians, is still living in the cave of his punishment ; a sulphureous vapour issues from the place ; and, if a stone be flung in, there comes out a voice and cries, " Why dost thou fling stones at me ? " This cavern is in the mountain of Demawend, which reaches from that of Elwend, towards Teheran.—D'Hérbelot. Olearius.

3 " I shall transcribe," says Grose, " a foreign piece of superstition, firmly believed in many parts of France, Germany, and Spain. The account of it, and the mode of preparation, appears to have been given by a judge : in the latter there is a striking resemblance to the charm in Macbeth : —

" Of the Hand of Glory, which is made use of by house-breakers, to enter into houses at night, without fear of opposition.

" I acknowledge that I never tried the secret of the Hand of Glory, but I have thrice assisted at the definitive judgment of certain criminals, who, under the torture, confessed having used it. Being asked what it was, how they procured it, and what were its uses and properties ? They answered, first, that the use of the Hand of Glory was to stupify those to whom it was presented, and to render them motionless, inasmuch that they could not stir, any more than if they were dead ; secondly, that it was the hand of a hanged man ; and, thirdly, that it must be prepared in the manner following : —

" Take the hand, left or right, of a person hanged, and exposed on the highway ; wrap it up in a piece of a shroud or winding-sheet, in which let it be well squeezed to get out any small quantity of blood that may have remained in it ; then put it into an earthen vessel with Zinât saltpetre, salt, and long pepper, the whole well powdered ; leave it fifteen days in that vessel ; afterwards take it out and expose it to the noontide sun in the dog-days, till it is thoroughly dry ; and if the sun is not sufficient, put it into an oven heated

Thalaba answer'd not.
 Nor was there time for answer now,
 For lo! Mohareb leads,
 And o'er the vaulted cave,
 Trembles the accursed taper's feeble light.
 There where the narrowing chasm
 Rose loftier in the hill,
 Stood Zohak, wretched man, condemn'd to keep His Cave of punishment.
 His was the frequent scream
 Which when far off the prowling Jackal heard,
 He howl'd in terror back:
 For from his shoulders grew
 Two snakes of monster size,
 Which ever at his head
 Aim'd their rapacious teeth
 To satiate raving hunger with his brain.
 He, in the eternal conflict, oft would seize
 Their swelling necks, and in his giant grasp
 Bruise them, and rend their flesh with bloody nails,
 And howl for agony,
 Feeling the pangs he gave, for of himself
 Co-sentient and inseparable parts,
 The snaky torturers grew.

29.

To him approaching now,
 Mohareb held the wither'd arm,
 The taper of enchanted power.
 The unhallow'd spell in hand unholy held,
 Then minister'd to mercy; heavily
 The wretch's eyelids closed;
 And welcome and unfelt,
 Like the release of death,
 A sudden sleep surprised his vital powers.

30.

Yet though along the cave relax'd
 Lay Zohak's giant limbs,
 The twin-born serpents kept the narrow pass,
 Kindled their fiery eyes,
 Darted their tongues of terror, and roll'd out
 Their undulating length,
 Like the long streamers of some gallant ship
 Buoy'd on the wavy air,
 Still struggling to flow on, and still withheld.
 The scent of living flesh
 Inflamed their appetite.

31.

Prepared for all the perils of the cave,
 Mohareb came. He from his wallet drew
 Two human heads, yet warm.

with fern and vervain. They compose a kind of candle with the fat of a hanged man, virgin wax, and sissame of Iapland. The Hand of Glory is used as a candlestick to hold this candle when lighted. Its properties are, that whosoever any one goes with this dreadful instrument, the persons to whom it is presented will be deprived of all power of motion. On being asked if there was no remedy or antidote to counteract this charm, they said, the Hand of Glory would cease to take effect, and thieves could not make use of it, if the threshold of the door of the house and other places by which they might enter, were anointed with an unguent composed of the gall of a black cat, the fat of a white hen, and the blood of a

O hard of heart! whom not the visible power
 Of retributive Justice, and the doom
 Of Zohak in his sight,
 Deterr'd from equal crime!
 Two human heads, yet warm, he laid
 Before the scaly guardians of the pass;
 They to their wonted banquet of old years
 Turn'd eager, and the narrow pass was free.

32.

And now before their path
 The opening cave dilates;
 They reach a spacious vault,
 Where the black river-fountains burst their way.
 Now as a whirlwind's force
 Had center'd on the spring,
 The gushing flood roll'd up;
 And now the deaden'd roar
 Echoed beneath, collapsing as it sunk
 Within a dark abyss,
 Adown whose fathomless gulphs the eye was lost.

33.

Blue flames that hover'd o'er the springs
 Flung through the cavern their uncertain light;
 Now waving on the waves they lay,
 And now their fiery curls
 Flow'd in long tresses up,
 And now contracting, glow'd with whiter heat!
 Then up they shot again,
 Darting pale flashes through the tremulous air;
 The flames, the red and yellow sulphur-smoke,
 And the black darkness of the vault,
 Commingling indivisibly.

34.

"Here," quoth Mohareb, "do the Angels dwell,
 The Teachers of Enchantment." Thalaba
 Then raised his voice, and cried,
 "Haruth and Maruth, hear me! Not with rites
 Accused, to disturb your penitence,
 And learn forbidden lore,
 Repentant Angels, seek I your abode;
 But sent by Allah and the Prophet here,
 Obediently I come,
 Their chosen servant I,
 Tell me the Talisman!"

35.

"And dost thou think,"
 Mohareb cried, as with a smile of scorn
 He glanced upon his comrade, "dost thou think
 To trick them of their secret? For the dupes
 Of human-kind keep this lip-righteousness!"

screech-owl, which mixture must necessarily be prepared during the dog-days."—Grose, Provincial Glossary and popular Superstitions.

Something similar is recorded by Torquemada of the Mexican thieves. They carried with them the left hand and arm of a woman who had died in her first childbirth; with this they twice struck the ground before the house which they designed to rob, and the door twice, and the threshold twice; and the inhabitants, if asleep, were hindered from waking by this charm; and, if awake, stupified and deprived of speech and motion while the fatal arm was in the house.—Lib. xiv. c. 22.

'Twill serve thee in the Mosque
And in the Market-place,
But Spirits view the heart.
Only by strong and torturing spells enforced,
Those stubborn angels teach the charm
By which we must descend."

36.

"Descend?" said Thalaba.
But then the wrinkling smile
Forsook Mohareb's cheek,
And darker feelings settled on his brow.
"Now by my soul," quoth he, "and I believe,
Idiot! that I have led
Some camel-knee'd prayer-monger through the cave!
What brings thee hither? Thou should'st have a hut
By some Saint's grave beside the public way,²
There to less-knowing fools
Retail thy Koran-scrap,"
And in thy turn die civet-like at last
In the dung-perfume of thy sanctity! . .
Ye whom I seek! that, led by me,
Feet uninitiate tread
Your threshold, this atones!—
Fit sacrifice he falls!"
And forth he flash'd his scymetar,
And raised the murderous blow.

37.

There ceased his power; his lifted arm,
Suspended by the spell,
Hung impotent to strike.
"Poor hypocrite!" cried he,
"And this then is thy faith
In Allah and the Prophet! They had fail'd
To save thee, but for Magic's stolen aid;
Yea, they had left thee yonder Serpent's meal,
But that, in prudent cowardice,
The chosen Servant of the Lord came in,
Safe follower of my path!"

38.

"Blasphemer! dost thou boast of guiding me?"
Quoth Thalaba, with virtuous pride inflamed,

¹ I knew not, when I used this epithet in derision, that the likeness had been seriously applied to St. James. His knees were, after the guise of a camel's knee, benumbed and bereft of the sense of feeling, by reason of his continual kneeling in supplication to God, and petition for the people.—Illegisippus, as quoted by Eusebius.

William of Malmshbury says of one of the Conqueror's daughters, who was affianced to Alphonsus, King of Galicia, but obtained from God a virgin death, that a hard substance, which proved the frequency of her prayers, was found upon her knees after her decease.

² "The habitations of the Saints are always beside the sanctuary or tomb of their ancestors, which they take care to adorn. Some of them possess, close to their houses, gardens, trees, or cultivated grounds, and particularly some spring or well of water. I was once travelling in the south in the beginning of October, when the season happened to be exceedingly hot, and the wells and rivulets of the country were all dried up. We had neither water for ourselves nor for our horses; and after having taken much fruitless trouble to obtain some, we went and paid homage to a Saint, who at first pretended a variety of scruples before he would suffer infidels to approach; but, on promising to give him ten or

"Blindly the wicked work
The righteous will of Heaven!
Sayest thou that diffident of God,
In Magic spells I trust?
Liar! let witness this!"
And he drew off Abdaldar's Ring,
And cast it in the gulph.
A skinny hand came up,
And caught it as it fell,
And peals of devilish laughter shook the Cave.

39.

Then joy suffused Mohareb's cheek,
And Thalaba beheld
The blue blade gleam, descending to destroy.

40.

The undefended youth
Sprung forward, and he seized
Mohareb in his grasp,
And grappled with him breast to breast.
Sinewy and large of limb Mohareb was,
Broad-shoulder'd, and his joints
Knit firm, and in the strife
Of danger practised well.
Time had not thus matured young Thalaba;
But high-wrought feeling now,
The inspiration and the mood divine,
Infused a force portentous, like the strength
Of madness through his frame.
Mohareb reels before him; he right on,
With knee, with breast, with arm,
Presses the staggering foe;
And now upon the brink
Of that tremendous spring, . .
There with fresh impulse and a rush of force,
He thrust him from his hold.
The upwhirling flood received
Mohareb, then, absorb'd,
Engulph'd him in the abyss.

41.

Thalaba's breath came fast,
And panting, he breath'd out

twelve shillings, he became exceedingly humane, and supplied us with as much water as we wanted; still, however, vaunting highly of his charity, and particularly of his disinterestedness."—Chénier.

³ "No nation in the world is so much given to superstition as the Arabs, or even as the Mahometans in general. They hang about their children's necks the figure of an open hand, which the Turks and Moors paint upon their ships and houses, as an antidote and counter-charm to an evil eye; for five is with them an unlucky number; and five, (fingers perhaps) in your eyes, is their proverb of cursing and defiance. Those who are grown up, carry always about with them some paragraph or other of their Koran, which, like as the Jews did their phylacteries, they place upon their breast, or sew under their caps, to prevent fascination and witchcraft, and to secure themselves from sickness and misfortunes. The virtue of these charms and scrolls is supposed likewise to be so far universal, that they suspend them upon the necks of their cattle, horses, and other beasts of burden."—Shaw.

The hand-spell is still common in Portugal; it is called the figa; and thus probably our vulgar phrase—"a fig for him," is derived from a Moorish amulet.

A broken prayer of thankfulness.
At length he spake and said,
"Haruth and Maruth! are ye here?
Or hath that evil guide misled my search?
I, Thalaba, the Servant of the Lord,
Invoke you. Hear me, Angels! so may Heaven
Accept and mitigate your penitence.
I go to root from earth the Sorcerer brood,
Tell me the needful Talisman!"

42.

Thus as he spake, recumbent on the rock
Beyond the black abyss,
Their forms grew visible.
A settled sorrow sate upon their brows, . .
Sorrow alone, for trace of guilt and shame
None now remain'd; and gradual as by prayer
The sin was purged away,
Their robe of glory, purified of stain,¹
Resumed the lustre of its native light.

43.

In awe the youth received the answering voice,
"Son of Hodeirah! thou hast proved it here;
The Talisman is Faith."

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

THE SIXTH BOOK.

Then did I see a pleasant Paradise,
Full of sweet flowers and daintiest delights,
Such as on earth man could not more devise
With pleasures choice to feed his cheerful sprights;
Not that which Merlin by his magic slights
Made for the gentle squire to entertain
His fair Belphebe, could this garden stain.

So from the lumost cave
Did Thalaba retrace

¹ "In the Vision of Thureillus, Adam is described as beholding the events of the world with mingled grief and joy; his original garment of glory gradually recovering its lustre, as the number of the elect increases, till it be fulfilled."—Matthew Paris.

This is more beautifully conceived than what the Archbishop of Toledo describes in his account of Mahommed's journey to Heaven: "Also in the first heaven I found a venerable man sitting upon a seat, and to him were shewn the souls of the dead; and when he beheld souls that did not please him, he turned away his eyes, saying, 'Ah! sinful soul, thou hast departed from an unhappy body;' and when a soul appeared which pleased him, then he said with applause, 'O happy Spirit, thou art come from a good body.' I asked the Angel concerning a man so excellent, and of such reverence, who he should be; and he said it was Adam, who rejoiced in the good of his generation, but turned away his face from the evil."—Roder. Ximenes.

² "The Arabian horses are divided into two great branches;

The windings of the rock.
Still on the ground the giant limbs
Of Zohak lay dispread;
The spell of sleep had ceased,
And his broad eyes were glaring on the youth:
Yet raised he not his arm to bar the way,
Fearful to rouse the snakes
Now lingering o'er their meal.

2.

Oh then, emerging from that dreadful cave,
How grateful did the gale of night
Salute his freshen'd sense!
How full of lightsome joy,
Thankful to Heaven, he hastens by the verge
Of that bitumen-lake,
Whose black and heavy fumes,
Surge heaving after surge,
Roll'd like the billowy and tumultuous sea.

3.

The song of many a bird at morn
Aroused him from his rest.
Lo! at his side a courser stood;
More animate of eye,
Of form more faultless never had he seen,
More light of limbs and beautiful in strength,
Among the race whose blood,
Pure and unmingled, from the royal steeds
Of Solomon came down.²

4.

The chosen Arab's eye
Glanced o'er his graceful shape,
His rich caparisons,
His crimson trappings gay.
But when he saw the mouth
Uncurb'd, the unbridled neck,
Then his heart leapt, at a then his cheek was flush'd;
For sure he deem'd that Heaven had sent
A courser, whom no erring hand might guide.
And lo! the eager, Steed
Throws his head and paws the ground,
Impatient of delay!
Then up leapt Thalaba,
And away went 'he self-govern'd courser.

the Kadishi, whose descent is unknown, and the Kochlani, of whom a written genealogy has been kept for 2000 years. These last are reserved for riding solely; they are highly esteemed, and consequently very dear; they are said to derive their origin from King Solomon's studs; however this may be, they are fit to bear the greatest fatigue, and can pass whole days without food; they are also said to show uncommon courage against an enemy; it is even asserted, that when a horse of this race finds himself wounded, and unable to bear his rider much longer, he retires from the fray, and conveys him to a place of security. If the rider falls upon the ground, his horse remains beside him, and neighs till assistance is brought. The Kochlani are neither large nor handsome, but amazingly swift; the whole race is divided into several families, each of which has its proper name. Some of these have a higher reputation than others, on account of their more ancient and uncontaminated nobility."—Niebuhr.

Over the plain
 Away went the steed ;
 With the dew of the morning his flocks were wet,
 The foam froth'd his limbs in the journey of noon,
 Nor stay'd he till over the westerly heaven
 The shadows of evening had spread.
 Then on a shelter'd bank
 The appointed Youth reposed,
 And by him laid the docile courser down.
 Again in the grey of the morning
 Thalaba bounded up ;
 Over hill, over dale,
 Away goes the steed.
 Again at eve he stops,
 Again the Youth alights ;
 His load discharg'd his errand done,
 The courser then bounded away.

6.

Heavy and dark the eve ;
 The Moon was hid on high,
 A dim light tinged the mist
 That cros'd her in the path of Heaven.
 All living sounds had ceased,
 Only the flow of waters near was heard,
 A low and lulling melody.

7.

Fasting, yet not of want
 Perceptive, he on that mysterious steed
 Had choic'd his resting-place,
 For exaltation kept his nature up.
 Now as the flow of waters near Awoke a feverish thirst,
 Led by the sound he moved
 To seek the grateful wave.

8.

A meteor in the hazy air
 Play'd before his path ;
 Before him now it roll'd
 A globe of living fire ;
 And now contracted to a steady light,

" In travelling by night through the valleys of Mount Ephraim, we were attended, for above the space of an hour, with an Ignis Fatuus, that displayed itself in a variety of extraordinary appearances. For it was sometimes globular, or like the flame of a candle ; immediately after it would spread itself, and involve our whole company in its pale inoffensive light ; then at once contract itself and disappear. But, in less than a minute, it would again exert itself as at other times, or else, running along from one place to another with a swift progressive motion, would expand itself at certain intervals, over more than two or three acres of the adjacent mountains. The atmosphere, from the beginning of the evening, had been remarkably thick and hazy, and the dew, as we felt it upon our bridles, was unusually clammy and unctuous. In the like disposition of the weather, I have observed those luminous bodies, which at sea skip about the masts and yards of ships, and are called Corpuscule * by the mariners."—Shaw.

* " The Hamman Meskoutcen, the Silent or Inchaned Baths, are situated on a low ground, surrounded with moun-

* A corruption of Caerpo Santo, as this meteor is called by the Spaniards.

As when the solitary hermit prunes
 His lamp's long undulating flame ;
 And now its wavy point

Up-blazing rose, like a young cypress tree
 Sway'd by the heavy wind ;

Anon to Thalaba it moved,
 And wrapt him in its pale innocuous fire ;

Now, in the darkness drown'd,
 Left him with eyes bedimm'd,

And now, emerging, spread the scene to sight. †

9.

Led by the sound and meteor-flame,
 The Arabian youth advanced.

Now to the nearest of the many hills

He stoops ; ascending steam

Timely repels his hand,

For from its source it sprung, a boiling tide.

A second course with better hap he tries,

The wave intensely cold

Tempts to a copious draught.

There was a virtue in the wave :

His limbs, that stiff with toil

Dragg'd heavy, from the copious draught received

Lightness and supple strength.

O'erjoyed, and weening the benignant Power,

Who sent the reinless steed,

Had blest these healing waters to his use,

He laid him down to sleep,

Lull'd by the soothing and incessant sound,

The flow of many waters, blending oft

With shriller tones and deep low murmurings,

Which from the fountain caves

In mingled melody

Like faery music, heard at midnight, came.

10.

The sounds which last he heard at night

Awoke his recollection first at morn.

A scene of wonders lay before his eyes.

In mazy windings o'er the vale

A thousand streamlets stray'd,

And in their endless course ‡

Had intersected deep the stony soil, tains. There are several fountains that furnish the water, which is of an intense heat, and falls afterwards into the Zenati. At a small distance from these hot fountains, we have others, which, upon comparison, are of as intense a coldness ; and a little below them, somewhat nearer the banks of the Zenati, there are the ruins of a few houses, built perhaps for the convenience of persons who came hither for the benefit of the waters.

" Besides the strong sulphureous steams of the Hamman † Meskoutcen, we are to observe farther of them, that their water is of so intense a heat, that the rocky ground it runs over, to the distance sometimes of a hundred feet, is dissolved, or rather calcined by it. When the substance of these rocks is soft and uniform, then the water, by making every way equal impressions, leaveth them in the shape of cones or hemispheres ; which being six feet high, and a little more or less of the same diameter, the Arabs maintain to be so many tents of their predecessors turned into stone. But when these rocks, besides their usual soft chalky substance, contain likewise some layers of harder matter, not so easy to be dis-

† They call the Therme of this country Hamman, from whence our *Hamman*s.

With labyrinthine channels islanding
A thousand rocks, which seem'd
Amid the multitudinous waters there
Like clouds that freckle o'er the summer sky,
The blue ethereal ocean circling each,
And insulating all.

11.

Those islets of the living rock
Were of a thousand shapes,
And Nature with her various tints
Diversified anew their thousand forms ;
For some were green with moss,
Some ruddier tinged, or grey, or silver-white,
And some with yellow lichens glow'd like gold,
Some sparkled sparry radiance to the sun.
Here gush'd the fountains up,
Alternate light and blackness, like the play
Of sunbeams on a warrior's burnish'd arms.
Yonder the river roll'd, whose ample bed,
Their sportive lingerings o'er,
Received and bore away the confluent rill.

12.

This was a wild and wondrous scene,
Strange and beautiful, as where
By Oton-tala, like a sea of stars,¹
The hundred sources of Hoangho burst.
High mountains closed the vale,
Bare rocky mountains, to all living things
Inhospitable ; on whose sides no herb solved, then, in proportion to the resistance the water is thereby to meet with, we are entertained with a confusion of traces and chauncels, distinguished by the Arabs into sheep, camels, horses, nay into men, women, and children, whom they suppose to have undergone the like fate with their habitations. I observed that the fountains which afforded this water had been frequently stopped up, or rather ceasing to run at one place, broke out immediately in another ; which circumstance seems not only to account for the number of cones, but for that variety likewise of traces, that are continued from one or other of those cones or fountains, quite down to the river Zenati.

"This place, in riding over it, giveth back such a hollow sound, that we were afraid every moment of sinking through it. It is probable, therefore, that the ground below us was hollow ; and may not the air, then, which is pent up within these caverns, afford, as we may suppose, in escaping continually through these fountains, that mixture of shrill, murmuring, and deep sounds, which, according to the direction of the winds and the motion of the external air, issue out along with the water ? The Arabs, to quote their strength of imagination once more, affirm these sounds to be the music of the Jenounes, Fairies, who are supposed, in a particular manner, to make their abodes at this place, and to be the grand agents in all these extraordinary appearances."

"There are other natural curiosities likewise at this place. For the chalky stone being dissolved into a fine impalpable powder, and carried down afterwards with the stream, lodgeth itself upon the sides of the channell, nay, sometimes upon the lips of the fountains themselves ; or else, embracing twigs, straws, and other bodies in its way, immediately hardeneth, and shoots into a bright fibrous substance, like the Arbestos, forming itself at the same time into a variety of glittering figures and beautiful crystallizations."—Shaw.

¹ In the place where the Whang-ho rises, there are more than an hundred springs which sparkle like stars, whence it

Rooted, no insect fed, no bird awoke
Their echoes, save the Eagle, strong of wing,
A lonely plunderer, that afar
Sought in the vales his prey.

13.

Thither toward those mountains Thalaba
Following, as he believed, the path prescribed
By Destiny, advanced,
Up a wide vale that led into their depths,
A stony vale between receding heights
Of stone, he wound his way.
A cheerless place ! the solitary Bee,
Whose buzzing was the only sound of life
Flew there on restless wing.
Seeking in vain one flower, whereon to fix.

14.

Still Thalaba holds on ;
The winding vale now narrows on his view,
And steeper of ascent,
Rightward and leftward rise the rocks,
And now they meet across the vale.
Was it the toil of human hands
Had hewn a passage in the rock,
Through whose rude portal-way
The light of heaven was seen ?
Rude and low the portal-way ;
Beyond, the same ascending straits²
Went winding up the wilds.

is called Hotun Nor, the Sea of Stars. These sources form two great lakes called Hala Nor, the Black Sea or Lake. Afterwards there appear three or four little rivers, which joined, form the Whang-ho, which has eight or nine branches. These sources of the river are called also Oton-tala. It is in Thibet.—Gaubil. Ashtley's Collect. of Voy. and Travels.

"The Whang-ho, or, as the Portuguese call it, Hoamho, i.e. the Yellow River, rises not far from the source of the Ganges, in the Tartarian mountains west of China, and having run through it with a course of more than six hundred leagues, discharges itself into the eastern sea. It hath its name from a yellow mud which always stains its water, and which, after rains, composes a third part of its quantity. The watermen clear it for use by throwing an alum. The Chinese say its waters cannot become clear in a thousand years ; whence it is a common proverb among them for any thing which is never likely to happen, 'when the Yellow River shall run clear.'"—Note to the Chinese Tale, Hou Kiou Choan.

² "Among the mountains of the Beni Abbas, four leagues to the S. E. of the Walled Mansour, we pass through a narrow winding defile, which, for the space of near half a mile, lieth on each side under an exceeding high precipice. At every winding, the rock or stratum that originally went across it, and thereby separated one valley from another, is cut into the fashion of a door-case six or seven feet wide, giving thereby the Arabs an occasion to call them Berban, the Gates ; whilst the Turks, in consideration of their strength and ruggedness, know them by the additional appellation of Dammer Cappy, the Gates of Iron. Few persons pass them without horror, a handful of men being able to dispute the passage with a whole army. The rivulet of salt water which glides through this valley, might possibly first point out the way which art and necessity would afterwards improve."—Shaw.

Still a bare, silent, solitary glen,
A fearful silence, and a solitude
That made itself be felt;
And steeper now the ascent,
A rugged path, that tired
The straining muscles, toiling slowly up.
At length again a rock
Stretch'd o'er the narrow vale;
There also had a portal-way been hewn,
But gates of massy iron barr'd the pass,
Huge, solid, heavy-hinged.

16.

There hung a horn beside the gate,
Ivory-tipt and brazen-mouth'd;
He took the ivory tip,
And through the brazen-mouth he breath'd;
Like a long thunder-pearl,
From rock to rock rebounding rung the blast;
The gates of iron, by no human arm
Unfolded, turning on their hinges slow,
Disclosed the passage of the rock.
He enter'd, and the iron gates fell to,
And with a clap like thunder closed him in.

17.

It was a narrow winding way;
Dim lamps suspended from the vault,
Lent to the gloom an agitated light.
Winding it pierced the rock,
A long descending path
By gates of iron closed;
There also hung a horn beside
Of ivory tip and brazen mouth;
Again he took the ivory tip,
And gave the brazen mouth its voice again.
Not now in thunder spake the horn,
But breathed a sweet and thrilling melody:
The gates flew open, and a flood of light
Rush'd on his dazzled eyes.

18.

Was it to earthly Eden, lost so long,
The fated Youth had found his wondrous way?
But earthly Eden boasts
No terraced palaces,
No rich pavilions bright with woven gold,¹
Like these that in the vale
Rise amid odorous groves.

¹ "In 1568 the Persian Sultan gave the Grand Seigneur two most stately pavilions made of one piece, the curtains being interlaced with gold, and the supporters embroidered with the same; also nine fair canopies to hang over the ports of their pavilions, things not used among the Christians."—Knolles.

² "The expences the Persians are at in their gardens is that wherein they make greatest ostentation of their wealth. Not that they much mind furnishing of them with delightful flowers, as we do in Europe; but these they slight as an excessive liberality of Nature, by whom their common fields are strewed with an infinite number of tulips and other flowers; but they are rather desirous to have their gardens full of all sorts of fruit-trees, and especially to dispose them into pleasant walks of a kind of plane or poplar, a tree not known in Europe, which the Persians call Tzinnar. These trees

The astonish'd Thalaba,
Doubting as though an unsubstantial dream
Beguiled him, closed his eyes,
And open'd them again;
And yet uncertified,
He prest them close, and as he look'd around
Question'd the strange reality again.
He did not dream;
They still were there,
The glittering tents,
The odorous groves,
The gorgeous palaces.

19.

And lo! a man, reverend in comely age,
Advancing greets the youth.
"Favour'd of Fortune," thus he said, "~~the~~ taste
The joys of Paradise!
The reainless steed that ranges o'er the world,
Brings hither those alone for lofty deeds
Mark'd by their horoscope; permitted thus
A foretaste of the full beatitude,
That in heroic acts they may go on
More ardent, eager to return and reap
Endless enjoyment here, their destined meed.
Favour'd of Fortune thou, go taste
The joys of Paradise!"

20

This said, he turn'd away, and left
The Youth in wonder mute,
For Thalaba stood mute,
And passively received
The mingled joy which flow'd on every sense.
Where'er his eye could reach,
Fair structures, rainbow-hued, arose;
And rich pavilions through the opening wood:
Gleam'd from their waving curtains sunny gold;
And winding through the verdant vale,
Went streams of liquid light;
And fluted cypresses rear'd up
Their living obelisks;
And broad-leav'd plane-trees in long colonnades²
O'er-arch'd delightful walks,
Where round their trunks the thousand tendrill'd vine
Wound up and hung the boughs with greener wreaths,
And clusters not their own.
Wearied with endless beauty, did his eyes
Return for rest? beside him teems the earth
With tulips, like the ruddy evening streak'd;³

grow up to the height of the plane, and have very broad leaves, not much unlike those of the vine. Their fruit has some resemblance to the chestnut, while the outer coat is about it: but there is no kernel within it, so that it is not to be eaten. The wood thereof is very brown, and full of veins; and the Persians use it in doors and shuttles for windows, which, being rubbed with oil, look incomparably better than any thing made of walnut-tree, nay indeed than the root of it, which is now so very much esteemed."—Amb. Travels.

³ Major Scott informs us, that scars and wounds, by Persian writers, are compared to the streaky tints of the tulip. The simile here employed is equally obvious, and more suited to its place.

And here the lily hangs her head of snow ;
 And here amid her sable cup¹
 Shines the red-eye spot, like one brightest star,
 The solitary twinkler of the night ;
 And here the rose expands
 Her paradise of leaves.²

21.

Then on his car what sounds
 Of harmony arose !
 Far music and the distance-mellow'd song
 From bowers of merriment ;
 The waterfall remote ;
 The murmuring of the leafy groves ;
 The single nightingale
 Perch'd in the rozier by, so richly toned,
 That never from that most melodious bird,
 Singing a love-song to his brooding mate,
 Did Thracian shepherd by the grave
 Of Orpheus hear a sweeter melody,³
 Though there the Spirit of the Sepulchre
 All his own power infuse, to swell
 The incense that he loves.

22.

And oh ! what odours the voluptuous vale
 Scatters from jasmine bowers,
 From yon rose wilderness,
 From cluster'd henna and from orange groves,
 That with such perfumes fill the breeze,

¹ "We pitched our tents among some little hills where there was a prodigious number of lilies of many colours, with which the ground was quite covered. None were white, they were mostly either of a rich violet, with a red spot in the midst of each leaf, or of a fine black, and these were the most esteemed. In form they were like our lilies, but much larger."—Tavernier.

² This expression is borrowed from one of Ariosto's smaller poems.

"Tal è proprio a veder quell' amorosa
 Fiamma, che nel bel viso
 Si sparge, ond' ella con soave riso
 Si va di sue bellezze innamorando ;
 Qual' è a vedere, qual' hor vermiglia rosa
 Scuopra il bel Paradiso
 De le sue foglie al hor che 'l sol diviso
 De l'Oriente sorge il giorno alzando."

³ The Thracians say, that the nightingales which build their nests about the sepulchre of Orpheus, sing sweeter and louder than other nightingales. — Pausanias.

Gongora has addressed this bird with somewhat more than his usual extravagance of absurdity : —

"Con diferencia tal, con gracia tanta
 Aquel Kuisenor llora, que sospecho,
 Que tiene otros cien mil dentro del pecho,
 Que alternan su dolor por su garganta."

"With such a grace that nightingale bewails,
 That I suspect, so exquisite his note,
 An hundred thousand other nightingales
 Within him, warble sorrow through his throat."

Marini has the same conceit, but has expressed it less extravagantly : —

"Sovra l'orlo d'un rio lucido e netto,
 Il canto soavissimo scorgile
 Musico rossignuol, ch' aver pareo
 E mille voci e mille augelli in petto."

As Peris to their Sister bear,
 When from the summit of some lofty tree
 She hangs encaged, the captive of the Dives,
 They from their pinions shake,
 The sweetness of celestial flowers,
 And, as her enemies impure
 From that impervious poison far away
 Fly groaning with the torment, she the while Inhales her fragrant food.⁴

23.

Such odours flow'd upon the world,
 When at Mohammed's nuptials, word
 Went forth in Heaven, to roll
 The everlasting gates of Paradise
 Back on their living hinges, that its gales
 Might visit all below ; the general bliss
 Thrill'd every bosom, and the family
 Of man, for once, partook one common joy.

24.

Full of the bliss, yet still awake
 To wonder, on went Thalaba ;
 On every side the song of mirth,
 The music of festivity,
 Invite the passing youth.
 Wearied at length with hunger and with heat,
 He enters in a banquet room,
 Where round a fountain brink,
 On silken carpets sate the festive train.⁵

"Among the presents that were exchanged between the Persian and Ottoman sovereigns in 1564, were carpets of silk, of camel's hair, lesser ones of silk and gold, and some called Tefuch, made of the finest lawn, and so large that seven men could scarcely carry one of them." — Knolles.

"In the beautiful story of Ali Beg, it is said Cha Seff, when he examined the house of his father's favourite, was much surprised at seeing it so badly furnished with plain skins and coarse carpets, whereas the other nobles in their houses trod only upon carpets of silk and gold." — Tavernier.

Instant through all his frame
 Delightful coolness spread ;
 The playing fount refresh'd
 The agitated air ;
 The very light came cool'd through silvering panes
 Of pearly shell¹, like the pale moon-beam tinged ;
 Or where the wine-vase fill'd the aperture,²
 Rosy as rising morn, or softer gleam
 Of saffron, like the sunny evening mist :
 Through every hue, and streak'd by all,
 The flowing fountain play'd,
 Around the water-edge
 Vessels of wine, alternate placed,
 Ruby and amber, tinged its little waves.
 From golden goblets there³
 The guests sate quaffing the delicious juice
 Of Shiraz' golden grape.

 But Thalaba took not the draught ;
 For rightly he knew had the Prophet forbidden

¹ On the way from Macao to Canton, in the rivers and channels, there is taken a vast quantity of oysters, of whose shells they make glass for the windows. — Genelli Caseri
 In the Chinese Novel Hau Kien Chouan, we read that Shuey-ping-in ordered her servants to hang up a curtain of mother-of-pearl across the hall. She commanded the first table to be set for her guest without the curtain, and two lighted tapers to be placed upon it. Afterwards she ordered a second table, but without any light, to be set for herself within the curtain, so that she could see every thing through it, unseen herself.

Master George Tuberville, in his letters from Muscovy, 1568, describes the Russian windows : —

" They have no English glasse ; of slices of a rocke Hight Shuda they their windows make, that English glasse doth mocke.

They cut it very thinne, and saw it with a thred
 In pretie order like to panes, to serve their present need.
 No other glasse, good faith, doth give a better light,
 And sure the rock is nothing rich, the cost is very slight."

Hakluyt.

The Indians of Malabar use mother-of-pearl for window panes. — Fra Paolo da San Bartolomeo.

² " The King and the great Lords have a sort of cellar for magnificence, where they sometimes drink with persons whom they wish to regale. These cellars are square rooms, to which you descend by only two or three steps. In the middle is a small cistern of water, and a rich carpet covers the ground from the walls to the cistern. At the four corners of the cistern are four large glass bottles, each containing about twenty quarts of wine, one white, another red. From one to the other of these, smaller bottles are ranged of the same material and form, that is, round, with a long neck, holding about four or five quarts, white and red alternately. Round the cellar are several rows of niches in the wall, and in each niche is a bottle also of red and white alternately. Some niches are made to hold two. Some windows give light to the apartment, and all these bottles, so well ranged with their various colours, have a very fine effect to the eye. They are always kept full, the wine preserving better, and therefore are replenished as fast as they are emptied." — Tavernier.

³ " The Cuptzi or king of Persia's merchant, treated us with a collation, which was served in, in plate, vermilion gilt.

" The Persians having left us, the ambassadors sent to the Chief Weywode a present, which was a large drinking cup, vermilion gilt." — Ambassador's Travels.

That beverage, the mother of sins,⁴
 Nor did the urgent guests
 Proffer a second time the liquid fire,
 When in the youth's strong eye they saw
 No moveable resolve.

Yet not uncourtous, Thalaba
 Drank the cool draught of innocence,
 That fragrant from its dewy vase⁵
 Came purer than it left its native bed ;
 And he partook the odorous fruits,
 For all rich fruits were there ;
 Water-melons rough of rind,
 Whose pulp the thirsty lip
 Dissolved into a draught ;
 Pistachios from the heavy-cluster'd trees
 Of Malavert, or Haleb's fertile soil ;
 And Casbin's luscious grapes of amber hue,⁶
 That many a week endure
 The summer sun intense,
 Till by its powerful heat
 All watery particles exhaled, alone

At Ispahan, the king's horses were watered with silver pails, thus coloured.

The Turks and Persians seem wonderfully fond of gilding ; we read of their gilt stirrups, gilt bridles, gilt maces, gilt scymitars, &c. &c.

⁴ " Mohammedes vinum appellabat Matrem peccatorum ; cui sententie Hafez, Anacreon ille Persarum, minime ascribit suam ; dicit autem :

' Acre illud (vinum) quod vir religiosus matrem peccatorum vocitat,

Optabilius nobis ac dulcius videtur, quam virginis suavium.'" — Poetes Asiatici.

" Mille ignem illum nobis liquidum,

Hoc est, ignem illum aque similem affer." — Hafiz.

⁵ " They export from Com earthenware both white and varnished : and this is peculiar to the white ware which is thence transported, that in the summer it cools the water wonderfully and very suddenly, by reason of continual transpiration. So that they who desire to drink cool and deliciously, never drink in the same pot above five or six days at most. They wash it with rose-water the first time, to take away the ill smell of the earth, and they hang it in the air, full of water, wrapped up in a moist linen cloth. A fourth part of the water transpires in six hours the first time ; after that, still less from day to day, till at last the pores are closed up by the thick matter contained in the water which stops in the pores. But so soon as the pores are stoped, the water stinks in the pots, and you must take new ones." — Chardin.

" In Egypt people of fortune burn Scio mastic in their cups ; the penetrating odour of which pervades the porous substance, which remains impregnated with it a long time, and imparts to the water a perfume which requires the aid of habit to render it pleasing." — Sonnini.

⁶ " Casbin produces the fairest grape in Persia, which they call Shahon, or the royal grape, being of a gold colour, transparent, and as big as a small olive. These grapes are dried and transported all over the kingdom. They also make the strongest wine in the world, and the most luscious, but very thick, as all strong and sweet wines usually are. This incomparable grape grows only upon the young branches, which they never water. So that, for five months together, they grow in the heat of summer, and under a scorching sun, without receiving a drop of water, either from the sky or otherwise. When the vintage is over, they let in their cattle to browse in the vineyards ; afterwards they cut off all the great wood, and leave only the young stocks about three feet high, which need no propping up with poles as in other places, and therefore they never make use of any such supporters." — Chardin.

The strong essential sweetness ripens there.
 Here cased in ice the apricot,¹
 A topaz, crystal-set :
 Here, on a plate of snow,
 The sunny orange rests ;
 And still the aloe and the sandal-wood,
 From golden censers, o'er the banquet room
 Diffuse their dying sweets.

26.

Anon a troop of females form'd the dance,
 Their ankles bound with bracelet-bells,²
 That made the modulating harmony.
 Transparent garments to the greedy eye³
 Exposed their harlot limbs,
 Which moved, in every wanton gesture skill'd.

27.

With earnest eyes the banqueters
 Fed on the sight impure ;
 And Thalaba, he gazed,
 But in his heart he bore a talisman,
 Whose blessed alchemy
 To virtuous thoughts refined
 The loose suggestions of the scene impure.
 Oneiza's image swam before his sight,
 His own Arabian Maid.
 He rose, and from the banquet room he rush'd,
 Tears coursed his burning cheek ;
 And nature for a moment woke the thought,
 And murmur'd, that, from all domestic joys
 Estranged, he wander'd o'er the world
 A lonely being, far from all he loved.
 Son of Hodeirah, not among thy crimes
 That momentary murmur shall be written !

28.

From tents of revelry,
 From festal bowers, to solitude he ran ;

¹ Dr. Fryer received a present from the Caun of Bunder-Abassas, of apples candied in snow.

When Tavernier made his first visit to the Kan at Erivan, he found him with several of his officers regaling in the Chambers of the Bridge. They had wine which they cooled with ice, and all kinds of fruit and melons in large plates, under each of which was a plate of ice.

A great number of camels were laden with snow to cool the liquors and fruit of the Caliph Mahadi, when he made the pilgrimage to Mecca.

² Of the Indian dancing women who danced before the ambassadors at Isfahan, "some were shod after a very strange manner. They had above the instep of the foot a string tied, with little bells fastened thereto, whereby they discovered the exactness of their cadence, and sometimes corrected the music itself; as they did also by the Tzarpanes or Castagnets, which they had in their hands, in the managing whereof they were very expert."

At Koojar, Mungo Park saw a dance "in which many performers assisted, all of whom were provided with little bells, which were fastened to their legs and arms."

³ At Seronge, a sort of cloth is made so fine, that the skin may be seen through it, as though it were naked. Merchants are not permitted to export this, the governor sending all that is made to the Seraglio of the Great Mogul, and the chief lords of his court. "C'est de quoy les Sultanes et les femmes des Grands Seigneurs, se font des chemises, et des robes pour la

And now he came where all the rills
 Of that well-water'd garden in one tide
 Roll'd their collected waves.
 A straight and stately bridge
 Stretch'd its long arches o'er the ample stream.
 Strong in the evening and distinct its shade
 Lay on the watery mirror, and his eye
 Saw it united with its parent pile,
 One huge fantastic fabric. Drawing near,
 Loud from the chambers of the bridge below,⁴
 Sounds of carousal came and song,
 And unweild women bade the advancing youth
 Come merry-make with them !
 Unhearing, or unheeding, he
 Pass'd o'er with hurried pace,
 And sought the shade and silence of the grove.

29.

Deserts of Araby !
 His soul return'd to you.
 He cast himself upon the earth,
 And closed his eyes and call'd
 The voluntary vision up.
 A cry, as of distress,
 Aroused him; loud it came and near !
 He started up, he strung his bow,
 He pluck'd an arrow forth.
 Again a shriek . . a woman's shriek !
 And lo ! she rushes through the trees,
 Her veil is rent, her garments torn !
 The ravisher follows close.
 "Prophet, save me ! save me, God !
 Help ! help me, man !" to Thalaba she cried ;
 Thalaba drew the bow.
 The unerring arrow did its work of death.
 Then turning to the woman, he beheld
 His own Oneiza, his Arabian Maid.

chaleur, et le Roy et les Grands se plaisent à les voir au travers de ces chemises fines, et à les faire danser." — Tavernier.

⁴ "I came to a village called Cupri-Kent, or the Village of the Bridge, because there is a very fair bridge that stands not far from it, built upon a river called Tabadi. This bridge is placed between two mountains, separated only by the river, and supported by four arches, unequal both in their height and breadth. They are built after an irregular form, in regard of two great heaps of a rock that stand in the river, upon which they laid so many arches. Those at the two ends are hollowed on both sides, and serve to lodge passengers, wherein they have made to that purpose little chambers and porticos, with every one a chimney. The arch in the middle of the river is hollowed quite through, from one part to the other, with two chambers at the ends, and two large balconies covered, where they take the cool air in the summer with great delight, and to which there is a descent of two pair of stairs hewn out of the rock. There is not a fairer bridge in all Georgia." — Chardin.

Over the river Isperuth "there is a very fair bridge, built on six arches, each whereof hath a spacious room, a kitchen, and several other conveniences, lying even with the water. The going down into it is by a stone pair of stairs, so that this bridge is able to find entertainment for a whole caravanne." — Amb. Tr.

The most magnificent of these bridges is the bridge of Zulpha at Isfahan.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

THE SEVENTH BOOK.

"Now all is done; bring home the Bride again,
Bring home the triumph of our victory!
Bring home with you the glory of her gain,
With joyance bring her, and with jollity,
Never had man more joyful day than this,
Whom Heaven would heap with bliss."

Spenser's Epithalamium.

1.

From fear, and from amazement, and from joy,
At length the Arabian Maid recovering speech,
Threw around Thalaba her arms, and cried,
"My father! O my father!" . . . Thalaba
In wonder lost, yet fearing to enquire,
Bent down his cheek on hers,
And their tears met, and mingled as they fell.

2.

ONEIZA.

At night they seized me, Thalaba! in my sleep; . .
Thou wert not near, . . and yet when in their grasp
I woke, my shriek of terror called on thee.
My father could not save me, . . an old man!
And they were strong and many: . . O my God,
The heart they must have had to hear his prayers,
And yet to leave him childless!

THALABA.

We will seek him;
We will return to Araby.

ONEIZA.

Alas!

We should not find him, Thalaba! Our tent
Is desolate! the wind hath heap'd the sands
Within its door; the lizard's track is left!
Fresh on the untrodden dust; prowling by night
The tiger as he passes, hears no breath

¹ "The dust which overspreads these beds of sand is so fine, that the lightest animal, the smallest insect, leaves there, as on snow, the vestiges of its track. The varieties of these impressions produce a pleasing effect, in spots where the saddened soul expects to meet with nothing but symptoms of the proscriptions of nature. — It is impossible to see any thing more beautiful than the traces of the passage of a species of very small lizards, extremely common in these deserts. The extremity of their tail forms regular sinuosities, in the middle of two rows of delineations, also regularly imprinted by their four feet, with their five slender toes. These traces are multiplied and interwoven near the subterranean retreats of these little animals, and present a singular assemblage which is not void of beauty." — Sonnet.

² These lines are feebly adapted from a passage in Burnet's Theory of the Earth.

"Hæc autem dicta vellem de geminis et majoribus terræ montibus; non gratos Bacchi colles hic intelligimus, aut amœnos illos monticulos, qui viridi herba et vicino fonte et

Of man, and turns to search the vacancy.
Alas! he strays a wretched wanderer
Seeking his child! old man, he will not rest, . .
He cannot rest, . . his sleep is misery, . .
His dreams are of my wretchedness, my wrongs,
O Thalaba! this is a wicked place!
Let us be gone!

THALABA.

But how to pass again
The iron doors that opening at a breath
Gave easy entrance? armies in their might
Would fail to move those hinges for return.

ONEIZA.

But we can climb the mountains that shut in
This dreadful garden.

THALABA.

Are Oneiza's limbs
Equal to that long toll?

ONEIZA.

Oh I am strong,
Dear Thalaba! for this . . fear gives me strength,
And you are with me!

3.

So she took his hand,
And gently drew him forward, and they went
Toward the mountain chain.

4.

It was broad moonlight, and obscure or lost
The garden beauties lay,
But the great boundary rose, distinctly mark'd.
These were no little hills,
No sloping uplands lifting to the sun
Their vineyards, with fresh verdure, and the shade
Of ancient woods, courting the loiterer
To win the easy ascent: stone mountains these,
Desolate rock on rock,
The burthens of the earth,
Whose snowy summits met the morning beam
When night was in the vale, whose feet were fix'd
In the world's foundations.² Thalaba beheld
The heights precipitous,
Impending crags, rocks unascendible, arboribus, vim æstivi solis repellunt: hisce non deest sua quælibetque elegantia et jucunditas. Sed longe aliud hic respicimus, nempe longæva illa tristitia et æqualentia corpora, telluris pondera, quæ duro capite rigent inter subes, infixisque in terram saxæ pedibus, ab innumeris sæculis steterunt immobilia, atque nudo pectore pertulerunt tot ænorum ardentis soles, fulmina et procellas. Illi sunt primævi et immortales illi montes, qui non aliunde, quam ex fracta mundi compage ortum suum ducere potuerunt, nec nisi cum eadem perituri sunt."

The whole chapter De Montibus is written with the eloquence of a poet. Indeed, Gibbon bestowed no exaggerated praise on Burnet in saying, that he had "blended Scripture, history, and tradition, into one magnificent system, with a sublimity of imagination scarcely inferior to Milton himself." This work should be read in Latin; the author's own translation is miserably inferior. He lived in the worst age of English prose.

And summits that had tired the eagle's wing;
 "There is no way!" he said;
 Paler Oneiza grew,
 And hung upon his arm a feebler weight.

5.

But soon again to hope
 Revives the Arabian maid,
 As Thalaba imparts the sudden thought.
 "I pass'd a river," cried the youth,
 "A full and copious stream.
 The flowing waters cannot be restrain'd,
 And where they find or force their way,
 There we perchance may follow; thitherward
 The current roll'd along."
 So saying, yet again in hope
 Quickening their eager steps,
 They turn'd them thitherward.

6.

Silent and calm the river roll'd along,
 And at the verge arrived
 Of that fair garden, o'er a rocky bed
 Toward the mountain-base,
 Still full and silent, held its even way.
 But farther as they went its deepening sound
 Louder and louder in the distance rose,
 As if it forced its stream
 Struggling through crags along a narrow pass.
 And lo! where raving o'er a hollow course
 The ever-flowing flood
 Foams in a thousand whirlpools! There adown
 The perforated rock
 Plunge the whole waters; so precipitous,
 So fathomless a fall,
 That their earth-shaking roar came deaden'd up
 Like subterranean thunders.

7.

"Allah save us!"
 Oneiza cried; "there is no path for man
 From this accursed place!"
 And as she spake, her joints
 Were loosen'd, and her knees sunk under her.
 "Cheer up, Oneiza!" Thalaba replied;
 "Be of good heart. We cannot fly
 The dangers of the place,
 But we can conquer them!"

8.

And the young Arab's soul
 Arose within him; "What is he," he cried,
 "Who hath prepared this garden of delight,
 And wherefore are its snares?"

9.

The Arabian Maid replied,
 "The Women, when I enter'd, welcomed me
 To Paradise, by Aloadin's will Chosen, like themselves, a Houri of the Earth.
 They told me, credulous of his blasphemies,
 That Aloadin placed them to reward
 His faithful servants with the joys of Heaven.
 O Thalaba, and all are ready here
 To break his wicked will, and work all crimes!
 How then shall we escape?"

10.

"Woe to him!" cried the Appointed, a stern smile
 Darkening with stronger shades his countenance;
 "Woe to him! he hath laid his toils
 To take the Antelope;
 The Lion is come in!"

11.

She shook her head, "A Sorcerer he,
 And guarded by so many! Thalaba, . .
 And thou but one!"

12.

He raised his hand to Heaven,
 "Is there not God, Oneiza?
 I have a Talisman, that, whoso bears,
 Him, nor the Earthly, nor the Infernal Powers
 Of Evil, can cast down.
 Remember, Destiny
 Hath mark'd me from mankind!
 Now rest in faith, and I will guard thy sleep!"

13.

So on a violet bank
 The Arabian Maid laid down,
 Her soft cheek pillow'd upon moss and flowers.
 She lay in silent prayer,
 Till prayer had tranquilized her fears,
 And sleep fell on her. By her side
 Silent sate Thalaba,
 And gazed upon the Maid,
 And as he gazed, drew in
 New courage and intenser faith,
 And waited calmly for the eventful day.

14.

Loud sung the Lark, the awaken'd Maid
 Beheld him twinkling in the morning light,
 And wish'd for wings and liberty like his.
 The flush of fear inflamed her cheek,
 But Thalaba was calm of soul,
 Collected for the work.
 He ponder'd in his mind
 How from Lobaba's breast
 His blunted arrow fell.
 Aloadin too might wear
 Spell perchance of equal power
 To blunt the weapon's edge.

15.

Beside the river-brink
 Grew a young poplar, whose unsteady leaves
 Varying their verdure to the gale,
 With silver glitter caught
 His meditating eye.
 Then to Oneiza turn'd the youth,
 And gave his father's bow,
 And o'er her shoulders slung
 The quiver arrow-stored.
 "Me other weapon suits," said he;
 "Bear thou the Bow: dear Maid,
 The days return upon me, when these shafts,
 True to thy guidance, from the lofty palm
 Brought down its cluster, and thy gladden'd eye,
 Exulting, turn'd to seek the voice of praise.
 Oh! yet again, Oneiza, we shall share

Our desert-joys !” So saying, to the bank
He moved, and stooping low,
With double grasp, hand below hand, he clench’d,
And from its watery soil
Uptore the poplar trunk.

16.

Then off he shook the clotted earth,
And broke away the head
And boughs, and lesser roots ;
And lifting it aloft,
Wielded with able sway the massy club.
“ Now for this child of Hell !” quoth Thalaba ;
“ Belike he shall exchange to-day
His dainty Paradise
For other dwelling, and its cups of joy
For the unallayable bitterness
Of Zaccoum’s fruit accurst.”¹

17.

With that the Arabian youth and maid
Toward the centre of the garden went.
It chanced that Aloadin had convoked
The garden-habitants,
And with the assembled throng
Oneiza mingled, and the Appointed Youth.
Unmark’d they mingled ; or if one
With busier finger to his neighbour notes
The quiver’d Maid, “ Haply,” he says,
“ Some daughter of the Homerites,²
Or one who yet remembers with delight
Her native tents of Himiar.” “ Nay !” rejoins
His comrade, “ a love-pageant ! for the man
Mimics with that fierce eye and knotty club
Some savage lion-tamer ; she forsooth
Must play the heroine of the years of old.”

18.

Radiant with gems upon his throne of gold
Sate Aloadin ; o’er the Sorcerer’s head
Hover’d a Bird, and in the fragrant air
Waved his wide winnowing wings,
A living canopy.
Large as the hairy Cassowar
Was that o’ershadowing Bird ;
So huge his talons, in their grasp
The Eagle would have hung a helpless prey.
His beak was iron, and his plumes
Glisten’d like burnish’d gold,
And his eyes glow’d, as though an inward fire
Shone through a diamond orb.

¹ “ The Zaccoum is a tree which issueth from the bottom of Hell ; the fruit thereof resembleth the heads of devils ; and the damned shall eat of the same, and shall fill their bellies therewith ; and there shall be given them thereon a mixture of boiling water to drink ; afterwards shall they return to Hell.”— Koran, chap. xxvii.

“ This hellish Zaccoum has its name from a thorny tree in Tehama, which bears fruit like an almond, but extremely bitter ; therefore the same name is given to the infernal tree.”— Sale.

² When the sister of the famous Derar was made prisoner

19.

The blinded multitude
Adored the Sorcerer,
And bent the knee before him,
And shouted forth his praise ;
“ Mighty art thou, the bestower of joy,
The Lord of Paradise !”
Then Aloadin rose and waved his hand.
And they stood mute, and moveless,
In idolising awe.

20.

“ Children of Earth,” he said,
“ Whom I have guided here
By easier passage than the gate of Death,
The infidel Sultan, to whose lands
My mountains stretch their roots,
Blasphemes and threatens me.
Strong are his armies, many are his guards,
Yet may a dagger find him.
Children of Earth, I tempt ye not
With the vain promise of a bliss unseen,
With tales of a hereafter Heaven,
Whence never Traveller hath return’d !
Have ye not tasted of the cup of joy
That in these groves of happiness
For ever over-mantling tempts
The ever-thirsty lip ?
Who is there here that by a deed
Of danger will deserve
The eternal joys of actual Paradise ?”

21.

“ I !” Thalaba exclaimed ;
And springing forward, on the Sorcerer’s head
He dash’d his knotty club.

22.

Aloadin fell not, though his skull
Was shattered by the blow,
For by some talisman
His miserable life imprison’d still Dwelt in the body. The astonish’d crowd
Stand motionless with fear,
Expecting to behold
Immediate vengeance from the wrath of Heaven.
And lo ! the Bird . . . the monster Bird,
Soars up . . . then pounces down
To seize on Thalaba !
Now, Oneiza, bend the bow,
Now draw the arrow home ! . . .
True fled the arrow from Oneiza’s hand ;
It pierc’d the monster Bird,
It broke the Talisman, . . .

before Damascus, with many other Arabian women, she excited them to mutiny : they seized the poles of the tents, and attacked their captors. This bold resolution, says Marigny, was not inspired by impotent anger. Most of these women had military inclinations already ; particularly those who were of the tribe of Himiar, or of the Homerites, where they are early exercised in riding the horse, and in using the bow, the lance, and the javelin. The revolt was successful, for, during the engagement, Derar came up to their assistance. — Marigny.

Then darkness cover'd all, . . .
Earth shook, Heaven thunder'd, and amid the yells
Of evil Spirits perished
The Paradise of Sin.¹

¹ "In the N.E. parts of Persia there was an old man named Aloudin, a Mahumetan, which had inclosed a goodly valley, situate between two hills, and furnished it with all variety which nature and art could yield; as fruits, pictures, rills of milk, wine, honey, water, palaces, and beautiful damosells, richly attired, and called it Paradise. To this was no passage but by an impregnable castle; and daily preaching the pleasures of this Paradise to the youth which he kept in his court, sometimes he would minister a sleepy drinke to some of them, and then convey them thither, where, being entertained with these pleasures four or five days, they supposed themselves rapt into Paradise, and then being again cast into a trance by the said drinke, he caused them to be carried forth, and then would examine them of what they had scene, and by this delusion would make them resolute for any enterprise which he should appoint them; as to murder any prince his enemy, for they feared not death in hope of their Mahumetical Paradise. But Hasior or Ulan, after three years' siege, destroyed him, and this his fool's Paradise."
—Purchas.

In another place Purchas tells the same tale, but calls the impostor Aldeudes, and says that Selim the Ottoman Emperor destroyed his Paradise.

The story is told by many writers, but with such difference of time and place, as wholly to invalidate its truth, even were the circumstances more probable.

"Travelling on further towards the south, I arrived at a certain country called Melistorte, which is a very pleasant and fertile place. And in this country there was a cortome aged man called Senex de Monte, who, round about two mountaines, had built a wall to enclose the said mountaines. Within this wall there were the fairest and most chrystall fountains in the whole world; and about the said fountains there were most beautiful virgins in great number, and goodly horses also; and, in a word, every thing that could be devised for bodily solace and delight, and therefore the inhabitants of the country call the same place by the name of Paradise.

"The said olde Senex, when he saw any proper and valliant young man, he would admit him into his paradise. Moreover by certayne conducts, he makes wine and milk to flow abundantly. This Senex, when he hath a minde to revenge himselfe, or to slay any king or baron, commandeth him that is governor of the said Paradise to bring thereunto some of the acquaintance of the said king or baron, permitting him a while to take his pleasure therein, and then to give him a certayne potion, being of force to cast him into such a slumber as should make him quite void of all sense, and so being in a profounde sleepe, to convey him out of his paradise; who being awaked, and seeing himselfe thrust out of the paradise, would become so sorrowfull, that he could not in the world devise what to do, or whither to turne him. Then would he go unto the forsaide old man, beseeching him that he might be admitted againe into his paradise: who saith unto him, you cannot be admitted thither, unless you will slay such or such a man for my sake, and if you will give the attempt only, whether you kill him or no, I will place you againe in paradise, that there you may remaine alwayes. Then would the party, without faile, put the same in execution, endeavouring to murder all those against whom the said olde man had conceived any hatred. And therefore all the kings of the East stood in awe of the said olde man, and gave unto him great tribute.

"And when the Tartars had subdued a great part of the world, they came unto the said olde man, and tooke from him the custody of his paradise; who being incensed thereat, sent abroad diverse desperate and resolute persons out of his

At last the earth was still;
The yelling of the Demons ceased!
Opening the wreck and ruin to their sight,

forenamed paradise, and caused many of the Tartarian nobles to be slain. The Tartars, seeing this, went and besieged the city wherein the said olde man was, tooke him, and put him to a most cruell and ignominious death." —Odoricus.

The most particular account is given by that undaunted liar, Sir John Maundeville:—

"Beside the Yle of Pentecostre, that is, the Iland of Prestre John, is a great Yle, long and brode, that men clepen Milaterak; and it is in the Lordschipe of Prestre John. In that Yle is gret plente of godes. There was dwellinge sometyne a ryche man; and it is not long sithen, and men clept him Gatholonabes; and he was full of cauteles, and of sotylle diacretyes; and had a fulle fair castelle, and a strong, in a mountayne, so strong and so noble, that no man cowde devise a fairere, ne a strengere. And he had let muren all the mountayne aboute with a stronge walle and a fair. And withinne the walles he had the fairest gardyn that ony man might behold; and therein were trees berynge all manner of frutes that ony man cowde devyse, and therein were also alle maner vertuouus herbes of gode smelle, and all other herbes also that beren fair floures, and he had also in that gardyn many faire welles, and beside the welles he had leto make faire halles and faire chambres, depeynted alle with gold and azure. And there weren in that place many dyverse thinges, and many dyverse stories; and of beestes and of bryddes that songen fulle delectably, and moveden be craft that it semede that thei weren quike. And he had also in his gardyn all maner of fowles and of bestes, that ony man might thinke on, for to have pley or desport to beholde hem. And he had also in that place, the faireste damyzeles that myghte ben founde under the age of 15 zere, and the fairest zouge stripynges that men myghte gete of that same age; and all thei weren clothed in clothes of gold fully richely, and he seyde that thei weren anges. And he had also let make three welles faire and noble and all envyrround with ston of jaspere, of cristalle, dynpned with gold, and sett with precious stones, and grette orient perles. And he had made a conduyt under erthe, so that the three welles, at his list, on scholde renne milk, another wyn, and another hony, and that place he clept paradys. And when that ony gode knyght, that was hardy and noble, came to see this Rialtee, he would lode him into his paradys, and schewen him theise wondirfulle thinges to his desport, and the marvellous and delicious song of dyverse bryddes, and the faire damyzeles and the faire welles of mylk, wyn, and honey plenteyous rennyng. And he would let make dyverse instruments of musick to sownen in an high tour, so merly, that it was joye for to here, and no man scholde see the craft thereof: and tho, he seyde, weren Augeles of God, and that place was paradys, that God had beghyght to his friends, saying, 'Dabo vobis terram fluentem lacte et melle.' And thanne wolde he maken hem to drynken of certeyn drynk, whereof anon thei sholden be dronken, and thanne wolde hem thinke gretter deynt than thei hadden before. And then wolde he seye to hem, that if thei wolde dyen for him and for his love, that after hire dethe thei scholde come to his paradys, and thei scholde ben of the age of the damyzeles, and thei scholde pleyen with hem and sit ben maydenes. And after that sit scholde he putten hem in a fayrere paradys, where that thei scholde see God of nature visibly in his mageste and in his blisse. And then wolde he schewe hem his entent and seye hem, that if thei wolde go to such a lord, or such a man, that was his enemye, or contrarious to his list, that thei scholde not drede to don it, and for to be sleyn therefore hemselfe; for after hire dethe he wolde putten hem into another paradys, that was an hundred fold fairere than any of the tothere: and there scholde thei

The darkness roll'd away. Alone in life,
Amid the desolation and the dead,
Stood the Destroyer and the Arabian Maid.
They look'd around, the rocks were rent,
The path was open, late by magic closed;
Awe-struck and silent down the stony glen
They wound their thoughtful way.

24.
Amid the vale below
Tents rose, and streamers play'd,
And javelins sparkled to the sun;
And multitudes encamp'd
Swarm'd, far as eye could travel o'er the plain.
There in his war pavilion sate
In council with his Chiefs
The Sultan of the Land.
Before his presence there a Captain led Oneiza and the Appointed Youth.

25.
"Obedient to our Lord's command," said he,
"We pass'd toward the mountains, and began
The ascending strait; when suddenly Earth shook,
And darkness, like the midnight, fell around,
And fire and thunder came from Heaven,
As though the Retribution-day were come.
After the terror ceased, and when with hearts
Somewhat assured, again we ventured on,
This youth and woman met us on the way.
They told us, that from Aloadin's hold
They came, on whom the judgement stroke hath fallen,
He and his sinful Paradise at once
Destroy'd by them, the agents they of Heaven.
Therefore I brought them hither to repeat
The tale before thy presence; that as search
Shall prove it false or faithful, to their merit
Thou mayest reward them."
"Be it done to us,"
Thalaba answer'd, "as the truth shall prove!"

26.
The Sultan while he spake
Fix'd on him the proud eye of sovereignty;
"If thou hast play'd with us,
By Allah and by Ali, Death shall seal
The lying lips for ever! But if the thing
Be as thou say'st, Arabian, thou shalt stand
Next to myself!" . . .
Hark! while he speaks, the cry,
The lengthening cry, the increasing shout
Of joyful multitudes!
Breathless and panting to the tent dwelling with the most fairest damyseles that myghte be, and play with hem ever more. And thus wenten many dyverse lusty bachelers for to sle grete lords, in dyverse countrees, that weren his enemyes, and maaden himself to ben slayn in hope to have that paradye. And thus often tyme he was revenged of his enemyes by his sotylle disceytes and false castyles. And when the worthe men of the countree hadden perceyved this sotylle falschod of this Gatholonabes, thei assembled hem with force, and assayleden his castelle, and slowen him, and destroyden alle the faire places, and alle the nobleties of that paradye. The place of the welles, and of the walles, and of many other thynges, bene sit apertly sene;

The bearer of good tidings comes,
"O Sultan, live for ever! be thy foes
Like Aloadin all!
The wrath of God hath smitten him."

27.
Joy at the welcome tale
Shone in the Sultan's cheek;
"Array the Arabian in the robe
Of honour," he exclaim'd,
"And place a chain of gold around his neck,
And bind around his brow the diadem,
And mount him on my steed of state,
And lead him through the camp,
And let the Heralds go before and cry,
Thus shall the Sultan reward
The man who serves him well!"

28.
Then in the purple robe
They vested Thalaba,
And hung around his neck the golden chain,
And bound his forehead with the diadem,
And on the royal steed
They led him through the camp,
And Heralds went before and cried,
"Thus shall the Sultan reward
The man who serves him well!"

29.
When from the pomp of triumph
And presence of the King,
Thalaba sought the tent allotted him,
Thoughtful the Arabian Maid beheld
His animated eye,
His cheek inflamed with pride.
"Oneiza!" cried the youth,
"The King hath done according to his word,
And made me in the land
Next to himself be named! . . .
But why that serious melancholy smile? . . .
Oneiza, when I heard the voice that gave me
Honour, and wealth, and fame, the instant thought
Arose to fill my joy, that thou would'st hear
The tidings, and be happy."

ONEIZA.
Thalaba,
Thou would'st not have me mirthful! Am I not
An orphan, . . . among strangers?

THALABA.
But with me!

but the riches is voyded cleene. And it is not long gon sithen that place was destroyed."—Sir John Maundeville.
"Let the royal apparel be brought which the king useth to wear, and the horse that the king rideth upon, and the crown-royal which is set upon his head.
"And let this apparel and horse be delivered to the hand of one of the king's most noble princes, that they may array the man withal whom the king delighteth to honour, and bring him on horseback through the streets of the city, and proclaim before him, Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour."—Ecker, vi. 8, 9.

ONEIZA.
My Father ! . .

THALABA.

Nay, be comforted ! Last night
To what wert thou exposed ! in what a peril
The morning found us ! . . safety, honour, wealth,
These now are ours. This instant who thou wert
The Sultan ask'd. I told him from our childhood
We had been plighted ; . . was I wrong, Oneiza ?
And when he said with bounties he would heap
Our nuptials, . . wilt thou blame me if I blest

With song, with music, and with dance,
The bridal pomp proceeds,
Following the deep-veil'd Bride
Fifty female slaves attend
In costly robes that gleam
With interwoven gold,
And sparkle far with gems.
An hundred slaves behind them bear
Vessels of silver and vessels of gold,
And many a gorgeous garment gay,
The presents that the Sultan gave.
On either hand the pages go
With torches flaring through the gloom,
And trump and timbrel merriment
Accompanies their way ;
And multitudes with loud acclaim
Shout blessings on the Bride.
And now they reach the palace pile,
The palace home of Thalaba,
And now the marriage feast is spread,
And from the finish'd banquet now
The wedding guests are gone.

Go not among the Tombs, Old Man !

where else. He therefore inquires, Whether the guilt of sins must not be augmented in a like proportion ?"—Notices des MSS. de la Bibl. Nat. t. iv. 541.

OLD MAN.

Will he harm me if I go?

WOMAN.

Not he, poor miserable man!
But 'tis a wretched sight to see
His utter wretchedness.
For all day long he lies on a grave,
And never is he seen to weep,
And never is he heard to groan,
Nor ever at the hour of prayer
Bends his knee nor moves his lips.
I have taken him food for charity,
And never a word he spake:
But yet so ghastly he look'd,
That I have awaken'd at night
With the dream of his ghastly eyes.
Now, go not among the Tombs, Old Man!

OLD MAN.

Wherefore has the wrath of God
So sorely stricken him?

WOMAN.

He came a stranger to the land,
And did good service to the Sultan,
And well his service was rewarded.
The Sultan named him next himself,
And gave a palace for his dwelling,
And dower'd his bride with rich domains.
But on his wedding night

There came the Angel of Death.
Since that hour, a man distracted
Among the sepulchres he wanders.
The Sultan, when he heard the tale,
Said that for some untold crime
Judgement thus had stricken him,
And asking Heaven forgiveness
That he had shown him favour,
Abandon'd him to want.

OLD MAN.

A Stranger did you say?

WOMAN.

An Arab born, like you.
But go not among the Tombs,
For the sight of his wretchedness
Might make a hard heart ache!

OLD MAN.

Nay, nay, I never yet have shunn'd
A countryman in distress!
And the sound of his dear native tongue
May be like the voice of a friend.

¹ "As the celestial Apostle, at his retreat from Medina, did not perform always the five canonical prayers at the precise time, his disciples, who often neglected to join with him in the Namas, assembled one day to fix upon some method of announcing to the public those moments of the day and night when their master discharged this first of religious duties. Flugs, bells, trumpets, and fire, were successively proposed as signals. None of these, however, were admitted. The flags were rejected as unsuited to the sanctity of the object; the bells, on account of their being used by Christians; the trumpets, as appropriated to the Hebrew worship; the fires, as having too near an analogy to the religion of the

Then to the Sepulchre
Where to she pointed him,
Old Moath bent his way.
By the tomb lay Thalaba,
In the light of the setting eve;
The sun, and the wind, and the rain,
Had rusted his raven locks;
His cheeks were fallen in,
His face-bones prominent;
Reclined against the tomb he lay,
And his lean fingers play'd,
Unwitting, with the grass that grew beside.

3.

The Old Man knew him not,
But drawing near him, said,
"Countryman, peace be with thee!"
The sound of his dear native tongue
Awaken'd Thalaba;
He raised his countenance,
And saw the good Old Man,
And he arose and fell upon his neck,
And groan'd in bitterness.
Then Moath knew the youth,
And fear'd that he was childless; and he turn'd
His asking eyes, and pointed to the tomb.
"Old Man!" cried Thalaba,
"Thy search is ended here!"

4.

The father's cheek grew white,
And his lip quiver'd with the misery;
Howbeit, collectedly, with painful voice
He answer'd, "God is good! His will be done!"

5.

The woe in which he spake,
The resignation that inspired his speech,
They soften'd Thalaba.
"Thou hast a solace in thy grief," he cried,
"A comforter within!
Moath! thou seest me here,
Deliver'd to the Evil Powers,
A God-abandon'd wretch."

6.

The Old Man look'd at him incredulous.
"Nightly," the youth pursued,
"Thy daughter comes to drive me to despair.
Moath, thou thinkest me mad;
But when the Cryer from the Minaret!
Proclaims the midnight hour,
Hast thou a heart to see her?"

pyrolators. From this contrariety of opinions, the disciples separated without any determination. But one of them, Abdullah bin Zeid Abderyd, saw the night following, in a dream a celestial being clothed in green: he immediately requested his advice, with the most zealous earnestness, respecting the object in dispute. 'I am come to inform you,' replied the heavenly visitor, 'how to discharge this important duty of your religion.' He then ascended to the roof of the house, and declared the Exams with a loud voice, and in the same words which have been ever since used to declare the canonical periods. When he awoke, Abdullah ran to declare his vision to the prophet, who loaded him with blessings, and authorized that moment Bilal Habeschy, another of his disciples, to charge, on the top of his house, that august office, by the title of Muezzin.

"These are the words of the Exann: 'Most high God! most high God! most high God! I acknowledge that there is no other except God; I acknowledge that there is no other except God! I acknowledge that Mohammed is the Prophet of God! Come to prayer! Come to prayer! come to the temple of salvation. Great God! great God! there is no God except God.'

"This declaration must be the same for each of the five canonical periods, except that of the morning, when the Muezzin ought to add, after the words, 'Come to the temple of salvation,' the following: 'Prayer is to be preferred to sleep, prayer is to be preferred to sleep.'

"This addition was produced by the zeal and plety of Bilal Habeschy: as he announced one day the Exann of the dawn in the prophet's antechamber, Alasche, in a whisper, informed him, that the celestial envoy was still asleep; this first of Muezzins then added these words, 'Prayer is to be preferred to sleep;' when he awoke, the prophet applauded him, and commanded Bilal to insert them in all the morning Exanns.

"The words must be chanted, but with deliberation and gravity, those particularly which constitute the profession of the faith. The Muezzin must pronounce them distinctly; he must pay more attention to the articulation of the words than to the melody of his voice; he must make proper intervals and pauses, and not precipitate his words, but let them be clearly understood by the people. He must be interrupted by no other object whatever. During the whole Exann, he must stand with a finger in each ear, and his face turned, as in prayer, towards the Kabâ of Mecca. As he utters these words, 'Come to prayer, come to the temple of salvation,' he must turn his face to the right and left, because he is supposed to address all the nations of the world, the whole expanded universe. At this time the auditors must recite, with a low voice, the Tekhill. . . There is no strength, there is no power, but what is in God, in that supreme Being, in that powerful Being." — D'Osson.

"In the Meidan, or Great Place of the city of Tauris, there are people appointed every evening when the sun sets, and every morning when he rises, to make during half an hour a terrible concert of trumpets and drums. They are placed on one side of the square, in a gallery somewhat elevated; and the same practice is established in every city in Persia." — Tavernier.

"If we except a few persons, who are buried within the precincts of some sanctuary, the rest are carried out at a distance from their cities and villages, where a great extent of ground is allotted for that purpose. Each family hath a particular portion of it, walled in like a garden, where the bones of their ancestors have remained undisturbed for many generations. For in these enclosures the graves are all distinct and separate; having each of them a stone, placed upright, both at the head and feet, inscribed with the name of the person who lieth there interred; whilst the intermediate space is either planted with flowers, bordered round with stone, or paved all over with tiles. The graves of the principal citizens are further distinguished by some square chambers or cupolas; that are built over them.

"Now, as all these different sorts of tombs and sepulchres, with the very walls likewise of the enclosures, are constantly kept clean, white-washed, and beautified, they continue, to this day, to be an excellent comment upon that expression of our Saviour's, where he mentions the 'garnishing of the sepulchres,' and again where he compares the scribes, pharisees, and hypocrites to 'whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness.' For the space of two or three months after any person is interred, the female relations go once a week to weep over the grave, and perform their parental duties upon it." — Shaw.

"About a quarter of a mile from the town of Mylasa, is a sepulchre of the species called by the ancients, Distiga, or Double-roofed. It consisted of two square rooms. In the lower, which has a doorway, were deposited the urns, with the ashes of the deceased. In the upper, the relations and friends solemnized the anniversary of the funeral, and performed stated rites. A hole made through the floor was designed for pouring libations of honey, milk, or wine, with which it was usual to gratify the manes or spirits." — Chandler's Travels in Asia Minor.

"St. Anthony the Great once retired to the sepulchres; a brother shut him in, in one of the tombs, and regularly brought him food. One day he found the doors of the tomb broken, and Anthony lying upon the ground as dead, the devil had so mauled him. Once a whole army of devils attacked him; the place was shaken from its foundation, the walls were thrown down, and the crowd of multiform fiends rushed in. They filled the place with the shapes of lions, and bulls, and wolves, asps, serpents, scorpions, pards, and bears, yelling, and howling, and threatening, and flogging and wounding him. The brave saint defied them, and upbraided them for their cowardice in not attacking him one to one, and defended himself with the sign of the cross. And lo, a light fell from above, which at once put the hellish rabble to flight, and healed his wounds, and strengthened him; and the walls of the sepulchre rose from their ruins. Then knew Anthony the presence of the Lord, and the voice of Christ proceeded from the light to comfort and applaud him." — Acta Sanct. t. ii. Jan. 17. p. 123. Vita S. Ant. auct. S. Athanasio.

"The Egyptian saints frequently inhabited sepulchres. St. James the hermit found an old sepulchre, made in the form of a cave, wherein many bones of the dead had been deposited, which, by length of time, were now become as dust. Entering there, he collected the bones into a heap, and laid them in a corner of the monument, and closed upon himself the old door of the cave." — Acta Sanct. tom. ii. Jan. 28. p. 872. Vita S. Jacobi Eremitæ, apud Metaphrasten.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

And in the pauses of its sweep
They heard the heavy rain
Beat on the monument above.
In silence on Oneiza's grave
Her Father and her husband sate.

9.

The Cryer from the Minaret
Proclaim'd the midnight hour.
"Now, now!" cried Thalaba;
And o'er the chamber of the tomb
There spread a lurid gleam,
Like the reflection of a sulphur fire;
And in that hideous light
Oneiza stood before them. It was She, . .
Her very lineaments, . . and such as death
Had changed them, livid cheeks, and lips of blue;
But in her eyes there dwelt
Brightness more terrible
Than all the loathsomeness of death.
"Still art thou living, wretch?"

In hollow tones she cried to Thalaba;
"And must I nightly leave my grave
To tell thee, still in vain,
God hath abandon'd thee?"

"This is not she!" the Old Man exclaim'd;
"A Fiend; a manifest Fiend!"
And to the youth he held his lance;
"Strike, and deliver thyself!"
"Strike ~~her~~!" cried Thalaba,
And, palsied of all power,
Gazed fix'dly upon the dreadful form.
"Yea, strike her!" cried a voice, whose tones
Flow'd with such sudden healing through his soul,
As when the desert shower
From death deliver'd him;
But unobedient to that well-known voice,
His eye was seeking it,
When Moath, firm of heart,
Perform'd the bidding: through the vampire corpaes¹

¹ In the Lettres Juives, is the following extract from the Mercur Historique et Politique. Octob. 1736.

"We have had in this country a new scene of Vampirism, which is duly attested by two officers of the Tribunal of Belgrade, who took cognizance of the affair on the spot, and by an officer in his Imperial Majesty's troops at Gradiach (in Slavonia), who was an eye-witness of the proceedings.

"In the beginning of September, there died at the village of Kislava, three leagues from Gradiach, an old man of above threescore and two; three days after he was buried, he appeared in the night to his son, and desired he would give him somewhat to eat, and then disappeared. The next day the son told his neighbours these particulars. That night the father did not come, but the next evening he made him another visit, and desired something to eat. It is not known whether his son gave him anything or not, but the next morning the young man was found dead in his bed. The magistrate or halff of the place had notice of this; as also that the same day five or six persons fell sick in the village, and died one after the other. He sent an exact account of this to the tribunal of Belgrade, and thereupon two commissioners were dispatched to the village, attended by an executioner, with instructions to examine closely into the affair. An officer in the Imperial service, from whom we have this relation, went also from Gradiach, in order to examine personally an affair of which he had heard so much. They opened in the first place the graves of all who have been buried in six weeks. When they came to that of the old man, they found his eyes open, his colour fresh, his respiration quick and strong, yet he appeared to be stiff and insensible. From these signs, they concluded him to be a notorious Vampire. The executioner thereupon, by the command of the commissioners, struck a stake through his heart; and when he had so done, they made a bonfire, and therein consumed the carcass to ashes. There were no marks of Vampirism found on his son or on the bodies of the other persons who died so suddenly."

Thanks be to God, we are as far as any people can be from giving into credulity; we acknowledge that all the lights of physic do not enable us to give any account of this fact, nor do we pretend to enter into its causes. However, we cannot avoid giving credit to a matter of fact juridically attested by competent and unsuspected witnesses, especially since it is far from being the only one of the kind. We shall here annex an instance of the same sort in 1732, already inserted in the Gleaner, No. 18.

"In a certain town of Hungary, which is called in Latin Oppida Heidonum, on the other side Tibiscus, vulgarly called the Teyss, that is to say, the river which washes the celebrated territory of Tokay, as also a part of Transylvania, the people known by the name of Hrydukes believe that certain dead persons, whom they call Vampires, suck the blood of the living, inasmuch that these people appear like skeletons, while the dead bodies of the suckers are so full of blood, that it runs out at all the passages of their bodies, and even at their very pores. This old opinion of theirs they support by a multitude of facts, attested in such a manner, that they leave no room for doubt. We shall here mention some of the most considerable.

"It is now about five years ago, that a certain Hryduke, an inhabitant of the village of Madrciga, whose name was Arnold Paul, was bruised to death by a hay-cart, which ran over him. Thirty days after his death, no less than four persons died suddenly in that manner, wherefn, according to the tradition of the country, those people generally die who are sucked by Vampires. Upon this a story was called to mind, that this Arnold Paul had told in his lifetime, viz. that at Cossova, on the frontiers of the Turkish Servia, he had been tormented by a Vampire; (now the established opinion is, that a person sucked by a Vampire becomes a Vampire himself, and sucks in his turn;) but that he had found a way to rid himself of this evil by eating some of the earth out of the Vampire's grave, and rubbing himself with his blood. This precaution, however, did not hinder his becoming a Vampire, inasmuch, that his body being taken up forty days after his death, all the marks of a notorious Vampire were found thereon. His complexion was fresh, his hair, nails, and beard were grown; he was full of fluid blood, which ran from all parts of his body upon his shroud. The Hadnagy or Budif of the place, who was a person well acquainted with Vampirism, caused a sharp stake to be thrust, as the custom is, through the heart of Arnold Paul, and also quite through his body, whereupon he cried out dreadfully, as if he had been alive. This done, they cut off his head, burnt his body, and threw the ashes thereof into the Saave. They took the same measures with the bodies of those persons who had died of Vampirism, for fear that they should fall to sucking in their turns.

"All these prudent steps did not hinder the same mischief from breaking out again about five years afterwards, when several people in the same village died in a very odd manner. In the space of three months, seventeen persons of all ages and sexes died of Vampirism, some suddenly, and some after two or three days' suffering. Amongst others, there was one Stanooska, the daughter of a Hryduke, whose name was Jovino, who, going to bed in perfect health, waked in the middle of the night, and making a terrible outcry, affirmed, that the son of a certain Heyduke, whose name was Millo, and who had been dead about three weeks, had attempted to strangle her in her sleep. She continued from that time in a languishing condition, and in the space of three days died. What this girl had said, discovered the son of Millo to be a Vampire. They took up the body and found him so in effect. The principal persons of the place, particularly the physician and surgeons, began to examine very narrowly, how, in spite of all their precautions, Vampirism had again broke out in so terrible a manner. After a strict inquisition, they found that the deceased Arnold Paul had not only sucked the four persons before mentioned, but likewise several beasts, of whom the new Vampires had eaten, particularly the son of Millo. Induced by these circumstances, they took a resolution of digging up the bodies of all persons who had died within a certain time. They did so, and amongst forty bodies there were found seventeen evidently Vampires. Through the hearts of those they drove stakes, cut off their heads, burnt their bodies, and threw the ashes into the river. All the informations we have been speaking of were taken in a legal way, and all the executions were so performed, as appears by certificates drawn up in full form, attested by several officers in the neighbouring garrisons, by the surgeons of several regiments, and the principal inhabitants of the place. The usual process was sent towards the latter end of last January to the council of war at Vienna, who thereupon established a special commission to examine into these facts. Those just now mentioned were attested by the Hadnagy Barrister, the principle Heyduke of the village, as also by Battuer, first lieutenant of Prince Alexander of Wirtemberg, Fuckstenger, surgeon-major of the regiment of Furstenberg, three other surgeons of the same regiment, and several other persons."

This superstition extends to Greece

"The man, whose story we are going to relate, was a peasant of Mycone, naturally ill-natured and quarrelsome, this is a circumstance to be taken notice of in such cases. He was murdered in the fields, nobody knew how or by whom. Two days after his being buried in a chapel in the town, it was noised about that he was seen to walk in the night with great haste, that he tumbled about people's goods, put out their lamps, gripped them behind, and a thousand other monkey tricks. At first the story was received with laughter, but the thing was looked upon to be serious when the better sort of people began to complain of it, the Papas themselves gave credit to the fact, and no doubt had their reasons for so doing; masses must be said, to be sure. but for all this, the peasant drove his old trade, and heeded nothing they could do. After divers meetings of the chief people of the city, of priests and monks, it was gravely concluded, that it was necessary, in consequence of some musty ceremonial, to wait till nine days after the interment should be expired.

"On the tenth day, they said one mass in the chapel where the body was laid, in order to drive out the Demon which they imagined was got into it. After mass they took up the body, and got every thing ready for pulling out its heart. The butcher of the town, an old clumsy fellow, first opens the belly instead of the breast; he groped a long while among the entrails, but could not find what he looked for; at last, somebody told him he should cut up the diaphragm. The heart was then pulled out, to the admiration of all the spectators. In the mean time the corpse stunk so abominably, that they were obliged to burn frankincense; but the smoke mixing with the exhalations from the carcass, increased the stink, and began to muddle the poor people's pericranies. Their imagination, struck with the spectacle before them, grew full of visions. It came into their noddies that a thick smoke came out of the body, we durst not say it was the smoke of the incense. They were incessantly bawling out Vroucolacas, in the chapel and place before it: this is the name they give to these pretended Redivivi. The noise bel- lowed through the streets, and it seemed to be a name in- vented on purpose to rend the roof of the chapel. Several there present averred, that the wretch's blood was extremely red, the butcher swore the body was still warm, whence they concluded that the deceased was a very ill man for not being thoroughly dead, or, in plain terms, for suffering him- self to be re-animated by Old Nick, which is the notion they have of Vroucolacas. They then roared out that name in a stupendous manner. Just at this time came in a flock of people, loudly protesting they plainly perceived the body was not grown stiff when it was carried from the fields to the church to be buried, and that consequently it was a true Vroucolacas, which word was still the burden of the song.

"I don't doubt they would have sworn it did not stink, had not we been there, so mazed were the poor people with this disaster, and so infatuated with their notion of the dead being re-animated. As for us, who were got as close to the corpse as we could, that we might be more exact in our observa- tions, we were almost poisoned with the intolerable stink that issued from it. When they asked us what we thought of this body, we told them we believed it to be very tho- roughly dead, but as we were willing to cure, or at least not to exasperate their prejudiced imaginations, we represented to them that it was no wonder the butcher should feel a little warmth when he groped among entrails that were then rotting; that it was no extraordinary thing for it to emit fumes, since dung turned up will do the same, that as for the pretended redness of the blood, it still appeared by the butcher's hands to be nothing but a very stinking nasty smear.

"After all our reasons, they were of opinion it would be their wisest course to burn the dead man's heart on the sea- shore but this execution did not make him a bit more tract- able, he went on with his racket more furiously than ever: he was accused of beating folks in the night, breaking down doors, and even roofs of houses, clattering windows, tearing clothes, emptying bottles and vessels. It was the most thirsty devil! I believe he did not spare any body but the Consul, in whose house we lodged. Nothing could be more miserable than the condition of this island, all the inhabit- ants seemed frightened out of their senses the wisest among them were stricken like the rest; it was an epidemical disease of the brain, as dangerous and infectious as the madness of dogs. Whole families quitted their houses, and brought their tent beds from the farthest parts of the town into the public place, there to spend the night. They were every in- stant complaining of some new insult; nothing was to be heard but sighs and groans at the approach of night; the bet- ter sort of people retired into the country.

"When the prepossession was so general, we thought it our best way to hold our tongues. Had we opposed it, we had not only been accounted ridiculous blockheads, but Atheists and Infidels; how was it possible to stand against the mad- ness of a whole people? Those that believed we doubted the truth of the fact came and upbraided us with our incre- duleity, and strove to prove that there were such things as Vroucolacas, by citations out of the Duchier of Faith, written by F. Richard, a Jesuit Missionary. He was a Latin say they, and consequently you ought to give him credit. We should have got nothing by denying the justness of the consequence: it was as good as a comedy to us every morn- ing to hear the new follies committed by this night bird; they charged him with being guilty of the most abominable sins.

"Some citizens, that were most zealous for the good of the public, fancied they had been deficient in the most material

"O Thalaba!" she cried,
 "Abandon not thyself!
 Would'st thou for ever lose me? . . O my husband,
 Go and fulfil thy quest,
 That in the Bowers of Paradise
 I may not look for thee
 In vain, nor wait thee long."

12.

To Moath then the Spirit
 Turn'd the dark lustre of her heavenly eyes:
 "Short is thy destined path,
 O my dear Father! to the abode of bliss.
 Return to Araby,
 There with the thought of death
 Comfort thy lonely age,
 And Asrael, the Deliverer, soon
 Will visit thee in peace."

They stood with earnest eyes,
 And arms out-reaching, when again
 The darkness closed around them.
 The soul of Thalaba revived;
 He from the floor his quiver took,
 And as he bent the bow, exclaimed,
 "Was it the over-ruling Providence
 That in the hour of frenzy led my hands

part of the ceremony. They were of opinion that they had been wrong in saying mass before they had pulled out the wretch's heart: 'Had we taken this precaution,' quoth they, 'we had bit the devil as sure as a gun: he would have been hanged before he would ever have come there again; whereas, saying mass first, the cunning dog fed for it awhile, and came back again when the danger was over.'

"Notwithstanding these wise reflections, they remained in as much perplexity as they were the first day: they meet night and morning, they debate, they make processions three days and three nights; they oblige the Papas to fast; you might see them running from house to house, holy-water-brush in hand, sprinkling it all about, and washing the doors with it; nay, they poured it into the mouth of the poor Vroucolacas.

"We so often repeated it to the magistrates of the town, that in Christendom we should keep the strictest watch a-nights upon such an occasion, to observe what was done, that at last they caught a few vagabonds, who undoubtedly had a hand in these disorders; but either they were not the chief ringleaders, or else they were released too soon. For two days afterwards, to make themselves amends for the Lent they had kept in prison, they fell foul again upon the wine tubs of those who were such fools as to leave their houses empty in the night: so that the people were forced to betake themselves again to their prayers.

"One day as they were hard at this work, after having stuck I know not how many naked swords over the grave of this corpse, which they took up three or four times a-day, for any man's whim, an Albanese that happened to be at Mycone took upon him to say, with a voice of authority, that it was in the last degree ridiculous to make use of the swords of Christians in a case like this. 'Can you not conceive, blind as ye are,' says he, 'that the handles of these swords being made like a cross, hide the devil from coming out of the body? Why do you not rather take the Turkish sabres?' The advice of this learned man had no effect: the Vroucolacas were incorrigible, and all the inhabitants were in a strange consternation;

The slacken'd cord, that now sounds loose and damp;
 To-morrow, and its livelier tone will sing
 In tort vibration to the arrow's flight.
 I . . but I also, with recover'd health
 Of heart, shall do my duty.
 My Father! here I leave thee then!" he cried,
 "And not to meet again,
 Till at the gate of Paradise
 The eternal union of our joys commence.
 We parted last in darkness!" . . . and the youth
 Thought with what other hopes;
 But now his heart was calm,
 For on his soul a heavenly hope had dawn'd.

14.

The Old Man answered nothing, but he held
 His garment, and to the door
 Of the Tomb Chamber followed him.
 The rain had ceased, the sky was wild,
 Its black clouds broken by the storm.
 And, lo! it chanced, that in the chasm
 Of Heaven between, a star,
 Leaving along its path continuous light,
 Shot eastward. "See my guide!" quoth Thalaba;
 And turning, he received
 Old Moath's last embrace,
 And the last blessing of the good Old Man.

15.

Evening was drawing nigh,
 When an old Dervise, sitting in the sun

they knew not now what saint to call upon, when of a sudden, with one voice, as if they had given each other the hint, they fell to bawling out all through the city, that it was intolerable to wait any longer; that the only way left was to burn the Vroucolacas entire; but after so doing, let the devil lurk in it if he could; that it was better to have recourse to this extremity than to have the island totally deserted; and, indeed, whole families began to pack up, in order to retire to Syre or Tinos. The magistrates therefore ordered the Vroucolacas to be carried to the point of the island St. George, where they prepared a great pile with pitch and tar, for fear the wood, as dry as it was, should not burn fast enough of itself. What they had before left of this miserable carcass was thrown into this fire, and consumed presently. — It was on the 1st of January, 1701. We saw the flame as we returned from Delos; it might justly be called a bonfire of joy, since after this no more complaints were heard against the Vroucolacas; they said that the devil had now met with his match, and some ballads were made to turn him into ridicule." — Tournefort.

"In Dalmatia, the Morlachians, before a funeral, cut the hamstrings of the corpse, and mark certain characters upon the body with a hot iron; they then drive nails or pins into different parts of it, and the Sorcerers finish the ceremony by repeating certain mysterious words; after which they rest confident that the deceased cannot return to the earth to shed the blood of the living." — Cassas.

"The Turks have an opinion that men that are buried have a sort of life in their graves. If any man makes affidavit before a judge, that he heard a noise in a man's grave, he is, by order, dug up, and chopped all to pieces. The merchants (at Constantinople), once airing on horseback, had, as usual, for protection, a Janisary with them. Passing by the burying place of the Jews, it happened that an old Jew sat by a sepulchre. The Janisary rode up to him, and rated him for stinking the world a second time, and commanded him to get into his grave again." — Roger North's Life of Sir Dudley North.

At his cell door, invited for the night
The traveller; in the sun
He spread the plain repast,
Rice and fresh grapes, and at their feet there flow'd
The brook of which they drank.

16.

So as they sat at meal,
With song, with music, and with dance,
A wedding train went by;
The deep-veil'd bride, the female slaves,
The torches of festivity,
And trump and timbrel merriment
Accompanied their way.
The good old Dervise gave
A blessing as they pass'd;
But Thalaba look'd on,
And breathed a low deep groan, and hid his face.
The Dervise had known sorrow, and he felt Compassion; and his words
Of pity and of piety
Open'd the young man's heart,
And he told all his tale.

17.

"Repine not, O my Son!" the Old Man replied,
"That Heaven hath chasten'd thee. Behold this vine,¹
I found it a wild tree, whose wanton strength
Had swoln into irregular twigs
And bold excrescences,
And spent itself in leaves and little rings,
So in the flourish of its outwardness
Wasting the sap and strength
That should have given forth fruit.
But when I pruned the plant,
Then it grew temperate in its vain expense
Of useless leaves, and knotted, as thou see'st,
Into these full clear clusters, to repay
The hand that wisely wounded it.
Repine not, O my Son!
In wisdom and in mercy Heaven inflicts
Its painful remedies."

18.

Then pausing, "Whither goest thou now?" he ask'd.
"I know not," answered Thalaba;
"My purpose is to hold
Straight on, secure of this,
That travel where I will, I cannot stray,
For Destiny will lead my course aright."

19.

"Far be it from me," the Old Man replied,
"To shake that pious confidence;
And yet, if knowledge may be gain'd, methinks
Thy course should be to seek it painfully.
In Kaf the Simorg hath his dwelling place,

The all-knowing Bird of Ages, who hath seen
The World, with all its children, thrice destroy'd.
Long is the path,
And difficult the way, of danger full;²
But that unerring Bird
Could to a certain end
Direct thy weary search."

20.

Easy assent the youth
Gave to the words of wisdom; and behold
At dawn, the adventurer on his way to Kaf.
And he hath travelled many a day,
And many a river swum over,
And many a mountain ridge hath crost,
And many a measureless plain;
And now amid the wilds advanced,
Long is it since his eyes
Have seen the trace of man.

21

Cold! cold! 'tis a chilly clime
That the youth in his journey hath reach'd,
And he is awery now,
And faint for lack of food.
Cold! cold! there is no Sun in heaven,
A heavy and uniform cloud
Overspreads the face of the sky,
And the snows are beginning to fall.
Dost thou wish for thy deserts, O Son of Hodehrah?
Dost thou long for the gales of Arabia?
Cold! cold! his blood flows languidly,
His hands are red, his lips are blue,
His feet are sore with the frost.
Cheer thee! cheer thee! Thalaba!
A little yet bear up!

22.

All waste! no sign of life
But the track of the wolf and the bear!
No sound but the wild, wild wind,
And the snow crunching under his feet!
Night is come; neither moon, nor stars,
Only the light of the snow!
But behold a fire in a cave of the hill,
A heart-reviving fire;
And thither with strength renew'd
Thalaba presses on.

23.

He found a Woman in the cave,
A solitary Woman,
Who by the fire was spinning,
And unging as she spun.
The pine boughs were cheerfully blazing,
And her face was bright with the flame;
Her face was as a Damsel's face,
And yet her hair was grey.

¹ In these lines I have versified a passage in Bishop Taylor's Sermons, altering as little as possible his unimprovable language.

² For so have I known a luxuriant vine swell into irregular twigs and bold excrescences, and spend itself in leaves and little rings, and afford but trifling clusters to the wine-press, and a faint return to his heart which longed to be refreshed with a full vintage, but when the Lord of the vine had caused the dressers to cut the wilder plant, and made it bleed, it grew temperate in its vain expense of useless leaves, and knotted into fair and juicy branches, and made accounts of that loss of blood, by the return of fruit."

³ It appears from Hafis, that the way is not easily found out. He says, "Do not expect faith from any one; if you do, deceive yourself in searching for the Simorg and the philosopher's stone."

She bade him welcome with a smile,
And still continued spinning,
And singing as she spun.
The thread the woman drew
Was finer than the silkworm's,
Was finer than the gossamer;
The song she sang was low and sweet,
But Thalaba knew not the words.

24.

He laid his bow before the hearth,
For the string was frozen stiff;
He took the quiver from his neck,
For the arrow-plumes were iced.
Then as the cheerful fire
Revived his languid limbs,
The adventurer ask'd for food.
The Woman answer'd him,
And still her speech was song:
"The She Bear she dwells near to me,
And she hath cubs, one, two, and three;
She hunts the deer, and brings him here,
And then with her I make good cheer,
And now to the chase the She Bear is gone,
And she with her prey will be here anon."

25.

She ceased her spinning while she spake;
And when she had answer'd him,
Again her fingers twirl'd the thread,
And again the Woman began,
In low, sweet tones to sing
The unintelligible song.

26.

The thread she spun it gleam'd like gold
In the light of the odorous fire,
Yet was it so wondrously thin,
That, save when it shone in the light,
You might look for it closely in vain.
The youth sat watching it,
And she observed his wonder,
And then again she spake,
And still her speech was song:
"Now twine it round thy hands I say,
Now twine it round thy hands I pray!
My thread is small, my thread is fine,
But he must be
A stronger than thee,
Who can break this thread of mine!"

27.

And up she raised her bright blue eyes,
And sweetly she smiled on him,
And he conceived no ill;
And round and round his right hand,
And round and round his left,
He wound the thread so fine.
And then again the Woman spake,
And still her speech was song,
"Now thy strength, O Stranger, strain!
Now then break the slender chain."

28.

Thalaba strove, but the thread
By magic hands was spun,

And in his cheek the flush of shame
Arose, commixt with fear.
She beheld and laugh'd at him,
And then again she sung,
"My thread is small, my thread is fine,
But he must be
A stronger than thee,
Who can break this thread of mine!"

29.

And up she raised her bright blue eyes,
And fiercely she smiled on him:
"I thank thee, I thank thee, Hodeirah's son!
I thank thee for doing what can't be undone,
For binding thyself in the chain I have spun!"
Then from his head she wrench'd
A lock of his raven hair,
And cast it in the fire,
And cried aloud as it burnt,
"Sister! Sister! hear my voice!
Sister! Sister! come and rejoice!
The thread is spun,
The prize is won,
The work is done,
For I have made captive Hodeirah's Son."

30.

Borne in her magic car
The Sister Sorceress came,
Khawla, the fiercest of the Sorcerer's brood.
She gazed upon the youth,
She bade him break the slender thread,
She laugh'd aloud for scorn,
She clapt her hands for joy.

31.

The She Bear from the chase came in,
She bore the prey in her bloody mouth,
She laid it at Maimuna's feet,
And then look'd up with wistful eyes
As if to ask her share.
"There! there!" quoth Maimuna,
And pointing to the prisoner-youth,
She spurn'd him with her foot,
And bade her make her meal.
But then their mockery fall'd them,
And anger and shame arose;
For the She Bear fawn'd on Thalaba,
And quietly lick'd his hand.

32.

The grey-hair'd Sorceress stamp'd the ground,
And call'd a Spirit up;
"Shall we bear the Enemy
To the dungeon dens below?"

SPIRIT.

Woe! woe! to our Empire woe!
If ever he tread the caverns below.

MAIMUNA.

Shall we leave him fetter'd here
With hunger and cold to die?

SPIRIT.

Away from thy lonely dwellings fly !
Here I see a danger nigh,
That he should live and thou should'st die.

MAIMUNA.

Whither then must we bear the foe ?

SPIRIT.

To Mohareb's island go,
There shalt thou secure the foe,
There prevent thy future woe.

33.

Then in the Car they threw
The fetter'd Thalaba,
And took their seats, and set
Their feet upon his neck ;
Maimuna held the reins,
And Khawla shook the scourge,
And away ! away ! away !¹

34.

They were no steeds of mortal race
That drew the magic car
With the swiftness of feet and of wings.
The snow-dust rises behind them,
The ice-rock's splinters fly,
And hark in the valley below
The sound of their chariot wheels, . .
And they are far over the mountains !
Away ! away ! away !
The Demons of the air
Shout their joy as the Sisters pass,
The Ghosts of the Wicked that wander by night
Flit over the magic car.

35.

Away ! away ! away !
Over the hills and the plains,
Over the rivers and rocks,
Over the sands of the shore ;
The waves of ocean heave
Under the magic steeds ;
With unwet hoofs they trample the deep,
And now they reach the Island coast,
And away to the city the Monarch's abode.
Open fly the city gates,
Open fly the iron doors,
The doors of the palace-court.
Then stopt the charmed car.

36.

The Monarch heard the chariot wheels,
And forth he came to greet
The mistress whom he served.
He knew the captive youth,
And Thalaba beheld
Mohareb in the robes of royalty,²
Whom erst his arm had thrust
Down the bitumen pit.³

¹ My readers will recollect the Lenora. The unwilling resemblance has been forced upon me by the subject. I could not turn aside from the road, because Burger had travelled it before. The " Old Woman of Berkeley " has been foolishly called an imitation of that inimitable ballad : the likeness is of the same kind as between Macedon and Monmouth. Both are ballads, and there is a horse in both.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

THE NINTH BOOK.

" Conscience ! . . .

Poor plodding Priests and preaching Friars may make Their hollow pulpits and the empty aisles
Of churches ring with that round word : but we,
That draw the subtle and more piercing air
In that sublimed region of a court,
Know all is good we make so, and go on Secured by the prosperity of our crimes.

B. Jonson. Mortimer's Fall.

1.

" Go up my Sister Maimuna, Go up and read the stars ! "

2.

Lo ! on the terrace of the topmost tower
She stands ; her darkening eyes
Her fine face raised to Heaven ;
Her white hair flowing like the silver streams
That streak the northern night.

3.

They hear her coming tread,
They lift their asking eyes .
Her face is serious, her unwilling lips
Slow to the tale of ill.
" What hast thou read ? what hast thou read ? "
Quoth Khawla in alarm.
" Danger . . death . . judgement ! " Maimuna replied.

4.

" Is that the language of the lights of Heaven ? "
Exclaim'd the sterner Witch ;
" Creatures of Allah, they perform his will,
And with their lying menaces would daunt
Our credulous folly . . . Maimuna,
I never liked this uncongenial lore !
Better befits to make the Sacrifice
Of Divination ; so shall I
Be mine own Oracle.
Command the victims thou, O King !
Male and female they must be,
Thou knowest the needful rites.
Meanwhile I purify the place."

5.

The Sultan went ; the Sorceress rose,
And North, and South, and East, and West,
She faced the points of Heaven ;

² How came Mohareb to be Sultan of this island ? Every one who has read Don Quixote, knows that there are always islands to be had by adventurers. He killed the former Sultan, and reigned in his stead. What could not a Domdanielite perform ? The narration would have interrupted the flow of the main story.

And ever where she turn'd
She laid her hand upon the wall ;
And up she look'd, and smote the air,
And down she stoop'd, and smote the floor.

" To Eblis and his servants
I consecrate the place ;
Let enter none but they !
Whatever hath the breath of life,
Whatever hath the sap of life,
Let it be blasted and die ! "

6.

Now all is prepared ;
Mohareb returns,
The Circle is drawn,
The Victims have bled,
The Youth and the Maid.
She in the circle holds in either hand,
Clench'd by the hair, a head,
The heads of the Youth and the Maid.
" Go out, ye lights ! " quoth Khawla,
And in darkness began the spell.

7.

With spreading arms she whirls around
Rapidly, rapidly,
Ever around and around ;
And loudly she calls the while,
" Eblis ! Eblis ! "
Loudly, incessantly,
Still she calls, " Eblis ! Eblis ! "
Giddily, giddily, still she whirls,
Loudly, incessantly, still she calls ;
The motion is ever the same,
Ever around and around ;
The calling is still the same,
Still it is, " Eblis ! Eblis ! "
Till her voice is a shapeless yell,
And dizzily rolls her brain,
And now she is full of the Fiend.
She stops, she rocks, she reels !
Look ! look ! she appears in the darkness !
Her flaming hairs curl up
All living, like the Meteor's locks of light !
Her eyes are like the sickly Moon !

8.

It is her lips that move,
Her tongue that shapes the sound ;
But whose is the Voice that proceeds ? ...
" Ye may hope and ye may fear,
The danger of his stars is near.
Sultan ! if he perish, woe !
Fate hath written one death-blow
For Mohareb and the Foe !
Triumph ; triumph ! only she
That knit his bonds can set him free. "

9.

She spake the Oracle,
And senselessly she fell.
They knelt in care beside her, . .
Her Sister and the King ;
They sprinkled her palms with water,
They wetted her nostrils with blood.

10.

She wakes as from a dream,
She asks the utter'd voice ;
But when she heard, an anger and a grief
Darken'd her wrinkling brow.
" Then let him live in long captivity ! "
She answer'd : but Mohareb's quicken'd eye
Perused her sullen countenance,
That lied not with the lips.
A miserable man !
What boots it that in central caves,
The Powers of Evil at his Baptism pledged
The Sacrament of Hell ?
His death secures them now.
What boots it that they gave
Abdaldar's guardian ring,
When, through another's life,
The blow may reach his own ?

11.

He sought the dungeon cell
Where Thalaba was laid.
'Twas the grey morning twilight, and the voice
Of Thalaba in prayer
With words of hallow'd import smote his ear.
The grating of the heavy hinge
Roused not the Arabian youth ;
Nor lifted he his earthward face,
At sound of coming feet.
Nor did Mohareb with unholy speech
Disturb the duty : silent, spirit-awed,
Envious, heart-humbled, he beheld
The peace which piety alone can give.

12.

When Thalaba, the perfect rite perform'd,
Raised his calm eye, then spake the Island-Chief :
" Arab ! my guidance through the dangerous Cave
Thy service overpaid,
An unintended friend in enmity.
The Hand that caught thy ring
Received and bore me to the scene I sought.
Now know me grateful. I return
That amulet, thy only safety here. "

13.

Artful he spake, with show of gratitude
Veiling the selfish deed.
Lock'd in his magic chain,
Thalaba on his passive powerless hand
Received again the Spell.
Remembering then with what an ominous faith
First he drew on the ring,
The youth repeats his words of augury ;
" In God's name and the Prophet's ! be its power
Good, let it serve the righteous ! If for evil,
God and my trust in Him shall hallow it.
Blindly the wicked work
The righteous will of Heaven ! "
So Thalaba received again
The written ring of gold.

14.

Thoughtful awhile Mohareb stood,
And eyed the captive youth.
Then, building skilfully sophistic speech,

Thus he began, "Brave art thou, Thalaba!
And wherefore are we foes? . . . for I would buy
Thy friendship at a princely price, and make thee
To thine own welfare wise.

Hear me! in Nature are two hostile Gods,
Makers and Masters of existing things,
Equal in power: . . . nay, hear me patiently! . . .
Equal . . . for look around thee! The same Earth
Bears fruit and poison; where the Camel finds
His fragrant food, the horned Viper there!
Sucks in the juice of death: the Elements
Now serve the use of man, and now assert
Dominion o'er his weakness: dost thou hear
The sound of merriment and nuptial song?
From the next house proceed the mourner's cry,
Lamenting o'er the dead. Say'st thou that Sin
Enter'd the world of Allah? that the Fiend,
Permitted for a season, prowls for prey?
When to thy tent the venomous serpent creeps,
Dost thou not crush the reptile? Even so,
Be sure, had Allah crush'd his Enemy,
But that the power was wanting. From the first,
Eternal as themselves their warfare is;
To the end it must endure. Evil and Good . . .
What are they, Thalaba, but words? in the strife
Of Angels, as of Men, the weak are guilty;
Power must decide. The Spirits of the Dead
Quitting their mortal mansion, enter not,
As falsely ye are preach'd, their final seat
Of bliss, or bale; nor in the sepulchre
Sleep they the long, long sleep: each joins the host
Of his great leader, aiding in the war
Whose fate involves his own.

Woe to the vanquish'd then!
Woe to the sons of man who follow'd him!
They, with their Leader, through eternity,
Must bow in central fires.

Thou, Thalaba, hast chosen ill thy part,
If choice it may be call'd, where will was not,
Nor searching doubt, nor judgement wise to weigh.
Hard is the service of the Power, beneath
Whose banners thou wert born; his discipline
Severe, yea cruel; and his wages, rich
Only in promise; who hath seen the pay?
For us . . . the pleasures of the world are ours,
Riches and rule, the kingdoms of the Earth.

We met in Babylon adventurers both,
Each zealous for the hostile Power he served:
We meet again; see the feeblest what thou art,
Thou seest what I am, the Sultan here,
The Lord of Life and Death.
Abandon him who has abandon'd thee,
And be, as I am, great among mankind!"

15.

The Captive did not, hasty to confute,
Break off that subtle speech;
But when the expectant silence of the King
Look'd for his answer, then spake Thalaba.
"And this then is thy faith! this monstrous creed!

"In this valley we found plenty of provender for our cattle: rosemary bushes, and other shrubs of uncommon fragrance, which, being natives of the desert, are still perhaps without a name. Though these scented plants are the usual food of the camel, it is remarkable that his breath is insufferably

This lie against the Sun, and Moon, and Stars,
And Earth, and Heaven! Blind man, who canst not see
How all things work the best! who wilt not know,
That in the Manhood of the World, whate'er
Of folly mark'd its infancy, of vice
Sullied its Youth, ripe Wisdom shall cast off,
Stablish'd in good, and, knowing evil, safe.
Sultan Mohareb, yes, ye have me here
In chains; but not forsaken, though oppress;
Cast down, but not destroy'd. Shall danger daunt,
Shall death dismay his soul, whose life is given
For God, and for his brethren of mankind?
Alike rewarded, in that holy cause,
The Conqueror's and the Martyr's palm above
Beam with one glory. Hope ye that my blood
Can quench the dreaded flame? and know ye not,
That leagu'd against ye are the Just and Wise,
And all Good Actions of all ages past,
Yea, your own crimes, and Truth, and God in Heaven?"

16.

"Slave!" quoth Mohareb, and his lip
Quiver'd with eager wrath,
"I have thee! thou shalt feel my power,
And in thy dungeon loathsomeness
Rot piece-meal, limb from limb!"
And out the Tyrant rushes,
And all impatient of the thoughts
That canker'd in his heart,
Seeks in the giddiness of bolsterous sport
Short respite from the avenging power within.

17.

What Woman is she
So wrinkled and old,
That goes to the wood?
She leans on her staff
With a tottering step,
She tells her bead-string slow
Through fingers dull'd by age.
The wanton boys bemock her;
The babe in arms that meets her
Turns round with quick affright
And clings to his nurse's neck.

18.

Hark! hark! the hunter's cry;
Mohareb has gone to the chase.
The dogs, with eager yelp,
Are struggling to be free;
The hawks in frequent stoop
Token their haste for flight;
And couchant on the saddle-bow,
With tranquil eyes and talons sheathed,
The ounce expects his liberty.

19.

Propt on the staff that shakes
Beneath her trembling weight,
The Old Woman sees them pass.

nauseous. But, when he is pushed by hunger, he devours thistles and prickles indiscriminately, without the least damage to his mouth, which seems proof to the sharpest thorns.—
Eyles Irwin.

Halloa ! halloo .
The game is up !
The dogs are loosed,
The deer bounds over the plain .
The dogs pursue
Far, far behind
Though at full stretch,
With eager speed,
Far, far behind.
But lo ! the Falcon o'er his head
Hovers with hostile wings,¹
And buffets him with blinding strokes !
Dizzy with the deafening strokes
In blind and interrupted course,
Poor beast, he struggles on,
And now the dogs are nigh !
How his heart pants ! you see

¹ The hawk is used at Aleppo in taking the hare "As soon as the hare is put up, one, or a brace of the nearest greyhounds are slipped, and the falconer, galloping after them, throws off his hawk. The hare cannot run long where the hawk behaves properly, but sometimes getting the start of the dogs, she gains the next hill, and escapes. It now and then happens, when the hawk is fierce and voracious in an unusual degree, that the hare is struck dead at the first stroke, but that is very uncommon, for the hawks preferred for hare hunting are taught to pounce and buffet the game not to seize it, and they rise a little between each attack to descend again with fresh force. In this manner the game is confused and retarded, till the greyhounds come in." — Russell

The Shaheen, or Falcon Gentle, flies at a more dangerous game. "Were there not," says the elder Russell, "several gentlemen now in England to bear witness to the truth of what I am going to relate, I should hardly venture to assert that, with this bird, which is about the size of a pigeon, they sometimes take large eagles. The hawk, in former times, was taught to seize the eagle under his pinion, and thus, depriving him of the use of one wing, both birds fell to the ground together. But I am informed, the present mode is to teach the hawk to fix on the back between the wings, which has the same effect, only that the bird, tumbling down more slowly, the falconer has more time to come in to his hawk's assistance, but, in either case, if he be not very expeditious, the falcon is inevitably destroyed."

Dr Patrick Russell says, this sport was disused in his time, probably from its ending more frequently in the death of the falcon than of the eagle. But he had often seen the shaheen take herons and storks. "The hawk, when thrown off, flies for some time in a horizontal line, not six feet from the ground, then mounting perpendicularly with astonishing swiftness, he seizes his prey under the wing, and both together come tumbling to the ground. If the falconer is not expeditious, the game soon disengages itself."

"We saw about twenty antelopes, which, however, were so very shy, that we could not get near enough to have a shot, nor do I think it possible to take them without hawks, the mode usually practised in those countries. The swiftest greyhounds would be of no use, for the antelopes are much swifter of foot than any animal I ever saw before." — Jackson's Journey over Land

The Persians train their hawks thus — "They take the whole skin of a stag, of the head, body, and legs, and stuff it with straw to the shape of the animal. After fixing it in the place where they usually train the bird, they place his food upon the head of the stuffed stag, and chiefly in the two cavities of the eyes, that the bird may strike there. Having accustomed him for several days to eat in this manner, they fasten the feet of the stag to a plank which runs upon wheels, which is drawn by cords from a distance, and from day to day

The panting of his heart;
And tears like human tears
Roll down, along the big veins fever-swain;
And now the death-sweat darkens his dun hide;²
His fear, his groans, his agony, his death,
Are the sport, and the joy, and the triumph !

20.

Halloa ! another prey,
The nimble Antelope !
The ounce is freed ; one spring,
And his talons are sheathed in her shoulders,
And his teeth are red in her gore.
There came a sound from the wood,
Like the howl of the winter wind at night,
Around a lonely dwelling ;
The ounce, whose gums were warm in his prey,³ they draw it faster, insensibly to accustom the bird not to quit his prey, and at last they draw the stag by a horse at full speed. They do the same with the wild boar, the ass, the fox, the hare, and other beasts of chase. They are even taught to stop a horseman at full speed, nor will they quit him till the falconer recalls them, and shows them their food." — Tavernier

"As the Persians are very patient, and not deterred by difficulty, they delight in training the crow in the same manner as the hawk." — Tavernier

"I do not recollect in what history or romance there is a tale of two dogs trained in this manner to destroy a tyrant ; but I believe it is an historical fiction. The same stratagem is found in Chao-shi-cu-el, the Orphan of the House of Chao."

"The farmers in Norway believe that the eagle will sometimes attack a deer. In this enterprise, he makes use of this stratagem, he soaks his wings in water, and then covers them with sand and gravel, with which he flies against the deer's face and blinds him for a time, the pain of this sets him running about like a distracted creature, and frequently he tumbles down a rock or some steep place and breaks his neck, thus he becomes a prey to the eagle." — Pontoppidan

In the arms of Caribay, the historian, a stag with an eagle or hawk on his back, is thus represented. This species of falconry has therefore probably been practised in Europe.

² I saw this appearance of death at a bull-fight, the detestable amusement of the Spaniards and Portuguese. To the honour of our country, few Englishmen visit these spectacles a second time.

³ "They have a beast called an ounce, spotted like a tiger, but very gentle and tame. A horseman carries it, and on perceiving the gazelle, lets it loose. and though the gazelle is incredibly swift, it is so nimble, that in three bounds it leaps upon the neck of its prey. The gazelle is a sort of small antelope, of which the country is full. The ounce immediately strangles it with its sharp talons, but if unluckily it misses its blow, and the gazelle escapes, it remains upon the spot ashamed and confused, and at that moment a child might take or kill it without its attempting to defend itself." — Tavernier

"The kings of Persia are very fond of the chase, and it is principally in this that they display their magnificence. It happened one day that Sha-Seff wished to entertain all the ambassadors who were at his court, and there were then ministers there from Tartary, Muscovy, and India. He led them to the chase, and having taken in their presence a great number of large animals, stags, does, hinds, and wild boars, he had them all dressed and eaten the same day, and while they were eating, an architect was ordered to erect a tower in the middle of Isfahan, only with the heads of these animals. The remains of it are yet to be seen. When the tower was raised to its proper height, the architect came exultingly

SOUTHEY'S WORKS.

Hear the summoning sound.
 In vain his master's voice,
 No longer dreaded now,
 Calls and recalls with threatful tone;
 Away to the forest he goes;
 For that Old Woman had laid
 Her shrivell'd finger on her shrivell'd lips,
 And whistled with a long, long breath;
 And that long breath was the sound
 Like the howl of the winter wind at night,
 Around a lonely dwelling.

21.
 Mohareb knew her not,
 As to the chase he went,
 The glance of his proud eye
 Passing in scorn o'er age and wretchedness.
 She stands in the depth of the wood.
 And panting to her feet,
 Fawning and fearful, creeps
 The ounce by charms constrain'd.
 Well may'st thou fear, and vainly dost thou fawn!
 Her form is changed, her visage new,
 Her power, her art the same!
 It is Khawla that stands in the wood.

22.
 She knew the place where the Mandrake grew,
 And round the neck of the ounce,
 And round the Mandrake's head,
 She tightens the ends of her cord.
 Her ears are closed with wax,
 And her prest finger fastens them,
 Deaf as the Adder, when, with grounded head, to the king, who was then at the banquet with the ambassadors, and informed him that nothing was wanting to finish the work well, but the head of some large beast for the point. The Prince in his drunkenness, and with a design of showing the ambassadors how absolute he was over his subjects, turned sternly to the architect — 'You are right,' said he, 'and I do not know where to find a better head than your own.' The unhappy man was obliged to lose his head, and the royal order was immediately executed." — Tavernier.

1 "A serpent which that aspidie

 That he the stone, noblest of all,
 The whiche that men carbuncle call,

 For whiche, wight that a man by sight

 He leyth downe his one ear all plat
 Unto the ground, and halt it fast,
 And eke that other eare als faste
 He stoppeth with his taille so sore,
 That he the wordes, lasse or more,
 Of his enchantement ne hereth,
 And in this wise himself he skilpeth,
 So that he hath the wordes wayved,
 And thus his eare is nought deceived." — Gower.

Does not "the deaf adder, that heareth not the voice of the charmer, charm he never so wisely," allude to some

And circled form, both avenues of sound
 Barr'd safely, one slant eye
 Watches the charmer's lips
 Waste on the wind his baffled witchery.¹
 The spotted ounce so beautiful,
 Springs forceful from the scourge;
 With that the dying plant all agony,
 Feeling its life-strings crack,
 Utter'd the unimaginable groan
 That none can hear and live.

23.
 Then from her victim servant Khawla loosed
 The precious poison. Next with naked hand,
 She pluck'd the boughs of the manchinee;
 And of the wormy wax she took,
 That, from the perforated tree forced out,²
 Bewray'd its insect-parent's work within.

24.
 In a cavern of the wood she sits,
 And moulds the wax to human form;
 And, as her fingers kneaded it,
 By magic accents, to the mystic shape,
 Imparted with the life of Thalaba,
 In all its passive powers,
 Mysterious sympathy.
 With the mandrake and the manchinee
 She builds her pile accurst
 She lays her finger to the pile,
 And blue and green the flesh
 Glows with emitted fire,

snake that cannot be enticed by music, as they catch them in Egypt?

2 "As for the wax, it is the finest and whitest that may be had, though of bees, and there is such plenty as serves the whole empire. Several provinces produce it, but that of Huquang exceeds all the others, as well in quantity as whiteness. It is gathered in the province of Xantung, upon little trees; but in that of Huquang, upon large ones, as big as those of the Indian pagods, or chestnut trees in Europe. The way nature has found to produce it, to us appears strange enough. There is in this province a creature or insect, of the bigness of a flea, so sharp at stinging, that it not only pierces the skins of men and beasts, but the boughs and bodies of the trees. Those of the province of Xantung are much valued, where the inhabitants gather their eggs from the trees, and carry them to sell in the province of Huquang. In the spring, there come from those eggs certain worms, which, about the beginning of the summer, they place at the foot of the tree, whence they creep up, spreading themselves wonderfully over all the branches. Having placed themselves there, they gnaw, pierce, and bore to the very pith, and their nourishment they convert into wax, as white as snow, which they drive out of the mouth of the hole they have made, where it remains congealed in drops by the wind and cold. Then the owners of the trees gather it, and shake it into cakes as we do, which are sold about China." — Gemelli Careri.

Du Halde's account is somewhat different from this; "the worms," he says, "fasten on the leaves of the tree, and in a short time form combs of wax, much smaller than the honey-combs."

3 It being notorious that fire enters into the composition of a devil, because he breathes smoke and flames; there is an obvious propriety in supposing every witch her own tinder-box, as they approximate to diabolic nature. I am sorry that I have not the Hierarchy of the Blessed Angels to refer to;

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

25.

Before the fire she placed the imaged wax :
 "There, waste away!" the Enchantress cried,¹
 "And with thee waste Hodeirah's Son!"

26.

Fool! fool! go thaw the everlasting ice,
 Whose polar mountains bound the human reign.
 Blindly the wicked work
 The righteous will of Heaven!
 The doom'd Destroyer wears Abdaldar's ring;
 Against the danger of his horoscope
 Yourself have shielded him;
 And on the sympathizing wax,
 The unadmitted flames play powerlessly,
 As the cold moon-beam on a plain of snow.

27.

"Curse thee! curse thee!" cried the fiendly woman,
 "Hast thou yet a spell of safety?"
 And in the raging flames
 She threw the imaged wax.
 It lay amid the flames,²
 Like Polycarp of old,
 When, by the glories of the burning stake
 O'er-vaulted, his grey hairs
 Curl'd, life-like, to the fire
 That haloed round his saintly brow.

28.

"Wherefore is this!" cried Khawla, and she stamp'd
 Thrice on the cavern floor.
 "Malmuna! Malmuna!"
 Thrice on the floor she stamp'd, otherwise, by the best authorities, I could show that it is the trick of Beelzebub to parody the costume of religion. The inflammability of saints may be abundantly exemplified.

"It happened upon a time, before St Kild was chosen Abesse, that being in the church at matins, before day, with the rest of her sisters, and going into the middlest, according to the costume, to read a lesson, the candle wherewith she saw to read, chanced to be put out, and thereupon wanting light, there came from the fingers of her right hand such an exceeding brightness upon the sudden, that not only herself, but all the rest of the quire also, might read by it."—English Martyrologe, 1608

Dead saints have frequently possessed this phosphoric quality, like rotten wood or dead fish. "St Bridget was interred at the town of Dunne, in the province of Ulster, in the tombe together with the venerable bodies of St Patrick and St Columbe, which was afterward miraculously reveled to the bishop of that place, as he was praying one night late in the church, about the yeare of Christ 1176, over which there shined a great light."—English Martyrologe.

"So, when the nurse of Mohammed first entered the chamber of Amena his mother, she saw a coruscating splendour, which was the light of the infant prophet, so that Amena never kindled her lamp at night."—Moracco.

Another Mohammedan thrall, of the same genus, is no ways improbable. "When the head of Hosein was brought to Coughah, the governor's gates were closed, and Haula, the bearer, took it to his own house. He awoke his wife, and told her what had so speedily brought him home. 'I bring with me,' said he, 'the most valuable present that could possibly be made to the Caliph.' And the woman asking eagerly what it could be? 'The head of Hosein,' he answered, 'here it is; I am sent with it to the governor.' Immediately she sprung from the bed, not that she was shocked or ter-

Then to the rocky gateway flung
 Her eager eyes, and Malmuna was there,
 "Nay, Sister, nay!" quoth she,—"Meharab's life
 Is link'd with Thalaba's!
 Nay, Sister, nay, the plighted oath!
 The common sacrament!"

29.

"Idiot!" said Khawla, "one must die, or all!
 Faith kept with him were treason to the rest.
 Why lies the wax like marble in the fire?
 What powerful amulet
 Protects Hodeirah's Son?"

30.

Cold, marble-cold, the wax
 Lay on the raging pile,
 Cold in that white intensity of fire.
 The Bat, that with her hook'd and leathery wings
 Clung to the cave-roof, loosed her hold,
 Death-sickening with the heat;
 The Toad, which to the darkest nook had crawl'd,
 Panted fast with fever pain;
 The Viper from her nest came forth,
 Leading her quicken'd brood,
 That, sportive with the warm delight, roll'd out
 Their thin curls, tender as the tendrils rings,
 Ere the green beauty of their brittle youth
 Grows brown, and toughens in the summer sun.
 Cold, marble-cold, the wax
 Lay on the raging pile,
 The silver quivering of the element
 O'er its pale surface shedding a dim gloss.

rified at the sight, for the Arabian women were accustomed to follow the army, and habituated to the sight of blood and massacre, but Hosen, by Katma, his mother, was grandson of the prophet, and this produced an astonishing effect upon the mind of the woman. "By the apostle of God!" she exclaimed, "I will never again lie down with a man who has brought me the head of his grandson." The Moslem, who, according to the custom of his nation, had many wives, sent for another, who was not so conscientious. Yet the presence of the head, which was placed upon a table, prevented her from sleeping, "because," she said, "she saw a great glory playing around it all night."—Moracco.

After Afonso de Castro had been martyred in one of the Molucca islands, his body was thrown into the sea. But it was in a few days brought back by Providence to the spot where he had suffered, the wounds fresh as if just opened, and so strange and beautiful a splendour flowing from them, that it was evident the fountain of such a light must be that body whose spirit was in the enjoyment of eternal happiness.

The Moors interpreted one of these phosphoric miracles, with equal ingenuity, to favour their own creed. A light was seen every night over the tomb of a Maronite whom they had martyred, and they said the priest was not only tortured with fire in hell, but his very body burnt in the grave.—Vasconcellos.

² Beautifully hath Milton painted this legend. "The fire, when it came to proof, would not do his work; but, starting off like a full sail from the mast, did but reflect a golden light upon his unviolated limbs, exhaling such a sweet odour, as if all the incense of Arabia had been burning."—Of Prolapsal Episcopacy.

31.

Around the red and fiery smoke,
 Watching the portent strange,
 The blue-eyed Sorceress and her Sister stood,
 Seeming a ruined Angel by the side
 Of Spirit born in hell.
 Maimuna gazed at length her thoughtful eyes:
 "Chance, Sister, was the wax?
 'Tis the work of the worm, or the bee?
 Nay then I marvel not!
 It were as wise to bring from Ararat
 The fore-world's wood to build the magic pile,¹
 And feed it from the balm bower, through whose veins
 The Martyr's blood sends such a virtue out
 That the fond mother from beneath its shade
 Wreathes the horn'd viper round her playful child.²
 This is the eternal, universal strife!
 There is a Grave-wax, . . . I have seen the Gouls³
 Fight for the dainty at their banqueting" . .

32.

"Excellent Witch!" quoth Khawla¹ and she went
 To the cave-arch of entrance, and scowl'd up,
 Mocking the blessed Sun
 "Shine thou in Heaven, but I will shadow Earth!"

¹ "On Mount Ararat, which is called Lubar, or the descending place, is an abbey of St Gregorie's Monks. These Monks, if any list to believe them, say that there remaineth yet some part of the ark, kept by angels, which if any seeks to ascend, carries them backe as farre in the night, as they have climbed in the day."—Purcians

² A thicket of balm trees is said to have sprung up from the blood of the Moslem slain at Beder

³ Ellanus avoucheth, that those vipers which breed in the provinces of Arabia, although they do bite, yet their biting is not venomous, because they doe feede on the balsme tree, and sleepe under the shadow thereof"—Treasury of Ancient and Modern Times.

"The balsam tree is nearly of the size as a sprig of myrtle, and its leaves are like those of the herb sweet marjoram. Vipers take up their residence about these plants, and are in some places more numerous than in others, for the juice of the balsam tree is their sweetest food, and they are delighted with the shade produced by its leaves. When the time therefore arrives for gathering the juice of this tree, the Arabians come into the sacred grove, each of them holding two twigs. By shaking these, they put to flight the vipers, for they are unwilling to kill them, because they consider them as the sacred inhabitants of the balsam. And if it happens that any one is wounded by a viper, the wound resembles that which is made by iron, but is not attended with any dangerous consequences, for these animals being fed with the juice of the balsam tree, which is the most odoriferous of all trees, their poison becomes changed from a deadly quality into one which produces a milder effect"—Pausanias.

"The inhabitants of Helicon say, that none of the herbs or roots which are produced in this mountain, are destructive to mankind. They add, that the pastures here even debilitate the venom of serpents; so that those who are frequently bit by serpents in this part, escape the danger with greater ease than if they were of the nation of the Pylii, or had discovered an antidote against poison."—Pausanias

³ The common people of England have long been acquainted with this change which muscular fibre undergoes before the circumstance was known to philosophers. I have heard them express a dislike and loathing to spermatoeli, because it was dead man's fat

"The Persians are strangely superstitious about the

Thou wilt not shorten day,
 But I will hasten darkness!" Then the Witch
 Began a magic song,
 One long low tone, through teeth half-closed,
 Through lips slow-moving, muttered slow;
 One long-continued breath,
 Till to her eyes a darker yellowness
 Was driven, and fuller-swollen the prominent veins
 On her loose throat grew black.
 Then looking upward, thrice she breathed
 Into the face of Heaven;
 The baneful breath infected Heaven;
 A mildewy fog it spread
 Darker and darker; so the evening sun
 Pour'd his unentering glory on the mist,
 And it was light below.

33.

"Bring now the wax," quoth Khawla, "for thou know'st
 The mine that yields it." Forth went Maimuna,
 In mist and darkness went the Sorceress forth,
 And she hath reach'd the Place of Tombs,
 And in their sepulchres the Dead
 Feel feet unholly trampling over them.⁴

burial of their kings. For, fearing lest by some magical art, any enchantments should be practised upon their bodies to the prejudice of their children, they conceal, as much as in them lies, the real place of interment

"To this end, they send to several places several coffins of lead, with others of wood which they call Taboat, and bury all alike with the same magnificence. In this manner they delude the curiosity of the people, who cannot discern by the outside in which of the coffins the real body should be. Not but it might be discovered by such as would put themselves to the expense and trouble of doing it. And thus it shall be related in the life of Habas the Great, that twelve of these coffins were conveyed to twelve of the principal Mosques, not for the sake of their riches, but of the person which they enclosed, and yet nobody knew in which of the twelve the king's body was laid though the common belief is, that it was deposited at Ardyall

"It is also said in the life of Sefse I, that there were three coffins carried to three several places, as if there had been a triple production from one body though it were a thing almost certainly known, that the coffin where the body was laid was carried to the same city of Kom, and to the same place where the deceased king commanded the body of his deceased father to be carried"—Chardin

"They imagine the dead are capable of pain. A Portuguese gentleman had one day ignorantly strayed among the tombs, and a Moor, after much wrangling, obliged him to go before the Cadi. The gentleman complained of violence, and asserted he had committed no crime, but the judge informed him he was mistaken, for that the poor dead suffered when trodden on by Christian feet. Muley Ishmael once had occasion to bring one of his wives through a burial-ground, and the people removed the bones of their relations, and murmuring, said, he would neither suffer the living nor the dead to rest in peace"—Chenier Additional Essay by the Translator

Were the Moorish superstition true, there would have been some monkish merit in the last request of St Swithin.

"When he was ready to depart out of this world, he commanded (for humilities sake) his body to be buried in the church-yard, whereon every one might tread with their feet."

—English Martyrologer

There is a story recorded, how that St Frithetane "was wont every day to say mass and office for the dead, and one evening as he walked in the church-yard, reciting the said

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

34.

Thou startest, Maimuna,
Because the breeze is in thy lifted locks !
Is Khawla's spell so weak ?
Sudden came the breeze and strong ;
The heavy mist wherewith the lungs oppress
Were labouring late, flies now before the gale,
Thin as an infant's breath,
Seen in the sunshine of an autumn frost.
Sudden it came, and soon its work was done,
And suddenly it ceased ;
Cloudless and calm it left the firmament,
And beautiful in the blue sky
Arose the summer Moon.

She heard the quicken'd action of her blood,
She felt the fever in her cheeks
Daunted, yet desperate, in a tomb
Entering, with impious hand she traced
Circles and squares and trines
And magic characters,
Till, riven by her charms, the tomb

office when he came to requiescant in pace, the voices in the graves round about made answer aloud, and said, Amen "—
English Martyrology

"I observed at Damascus" says Thevenot "that the Turks leave a hole of three fingers breadth in diameter, on the top of their tombs (where there is a channel of earth over the dead body) that serves to cool the dead, for the women, going thither on Thursday to pray which they never fail to do every week they pour in water by that hole to refresh them, and quench their thirst, and at the end of the grave, they stick in a large branch of box, and leave it there to keep the dead cool. They have another no less pleasant custom and that is when a woman hath lost her husband she still asks his counsel about her affairs. For instance she will go to his grave and tell him that such a person hath wronged her, or that such a man would marry her, and thereupon asks his counsel what she should do, having done so, she returns home expecting the answer which her late husband fails not to come and give her the night following "

1 The Mohammedan tradition is even more horrible than this. The corpse of the wicked is gnawed and stung till the resurrection by ninety nine dragons with seven heads each, or, as others say, their sins will become venomous beasts, the grievous ones stinging like dragons, the smaller like scorpions and the others like serpents, circumstances which some understand in a figurative sense. — Salic's Preliminary Discourse

This Mohammedan tale may be traced to the Scripturo, "whose worm dieth not."

They also believe "that after a man is buried, the soul returns to the body, and that two very terrible angels come into the grave the one called Munkar, and the other Nakir, who take him by the head, and make him kneel, and that for that reason, they leave a tuft of hair on the crown of their heads, that the angels who make them kneel may take hold of it. After that, the angels examine him in this manner 'Who is thy God, thy religion, and prophet?' and he answers thus 'My God is the true God, my religion is the true religion, and my prophet is Mahomet.' But if that man find himself to be guilty, and being afraid of their tortures, shall say, 'You are my God and my prophet, and it is in you that I believe.' At such an answer, those angels smite him with a mass of fire, and depart, and the earth squeezes the poor wretch so hard, that his mother's milk comes running out of his nose. After that come two other angels, bringing an ugly

Yawn'd and disclosed its dead;
Maimuna's eyes were open'd, and she saw
The secrets of the Grave.

There sat a Spirit in the vault,
In shape, in hue, in movements, like life;
And by him couch'd, as if intamed,
The hundred-headed Worm that never dies.

37.

"Nay, Sorceress! not to-night!" the Spirit cried,
"The flesh in which I sinn'd may rest to-night
From suffering; all things, even I, to-night,
Even the Dam'd, repose!"

38.

The flesh of Maimuna
Crept on her bones with terror, and her knees
Trembled with their trembling weight.
"Only this Sabbath! and at dawn the Worm
Will wake, and this poor flesh must grow to meet
The gnawing of his hundred poison-mouths! 1
God! God! is there no mercy after death!"

creature with them, that represents his sins and bad deeds, changed into that form, then, opening a window, they depart into hell and the man remains there with that ugly creature, being continually tormented with the sight of it, and the common miseries of the damned, until the day of judgement, when both go to hell together. But if he had lived well, and made the first answer above-mentioned, they bring him a lovely creature, which represents his good actions, changed into that form, then the angels opening a window, go away to paradise, and the lovely creature remains, which gives him a great deal of content, and stays with him until the day of judgement, when both are received into paradise. — Thevenot

Monkish ingenuity has invented something not unlike this Mohammedan article of faith.

"St Elphege," said William of Malmesbury, "In his tender years took the monastic habit at Dirherst, then a small monastery, and now only an empty monument of antiquity. There, after he had continued awhile, aspiring to greater perfection, he went to Bath, where, enclosing himself in a secret cell, he employed his mind in contemplation of celestial things. To him there, after a short time, were congregated a great number of religious persons, desiring his instructions and directions and among them, being many, there were some who gave themselves to licentious feasting and drinking in the night time, their spiritual father, St. Elphege, not knowing of it. But Almighty God did not a long time suffer this their licence, but, at midnight, struck with a sudden death one who was the ringleader in this licentiousness, in the chamber where they practised such excesses. In the mean time, the holy man being at his prayers, was interrupted by a great noise, proceeding out of the same chamber, and wondering at a thing so unaccustomed, he went softly to the door, looking in through certain cloths, he saw two devils of a vast stature, which, with frequent strokes, as of hammers, tormented the lifeless carcases; from whence, notwithstanding, proceeded loud clamours, as if for help. But his tormentors answered, 'Thou dost not obey God, neither wilt we thee.' This, the next morning, the holy man related to the rest, and no wonder if his companions became afterward more abstemious." — Cressy

There is another ceremony to be undergone at the time of death, which is described in a most barbarous mixture of Arabic and Spanish. The original is given for its singularity:—

39.

Soul-struck, she dash'd away,
She had the Place of Tombs,
She cast herself upon the earth,
All agony, and tumult, and despair.

"Says to all Moslems que quando viene a la muerte, que le envia Allah cinco Almalagues. El primero viene quando terrores (la vida); esta en la garganta, y dice le, Yr hijo de Adam que es de tu cuerpo el forjado, que tan falaco es oy? y que es de tu lengua la fablante, como se emmudercido el dia de oy? y que es de tu compania y parientes? oy te desaran solo. Y viene almalac segundo, quando le meten la mortaja, y dice le, se hijo de Adam, que es de lo que tenas de la riqueza para la pobreza? y que es de lo que alcaste del poblado para el yermo? y que es de lo que alcaste del solaco para la soledad? Y viene almalac tercero quando lo ponen en lanaas (las andas), y dice le, Yr hijo de Adam, oy caminaras camino que nunca lo caminas mas luenta qu'el; el dia de oy veras jente que nunca la veyete nunca jamas; el dia de oy entararas en casa que nunca entaraste en mas esterecha qu'ella jamas ni mas oscura. Y viene almalac quarto, quando lo meten en la fuesa y guarda, y dice, Yr hijo de Adam, ayer eras sobre la carra de la tierra alegre y goyoso, oy seras en su vientre; y buen dia te vino si tu eres en la garacia de Allah, y mal dia te vino si tu eres en la ira de Allah. Y viene almalac cinqueno quando esta soterrado y querna, y dice, Ic hijo de Adam oy quodaras solo y aunque quedaremos con tu no aporovejaríamos ninguna cosa; y a espelgado elalago y desas lo para otr; el dia de oy seras en layerna (parayso) vir uso, o en el fuego penoso. Aquestos cinco Almalagues vienen por mandamiento de Allah a todo persona en el paso de la muerte. Rogemos de Allah nos ponga por la rogar y alfadale (mercerimento) de nuestro ahabi (profete) Muhammad (salla Allah alayh wasallam) nos ponga de los siervos olvidados, que merescamos ser seguros del espanto de la fuesa y de los cinco almalagues por su santo al ahma (misericordia) y piedad. Amen."—Notices des Manuscrits de la Bibl. Nationale, t. iv 636

"Let every Moslem know, that when he comes to die, Allah sends five Almalagues to him. The first comes when the soul is in the throat, and says to him, 'Now, son of Adam, what is become of thy body, the strong, which is to-day so feeble? And what is become of thy tongue, the talker, that is thus made dumb to-day? And where are thy companions and thy kin? To-day they have left thee alone.' And the second Almalac comes when they put on the winding-sheet, and says, 'Now, son of Adam, what is become of the riches which thou hadst, in this poverty? And where are the peopled lauds which were thine, in this desolation? And where are the pleasures which were thine, in this solitariness?' And the third Almalac comes when they place him upon the bier, and says, 'Now, son of Adam, to day thou shalt travel a journey, than which thou hast never travelled longer; to-day thou shalt see a people, such as thou hast never seen before, to-day thou shalt enter a house, than which thou hast never entered a narrower nor a darker.' And the fourth Almalac comes when they put him in the grave, and says, 'Now, son of Adam, yesterday thou wert upon the face of the earth, blithe and joyous, to-day thou art in its bowels; a good day is to beide thee, if thou art in the grace of Allah, and an ill day will beide thee if thou art in the wrath of Allah.' And the fifth Almalac comes when he is interred, and says, 'Now, son of Adam, to-day thou wilt be left alone, and though we were to remain with thee, we should profit thee nothing, as to the wealth which thou hast gathered together, and must now leave to another. To-day thou wilt be rejoicing in paradise, or tormented in the fire.' These five Almalagues come by the command of Allah to every person in the pass of death. Let us pray to Allah, that through the mediation and merits of our prophet Mahommed, he may place us among his obedient servants, that we may be worthy to be safe from the terror of the grave, and of these five Almalagues, through his holy compassion and mercy. Amen."

"The night, Lelleth-ul-cadir, is considered as being particularly consecrated to ineffable mysteries. There is a prevailing opinion, that a thousand secret and invisible prodigies are performed on this night; that all the inanimate beings then pay their adoration to God; that all the waters of the sea lose their saltiness, and become fresh at these mysterious moments; that such, in fine, is its sanctity, that prayers said during this night are equal in value to all those which can be said in a thousand successive months. It has not, however, pleased God, says the author of the celebrated theological work entitled Ferhann, to reveal it to the faithful no prophet no saint has been able to discover it; hence this night so august, so mysterious, so favoured by Heaven, has hitherto remained undiscovered."—D'Oheron

"They all hold, that some time on this night, the firmament opens for a moment or two, and the glory of God appears visible to the eyes of those who are so happy as to behold it, at which juncture, whatever is asked of God by the fortunate beholder of the mysteries of that critical minute, is infallibly granted. This acts many credulous and superstitious people upon the watch all night long, till the morning begins to dawn. It is my opinion, that they go on full as wise as they come off. I mean, from standing sentinel for so many hours. Though many stories are told of people who have enjoyed the privilege of seeing this miraculous opening of the Heavens, of all which, few have had power to speak their mind, till it was too late, so great was their ecstasy. But one passage, pleasant enough, was once told me by a grave elderly gentlewoman at Constantine, in Barbary. 'There was, not many years before my time,' said she, 'in this town, a Mulatta wench, belonging to such a great family,' naming one of the best in the town, 'who being quite out of love with her woolly locks, and imagining that she wanted nothing to make her thought a pretty girl but a good head of hair, took her supper in her hand presently after sunset, and without letting any body into her secret, stole away, and shut herself up in the uppermost apartment in the house, and went upon the watch. She had the good fortune to direct her optics towards the right quarter, the patience to look so long and so steadfastly till she plainly beheld the beams of celestial glory darting through the amazing chasm in the divided firmament, and the resolution to cry out, with all her might, Ya Rabbi Kubbar Rassi; i. e. "O Lord, make my head big!" This expression is, figuratively, not improper to pray for a good head of hair. But, unhappily for the poor girl, it seems God was pleased to take her words in the literal sense, for, early in the morning, the neighbours were disturbed by the terrible noise and bawling she made; and they were forced to hasten to her assistance with tools proper to break down the walls about her ears, in order to get her head in at the window, it being grown to a monstrous magnitude, bigger in circumference than several bushels, I don't remember exactly how many, nor am I certain whether she survived her misfortune or not.'"—Morgan. Note to Rabdan

According to Franchin, it is believed, that whatever Moslem dies during the month of Ramadan, will most assuredly enter into paradise, because the gates of Heaven then stand open, by command of God.—Tour from Bengal to Persia, p. 186.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

When all Created Things adore
The Power that made them; Insects, Beasts, and Birds,
The Water-Dwellers, Herbs, and Trees, and Stones,
Yea, Earth and Ocean, and the infinite Heaven,
With all its Worlds! Man only doth not know
The universal Sabbath, doth not join
With Nature in her homage Yet the prayer
Flows from the righteous with intenser love,
A holler calm succeeds, and sweeter dreams
Visit the slumbers of the penitent.

40.

Therefore on Maimuna the Elements
Shed healing; every breath she drew was balm.
For every flower sent then in incense up
Its richest odours; and the song of birds
Now, like the music of the Seraphim,
Lut'd her soul, and now
Made silence awful by their sudden pause.
It seem'd as if the quiet Moon
Pour'd quietness; its lovely light
Was like the smile of reconciling Heaven.

41.

Is it the dew of night
That on her glowing cheek
Shines in the moon-beam? Oh! she weeps. . . she weeps!
And the Good Angel that abandon'd her!
At her hell-baptism, by her tears drawn down,
Resumes his charge. Then Maimuna
Recall'd to mind the double oracle;
Quick as the lightning flash
Its import glanced upon her, and the hope
Of pardon and salvation rose,
As now she understood
The lying prophecy of truth
She pauses not, she ponders not;
The driven air before her fann'd the face
Of Thalaba, and he awoke and saw
The Sorceress of the Silver Locks.

42.

One more permitted spell.
She takes the magic thread.
With the wide eye of wonder, Thalaba
Watches her snowy fingers round and round,
Unwind the loosening chain.

Again he hears the low sweet voice,
The low sweet voice so musical,
That sure it was not strange,
If in those unintelligible tones
Was more than human potency,
That with such deep and undefined delight
Fill'd the surrender'd soul.
The work is done, the song hath ceased;
He wakes as from a dream of Paradise,
And feels his fetters gone, and with the burst
Of wondering adoration, praises God.

43.

Her charm hath loosed the chain it bound,
But massy walls and iron gates
Confine Hozatrah's Son.
Heard ye not, Genii of the Air, her spell,
That o'er her face there flits
The sudden flush of fear?
Again her louder lips repeat the charm;
Her eye is anxious, her cheek pale,
Her pulse plays fast and feeble.
Nay, Maimuna! thy power hath ceased,
And the wind scatters now
The voice which ruled it late.

44.

"Be comforted, my soul!" she cried, her eye
Brightening with sudden joy, "be comforted!
We have burst through the bonds which bound us down
To utter death; our covenant with Hell
Is blotted out! The Lord hath given me strength!
Great is the Lord, and merciful!
Hear me, ye rebel Spirits! in the name
Of Allah and the Prophet, hear the spell!"

45.

Groans then were heard, the prison walls were rent,
The whirlwind wrapt them round, and forth they flew,
Borne in the chariot of the Winds abroad.

Hosein, the Persians believe that the gates of paradise are thrown open, and that all the Moslems who die find immediate admittance. — Pietro della Valle.

"The Turks also acknowledge guardian angels, but in far greater number than we do, for they say, that God hath appointed threescore and ten angels, though they be invisible, for the guard of every Musulman, and nothing befals any body but what they attribute to them. They have all their several offices, one to guard one member, and another another; one to serve him in such an affair, and another in another. There are, among all these angels, two who are the dictators over the rest; they sit one on the right side, and the other on the left; these they call Kerim Khatib, that is to say, the merciful scribes. He on the right side, writes down the good actions of the man whom he has in tuition, and the other on the left hand, the bad. They are so merciful, that they spare him if he commit a sin before he goes to sleep, hoping he'll repent, and if he does not repent, they mark it down; if he does repent, they write down, Esau has repented, that is to say, God pardons. They wait upon him in all places, except when he does his needs, where they let him go alone, staying for him at the door till he comes out, and then they take him into possession again; wherefore, when the Turks go to the house-of-office, they put the left foot foremost, to the end the angel who registers their sins may leave them first; and when they come out, they put the right foot before, that the angel who writes down their good works, may have them first under his protection." — Thevenot.

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

THE TENTH BOOK.

"And the Angel that was sent unto me said, Thinkest thou to comprehend the way of the Most High! . . . Then said I, Yea, my Lord. And he answered me, and said, I am sent to shew thee three ways, and to set forth three similitudes before thee; whereof if thou canst declare me one, I will shew thee also the way that thou desirest to see, and I shall shew thee from whence the wicked heart cometh. And I said, Tell on, my Lord. Then said he unto me, Go thy way, weigh me the weight of the fire, or measure me the blast of the wind, or call me again the day that is past." — Esdra, ii. 4.

1.

ERE there was time for wonder or for fear,
The way was pass'd, and lo! again
Amid surrounding snows,
Within the cavern of the Witch they stand.

"When any person is to be buried, it is usual to bring the corpse at mid-day, or afternoon prayers, to one or other of these Mosques, from whence it is accompanied by the greatest part of the congregation to the grave. Their processions, at these times, are not so slow and solemn as in most parts of Christendom; for the whole company make what haste they can, singing, as they go along, some select verses of their Koran. That absolute submission which they pay to the will of God, allows them not to use any consolatory words upon these occasions; no loss or misfortune is to be here-upon regretted or complained of: instead likewise of such expressions of sorrow and condolence, as may regard the deceased, the compliments turn upon the person who is the nearest concerned, a blessing (say his friends) be upon your head." — Shaw.

"All Mahometans inter the dead at the hour set apart for prayer; the defunct is not kept in the house, except he expires after sunset; but the body is transported to the Mosque, whither it is carried by those who are going to pray; each, from a spirit of devotion, is desirous to carry in his turn. Women regularly go on Friday to weep over, and pray at the sepulchres of the dead, whose memory they hold dear." — Chenier.

This custom of crowding about a funeral contributes to spread the plague in Turkey. It is not many years since, in some parts of Worcestershire, the mourners were accustomed to kneel with their heads upon the coffin during the burial service.

The fullest account of a Mohammedan funeral is in the Lettres sur la Grèce, of M. Guys. Chance made him the spectator of a ceremony which the Moslem will not suffer an infidel to profane by his presence.

"About ten in the morning I saw the grave-digger at work; the slaves and the women of the family were seated in the burial ground, many other women arrived, and then they all began to lament. After this prelude, they, one after the other, embraced one of the little pillars which are placed upon the graves, crying out, 'Ogloum, ogloum, sana Mussaphir gusidi.' 'My son, my son, a guest is coming to see thee.' At these words their tears and sobs began anew; but the stars did not continue long; they all seated themselves, and entered into conversation.

Then came the weakness of her natural age
At once on Maimuna;
The burthen of her years
Fell on her, and she knew
That her repentance in the sight of God
Had now found favour, and her hour was come.
Her death was like the righteous: "Turn my face
To Mecca!" in her languid eyes
The joy of certain hope
Lit a last lustre, and in death
A smile was on her cheek.

3.

No faithful crowded round her bier,¹
No tongue reported her good deeds,
For her no mourners wall'd and wept,
No Iman o'er her perfumed corpse
For her soul's health intoned the prayer;
Nor column raised by the way-side:²
Implored the passing traveller
To say a requiem for the dead.
Thalaba laid her in the snow,
And took his weapons from the hearth,
And then once more the youth began
His weary way of solitude.

"At noon I heard a confused noise, and cries of lamentation; it was the funeral which arrived. A Turk preceded it, bearing upon his head a small chest; four other Turks carried the bier upon their shoulders, then came the father, the relations, and the friends of the dead, in great numbers. Their cries ceased at the entrance of the burial ground, but then they quarrelled — and for this: The man who bore the chest opened it, it was filled with copies of the Koran: a crowd of Turks, young and old, threw themselves upon the books, and scrambled for them. Those who succeeded ranged themselves around the Iman, and all at once began to recite the Koran, almost as boys say their lesson. Each of the readers received ten parats, about fifteen sols, wrapt in paper. It was then for these fifteen pence, that these pious assistants had quarrelled, and in our own country you might have seen them fight for less.

"The bier was placed by the grave, in which the grave-digger was still working, and perfumes were burnt by it. After the reading of the Koran, the Iman chanted some Arabic prayers, and his full chant would, no doubt, have appeared to you, as it did to me, very ridiculous. All the Turks were standing; they held their hands open over the grave, and answered Amen, to all the prayers which the Iman addressed to God for the deceased.

"The prayers finished, a large chest was brought, about six feet long, and three broad; its boards were very thick. The coffin is usually made of cypress; thus, literally, is verified the phrase of Horace, that the cypress is our last possession:

"Neque harum, quas colis, arborum,
Te, præter invisas cupressus,
Ulla brevem dominum sequetur."

"The cemeteries of the Turks are usually planted with these trees, to which they have a religious attachment. The chest, which was in loose pieces, having been placed in the grave, the coffin was laid in it, and above, planks, with other pieces of wood. Then all the Turks, taking spades, cast earth upon the grave to cover it. This is a part of the ceremony at which all the bystanders assisted in their turn.

"Before the corpse is buried it is carried to the Mosque. Then, after having recited the Fatwa (a prayer very similar to our Lord's prayer, which is repeated by all present), the Iman asks the congregation what they have to testify concerning the life and morals of the deceased? Each then, in his turn, relates those good actions with which he was acquainted. The body is then washed, and wrapped up like a mummy, so that it cannot be seen. Drugs and spices are placed in the bier with it, and it is carried to interment. Before it is lowered into the grave, the Iman commands silence, saying, 'Cease your lamentations for a moment, and let me instruct this Moslem how to act, when he arrives in the other world.' Then, in the ear of the corpse, he directs him how to answer the Evil Spirit, who will not fail to question him respecting his religion, &c. This lesson finished, he repeats the Fatwa, with all the assistants, and the body is let down into the grave. After they have thrown earth three times upon the grave, as the Romans used, they retire. The Iman only remains he approaches the grave, stoops down, inclines his ear, and listens to hear if the dead man disputes when the Angel of Death comes to take him: then he bids him farewell; and in order to be well paid, never fails to report to the family the best news of the deceased."

4.
The breath of the East is in his face,
And it drives the sleet and the snow.

"As soon as the ceremony of interment is concluded, the Imaum, seated with his legs bent under his thighs, repeats a short prayer; he then calls the deceased three times by his name, mentioning also that of his mother, but without the smallest allusion to that of his father. What will be considered as infinitely more extraordinary is, that should the Imaum be ignorant of the name of the mother, it is usual for him to substitute that of Mary, in honour of the Virgin, provided the deceased be a male, and that of Eve, in case the deceased be a female, in honour of the common mother of mankind. This custom is so invariable, that even at the interment of the Sultans it is not neglected; the Imaum calling out, 'Oh Mustaphah! Son of Mary! or, Oh Fatimah! Daughter of Eve!'

"Immediately afterwards, he repeats a prayer, called Telken, which consists of the following words:—Remember the moment of thy leaving the world, in making this profession of faith. Certainly there is no God but God. He is one, and there is no association in Him. Certainly Mohammed is the prophet of God. Certainly Paradise is real. Certainly the resurrection is real, it is indisputable. Certainly God will bring to life the dead, and make them leave their graves. Certainly thou hast acknowledged God for thy God; Islamism for thy religion; Mohammed for thy prophet; the Koran for thy priest; the sanctuary of Mecca for thy Kibla; and the faithful for thy brethren. God is my God; there is no other God but he. He is the master of the august and sacred throne of Heaven. Oh Mustaphah! (or any other name) say that God is thy God (which the Imaum repeats thrice). Say there is no other God but God (also repeated thrice). Say that Mohammed is the prophet of God; that thy religion is Islam, and that thy prophet is Mohammed, upon whom be the blessing of salvation, and the mercy of the Lord. O God, do not abandon us.' After this ejaculation, the ceremony is concluded by a chapter of the Koran, and the party returns home.

"As soon as the grave was filled up, each friend planted a sprig of cypress on the right, and another on the left hand of the deceased, and then took his leave. This was to ascertain by their growth whether the deceased would enjoy the happiness promised by Mohammed to all true believers, or whether he would for ever be denied the bliss of the Houris. The former would occur should the sprigs on the right hand take root, and the latter would be ascertained if the left only should flourish. If both succeeded, he would be greatly favoured in the next world; or, if both failed, he would be tormented by black angels, until, through the mediation of the prophet, he should be rescued from their persecutions.

"The graves are not dug deep, but separated from each other carefully, that two bodies may not be placed together. The earth is raised, to prevent an unhalloved foot from treading upon it; and, instead of a plain flat stone being placed over it, one which is perforated in the centre is most commonly used, to allow of cypress trees, or odoriferous herbs, being planted immediately over the corpse. Occasionally a square stone, hollowed out, and without a cover, is preferred; which, being filled with mould, the trees or herbs are cultivated in it."—Griffiths.

"The Turks bury not at all within the walls of the city, but the great Turkish Emperors themselves, with their wives and children about them, and some few other of their great Bassas, and those only in chapels by themselves, built for that purpose. All the rest of the Turks are buried in the fields; some of the better sort, in tombs of marble; but the rest, with tomb-stones laid upon them, or with two great stones, one set up at the head, and the other at the feet, of every grave; the greatest part of them being of white marble, brought from the Isle of Marmora.

"They will not bury any man where another hath been buried, accounting it impious to dig up another man's bones: by reason whereof, they cover all the best ground about the city with such great white stones; which, for the infinite number of them, are thought sufficient to make another wall about the city."—Knolles.

"The Turks bury by the way-side, believing that the passengers will pray for the souls of the dead."—Tavernier.

"All that day we travelled over plains all covered with snow, as the day before; and indeed it is not only troublesome, but very dangerous, to travel through these deep snows. The mischief is, that the beams of the sun, which lie all day long upon it, molest the eyes and face with such a scorching heat, as very much weakens the sight, whatever remedy a man can apply, by wearing, as the people of the country do, a thin handkerchief of green or black silk, which no way abates the annoyance."—Chardin.

"When they have to travel many days through a country covered with snow, travellers, to preserve their sight, cover the face with a silk kerchief, made on purpose, like a sort of black crape. Others have large furred bonnets, bordered with goat-skin, and the long goat-hair hanging over the face, is as serviceable as the crape."—Tavernier.

"An Abyssinian historian says, that the village called Zinzenam, rain upon rain, has its name from an extraordinary circumstance that once happened in these parts; for a shower of rain fell, which was not properly of the nature of rain, as it did not run upon the ground, but remained very light, having scarce the weight of feathers, of a beautiful white colour, like flour: it fell in showers, and occasioned a darkness in the air more than rain, and liker to mist. It covered the face of the whole country for several days, retaining its whiteness the whole time, then went away like dew, without leaving any smell or unwholesome effect behind it."—Bruce.

The Dutch were formerly expelled from an East Indian settlement, because their Consul, in narrating to the Prince of the country the wonders of Europe, chanced to say, that in his own country water became a solid body once a-year, for some time; when men, or even horses, might pass over it without sinking. The Prince, in a rage, said, that he had hitherto listened to his tales with patience, but this was so palpable a lie, that he would never more be connected with Europeans, who only could assert such monstrous falsehoods.

His very heart is cold,
His spirit chill'd within him. He looks on
If aught of life be near;
But all is sky, and the white wilderness,
And here and there a solitary pine,
Its branches broken by the weight of snow,
His pains abate, his senses, dull
With suffering, cease to suffer.
Languidly, languidly,
Thalaba drags along,
A heavy weight is on his lids,
His limbs move slow for heaviness,
And he full fain would sleep.
Not yet, not yet, O Thalaba,
Thy hour of rest is come!
Not yet may the Destroyer sleep:
The comfortable sleep:
His journey is not over yet,

His course not yet fulfill'd . . .
Run thou thy race, O Thalaba!
The prize is at the goal.

It was a Cedar-tree
Which woke him from that deadly drowsiness;
Its broad round-spreading branches, when they felt³
The snow, rose upward in a point to heaven,
And standing in their strength erect,
Defied the baffled storm.
He knew the lesson Nature gave,
And he shook off his heaviness,
And hope revived within him.

Now sunk the evening sun,
A broad and beamless orb,

¹ A strange account of the cedars of Lebanon is given by De la Roque, Voyage de Syrie et du Mont Liban. 1772.

"This little forest is composed of twenty cedars, of a prodigious size; so large, indeed, that the finest planes, sycamores, and other large trees which we had seen, could not be compared with them. Besides these principal cedars, there were a great number of lesser ones, and some very small, mingled with the large trees, or in little clumps near them. They differed not in their foliage, which resembles the juniper, and is green throughout the year; but the great cedars spread at their summit, and form a perfect round, whereas the small ones rise in a pyramidal form like the cypress. Both diffuse the same pleasant odour; the large ones only yield fruit, a large cone, in shape almost like that of the pine, but of a browner colour, and compacter shell. It gives a very pleasant odour, and contains a sort of thick and transparent balm, which oozes out through small apertures, and falls drop by drop. This fruit, which it is difficult to separate from the stalk, contains a nut like that of the cypress: it grows at the end of the boughs, and turns its point upwards.

"The nature of this tree is not to elevate its trunk, or the part between the root and the first branches; for the largest cedars which we saw, did not, in the height of their trunks, exceed six or seven feet. From this low, but enormously thick body, prodigious branches rise, spreading as they rise, and forming, by the disposition of their boughs and leaves, which point upward, a sort of wheel, which appears to be the work of art. The bark of the cedar, except at the trunk, is smooth and shining, of a brown colour. Its wood white and soft, immediately under the bark, but hard and red within, and very bitter, which renders it incorruptible, and almost immortal. A fragrant gum issues from the tree.

"The largest cedar which we measured was seven feet in circumference, wanting two inches; and the whole extent of its branches, which it was easy to measure, from their perfect roundness, formed a circumference of about 120 feet.

"The Patriarch of the Maronites, fully persuaded of the rarity of these trees, and wishing, by the preservation of those that remain, to show his respect for a forest so celebrated in Scripture, has pronounced canonical pains, and even excommunication, against any Christians who shall dare to cut them; scarcely will he permit a little to be sometimes taken for crucifixes and little tabernacles in the chapels of our missionaries.

"The Maronites themselves have such a veneration for these cedars, that on the day of transfiguration, they celebrate the festival under them with great solemnity; the Patriarch officiates, and says mass pontifically; and, among other exercises of devotion, they particularly honour the Virgin Mary there, and sing her praises, because she is compared to the cedars of Lebanon, and Lebanon itself used as a metaphor for the mother of Christ.

"The Maronites say, that the snows have no sooner begun to fall, than these cedars, whose boughs, in their infinite number, are all so equal in height, that they appear to have been shorn, and form, as we have said, a sort of a wheel or parasol: than these cedars, I say, never fall at that time to change their figure. The branches, which before spread themselves, rise insensibly, gathering together, it may be said, and turn their points upward towards heaven, forming altogether a pyramid. It is Nature, they say, who inspires this movement, and makes them assume a new shape, without which these trees never could sustain the immense weight of snow remaining for so long a time.

"I have procured more particular information of this fact, and it has been confirmed by the testimony of many persons, who have often witnessed it. This is what the secretary of the Maronite Patriarch wrote to me in one of his letters, which I think it right to give in his own words. 'Cedri Libani quos plantavit Deus, ut Psalmista loquitur, sitae sunt in planitie quoddam, aliquantulum infra altissimum Montis Libani cacumen, ubi tempore hyemalis maxime nivium quantitas descendit, tribusque et ultra mensibus mordaciter dominatur. Cedri in altum ascendunt extensis tamen ramis in gyrum solo parallelis, conficiuntibus suo gyro fore umbellam solarem. Sed superveniente nive, quia conservaretur in magna quantitate eo desuper, neque possent pati tantum pondus tanto tempore premens, sine certo fractionis discrimine, Natura, rerum omnium provida mater, ipsas concessit, ut adveniente hyeme et descendente nive, statim rami in altum assurgant, et secum invicem uniti constituent quasi conum, ut melius seec ab adveniente hoste tuerantur. Naturâ enim ipsâ verum est, virtutem quamlibet unitam simul reddi fortiores.'

"The cedars of Lebanon, which, as the Psalmist says, God himself planted, are situated in a little plain somewhat below the loftiest summit of Mount Lebanon, where, in the winter, a great quantity of snow falls, and continues for three months or longer. The cedars are high, but their boughs spread out parallel with the ground into a circle, forming almost a shield against the sun. But when the snow falls, which would be heaped upon them in so great a quantity, that they could not endure such a weight so long a time, without the certain danger of breaking, Nature, the provident mother of all, has endued them with power, that when the winter comes, and the snow descends, their boughs immediately rise, and, uniting together, form a cone, that they may be the better defended from the coming enemy. For in Nature itself, it is true, that virtue, as it is united, becomes stronger."

Adown the glowing sky ;
Through the red light the snow-flakes fell like fire.
Louder grows the biting wind,
And it drifts the dust of the snow.
The snow is clotted in his hair,
The breath of Thalaba
Is iced upon his lips.
He looks around ; the darkness,
The dizzy floating of the feathery sky
Close in his narrow view.

7.
At length, through the thick atmosphere, a light
Not distant far appears.
He, doubting other wiles of sorcery,
With mingled joy and fear, yet quicken'd step,
Bends thitherward his way.

8.
It was a little, lowly dwelling-place,
Amid a garden whose delightful air
Was mild and fragrant as the evening wind
Passing in summer o'er the coffee-groves¹
Of Yemen, and its blessed bowers of balm.
A fount of Fire that in the centre play'd
Roll'd all around its wondrous rivulets,
And fed the garden with the heat of life.
Every where magic ! the Arabian's heart
Yearn'd after human intercourse.
A light ; . . the door unclosed ! . .
All silent . . he goes in.

9.
There lay a Damsel, sleeping on a couch :
His step awoke her, and she gazed at him
With pleased and wondering look,
Fearlessly, like a happy child,
Too innocent to fear.
With words of courtesy
The young intruder spake.
At the sound of his voice, a joy
Kindled her bright black eyes ;
She rose and took his hand ;
But at the touch the joy forsook her cheek :
" Oh ! it is cold ! " she cried,
" I thought I should have felt it warm, like mine,
But thou art like the rest ! "

10.
Thalaba stood mute awhile,
And wondering at her words :
" Cold ? Lady ! " then he said : " I have travell'd long
In this cold wilderness,
Till life is well-nigh spent ! "

¹ The coffee plant is about the size of the orange tree. The flower, in colour, size, and smell, resembles the white jessamine. The berry is first green, then red, in which ripe state it is gathered.

Olearius's description of coffee is amusing. " They drink a certain black water, which they call cabwa, made of a fruit brought out of Egypt, and which is in colour like ordinary wheat, and in taste like Turkish wheat, and is of the bigness of a little bean. They fry, or rather burn it, in an iron pan, without any liquor, beat it to powder, and boiling it with fair water, they make this drink thereof, which hath as it were

LAILA.
Art thou a Man, then ?

THALABA.
Nay . . I did not think
Sorrow and toil could so have alter'd me,
As to seem otherwise.

LAILA.
And thou canst be warm
Sometimes ? life-warm as I am ?

THALABA.
Surely, Lady,
As others are, I am, to heat and cold
Subject like all. You see a Traveller,
Bound upon hard adventure, who requests
Only to rest him here to-night, . . to-morrow
He will pursue his way.

LAILA.
Oh . . not to-morrow !
Not, like a dream of joy, depart so soon !
And whither wouldst thou go ? for all around
Is everlasting winter, ice and snow,
Deserts unpassable of endless frost.

THALABA.
He who has led me here, will still sustain me
Through cold and hunger.

12.
" Hunger ? " Laila cried :
She clapt her hly hands,
And whether from above, or from below,
It came, sight could not see,
So suddenly the floor was spread with food.

13.
LAILA.
Why dost thou watch with hesitating eyes
The banquet ? 'tis for thee ! I bade it come.

THALABA.
Whence came it ?

LAILA.
Matters it from whence it came ?
My Father sent it : when I call, he hears.
Nay, . . thou hast fabled with me ! and art like
The forms that wait upon my solitude,
Human to eye alone ; . . thy hunger would not
Question so idly else.

the taste of a burnt crust, and is not pleasant to the palate."
— Amb. Travels.

Pietro della Valle liked it better, and says he should introduce it into Italy. " If," said he, " it were mixed with wine instead of water, I should think it is the Nepenthe, which, according to Homer, Helen brought from Egypt, for it is certain that coffee comes from that country ; and the Nepenthe was said to assuage trouble and disquietude," so does this serve the Turks as an ordinary pastime, making them pass their hours in conversation, and occasioning pleasant discourse, which induces forgetfulness of care."

THALABA.

I will not eat!
It came by magic! fool, to think that aught
But fraud and danger could await me here.
Let loose my cloak! . .

LAILA.

Begone then, insolent!
Why dost thou stand and gaze upon me thus?
Ay! eye the features well that threaten thee
With fraud and danger! in the wilderness
They shall avenge me, . . in the hour of want,
Rise on thy view, and make thee feel
How innocent I am:

And this remember'd cowardice and insult,
With a more painful shame will burn thy cheek,
Than now heats mine in anger!

THALABA.

Mark me, Lady!
Many and restless are my enemies;
My daily paths have been beset with snares
Till I have learnt suspicion, bitter sufferings
Teaching the needful vice. If I have wrong'd you, . .
For yours should be the face of innocence, . .
I pray you pardon me! In the name of God
And of his Prophet, I partake your food

LAILA.

Lo, now! thou wert afraid of sorcery,
And yet hast said a charm!

THALABA.

A charm?

LAILA.

And wherefore? . .
Is it not delicate food? . . What mean thy words?
I have heard many spells, and many names,
That rule the Genii and the Elements,
But never these.

THALABA.

How! never heard the names
Of God and of the Prophet?

LAILA.

Never . . nay now!
Again that troubled eye? . . thou art a strange man,
And wondrous fearful . . but I must not twice
Be charged with fraud! If thou suspectest still,
Depart and leave me!

¹ It is well known how much the Orientalists are addicted to this pretended science. There is a curious instance of public folly in Sir John Chardin's Travels.

"Sephie-Mirza was born in the year of the Egre 1057. For the superstition of the Persians will not let us know the month or the day. Their addiction to astrology is such, that they carefully conceal the moments of their princes' birth, to prevent the casting their nativities, where they might meet perhaps with something which they should be unwilling to know."

At the coronation of this prince two astrologers were to be present with an astrolabe in their hands, to take the fortunate hour, as they term it, and observe the lucky moments when a happy constellation should point out for proceedings of great importance.

THALABA.

And you do not know
The God that made you?

LAILA.

Made me, man! . . my Father
Made me. He made this dwelling, and the grove,
And yonder fountain-fire; and every morn
He visits me, and takes the snow, and moulds
Women and men, like thee; and breathes into them
Motion, and life, and sense, . . but, to the touch
They are chilling cold; and ever when night closes
They melt away again, and leave me here
Alone and sad. Oh then how I rejoice
When it is day, and my dear Father comes
And cheers me with kind words and kinder looks!
My dear, dear Father! . . Were it not for him,
I am so weary of this loneliness,
That I should wish I also were of snow,
That I might melt away, and cease to be.

THALABA.

And have you always had your dwelling here
Amid this solitude of snow?

LAILA.

I think so.
I can remember, with unsteady feet
Tottering from room to room, and finding pleasure
In flowers, and toys, and sweetmeats, things, which long
Have lost their power to please; which, when I see them,
Raise only now a melancholy wish,
I were the little trifter once again
Who could be pleased so lightly!

THALABA.

Then you know not
Your Father's art?

LAILA.

No. I beought him once
To give me power like his, that where he went
I might go with him; but he shook his head,
And said, it was a power too dearly bought,
And kiss'd me with the tenderness of tears.

THALABA.

And wherefore hath he hidden you thus far
From all the ways of humankind?

LAILA.

'Twas fear,
Fatherly fear and love. He read the stars,¹
And saw a danger in my destiny,

Sephie-Mirza having by debauchery materially injured his health, the chief physician was greatly alarmed, "in regard his life depended upon the king's, or if his life were spared, yet he was sure to lose his estate and his liberty, as happens to all those who attend the Asiatic Sovereigns, when they die under their care. The queen-mother, too, accused him of treason or ignorance, believing that since he was her son's physician, he was obliged to cure him. This made the physician at his wife's end, so that all his remedies failing him, he bethought himself of one that was possibly his own invention, and which few physicians would ever have found out, as not being to be met with neither in Galen nor Hippocrates. What does he then do, but out of an extraordinary fetch of his wit, he begins to lay the fault upon the stars and the king's astrologers crying out that they were altogether in the

And therefore placed me here amid the snows,
And laid a spell that never human eye,
If foot of man by chance should reach the depth
Of this wide waste, shall see one trace of grove,
Garden or dwelling-place, or yonder fire;
That thaws and mitigates the frozen sky.
And, more than this, even if the Enemy
Should come, I have a Guardian here.

THALABA.
A Guardian?

LAILA.
'Twas well, that when my sight unclosed upon thee,
There was no dark suspicion in thy face,
Else I had called his succour! Wilt thou see him?
But, if a woman can have terrified thee,
How wilt thou bear his unrelaxing brow,
And lifted lightnings?

THALABA.
Lead me to him, Lady!

14.
She took him by the hand,
And through the porch they pass'd.
Over the garden and the grove
The fountain-streams of fire
Pour'd a broad light like noon:
A broad unnatural light,
Which made the rose's blush of beauty pale,
And dimm'd the rich geranium's scarlet blaze.
The various verdure of the grove
Wore here one undistinguishable grey,
Chequer'd with blacker shade.
Suddenly Laila stopt,
"I do not think thou art the enemy,"
She said, "but He will know!
If thou hast meditated wrong,
Stranger, depart in time...
I would not lead thee to thy death."

15.
She turn'd her gentle eyes
Toward him then with anxious tenderness.
"So let him pierce my breast," cried Thalaba,
"If it hide thought to harm you!"

wrong. That if the king lay in a languishing condition, and could not recover his health, it was because they had failed to observe the happy hour, or the aspect of a fortunate constellation at the time of his coronation." The stratagem succeeded, the king was re-crowned, and by the new name of Solyman! — Chardin.

1 "We have now to refute their error, who are persuaded that brazen heads, made under certain constellations, may give answers, and be as it were guides and counsellors, upon all occasions, to those that had them in their possession. Among these is one Yepes, who affirms, that Henry de Villena made such a one at Madrid, broken to pieces afterwards by order of John II., King of Castile. The same thing is affirmed by Barthelemy Sibillus, and the author of the Image of the World, by Virgil; by William of Malmesbury, of Sylvester; by John Gower, of Robert of Lincoln; by the common people of England, of Roger Bacon; and by Tos-tatus, bishop of Avila, George of Venice, Deirio, Sibillus, Raguseus, Delancre, and others, too many to mention, of

'Tis a figure.
Almost I fear to look at!... yet come on.
'Twill ease me of a heaviness that seems
To sink my heart; and thou may'st dwell here then
In safety;... for thou shalt not go to-morrow,
Nor on the after, nor the after day,
Nor ever! It was only solitude
Which made my misery here...
And now, that I can see a human face,
And hear a human voice...
Oh no! thou wilt not leave me!

THALABA.
Alas, I must not rest!
The star that ruled at my nativity,
Shone with a strange and blasting influence.
O gentle Lady! I should draw upon you
A killing curse!

LAILA.
But I will ask my Father
To save you from all danger; and you know not
The wonders he can work; and when I ask,
It is not in his power to say me nay.
Perhaps thou know'st the happiness it is
To have a tender Father?

THALABA.
He was one,
Whom, like a loathsome leper, I have tainted
With my contagious destiny. One evening
He kiss'd me as he wont, and laid his hands
Upon my head, and blest me ere I slept.
His dying groan awoke me, for the Murderer
Had stolen upon our sleep!... For me was meant
The midnight blow of death; my Father died;
The brother playmates of my infancy,
The baby at the breast, they perish'd all...
All in that dreadful hour!... but I was saved
To remember and revenge.

16.
She answer'd not; now,
Emerging from the o'er-arch'd avenue,
The finger of her upraised hand
Mark'd where the Guardian of the garden stood.
It was a brazen Image, every limb!

Albertus Magnus; who, as the most expert, had made an entire man of the same metal, and had spent thirty years without any interruption in forming him under several aspects and constellations. For example, he formed the eyes, according to the said Tostatus; in his Commentaries upon Exodus, when the sun was in a sign of the Zodiac, correspondent to that part, casting them out of divers metals mixed together, and marked with the characters of the same signs and planets, and their several and necessary aspects. The same method he observed in the head, neck, shoulders, thighs, and legs, all which were fashioned at several times, and being put and fastened together in the form of a man, had the faculty to reveal to the said Albertus the solutions of all his principal difficulties. To which they add (that nothing be lost of the story of the Statue), that it was battered to pieces by St. Thomas, merely because he could not endure its excess of prating.

"But, to give a more rational account of this Androides of Albertus, as also of all these miraculous heads, I conceive

And swelling vein and muscle true to life :
The leg-knees bending on,
The other straight, firm planted, and his hand
Lifted on high to hurl
The lightning that it grasp'd.

17.
When Thalaba approach'd,
The enchanted Image knew Hodeirah's son.
And hurl'd the lightning at the dreaded foe.
But from Mohareb's hand
Had Thalaba received Abdaladar's Ring.
Blindly the wicked work
The righteous will of Heaven.
Full in his face the lightning-bolt was driven ;
The scatter'd fire recoil'd ;
Like the flowing of a summer gale he felt
Its ineffectual force ;
His countenance was not changed,
Nor a hair of his head was singed.

18.
He started, and his glance
Turn'd angrily upon the Maid.
The sight disarm'd suspicion ; . . . breathless, pale,
Against a tree she stood ;
Her wan lips quivering, and her eyes
Upraised, in silent supplicating fear.

19.
Anon she started with a scream of joy,
Seeing her Father there,
And ran and threw her arms around his neck.
" Save me ! " she cried, " the Enemy is come !
Save me ! save me ! Okba ! "

20.
" Okba ! " repeats the youth ;
For never since that hour,
When in the tent the Spirit told his name,
Had Thalaba let slip
The memory of his Father's murderer ;
" Okba ! " . . . and in his hand
He grasp'd an arrow-shaft,
And he rush'd on to strike him.

the original of this fable may well be deduced from the Tenth of the Hebrews, by which, as Mr. Selden affirms, many are of opinion, that we must understand what is said in Genesis concerning Laban's Gods, and in the first book of Kings, concerning the image which Michal put into the bed in David's place. For R. Eleazer holds, that it was made of the head of a male child, the first-born, and that dead-born, under whose tongue they applied a lamen of gold, whereon were engraven the characters and inscriptions of certain planets, which the Jews superstitiously wandered up and down with, instead of the Urim and Thummim, or the Ephod of the high-priest. And that this original is true and well deduced, there is a manifest indicium, in that Henry D'Assia and Bartholomæus Sibillus affirm, that the Androides of Albertus, and the head made by Virgil, were composed of flesh and bone, yet not by nature but by art. But this being judged impossible by modern authors, and the virtue of amulets, amulets, and planetary sigilla, being in great reputation, men have thought ever since, (taking their opinion from Triamegistus affirming in his Asclepiion, that of the

And putting forth his hand
Gently he repell'd the Youth.
" My hour is not yet come !
But thou may'st shed this innocent Maiden's blood ;
That vengeance God allows thee ! "

22.
Around her Father's neck
Still Laila's hands were clasp'd ;
Her face was turn'd to Thalaba,
A broad light floated o'er its marble paleness,
As the wind waved the fountain fire,
Her large dilated eye, in horror raised,
Watch'd every look and movement of the youth :
" Not upon her, " said he,
" Not upon her, Hodeirah's blood cries out
For vengeance ! " and again his lifted arm
Threaten'd the Sorcerer :
Again withheld, it felt
A barrier that no human strength could burst.

23.
" Thou dost not aim the blow more eagerly, "
Okba replied, " than I would rush to meet it !
But that were poor revenge.
O Thalaba, thy God
Wrecks on the innocent head
His vengeance ; . . I must suffer in my child !
Why dost thou pause to strike thy victim ? Allah

" Liar ! " quoth Thalaba.
And Laila's wondering eye
Look'd up, all anguish, to her father's face.

gods, some were made by the Sovereign God, and others by men, who, by some art, had the power to unite the invisible spirits to things visible and corporeal, as is explained at large by St. Augustine,) that such figures were made of copper or some other metal, whereon men had wrought under some favourable aspects of Heaven and the planets.

" My design is not absolutely to deny that he might compose some head or statue of man, like that of Memnon, from which proceeded a small sound and pleasant noise, when the rising sun came, by his heat, to rarify and force out, by certain small conduits, the air which, in the cold of the night, was condensed within it. Or haply, they might be like those statues of Boethius, whereof Cassiodorus speaking, said, " Metalla mugiant, Diomedes in arce græves buccinant, æneus angulis insibilat, aves simulatæ fringunt, et quæ propriam vocem nesciunt, ab ære dulcedinem præcipuum emittere cantilenæ ; " for such I doubt not but may be made by the help of that part of natural magic which depends on the mathematics. Her birth-star warn'd me of Hodeirah's race.

I laid a spell, and call'd a Spirit up;

He answered, one must die,

Laila or Thalaba. . .

Accurs'd Spirit! even in truth

Giving a lying hope!

Last, I ascended the seventh Heaven,

And on the Everlasting Table there,¹

In characters of light,

I read her written doom.

The years that it has gnawn me! and the load

Of sin that it has laid upon my soul!

Curse on this hand, that in the only hour

The favouring Stars allow'd,

Reek'd with other blood than thine.

Still dost thou stand and gaze incredulous?

Young man, be merciful, and keep her not Longer in agony."

Thalaba's unbelieving frown

Scowl'd on the Sorcerer,

When in the air the rush of wings was heard,

And Azrael stood before them.

In equal terror, at the sight,

The Enchanter, the Destroyer stood,

And Laila, the victim Maid.

¹ "This table is suspended in the Seventh Heaven, and guarded from the Demons, lest they should change or corrupt any thing thereon. Its length is so great as is the space between heaven and earth, its breadth equal to the distance from the east to the west, and it is made of one pearl. The divine pen was created by the finger of God; that also is of pearl, and of such length and breadth, that a swift horse could scarcely gallop round it in five hundred years. It is so endowed, that, self-moved, it writes all things, past, present, and to come. Light is its ink, and the language which it uses only the Angel Seraphael understands."—Maracci.

³ "Here, in the Fourth Heaven, I beheld a most prodigious angel, of an admirable presence and aspect, in whose awful countenance there appeared neither mirth nor sorrow, but an undescrivable mixture of both. He neither smiled in my face, nor did he, indeed, scarce turn his eyes towards me to look upon me, as all the rest did, yet he returned my salutation after a very courteous, obliging manner, and said, 'Welcome to these mansions, O Mahomet; thou art the person whom the Almighty hath endowed with all the united perfections of nature; and upon whom he, of his immense goodness, hath been pleased to bestow the utmost of his divine graces.'

"There stood before him a most beautiful table, of a vast magnitude and extent, written all over, almost from the top to the bottom, in a very close, and scarce distinguishable character, upon which written table his eyes were continually fixed; and so exceedingly intent he was upon that his occupation, that, though I stood steadfastly observing his countenance, I could not perceive his eyelids once to move. Casting my eyes towards the left side of him, I beheld a prodigious large shady tree, the leaves whereof were as innumerable as the sands of the ocean, and upon every one of which were certain characters inscribed. Being extremely desirous of knowing the secret of this wonderful mystery, I enquired of Gabriel the meaning of what I was examining with my eyes with so anxious a curiosity. The obliging angel, to satisfy my longing, said, 'That person, concerning whom thou art so very inquisitive, is the redoubtable Azrael, the Angel of Death, who was never yet known either to laugh, smile, or be merry; for, depend upon it, my beloved Mahomet, had he been capable of smiling, or looking pleasant upon any creature in nature, it would assuredly have been upon thee alone. This table, upon which thou beholdest him so attentively fixing his looks, is called Et Lough El Mahfoud, and is the register upon which are engraven the names of every individual soul breathing; and, notwithstanding the inspection of that register taketh up the greatest part of his time, yet he more particularly looketh it all over five times a-day, which are at those very same instants wherein the true believers are obliged to offer up their adorations to our Omnipotent Lord. The means whereby he understandeth when the thread of each individual life is run out and expired, is to look upon the branches of that vast tree thou there beholdest, upon the leaves whereof are written the names of all mortals, every one having his peculiar leaf; there, forty days before the time of any person's life is expired, his respective leaf beginning to fade, wither, and grow dry, and the letters of his name to disappear; at the end of the fortieth day they are quite blotted out, and the leaf falleth to the ground, by which Azrael certainly knoweth that the breath of its owner is ready to leave the body, and hasteneth away to take possession of the departing soul.'

"The size or stature of this formidable angel was so incomprehensibly stupendous, so unmeasurably great, that if this earthly globe of ours, with all that is thereon contained, were to be placed in the palm of his hand, it would seem no more than one single grain of mustard-seed (though the smallest of all seeds) would do if laid upon the surface of the earth."—Rabdan.

⁴ The balance of the dead is an article in almost every creed. Mahomet borrowed it from the Persians. I know not from whence the Monks introduced it; probably they were ignorant enough to have invented the obvious fiction.

In the Vision of Thurdillus; the ceremony is accurately

He said, and from above,
 As though it were the Voice of Night,
 The startling answer came.
 "Son of Hodeirah, think again!
 One must depart from hence,
 Laila, or Thalaba;
 She dies for thee, or thou for her;
 It must be life for life!
 Son of Hodeirah weigh it well,
 While yet the choice is thine!"

He hesitated not,
 But, looking upward, spread his hands to Heaven, described. "At the end of the north wall, within the church, sat St. Paul, and opposite him, without, was the devil and his angels. At the feet of the devil, a burning pit flamed up, which was the mouth of the pit of hell. A balance, equally poised, was fixed upon the wall, between the devil and the apostle, one scale hanging before each. The apostle had two weights, a greater and a less, all shining, and like gold, and the devil also had two smoky and black ones. Therefore, the souls that were all black, came one after another, with great fear and trembling, to behold the weighing of their good and evil works; for these weights weighed the works of all the souls, according to the good or evil which they had done. When the scale inclined to the apostle, he took the soul, and introduced it through the eastern gate, into the fire of Purgatory, that there it might expiate its crimes. But when the scale inclined and sunk towards the devil, then he and his angels snatched the soul, miserably howling and cursing the father and mother that begot it, to eternal torments, and cast it with laughter and grinning into the deep and fiery pit which was at the feet of the devil. Of this balance of good and evil, much may be found in the writings of the Holy Fathers."—Matthew Paris.

Concerning the salvation of Charlemagne, Archbishop Turpin, a man of holy life, wrote thus: "I, Turpin, Archbishop of Rheims, being in my chamber in the city of Vienna, saying my prayers, saw a legion of devils in the air, who were making a great noise. I adjured one of them to tell me from whence they came, and wherefore they made so great an uproar. And he replied that they came from Aix la Chapelle, where a great lord had died, and that they were returning in anger, because they had not been able to carry away his soul. I asked him who the great lord was, and why they had not been able to carry away his soul? He replied, That it was Charlemagne, and that Santiago had been greatly against them. And I asked him how Santiago had been against them; and he replied, We were weighing the good and the evil which he had done in this world, and Santiago brought so much timber, and so many stones, from the churches which he had founded in his name, that they

The eager exultation of his speech
 Earthward recall'd the thoughts of Thalaba.
 "And dost thou triumph, Murderer? dost thou deem Because I perish, that the unsleeping lids
 Of Justice shall be closed upon thy crime?
 Poor, miserable man! that thou canst live
 With such beast-blindness in the present joy,
 When o'er thy head the sword of God

"Servant of Allah, thou hast disobey'd;
 God hath abandon'd thee;

 And shook his daughter off,
 And drew the dagger from his vest,
 And aim'd the deadly blow.

greatly overbalanced all his evil works; and so we had no power over his soul. And having said this, the devil disappeared."

We must understand from this vision of Archbishop Turpin, that they who build or repair churches in this world, erect resting places and inns for their salvation. — Historia do Imperador Carlos Magno, et dos Doze Pares de Franca.

Two other corollaries follow from the vision. The devil's way home from Aix la Chapelle lay through Vienna; and as churches go by weight, an architect of Sir John Vaubrugh's school should always be employed.

This balance of the dead was an easy and apt metaphor, but clumsily imagined as an actual mode of trial.

"For take thy ballance, if thou be so wise,
 And weigh the winde that under heaven doth blow;
 Or weigh the light that in the east doth rise;
 Or weigh the thought that from man's mind doth flow;
 But if the weight of these thou canst not show,
 Weigh but one word which from thy lips doth fall."

Spenser.

¹ This double meaning is in the spirit of oracular prediction. The classical reader will remember the equivocations of Apollo. The fable of the Young Man and the Lion in the Tapestry will be more generally recollected. We have many buildings in England to which this story has been applied. Cooke's Folly, near Bristol, derives its name from a similar tradition.

The History of the Buccaneers affords a remarkable instance of prophecy occasioning its own accomplishment.

"Before my first going over into the South Sea with Captain Sharp, (and indeed before any privateers, at least since Drake and Orengham had gone that way which we afterwards went, except La Souda, a French captain, who, by Captain Wright's instructions, had ventured as far as Chiapo town with a body of men, but was driven back again.) I being then on board Captain Coson, in company with three or four more privateers, about four leagues to the east of Portobelo, we took the packets bound thither from Carthagena. We opened a great quantity of the merchants' letters, and found the contents of many of them to be very surprising; the merchants of several parts of Old Spain thereby informing their correspondents of Panama and elsewhere, of a certain prophecy that went about Spain that year, the tenor of which was, 'that there would be English privateers that year in the West Indies, who would make such great discoveries, as to open a door into the South Seas,' which they supposed was fastest shut; and the letters were accordingly full of cautions to their friends to be very watchful and careful of their coasts.

"This door they spoke of, we all concluded must be the passage over-land through the country of the Indians of Darien, who were a little before this become our friends, and had lately fallen out with the Spaniards, breaking off the intercourse which for some time they had with them. And upon calling also to mind the frequent invitations we had from those Indians a little before this time, to pass through their country and fall upon the Spaniards in the South Seas, we from henceforward began to entertain such thoughts in earnest, and soon came to a resolution to make those attempts which we afterwards did with Captains Sharp, Coxon, &c. So that the taking these letters gave the first life to those bold undertakings, and we took the advantage of the fears the Spaniards were in from that prophecy, or probable con-

His vengeance fall upon the innocent head!...
Curse thee, curse thee, Thalaba!"

3.

All feelings of revenge
Had left Hodeirah's son.
Pitying and silently he heard
The victim of his own iniquities;
Not with the officious hand
Of consolation, fretting the sore wound
He could not hope to heal.

4.

So as the Servant of the Prophet stood,
With sudden motion the night-air
Gently fann'd his cheek.
'Twas a Green Bird, whose wings
Had waved the quiet air.
On the hand of Thalaba
The Green Bird perch'd, and turn'd
A mild eye up, as if to win
The Adventurer's confidence;
Then, springing on, flew forward;
And now again returns
To court him to the way;
And now his hand perceives
Her rosy feet press firmer, as she leaps
Upon the wing again.

5.

Obedient to the call,
By the pale moonlight Thalaba pursued,
O'er trackless snows, his way;
Unknowing he what blessed messenger
Had come to guide his steps...
That Lalla's spirit went before his path.
Brought up in darkness, and the child of sin,
Yet, as the meed of spotless Innocence,
Just Heaven permitted her by one good deed
To work her own redemption after death;

jecture, or whatever it were; for we sealed up most of the letters again, and sent them ashore to Portobello."—Dampier.

¹ The souls of the blessed are supposed by some of the Mahomedans to animate green birds in the groves of paradise. Was this opinion invented to conciliate the Pagan Arabs, who believed, that of the blood near the dead person's brain was formed a bird named Hamah, which once in a hundred years visited the sepulchre?

To this there is an allusion in the Moallakat. "Then I knew with certainty, that, in so fierce a contest with them, many a heavy blow would make the perched birds of the brain fly quickly from every skull."—Poem of Antara.

In the Bahar-Danush, parrots are called the green-vested resemblers of Heaven's dwellers. The following passages in the same work may, perhaps, allude to the same superstition, or perhaps are merely metaphorical, in the usual style of its true oriental bombast. "The bird of understanding fled from the nest of my brain." "My joints and members seemed as if they would separate from each other, and the bird of life would quit the nest of my body." "The bird of my soul became a captive in the net of her gossamer singlets."

I remember in a European Magazine two similar lines by the author of the Lives of the Admirals:—

6.

The morning sun came forth,
 Wakening no eye to life
 In this wide solitude ;
 His radiance, with a saffron hue, like heat,
 Suffused the desert snow.
 The Green Bird guided Thalaba ;
 Now oaring with slow wing her upward way,
 Descending now in slant descent
 On out-spread pinions motionless ;
 Floating now, with rise and fall alternate,
 As if the billows of the air
 Heaved her with their sink and swell.
 And when beneath the noon
 The icy glitter of the snow
 Dazzled his aching sight,
 Then on his arm alighted the Green Bird,
 And spread before his eyes
 Her plumage of refreshing hue.

7.

Evening came on ; the glowing clouds
 Tinged with a purple ray the mountain ridge
 That lay before the Traveller.
 Ah ! whither art thou gone,
 Guide and companion of the youth, whose eye
 Has lost thee in the depth of Heaven ?
 Why hast thou left alone
 The weary wanderer in the wilderness ?

" My beating bosom is a well-wrought cage
 Whence that sweet goldfinch Hope shall ne'er elope ! "

The grave of Francisco Jorge, the Maronite martyr, was visited by two strange birds of unusual size. No one knew whence they came. They emblemized, says Vasconcellos, the purity and the indefatigable activity of his soul.

The inhabitants of Otaheite have assigned a less respectable part of the body as the seat of the soul.

" The disembowelling of the body there, is always performed in great secrecy, and with much religious superstition. The bowels are, by these people, considered as the immediate organs of sensation, where the first impressions are received, and by which all the operations of the mind are carried on : it is therefore natural to conclude, that they may esteem and venerate the intestines, as bearing the greatest affinity to the immortal part. I have frequently held conversations on this subject, with a view to convince them that all intellectual operations were carried on in the head ; at which they would generally smile, and intimate that they had frequently seen men recover whose skulls had been fractured, and whose heads had otherwise been much injured ; but that, in all cases in which the intestines had been wounded, the persons on a certainty died. Other arguments they would also advance in favour of their belief ; such as the effect of fear, and other passions, which caused great agitation and uneasiness, and would sometimes produce sickness at the stomach, which they attributed entirely to the action of the bowels." — Vancover.

" When Hosein, the son of Ali, was sick of a grievous disorder, he longed for a pomegranate, though that fruit was not then in season. Ali went out, and diligently enquiring, found a single one in the possession of a Jew. As he returned with it, a sick man met him and begged half the pomegranate, saying it would restore his health. Ali gave him half, and when he had eaten it, the man requested he would give him the other half, the sooner to complete his recovery. Ali benignantly complied, returned to his son, and told him

And now the western clouds grow pale,
 And night descends upon his solitude.

8.

The Arabian youth knelt down,
 And bow'd his forehead to the ground,
 And made his evening prayer.
 When he arose the stars were bright in heaven,
 The sky was blue, and the cold Moon
 Shone over the cold snow.
 A speck in the air !
 Is it his guide that approaches ?
 For it moves with the motion of life !
 Lo ! she returns, and scatters from her pinions
 Odours diviner than the gales of morning
 Waft from Sabea.

9.

Hovering before the youth she hung,
 Till from her rosy feet, that at his touch
 Uncurl'd their grasp, he took
 The fruitful bough they bore.
 He took and tasted : a new life
 Flow'd through his renovated frame ;
 His limbs, that late were sore and stiff,
 Felt all the freshness of repose ;
 His dizzy brain was calm'd,
 The heavy aching of his lids was gone ;
 For Laila, from the Bowers of Paradise,

what had happened, and Hosein approved what his father had done.

" Immediately behold a miracle ! as they were talking together, the door was gently knocked at. He ordered the woman servant to go there, and she found a man, of all men the most beautiful, who had a plate in his hand covered with green silk, in which were ten pomegranates. The woman was astonished at the beauty of the man and of the pomegranates, and she took one of them, and hid it, and carried the other nine to Ali, who kissed the present. When he had counted them, he found that one was wanting, and said so to the servant ; she confessed that she had taken it on account of its excellence, and Ali gave her her liberty. The pomegranates were from paradise ; Hosein was cured of his disease only by their odour, and rose up immediately, recovered, and in full strength." — Maracci.

" I suspect," says Maracci, " that this is a true miracle wrought by some Christian saint, and falsely attributed to Ali. However this may be, it does not appear absurd that God should, by some especial favour, reward an act of remarkable charity even in an infidel, as he has sometimes, by a striking chastisement, punished enormous crimes. But the assertion, that the pomegranates were sent from paradise, exposes the fable."

Maracci, after detailing and ridiculing the Mahomedan miracles, contrasts with them, in an appendix, a few of the real and permanent miracles of Christianity, which are proved by the testimony of the whole world. He selects five as examples. " 1. The chapel of Loretto, brought by angels from Nazareth to Illyricum, and from Illyricum to Italy ; faithful messengers having been sent to both places, and finding in both its old foundations, in dimensions and materials exactly corresponding.

" 2. The cross of St. Thomas at Mellapor. A Bramin as the saint was extended upon his cross in prayer, slew him. On the anniversary of his martyrdom, during the celebration of mass, the cross gradually becomes luminous, till it shines one white glory. At elevating the host, it resumes its

2 ² Simorg Anka says my friend Mr Fox in a note to his Achmed Ardabelli, is a bird or griffin of extraordinary strength and siro (as its name imports signifying as large as thirty oxen) which according to the Eastern writers was sent by the Supreme Being to subdue and chastise the rebel lious Dives It was supposed to possess rational faculties, and the gift of speech The Cakeiman Nameh relates that Simorg Anka being asked his age replied this world is very ancient for it has already been seven times replenished with beings different from man and as often depopulated That the age of Adam in which we now are is to endure seven thousand years, making a great cycle, that himself had seen twelve of these revolutions and knew not how many more he had to see

I am afraid that Mr Fox and myself have fallen into a grievous heresy both respecting the unity and the sex of the Simorg For this great bird is a hen there is indeed a cock also but he seems to be of some inferior species a sort of Prince George of Denmark, the Simorg's consort, not the rock Simorg

In that portion of the Shah Nameh which has been put into English rhyme by Mr Champion some anecdotes may be found concerning this all knowing bird who is there repre sented as possessing one species of knowledge, of which she would not be readily suspected Zolzer, the father of Rus tan is exposed in his infancy by his own father, Saum who takes him for a young devil, because his body is black, and his hair white The infant is laid at the foot of Mount Elburs where the Simorg has her nest, and she takes him up and breeds him with her young, who are very desirous of eating him but she preserves him When Zolzer is grown up, and leaves the nest, the Simorg gives him one of her fea thers, telling him whenever he is in great distress, to burn it,

And bow'd his head and spake.
 "Earliest of existing things,
 Earliest thou, and wisest thou,
 Guide me, guide me, on my way!
 I am bound to seek the Caverns
 Underneath the roots of Ocean,
 Where the Sorcerers have their seat;
 Thou the eldest, thou the wisest,
 Guide me, guide me on my way!"

13.

"The ancient Simorg on the youth
 Unclosed his thoughtful eyes,
 And answer'd to his prayer.
 "Northward by the stream proceed;
 In the Fountain of the Rock
 Wash away thy worldly stains;
 Kneel thou there, and seek the Lord,
 And fortify thy soul with prayer
 Thus prepared, ascend the Sledge;
 Be bold, be wary; seek and find!
 God hath appointed all."
 The Ancient Simorg then let fall his lid,
 Relapsing to repose.

14.

Northward, along the rivulet,
 The adventurer went his way;
 Tracing its waters upward to their source.
 Green Bird of Paradise,
 Thou hast not left the youth!
 With slow associate flight,
 She accompanies his way;
 And now they reach the Fountain of the Rock.

15.

There, in the cold clear well,
 Thalaba wash'd away his earthly stains,
 And bow'd his face before the Lord,
 And fortified his soul with prayer.
 The while, upon the rock,
 Stood the celestial Bird,
 And pondering all the perils he must pass,
 With a mild, melancholy eye,
 Beheld the youth beloved.

and she will immediately come to his assistance. Zalzer marries Rodahver, who is likely to die in childing; he then burns the feather, and the Simorg appears and orders the Casarean operation to be performed. As these stories are not Ferdusi's invention, but the old traditions of the Persians, collected and arranged by him, this is, perhaps, the earliest fact concerning that operation which is to be met with, earlier probably than the fable of Semel. Zalzer was ordered first to give her wine, which acts as a powerful opiate, and after sewing up the incision, to anoint it with a mixture of milk, musk, and grass, pounded together, and dried in the shade, and then to rub it with a Simorg's feather.

In Mr Fox's collection of Persian books, is an illuminated copy of Ferdusi, containing a picture of the Simorg, who is there represented as an ugly dragon looking sort of bird. I should be loth to believe that she has so bad a physiognomy; and in the same volume, there are blue and yellow horses, there is good reason to conclude that this is not a genuine Persian.

And lo! beneath yon lonely pine, the Sledge:
 There stand the harness'd Dogs,
 Their wide eyes watching for the youth,
 Their ears erect, and turn'd toward his way.
 They were lean as lean might be,
 Their furrow'd ribs rose prominent,
 And they were black from head to foot,
 Save a white line on every breast,
 Curved like the crescent moon.
 Thalaba takes his seat in the sledge;
 His arms are folded on his breast,
 The Bird is on his knees;
 There is fear in the eyes of the Dogs,
 There is fear in their pitiful moan.
 And now they turn their heads,
 And seeing him seated, away!

17.

The youth, with the start of their speed,
 Falls back to the bar of the sledge;
 His hair floats straight in the stream of the wind
 Like the weeds in the running brook.
 They wind with speed their upward way,
 An icy path through rocks of ice:
 His eye is at the summit now,
 And thus far all is dangerless;
 And now upon the height
 The black Dogs pause and pant;
 They turn their eyes to Thalaba
 As if to plead for pity;
 They moan and whine with fear.

18.

Once more away! and now
 The long descent is seen,
 A long, long, narrow path;
 Ice-rocks aright, and hills of snow,
 Aleft the precipice.
 Be firm, be firm, O Thalaba!
 One motion now, one bend,
 And on the crags below
 Thy shatter'd flesh will harden in the frost.
 Why howl the Dogs so mournfully?
 And wherefore does the blood flow fast

bring a roc's egg, and hang it up in the hall, he is violently enraged, and exclaims, "Wretch, wouldst thou have me hang my master?" From the manner in which rocs are usually mentioned in the Arabian tales, the reader feels as much surprised at this indignation as Aladin was himself. Perhaps the original may have Simorg instead of roc. To think, indeed, of robbing the Simorg's nest, either for the sake of drilling the eggs, or of poaching them, would, in a believer, whether Shiah or Sunni, be the height of human impiety.

Since this note was written, the eighth volume of the Asiatic Researches has appeared, in which Captain Wilford identifies the roc with the Simorg "Simbad," he says, "was exposed to many dangers from the birds called Roc or Simorg, the Garuda of the Pauranics, whom Persian Romancers represent as living in Madagascar, according to Marco Polo." But the Roc of the Arabian Tales has none of the characteristics of the Simorg; and it is only in the instance which I have noticed, that any mistake of one for the other can be suspected.

All purple o'er their sable skin?
His arms are folded on his breast,
Nor scourge nor goad hath he,
No hand appears to strike,
No sounding lash is heard;
But piteously they moan and whine,
And track their way with blood.

19.

Behold! on yonder height
A giant fiend aloft
Waits to thrust down the tottering avalanche!
If Thalaba looks back, he dies;
The motion of fear is death.
On . . on . . with swift and steady pace,
Adown that dreadful way!
The Youth is firm, the Dogs are fleet,
The Sledge goes rapidly;
The thunder of the avalanche
Re-echoes far behind.
On . . on . . with swift and steady pace,
Adown that dreadful way
The Dogs are fleet, the way is steep,
The Sledge goes rapidly;
They reach the plain below.

20.

A wide, blank plain, all desolate.
Nor tree, nor bush, nor herb!
On go the Dogs with rapid course,
The Sledge slides after rapidly,
And now the sun went down.
They stopt and look'd at Thalaba,
The Youth perform'd his prayer!
They knelt beside him while he pray'd,
They turn'd their heads to Mecca,
And tears ran down their cheeks.
Then down they laid them in the snow,
As close as they could lie,
They laid them down and slept.
And backward in the sledge,
The Adventurer laid himself;
There peacefully slept Thalaba,
And the Green Bird of Paradise
Lay nestling in his breast.

21.

The Dogs awoke him at the dawn,
They knelt and wept again;
Then rapidly they journey'd on,
And still the plain was desolate,
Nor tree, nor bush, nor herb!
And ever at the hour of prayer,
They stopt, and knelt, and wept;
And still that green and graceful Bird
Was as a friend to him by day,
And, ever when at night he slept,
Lay nestling in his breast.

22.

In that most utter solitude
It cheer'd his heart to hear
Her soft and soothing voice.
Her voice was soft and sweet,
It rose not with the blackbird's thrill,
Nor warbled like that dearest bird that holds

The solitary man
A lotterer in his thoughtful walk at eve;
But if it swell'd with no exuberant joy,
It had a tone that touch'd a finer string,
A music that the soul received and own'd.
Her bill was not the beak of blood;
There was a human meaning in her eye
When met on Thalaba,
He wonder'd while he gazed,
And with mysterious love
Felt his heart drawn in powerful sympathy.

23.

Oh joy! the signs of life appear,
The first and single fir
That on the limits of the living world
Strikes in the ice its roots
Another, and another now;
And now the Larch, that flings its arms
Down-curving like the falling wave;
And now the Aspin's scatter'd leaves
Grey-glittering on the moveless twig;
The Poplar's varying verdure now,
And now the Birch so beautiful
Light as a lady's plumes.
Oh joy! the signs of life! the Deer
Hath left his slot beside the way;
The little Ermine now is seen,
White wanderer of the snow;
And now from yonder pines they hear
The clatter of the Grouse's wings;
And now the snowy Owl pursues
The Traveller's sledge, in hope of food;
And hark! the rosy-breasted bird,
The Thrush of sweet song!
Joy! joy! the winter-wilds are left!
Green bushes now, and greener grass,
Red thickets here, all berry-bright,
And here the lovely flowers!

24.

When the last morning of their way was come,
After the early prayer,
The Green Bird fix'd on Thalaba
A sad and supplicating eye,
And speech was given her then:
"Servant of God, I leave thee now;
If rightly I have guided thee,
Give me the boon I beg!"

25.

"O gentle Bird!" quoth Thalaba,
"Guide and companion of my dangerous way,
Friend and sole solace of my solitude,
How can I pay thee benefits like these?
Ask what thou wilt that I can give,
O gentle Bird, the poor return
Will leave me debtor still!"

26.

"Son of Hodeirah!" she replied,
"When thou shalt see an Old Man bent beneath
The burthen of his earthly punishment,
Forgive him, Thalaba!
Yea, send a prayer to God in his behalf!"

27.

A flush o'erspread the young Destroyer's cheek;
 He turn'd his eye towards the Bird
 As if in half repentance; for he thought
 Of Okba; and his Father's dying groan
 Came on his memory. The celestial Bird
 Saw and renew'd her speech;
 "O Thalaba, if she who, in thine arms
 Received the dagger-blow and died for thee
 Deserve one kind remembrance, . . save, O save
 The Father that she loves from endless death!"

28.

"Lalla! and is it thou?" the youth replied,
 "What is there that I durst refuse to thee?
 This is no time to harbour in my heart
 One evil thought; . . here I put off revenge,
 The last rebellious feeling. . . Be it so!
 God grant to me the pardon that I need,
 As I do pardon him! . . .
 But who am I, that I should save
 The sinful soul alive?"

29.

"Enough!" said Lalla. "When the hour shall come,
 Remember me! my task is done.
 We meet again in Paradise!"
 She said, and shook her wings, and up she soar'd
 With arrowy swiftness through the heights of Heaven.

30.

His aching eye pursued her path,
 When starting onward went the Dogs;
 More rapidly they hurried now,
 In hope of near repose.
 It was the early morning yet,
 When, by the well-head of a brook
 They stopt, their journey done.
 The spring was clear, the water deep;"
 A venturous man were he, and rash,
 That should have probed its depths,
 For all its loosen'd bed below,
 Heaved strangely up and down,
 And to and fro, from side to side,
 It heaved, and waved, and toss'd,
 And yet the depths were clear,
 And yet no ripple wrinkled o'er
 The face of that fair Well.

31.

And on that Well, so strange and fair,
 A little boat there lay,
 Without an oar, without a sail,
 One only seat it had, one seat,
 As if for only Thalaba.
 And at the helm a Damsel stood,
 A Damsel bright and bold of eye,
 Yet did a maiden modesty
 Adorn her fearless brow;
 Her face was sorrowful, but sure
 More beautiful for sorrow.
 To her the Dogs look'd wistful up,

And then their tongues were loosed:
 "Have we done well, O Mistress dear!
 And shall our sufferings end?"

32.

The gentle Damsel made reply;
 "Poor servants of the God I serve,
 When all this witchery is destroy'd,
 Your woes will end with mine.
 A hope, alas! how long unknown!
 This new adventurer gives;
 Now God forbid, that he, like you,
 Should perish for his fears!
 Poor servants of the God I serve,
 Wait ye the event in peace."
 A deep and total slumber as she spake
 Seized them. Sleep on, poor sufferers! be at rest!
 Ye wake no more to anguish: . . ye have borne
 The Chosen, the Destroyer! . . soon his hand
 Shall strike the efficient blow;
 And shaking off your penal forms, shall ye,
 With songs of joy, amid the Eden groves,
 Hymn the Deliverer's praise.

33.

Then did the Damsel say to Thalaba,
 "The morn is young, the Sun is fair,
 And pleasantly through pleasant banks
 Yon quiet stream flows on . .
 Wilt thou embark with me?
 Thou knowest not the water's way;
 Think, Stranger, well! and night must come, . .
 Darest thou embark with me?
 Through fearful perils thou must pass, . .
 Stranger, the wretched ask thine aid!
 Thou wilt embark with me!"
 She smiled in tears upon the youth; . .
 What heart were his, who could gainsay
 That melancholy smile?
 "I will," quoth Thalaba,
 "I will, in Allah's name!"

34.

He sat him on the single seat,
 The little boat moved on.
 Through pleasant banks the quiet stream
 Went winding pleasantly;
 By fragrant fir-groves now it pass'd,
 And now, through alder-shores,
 Through green and fertile meadows now
 It silently ran by.
 The flag-flower blossom'd on its side,
 The willow tresses waved,
 The flowing current furrow'd round
 The water-lily's floating leaf,
 The fly of green and gauzy wing,
 Fell sporting down its course;
 And grateful to the voyager
 The freshness that it breathed,
 And soothing to his ear
 Its murmur round the prow.
 The little boat falls rapidly
 Adown the rapid stream.

Some travellers may perhaps be glad to know, that the spring from which this description was taken, is near Bristol, about a mile from Stokes-Croft turnpike, and known by the name of the Bolling Well. Other, and larger springs, of the same kind, called the Lady Pools, are near Shobdon, in Herefordshire.

35.

But many a silent spring meantime,
And many a rivulet and rill
Had swoln the growing stream;
And when the southern Sun began
To wind the downward way of heaven,
It ran a river deep and wide,¹
Through banks that widen'd still.
Then once again the Damsel spake:
"The stream is strong, the river broad,
Wilt thou go on with me?
The day is fair, but night must come . .
Wilt thou go on with me?
Far, far away, the sufferer's eye
For thee hath long been looking, . .
"Thou wilt go on with me!"
"Sail on, sail on," quoth Thalaba,
"Sail on, in Allah's name!"
The little boat falls rapidly
Adown the river-stream.

36.

A broader and yet broader stream,
That rock'd the little boat!
The Cormorant stands upon its shoals,
His black and dripping wings
Half open'd to the wind.
The Sun goes down, the crescent Moon
Is brightening in the firmament;
And what is yonder roar,
That sinking now, and swelling now,
But evermore increasing,
Still louder, louder, grows?
The little boat falls rapidly
Adown the rapid tide;
The Moon is bright above,
And the great Ocean opens on their way.

37.

Then did the Damsel speak again,
"Wilt thou go on with me?
The Moon is bright, the sea is calm,
I know the ocean-paths;
Wilt thou go on with me? . .
Deliverer! yes! thou dost not fear!
Thou wilt go on with me!"
"Sail on, sail on!" quoth Thalaba,
"Sail on, in Allah's name!"

38.

The Moon is bright, the sea is calm,
The little boat rides rapidly
Across the ocean waves;
The line of moonlight on the deep
Still follows as they voyage on;
The winds are motionless;

¹ A similar picture occurs in Miss Baillie's Comedy, "the Second Marriage." "By Heaven, there is nothing so interesting to me as to trace the course of a prosperous man through this varied world. First, he is seen like a little stream, wearing its shallow bed through the grass, circling and winding, and gleaming up its treasures from every twink-

The gentle waters gently part
In dimples round the prow.
He looks above, he looks around,
The boundless heaven, the boundless sea,
The crescent moon, the little boat,
Nought else above, below.

39.

The Moon is sunk; a dusky grey
Spreads o'er the Eastern sky;
The stars grow pale and paler; . .
Oh beautiful! the godlike Sun
Is rising o'er the sea!
Without an oar, without a sail,
The little boat rides rapidly; . .
Is that a cloud that skirts the sea?
There is no cloud in heaven!
And nearer now, and darker now . .
It is . . it is . . the Land!
For yonder are the rocks that rise
Dark in the reddening morn;
For loud around their hollow base
The surges rage and foam.

40.

The little boat rides rapidly,
And pitches now with shorter toss
Upon the narrower swell;
And now so near, they see
The shelves and shadows of the cliff,
And the low-lurking rocks,
O'er whose black summits, hidden half,
The shivering billows burst; . .
And nearer now they feel the breaker's spray.
Then said the Damsel: "Yonder is our path
Beneath the cavern arch.
Now is the ebb, and till the ocean flow
We cannot over-ride the rocks.
Go thou, and on the shore
Perform thy last ablutions, and with prayer
Strengthen thy heart . . I too have need to pray."

41.

She held the helm with steady hand
Amid the stronger waves;
Through surge and surf she drove;
The adventurer leapt to land.

ling rill, as it passes; further on, the brown sand fences its margin, the dark rushes thicken on its side; further on still, the broad flags shake their green ranks, the willows bend their wide boughs o'er its course: and yonder, at last the fair river appears spreading his bright waves to the light."

THALABA THE DESTROYER.

THE TWELFTH BOOK.

"Why should he that loves me sorry be
For my deliverance, or at all complain
My good to hear, and toward joys to see?
I go, and long desired have to go,
I go with gladness to my wished rest."

Spenser's Daphnida.

1.

THEN Thalaba drew off Abdalzar's ring,
And cast it in the sea, and cried aloud,
"Thou art my shield, my trust, my hope, O God!
Behold and guard me now,
Thou who alone canst save.
If from my childhood up I have look'd on
With exultation to my destiny;
If in the hour of anguish I have own'd
The justice of the hand that chasten'd me;
If of all selfish passions purified
I go to work thy will, and from the world
Root up the ill-doing race,
Lord! let not thou the weakness of my arm
Make vain the enterprize!"

2.

The Sun was rising all magnificent,
Ocean and Heaven rejoicing in his beams.
And now had Thalaba
Perform'd his last ablutions, and he stood
And gazed upon the little boat
Riding the billows near,
Where, like a sea-bird breasting the broad waves,
It rose and fell upon the surge,
Till from the glitterance of the sunny main
He turn'd his aching eyes;
And then upon the beach he laid him down,
And watch'd the rising tide.
He did not pray, he was not calm for prayer;
His spirit, troubled with tumultuous hope,
Toll'd with futurity;
His brain, with busier workings, felt
The roar and raving of the restless sea,
The boundless waves that rose and roll'd and rock'd:
The everlasting sound
Opprest him, and the heaving infinite:
He closed his lids for rest.

3.

Meantime with fuller reach and stronger swell,
Wave after wave advanced;
Each following billow lifted the last foam
That trembled on the sand with rainbow hues;
The living power that, rooted to the rock,
Late from the thinner element
Shrunk down within its purple stem to sleep,
Now feels the water, and again
Awakening, blossoms out
All its green anther-necks.

4.

Was there a Spirit in the gale
That flutter'd o'er his cheek?
For it came on him like the new-risen sun
Which plays and dallies o'er the night-closed flower,
And woos it to unfold anew to joy;
For it came on him as the dews of eve
Descend with healing and with life
Upon the summer mead;
Or liker the first sound of seraph song
And Angel greeting, to the soul
Whose latest sense had shudder'd at the groan
Of anguish, kneeling by a death-bed side.

5.

He starts, and gazes round to seek
The certain presence. "Thalaba!" exclaim'd
The Voice of the Unseen;
"Father of my Onclza!" he replied,
"And have thy years been number'd? art thou too
Among the Angels?" "... Thalaba!"
A second and a dearer voice repeats,
"Go in the favour of the Lord,
My Thalaba, go on!
My husband, I have dress'd our bower of bliss.
Go, and perform the work;
Let me not longer suffer hope in Heaven!"

6.

He turn'd an eager glance toward the sea.
"Come!" quoth the Dameel, and she drove
Her little boat to land.
Impatient through the rising wave,
He rush'd to meet its way,
His eye was bright, his cheek was flush'd with joy.
"Hast thou had comfort in thy prayers?" she ask'd.
"Yea," Thalaba replied,
"A heavenly visitation." "God be praised!"
She answer'd, "then I do not hope in vain!"
And her voice trembled, and her lip
Quiver'd, and tears ran down.

7.

"Stranger," said she, "in years long past
Was one who vow'd himself
The Champion of the Lord, like thee,
Against the race of Hell.
Young was he, as thyself,
Gentle, and yet so brave!
A lion-hearted man.
Shame on me, Stranger! in the arms of love
I held him from his calling, till the hour
Was past; and then the Angel who should else
Have crown'd him with his glory-wreath,
Smote him in anger... Years and years are gone...
And in his place of penance he awaits
Thee, the Deliverer... surely thou art he!
It was my righteous punishment,
In the same youth unchanged,
And love unchangeable,
Sorrow for ever fresh,
And bitter penitence,
That gives no respite night nor day from grief,
To abide the written hour, when I should waft
The doom'd Destroyer and Deliverer here.
Remember thou, that thy success affects
No single fate, no ordinary woes."

8.

As thus she spake, the entrance of the cave
 Darken'd the boat below.
 Around them from their nests,
 The screaming sea-birds fled,
 Wondering at that strange shape,
 Yet unalarm'd at sight of living man,
 Unknowing of his sway and power misused ;
 The clamours of their young
 Echoed in shriller cries,
 Which rung in wild discordance round the rock.
 And farther as they now advanced,
 The dim reflection of the darken'd day
 Grew fainter, and the dash
 Of the out-breakers deaden'd ; farther yet,
 And yet more faint the gleam,
 And there the waters, at their utmost bound,
 Silently rippled on the rising rock.
 They landed and advanced, and deeper in,
 Two adamantine doors
 Closed up the cavern pass.

9.

Reclining on the rock beside,
 Sate a grey-headed man,
 Watching an hour-glass by.
 To him the Damsel spake,
 " Is it the hour appointed ? " The Old Man
 Nor answer'd her awhile,
 Nor lifted he his downward eye,
 For now the glass ran low,
 And, like the days of age,
 With speed perceivable,
 The latter sands descend ;
 And now the last are gone.
 Then he look'd up, and raised his hand, and smote
 The adamantine gates.

10.

The gates of adamant
 Unfolding at the stroke,
 Open'd and gave the entrance. Then she turn'd
 To Thalaba and said,
 " Go, in the name of God !
 I cannot enter, . . I must wait the end
 In hope and agony.
 God and Mahommed prosper thee,
 For thy sake and for ours ! "

11.

He tarried not, . . he pass'd
 The threshold, over which was no return.
 All earthly thoughts, all human hopes
 And passions now put off,
 He cast no backward glance
 Toward the gleam of day.
 There was a light within,
 A yellow light, as when the autumnal Sun,
 Through travelling rain and mist
 Shines on the evening hills :
 Whether, from central fires effused,
 Or that the sun-beams, day by day,
 From earliest generations, there absorb'd,
 Were gathering for the wrath-flame. Shade was none
 In those portentous vaults ;
 Crag overhanging, nor columnal rock

Cast its dark outline there ;

For with the hot and heavy atmosphere
 The light incorporate, permeating all,
 Spread over all its equal yellowness.
 There was no motion in the lifeless air ;
 He felt no stirring as he pass'd
 Adown the long descent ;
 He heard not his own footsteps on the rock
 That through the thick stagnation sent no sound.
 How sweet it were, he thought,
 To feel the flowing wind !
 With what a thirst of joy
 He should breathe in the open gales of heaven !

12.

Downward, and downward still, and still the way,
 The lengthening way is safe.
 Is there no secret wile,
 No lurking enemy ?
 His watchful eye is on the wall of rock, . .
 And warily he marks the roof,
 And warily surveys
 The path that lies before.
 Downward, and downward still, and still the way,
 The long, long way is safe ;
 Rock only, the same light,
 The same dead atmosphere,
 And solitude, and silence like the grave.

13.

At length the long descent
 Ends on a precipice ;
 No feeble ray enter'd its dreadful gulph ;
 For in the pit profound,
 Black Darkness, utter Night,
 Repell'd the hostile gleam,
 And o'er the surface the light atmosphere
 Floated, and mingled not.
 Above the depth, four over awning wings,
 Unplumed and huge and strong,
 Bore up a little car ;
 Four living pinions, headless, bodiless,
 Sprung from one stem that branch'd below
 In four down-arching limbs,
 And clench'd the car-rings endlong and athwart
 With claws of griffin grasp.

14.

But not on these, the depth so terrible,
 The wondrous wings, fix'd Thalaba his eye ;
 For there, upon the brink,
 With fiery fetters fasten'd to the rock,
 A man, a living man, tormented lay,
 The young Othatha ; in the arms of love
 He who had linger'd out the auspicious hour,
 Forgetful of his call :
 In shuddering pity, Thalaba exclaim'd,
 " Servant of God, can I not succour thee ? "
 He groan'd, and answered, " Son of Man,
 I sin'd, and am tormented ; I endure
 In patience and in hope.
 The hour that shall destroy the Race of Hell,
 That hour shall set me free."

15.

Is it not come?" quoth Thalaba,
 "Yea! by this omen!"... and with fearless hand
 He grasp'd the burning fetters, "In the name
 Of God!"... and from the rock
 Rooted the rivets, and adown the gulph
 Dropt them. The rush of flames roar'd up,
 For they had kindled in their fall
 The deadly vapours of the pit profound,
 And Thalaba bent on and look'd below.
 But vainly he explored
 The deep abyss of flame,
 That sunk beyond the plunge of mortal eye,
 Now all ablaze, as if infernal fires
 Illumed the world beneath.
 Soon was the poison-fuel spent,
 The flame grew pale and dim,
 And dimmer now it fades, and now is quench'd,
 And all again is dark,
 Save where the yellow air
 Enters a little in and mingles slow.

16.

Meantime, the freed Othatha clasp't his knees,
 And cried, "Deliverer!" struggling then
 With joyful hope, "and where is she," he cried,
 "Whose promised coming for so many a year..."
 "Go!" answered Thalaba,
 "She waits thee at the gates."
 "And in thy triumph," he replied,
 "There thou wilt join us?"... The Deliverer's eye
 Glanced on the abyss, way else was none...
 The depth was unascendable.
 "Await not me," he cried,
 "My path hath been appointed! go... embark!
 Return to life, ... live happy!"

OTHATHA.

But thy name?...

That through the nations we may blazon it, ...
 That we may bless thee!

THALABA.

Bless the Merciful!

17.

Then Thalaba pronounced the name of God,
 And leapt into the car.
 Down, down, it sunk, ... down, down, ...
 He neither breathes nor sees;
 His eyes are closed for giddiness,
 His breath is sinking with the fall.
 The air that yields beneath the car,

Inflates the wings above.

Down... down... a measureless depth!... down... down.
 Was then the Simorg with the Powers of ill
 Associate to destroy?
 And was that lovely Mariner
 A fiend as false as fair?
 For still the car sinks down;
 But ever the uprushing wind
 Inflates the wings above,
 And still the struggling wings
 Repel the rushing wind.
 Down... down... and now it strikes.

18.

He stands and totters giddily,
 All objects round awhile
 Float dizzy on his sight;
 Collected soon, he gazes for the way.
 There was a distant light that led his search;
 The torch a broader blaze,
 The unpruned taper flares a longer flame,
 But this was strong as is the noontide sun,
 So, in the glory of its rays intense,
 It quiver'd with green glow.
 Beyond was all unscen,
 No eye could penetrate
 That unendurable excess of light.

19.

It veil'd no friendly form, thought Thalaba:
 And wisely did he deem,
 For at the threshold of the rocky door,
 Hugest and fiercest of his kind accurst,
 Fit warden of the sorcery-gate,
 A rebel Afreet lay;¹
 He scented the approach of human food,
 And hungry hope kindled his eye of fire.
 Raising his hand to screen the dazzled sense,
 Onward held Thalaba,
 And lifted still at times a rapid glance;
 Till the due distance gain'd,
 With head abased, he laid
 An arrow in its rest.
 With steady effort and knit forehead then,
 Full on the painful light
 He fix'd his aching eye, and loosed the bow.

20.

A hideous yell ensued;
 And sure no human voice had scope or power
 For that prodigious shriek
 Whose pealing echoes thundered up the rock.
 Dim grew the dying light;

¹ One of these evil Genii is thus described in the Bahar Danush:—"On his entrance, he beheld a black demon heaped on the ground like a mountain, with two large horns upon his head, and a long proboscis, fast asleep. In his head the Divine Creator had joined the likenesses of the elephant and the wild bull. His teeth grew out as the tusks of a boar, and all over his monstrous carcass hung shaggy hairs, like those of the bear. The eye of mortal-born was dimmed at his appearance, and the mind, at his horrible form and frightful figure, was confounded.

"He was an Afreet, created from mouth to foot by the wrath of God.

"His hair like a bear's, his teeth like a boar's. No one ever beheld such a monster.

"Crook-backed and crabbed-faced; he might be scented at the distance of a thousand firsungs.

"His nostrils were like the ovens of brick-burners, and his mouth resembled the vat of the dyer.

"When his breath came forth, from its vehemence the dust rose up as in a whirlwind, so as to leave a chasm in the earth; and when he drew it in, chaff, sand, and pebbles, from the distance of some yards, were attracted to his nostrils."—Bahar Danush.

But Thalaba leapt onward to the doors
Now visible beyond,
And while the Afreet warden of the way
Was writhing with his death-pangs, over him
Sprung and smote the stony doors,
And bade them, in the name of God, give way !

21.

The dying Fiend beneath him, at that name
Tost in worse agony,
And the rocks shudder'd, and the rocky doors
Rent at the voice asunder. Lo ! within . .

The Teraph and the Fire,
And Khawla, and in mail complete
Mohareb for the strife.
But Thalaba, with numbing force,
Smites his raised arm, and rushes by ;
For now he sees the fire, amid whose flames,
On the white ashes of Hodeirah, lies
Hodeirah's holy sword.

22.

He rushes to the Fire :
Then Khawla met the youth,
And leapt upon him, and with clinging arms
Clasps him, and calls Mohareb now to arm
The effectual vengeance. O fool ! fool ! he sees
His Father's Sword, and who shall bar his way ?
Who stand against the fury of that arm
That spurns her to the ground ? . .
She rises half, she twists around his knees, . .
A moment . . and he vainly strives
To shake her from her hold ;
Impatient then he seized her leathery neck
With throttling grasp, and as she loosed her hold,
Thrust her aside, and unimpeded now
Springs forward to the Sword.

23.

The co-existent Flame
Knew the Destroyer ; it encircled him,
Roll'd up his robe, and gather'd round his head :
Condensing to intenser splendour there,
His Crown of Glory and his Light of Life,
Hover'd the irradiate wreath.

24.

The instant Thalaba had laid his hand
Upon his Father's Sword,
The Living Image in the inner cave
Smote the Round Altar. The Domdaniel rock'd
Through all its thundering vaults ;
Over the Surface of the reeling Earth,
The alarm shock was felt ;
The Sorcerer brood, all, all, where'er dispersed,
Perforce obey'd the summons ; all, . . they came Compell'd by Hell and Heaven ;
By Hell compell'd to keep Their baptism-covenant,
And with the union of their strength
Oppose the common danger ; forced by Heaven
To share the common doom.

25.

Vain are all spells ! the Destroyer
Treads the Domdaniel floor.

They crowd with human arms and human force
To crush the single foe.
Vain is all human force !

He wields his Father's Sword,
The vengeance of awaken'd Deity.
But chief on Thalaba Mohareb prest ;
The Witch in her oracular speech
Announced one fatal blow for both,
And, desperate of self-safety, yet he hoped
To serve the cause of Ebils, and uphold
His empire, true in death.

26.

Who shall withstand the Destroyer ?
Scatter'd before the sword of Thalaba
The Sorcerer throng recede,
And leave him space for combat. Wretched man, . . .
What shall the helmet or the shield avail
Against Almighty anger ? . . wretched man,
Too late Mohareb finds that he hath chosen
The evil part ! . . He rears his shield
To meet the Arabian's sword, . .
Under the edge of that fire-hardened steel,
The shield falls sever'd ; his cold arm
Rings with the jarring blow : . .
He lifts his scymetar ;
A second stroke, and lo ! the broken hilt
Hangs from his palsied hand :
And now he bleed's, and now he flies,
And fain would hide himself amid the troop ;
But they feel the sword of Hodeirah,
But they also fly from the ruin,
And hasten to the inner cave,
And fall all fearfully
Around the Giant Idol's feet,
Seeking protection from the Power they served.

27.

It was a Living Image, by the art
Of magic hands, of flesh and bones composed,
And human blood, through veins and arteries
That flow'd with vital action. In the shape
Of Ebils it was made ;
Its stature such, and such its strength,
As when among the sons of God
Pre-eminent he raised his radiant head,
Prince of the Morning. On his brow
A coronet of meteor flames,
Flowing in points of light.
Self-poised in air before him
Hung the Round Altar, rolling like the World
On its diurnal axis, like the World
Chequer'd with sea and shore,
The work of Demon art.
For where the sceptre in the Idol's hand
Touch'd the Round Altar, in its answering realm,
Earth felt the stroke, and Ocean rose in storms,
And shatter'd Cities, shaken from their seat,
Crush'd all their habitants,
His other arm was raised, and its spread palm
Sustain'd the ocean-weight,
Whose naked waters arch'd the sanctuary ;
Sole prop and pillar he.

28.

Fallen on the ground, around his feet,
The Sorcerers lay. Mohareb's quivering arms

Clung to the Idol's knees;
The Idol's face was pale,
And calm in terror he beheld
The approach of the Destroyer.

29.

Sure of his stroke, and therefore in pursuit
Following, nor blind, nor hasty, on his foe,
Moved the Destroyer. Okba met his way,
Of all that brotherhood
He only fearless, miserable man,
The one that had no hope
"On me, on me," the childless Sorcerer cried,
Let fall the weapon! I am he who stole
Upon the midnight of thy Father's tent;
This is the hand that pierced Hodeirah's heart,
That felt thy brethren's and thy sisters' blood
Gush round the dagger-hilt. Let fall on me
The fated sword! "the vengeance-hour is come!
Destroyer, do thy work!"

30.

Nor wife, nor weapon, had the desperate wretch;
He spread his bosom to the stroke
"Old Man, I strik thee not!" said Thalaba;
"The evil thou hast done to me and mine
Brought its own bitter punishment
For thy dear daughter's sake I pardon thee,
As I do hope Heaven's pardon. . . For her sake
Repent while time is yet! thou hast my prayers
To aid thee; thou poor sinner, cast thyself
Upon the goodness of offended God!"
I speak in Laila's name, and what if now
Thou canst not think to join in Paradise
Het spotless Spirit, . . hath not Allah made
Al-Araf, in his wisdom? where the sight
Of Heaven may kindle in the penitent
The strong and purifying fire of hope,
Till, at the Day of Judgement, he shall see
The Mercy-Gates unfold."

31.

The astonish'd man stood gazing as he spake,
At length his heart was soften'd, and the tears
Gush'd, and he sobb'd aloud.
Then suddenly was heard
The all-beholding Prophet's voice divine,
"Thou hast done well, my Servant!
Ask and receive thy reward!"

¹ Araf is a place between the Paradise and the Hell of the Mahomedans; some deem it a veil of separation, some a strong wall. Others hold it to be a Purgatory, in which those believers will remain, whose good and evil works have been so equal, that they were neither virtuous enough to enter Paradise, nor guilty enough to be condemned to the fire of Hell. From whence they see the glory of the blessed, and are near enough to congratulate them, but their ardent desire to partake the same happiness becomes a great pain.

32.

A deep and awful joy
Seem'd to dislodge the heart of Thalaba;
With arms in reverence cross'd upon his breast,
Upseeking eyes suffused with tears devout,
He answered to the Voice, "Prophet of God,
Holy, and good, and bountiful!
One only earthly wish have I, to work
Thy will; and thy protection grants me that.
Look on this Sorcerer! heavy are his crimes,
But infinite is mercy! If thy servant
Have now found favour in the sight of God,
Let him be touch'd with penitence, and save
His soul from utter death."

33.

"The groans of penitence," replied the Voice,
"Never arise unheard!
But, for thyself, prefer the prayer;
The Treasure-house of Heaven
Is open to thy will."

34.

"Prophet of God!" then answered Thalaba,
"I am alone on earth;
Thou knowest the secret wishes of my heart!
Do with me as thou wilt! thy will is best."

35.

There issued forth no Voice to answer him;
But, lo! Hodeirah's Spirit comes to see
His vengeance, and beside him, a purr form
Of rostrate light, his Angel mother hung
"My Child, my dear, my glorious, blessed Child,
My promise is perform'd . . fulfil thy work!"

36.

Thalaba knew that his death-hour was come;
And on he leapt, and springing up,
Into the Idol's heart
Hilt deep he plunged the sword
The Ocean-vault fell in, and all were crush'd.
In the same moment, at the gate
Of Paradise, Oneissa's Houris form
Welcomed her Husband to eternal bliss.

At length, at the day of Judgement, when all men, before they were judged, shall be cited to render homage to their Creator, those who are here confined shall prostrate themselves before the face of the Lord, in adoration; and by this act of religion, which shall be accounted a merit, the number of their good works will exceed their evil ones, and they will enter into glory.

Beadl says, that Araf appears a Hell to the happy, and a Paradise to the damned.—D'Herbelot.

MADOC.

"OMNE SOLUM FORTI PATRIA."

TO
CHARLES WATKIN WILLIAMS WYNN,

THIS POEM

WAS ORIGINALLY INSCRIBED, IN 1805,

AS A TOKEN OF SIXTEEN YEARS OF UNINTERRUPTED FRIENDSHIP;

AND IS NOW RE-INSCRIBED WITH THE SAME FEELING,

AFTER AN INTERVAL OF THIRTY-TWO.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION.

THE historical facts on which this Poem is founded may be related in a few words. On the death of Owen Gwyneth, king of North Wales, A.D. 1169, his children disputed the succession. Yorwerth, the elder, was set aside without a struggle, as being incapacitated by a blemish in his face. Hoel, though illegitimate, and born of an Irish mother, obtained possession of the throne for a while, till he was defeated and slain by David, the eldest son of the late king by a second wife. The conqueror, who then succeeded without opposition, slew Yorwerth, imprisoned Rodri, and hunted others of his brethren into exile. But Madoc, meantime, abandoned his barbarous country, and sailed away to the West in search of some better resting-place. The land which he discovered pleased him. he left there part of his people, and went back to Wales for a fresh supply of adventurers, with whom he again set sail, and was heard of no more. Strong evidence has been adduced that he reached America, and that his posterity exist there to this day, on the southern branches of the Missouri¹, retaining their complexion, their language, and, in some degree, their arts.

About the same time, the Aztecs, an American tribe, in consequence of certain calamities, and of a particular vision, forsook Aztlan, their own country, under the guidance of Yuhdithiton. They became a mighty people, and founded the Mexican empire, taking the name of Mexicans, in honour of Mexitli, their tutelary god. Their emigration is here connected with the adventures of Madoc, and their superstition is represented as the same which their descendants practised, when discovered by the Spaniards. The manners of the Poem, in both its parts, will be found historically true. It assumes not the degraded title of Epic; and the question, therefore, is not whether the story is formed upon the rules of Aristotle, but whether it be adapted to the purposes of poetry.

Kewick, 1805.

"Three things must be avoided in Poetry; the frivolous, the obscure, and the superfluous.

"The three excellencies of Poetry; simplicity of language, simplicity of subject, and simplicity of invention.

"The three indispensable purities of Poetry; pure truth, pure language, and pure manners.

"Three things should all Poetry be; thoroughly erudite, thoroughly animated, and thoroughly natural."—Tricks.

COME, LISTEN TO A TALE OF TIMES OF OLD!
COME, FOR YE KNOW ME. I AM HE WHO SANG
THE MAID OF ARC, AND I AM HE WHO FRAMED
OF THALARA THE WILD AND WONDROUS SONG.
COME, LISTEN TO MY LAY, AND YE SHALL HEAR
HOW MADOC FROM THE SHORES OF BRITAIN SPREAD
THE ADVENTUROUS SAIL, EXPLORED THE OCEAN PATHS, AND QUELLED BARBARIAN POWER, AND OVERTHREW
THE BLOODY ALTARS OF IDOLATRY,
AND PLANTED IN ITS FURNES TRIUMPHANT
THE CROSS OF CHRIST. COME, LISTEN TO MY LAY!

¹ That country has now been fully explored, and wherever Madoc may have settled, it is now certain that no Welsh

Indians are to be found upon any branches of the Missouri.

MADOC IN WALES.

PART I.

I.

THE RETURN TO WALES.

FAIR blows the wind, . . . the vessel drives along,
Her streamers fluttering at their length, her sails
All full, . . . she drives along, and round her prow
Scatters the ocean spray. What feelings then
Fill'd every bosom, when the mariners,
After the peril of that weary way,
Beheld their own dear country! Here stands one
Stretching his sight toward the distant shore,
And as to well-known forms his busy joy
Shapes the dim outline, eagerly he points
The fenced headland and the cape and bay,
Till his eyes ache o'erstraining. This man shakes
His comrade's hand and bids him welcome home,
And blesses God, and then he weeps aloud.
Here stands another, who in secret prayer
Calls on the Virgin and his patron Saint,
Renewing his old vows of gifts and alms
And pilgrimage, so he may find all well.
Silent and thoughtful and apart from all
Stood Madoc¹; now his noble enterprize
Proudly remembering, now in dreams of hope,
Anon of bodings full and doubt and fear.
Fair smiled the evening, and the favouring gale
Sung in the shrouds, and swift the steady bark
Rush'd roaring through the waves.

The sun goes down.
Far off his light is on the naked crags
Of Penmanmawr, and Arvon's ancient hills;
And the last glory lingers yet awhile,
Crowning old Snowdon's venerable head,
That rose amid his mountains. Now the ship
Drew nigh where Mona, the dark island², stretch'd
Her shore along the ocean's lighter line.
There through the mist and twilight, many a fire

¹ Long after these lines had been written, I was pleased at finding the same feeling expressed in a very singular specimen of metrical auto-biography.

"A Nao, despregando as velas
Ja se aproveita do vento;
E de evidente alegria
Os Portuguezes ja cheios
Sobre o convés estam todos;
Na terra se vam revendo
Igrejas, Palacios, Quintas,
De que tam conhecimento,
Daqui, dalli apontando
Vam ledamento co dedo.
Todos fallando demostram
Seus jubilos manifestos;
Mas o Vieira occupado
Vai de hum notavel silencio.
Seu excessivo alvoroço
Tumultuante, que dentro
No peito sente, lhe causa
De sobresalto os effeitos.

Up-flaming stream'd upon the level sea
Red lines of lengthening light, which, far away
Rising and falling, flash'd athwart the waves.
Therewith full many a thought of ill disturb'd
Prince Madoc's mind; . . . did some new conqueror seize
The throne of David? had the tyrant's guilt
Awaken'd vengeance to the deed of death?
Or blazed they for a brother's obsequies,
The sport and mirth of murder? . . . Like the lights
Which there upon Aberffraw's royal walls
Are waving with the wind, the painful doubt
Fluctuates within him . . . Onward drives the gale, . . .
On flies the bark, . . . and she hath reach'd at length
Her haven, safe from her unequal'd way!
And now, in louder and yet louder joy
(I amorous, the happy mariners all hail
Their native shore, and now they leap to land.

There stood an old man on the beach to wait
The comers from the ocean; and he ask'd,
Is it the Prince? And Madoc knew his voice,
And turn'd to him and fell upon his neck;
For it was Urien who had foster'd him,
Had loved him like a child; and Madoc loved,
Even as a father loved he that old man.
My Sister! quoth the Prince. . . Oh, she and I
Have wept together, Madoc, for thy loss, . . .
That long and cruel absence! . . . She and I,
Hour after hour and day by day, have look'd
Toward the waters, and with aching eyes
And aching heart, sat watching every sail.

And David and our brethren? cried the Prince,
As they mov'd on. . . But then old Urien's lips
Were slow at answer; and he spake, and paused
In the first breath of utterance, as to choose
Fit words for uttering some unhappy tale.
More blood, quoth Madoc, yet? Hath David's fear
Forced him to still more cruelty? Alas . . .
Woe for the house of Owen!

Evil stars,
Replied the old man, ruled o'er thy brethren's birth,
From Dolwyddelan driven, his peaceful home,
Poor Yorwydd sought the church's sanctuary;
The murderer follow'd, . . . Madoc, need I say

Quanto mais elle chegando
Vai ao suspirado termo,
Mais se lhe augmenta o gostoso
Susto no doce projecto. — Vieira Lusitano.

³ The palace of Gwynedd, or North Wales. Rhodri Mawr, about the year 873, fixed the seat of government here, which had formerly been at Dyganny, but latterly at Caer Arvon, near the present town of Caernarvon. "It is strange," says Warrington, "that he should desert a country where every mountain was a natural fortress, and in times of such difficulty and danger should make choice of a residence so exposed and defenceless." But this very danger may have been his motive. The Danes, who could make no impression upon England against the great Alfred, had turned their arms upon Wales; Mona was the part most open to their ravages, and it may have been an act as well of policy as of courage in the king to fix his abode there. He fell there, at length, in battle against the Saxons. A barn now stands upon the site of the palace, in which there are stones that, by their better workmanship, appear to have belonged to the original building.

Who sent the sword? . . . Llewelyn, his brave boy,
Where wanders he? In this his rightful realm,
Houseless and hunted; richly would the king
Gift the red hand that rid him of that fear!
Bird, an outlaw'd fugitive, as yet
Eludes his deadly purpose; Rodri lives,
A prisoner he, . . . I know not in what fit
Of natural mercy from the slaughter spared.
Oh, if my dear old master saw the wreck
And scattering of his house! . . . that princely race!
The beautiful band of brethren that they were!

Madoc made no reply, . . . he closed his eyes,
Groaning. But Urien, for his heart was full,
Loving to linger on the woe, pursued:
I did not think to live to such an hour
Of joy as this! and often, when my sight
Turn'd dizzy from the ocean, overcome
With heavy anguish, Madoc, I have prayed
That God would please to take me to his rest.

So as he ceased his speech, a sudden shout
Of popular joy awakened Madoc's ear;
And calling then to mind the festal fires,
He ask'd their import. The old man replied,
It is the giddy people merry-making
To welcome their new Queen; unheeding they
The shame and the reproach to the long line
Of our old royalty! . . . Thy brother weds
The Saxon's sister.

What! . . . in loud reply
Madoc exclaim'd, hath he forgotten all?
David! King Owen's son, . . . my father's son, . . .
He wed the Saxon, . . . the Plantagenet!¹

Quoth Urien, He so doats, as she had dropt
Some philtre in his cup, to lethargize
The British blood that came from Owen's veins.
Three days his halls have echoed to the song
Of joyance.

Shame! foul shame! that they should hear
Songs of such joyance! cried the indignant Prince:
Oh that my Father's hall, where I have heard
The songs of Corwen and of Keiriog's day,
Should echo this pollution! Will the chiefs
Brook this alliance, this unnatural tie?

There is no face but wears a courtly smile,
Urien replied: Aberfraw's ancient towers
Beheld no pride of festival like this,
No like solemnities, when Owen came
In conquest, and Gwalchmal struck the harp.
Only Goervyl, careless of the pomp,
Sits in her solitude, lamenting thee.

Saw ye not then my banner? quoth the Lord
Of Ocean; on the topmast-head it stood

¹ "It was the manner of those days, that the murderer only, and he that gave the death's wound, should fly, which was called in Welsh Llawruda, which is a red hand, because he had blooded his hands. The accessories and abettors to the murderers were never hearkened after." — Gwydir History.

² This marriage was in fact one of the means whereby Henry succeeded for a time in breaking the independent spirit of the Welsh. David immediately sent a thousand men

To tell the tale of triumph; . . . or did night
Hide the glad signal, and the joy hath yet
To reach her?

Now had they almost attain'd
The palace portal. Urien stopt and said,
The child should know your coming; it is long
Since she hath heard a voice that to her heart
Spake gladness; . . . none but I must tell her this.
So Urien sought Goervyl, whom he found
Alone and gazing on the moonlight sea.

Oh you are welcome, Urien! cried the maid
There was a ship came sailing hitherward . . .
I could not see his banner, for the night,
Closed in so fast around her; but my heart
Indulged a foolish hope!

The old man replied,
With difficult effort keeping his heart down,
God in his goodness may reserve for us
That blessing yet! I have yet life enow
To trust that I shall live to see the day,
Albeit the number of my years well nigh
Be full.

Ill-judging kindness! said the maid.
Have I not nursed for two long wretched years
That miserable hope, which every day
Grew weaker like a baby sick to death,
Yet dearer for its weakness day by day!
No, never shall we see his daring bark!
I knew and felt it in the evil hour
When forth she fared! I felt it then! that kiss
Was our death parting! . . . And she paused to curb
The agony: anon, . . . But thou hast been
To learn their tidings, Urien? . . . He replied,
In half-articulate words, . . . They said, my child,
That Madoc lived, . . . that soon he would be here.

She had received the shock of happiness:
Urien! she cried. . . thou art not mocking me!
Nothing the old man spake, but spread his arms
Sobbing aloud. Goervyl from their hold
Started, and sunk upon her brother's breast.

Recovering first, the aged Urien said,
Enough of this, . . . there will be time for this,
My children! better it behoves ye now
To seek the King. And, Madoc, I beseech thee,
Bear with thy brother! gently bear with him,
My gentle Prince! he is the headstrong slave
Of passions unsubdued³; he feels no tie
Of kindly love, or blood; . . . provoke him not,
Madoc! . . . It is his nature's malady.

Thou good old man! replied the Prince, be sure
I shall remember what to him is due,
What to myself; for I was in my youth
Wisely and well train'd up; nor yet hath time
Effaced the lore my foster-father taught.

to serve under his brother-in-law and liege lord in Normandy, and shortly after attended the parliament at Oxford upon his summons.

³ "Caradoc represents Davydd as a prince greatly disliked on account of his cruelty and untractable spirit, killing and putting out the eyes of those who were not subservient to his will, after the manner of the English!" — Cambrian Biography.

Haste, haste! exclaim'd Goervyl; . . . for her heart
Smote her in sudden terror at the thought
Of Yorwerth, and of Owen's broken house; . . .
I dread his dark suspicions!

Not for me
Suffer that fear, my sister! quoth the Prince.
Safe is the straight and open way I tread;
Nor hath God made the human heart so bad
That thou or I should have a danger there.
So saying, they toward the palace gate
Went on, ere yet Aberfraw had received
The tidings of her wanderer's glad return.

II.

THE MARRIAGE FEAST.

THE guests were seated at the festal board;¹
Green rushes strew'd the floor; high in the hall
Was David; Emma, in her bridal robe,
In youth, in beauty, by her husband's side
Sate at the marriage feast. The monarch raised
His eyes, he saw the mariner approach;
Madoc! he cried; strong nature's impulses
Prevail'd, and with a holy joy he met
His brother's warm embrace.

With that what pe is
Of exultation shook Aberfraw's tower!
How then re-echoing rang the home of Kings,
When from subdued Ocean, from the World
That he had first foreseen, he first had found,
Came her triumphant child! The mariners,
A happy band, enter the clamorous hall;

¹ The order of the royal hall was established by law.

"The men to whom the right of a seat in the hall belongs are fourteen, of whom four shall sit in the lower, and ten in the upper part of the hall. The king is the first, he shall sit at the pillar, and next him the chancellor; and after him the guest, and then the heir apparent, and then the master of the hawks. The foot-bearer shall sit by the dish opposite the king, and the mead-maker at the pillar behind him. The priest of the household shall be at another pillar, who shall bless the meat, and chaunt the pater noster. The crier shall strike the pillar above the king's head. Next him shall be the judge of the palace, and next to him the musician, to whom the right of the seat belongs. The smith of the palace shall be at the bottom before the knees of the priest. The master of the palace shall sit in the lower hall with his left hand towards the door, with the serving-men whom he shall chuse, and the rest shall be at the other side of the door, and at his other hand the musician of the household. The master of the horse shall sit at the pillar opposite the king, and the master of the bounds at the pillar opposite the priest of the household." — Laws of Hoel Dha.

² "1168. The king gathered another armie of chosen men, through all his dominions, as England, Normandy, Anjou, Gascoigne, and Gwyn, sending for succours from Flanders and Brytain, and then returned towards North Wales, minding utterlie to destroy all that had life in the land: and coming to Croes Oswalt, called Oswald's Tree, incamped there. On the contrarie side, Prince Owen and his brother Cadwallader, with all the power of North Wales; and the Lord Rees, with the power of South Wales; and Owen Cyvelloc and the sonnes of Madoc ap Meredyth, with the power of Powys, and the two sonnes of Madoc ap Ednerth, with the people betwixt Wye and Seavern, gathered themselves together and came to Corwen in Edeyrneon, proposing to defend their country. But the king understanding

Friend greets with friend, and all are friends; one joy
Fills with one common feeling every heart,
And strangers give and take the welcoming
Of hand and voice and eye. That boisterous joy
At length allay'd, the board was spread anew,
Anew the horn was brimm'd, the central hearth
Built up anew for later revelries.
Now to the ready feast! the seneschal
Duly below the pillars ranged the crew;
Toward the guest's most honourable seat
The King himself led his brave brother; . . . then,
Eyeing the lovely Saxon as he spake,
Here, Madoc, see thy sister! thou hast been Long absent, and our house hath felt the while Sad diminution; but my arm at last
Hath rooted out rebellion from the land;
And I have establish'd now our ancient house,
Grafting a scyon from the royal tree
Of England on the sceptre; so shall peace
Bless our dear country.

Long and happy years
Await my sovereigns! thus the Prince replied,
And long may our dear country rest in peace!
Enough of sorrow hath our royal house
Known in the field of battles, . . . yet we reap'd
The harvest of renown.

Ay, . . . many a day,
David replied, together have we led
The onset . . . Dost thou not remember, brother,
How in that hot and unexpected charge
On Keiriog's bank, we gave the enemy
Their welcoming?

And Berwyn's after-strife!²

that they were nigh, being wonderfull desirous of battell, came to the river Ceireoc, and caused the woods to be hewn down. Whereupon a number of the Welshmen understanding the passage, unknown to their captains, met with the king's ward, where were placed the picked men of all the armie, and there began a hote skirmish, where diverse worthie men were slaine on either side; but in the end the king wanne the passage, and came to the mountain of Berwyn, where he laid in campe certayne days, and so both the armies stood in awe of each other; for the king kept the open plains, and was afraid to be intrapp'd in straits; but the Welshmen watched for the advantage of the place, and kept the king so straitlie, that neither forage nor victuall might come to his camp, neither durst anie soldour stir abroad. And to augment their miseries there fell such raine, that the king's men could scant stand upon their feete upon those slipperie hilles. In the end, the king was compelled to return home without his purpose, and that with great loss of men and munition, besides his charges. Therefore in a great choler he caused the pledges eles, whom he had received long before that, to be put out; which were Rees and Cawdwalhon the sonnes of Owen, and Cynwric and Meredith the sonnes of Rees, and other." — Powell.

During the military expedition which King Henry II. made in our days against South Wales, an old Welshman at Pen-cadulr, who had faithfully adhered to him, being desired to give an opinion about the royal army, and whether he thought that of the rebels would make resistance, and what would be the final event of this war, replied: — "This Nation, O king, may now, as in former time, be harassed, and in a great measure weakened and destroyed by you and other powers, and it will often prevail by its laudable exertions; but it can never be totally subdued through wrath of man, unless the wrath of God shall concur. Nor do I think, that any other nation than this of Wales, or any other

Quoth Madoc, as the memory kindled him :
The fool that day, who in his masque attire
Sported before King Henry¹, wished in vain
Fittler habiliments of javelin-proof!
And yet not more precipitate that fool
Dropt his mock weapons, than the archers cast
Desperate their bows and quivers-full away,
When we leapt on, and in the mire and blood
Trampled their banner !

That, exclaimed the king,
That was a day indeed, which I may still Proudly remember, proved as I have been
In conflicts of such perilous assay,
That Saxon combat seem'd like woman's war.
When with the traitor Hoel I did wage
The deadly battle, then was I in truth
Put to the proof; no vantage-ground was there,
Nor famine, nor disease, nor storms to aid,
But equal, hard, close battle, man to man,
Briton to Briton. By my soul, pursued
The tyrant, heedless how from Madoc's eye
Flash'd the quick wrath like lightning, though I knew
The rebel's worth², his prowess then excited
Unwelcome wonder; even at the last,
When stiff with toil and faint with wounds, he raised
Feebly his broken sword, . . .

Then Madoc's grief
Found utterance; Wherefore, David, dost thou rouse
The memory now of that unhappy day,
That thou should'st wish to hide from earth and heaven?
Not in Aberffraw, . . . not to me this tale!
Tell it the Saxon! . . . he will join thy triumph, . .
He hates the race of Owen! . . . but I loved
My brother Hoel, . . . loved him? . . . that ye knew!
I was to him the dearest of his kin,
And he my own heart's brother.

David's cheek
Grew pale and dark; he bent his broad black brow
Full upon Madoc's glowing countenance;
Art thou return'd to brave me? to my teeth
To praise the rebel bastard? to insult
The royal Saxon, my affianced friend?

language whatever, may hereafter come to pass, shall in the day of severe examination before the Supreme Judge answer for this corner of the earth." — Hoare's Geraldus.

¹ "Briestone in Dorsetshire was held in grand serjeantry by a pretty odd jocular tenure; viz. by finding a man to go before the king's army for forty days, when he should make war in Scotland. (some records say in Wales), bareheaded and barefooted, in his shirt and linen drawers, holding in one hand a bow without a string, in another an arrow without feathers." — Gibson's Camdenn.

² There is a good testimony to Hoel's military talents in the old history of Cambria, by Powell. "At this time Cadell, Meredyth, and Rees, the sons of Gruffyth ap Rees, ap
Theodor, did lead their powers against the castle of Gwys; which, after they saw they could not win, they sent for Howel the sonne of Owen, prince of North Wales, to their succour, who for his prowess in the field, and his discretion in consultation, was counted the flower of chivalrie; whose presence also was thought only sufficient to overthrow anle hold."

³ Of this name Saxon, which the Welsh still use, Higden gives an odd etymology. "Men of that countree ben more lyghter and stronger on the see than other scommers or theeves of the see, and pursue theyr enemies full harde, both by water and by londe, and ben called Saxones, of Saxum, that is, a stone, for they ben as hard as stones, and uneasy to fare with." — Polychronicon, l. 26.

I hate the Saxon!⁵ Madoc cried; not yet
Have I forgotten, how from Keirlog's shame
Flying, the coward wreak'd his cruelty
On our poor brethren! . . . David, seest thou never Those eyeless spectres by thy bridal bed?⁴
Forget that horror? . . . may the fire of God
Blast my right hand, or ever it be link'd
With that accursed Plantagenet's!

The while,
Impatience struggled in the heaving breast
Of David; every agitated limb
Shook with ungovernable wrath; the page,
Who chafed his feet⁵, in fear suspends his task;
In fear the guests gaze on him silently;
His eyeballs flash'd, strong anger choked his voice,
He started up. . . Him Emma, by the hand
Gently retaining, held, with gentle words
Calming his rage. Goervyl too in tears
Besought her generous brother: he had met
Emma's reproaching glance, and self-reproved
While the warm blood flush'd deeper o'er his cheek,
Thus he replied; I pray you pardon me,
My Sister-Queen! nay, you will learn to love
This high affection for the race of Owen,
Yourself the daughter of his royal house
By better ties than blood.

Grateful the Queen
Replied, by winning smile and eloquent eye
Thanking the gentle Prince: a moment's pause
Ensued; Goervyl then with timely speech
Thus to the wanderer of the waters spake:
Madoc, thou hast not told us of the world
Beyond the ocean and the paths of man.
A lovely land it needs must be, my brother,
Or sure you had not sojourn'd there so long,
Of me forgetful, and my heavy hours
Of grief and solitude and wretched hope.
Where is Cadwallon? for one bark alone
I saw come sailing here.

The tale you ask
Is long, Goervyl, said the mariner,
And I in truth am weary. Many moons

⁴ Henry in his attempt upon Wales, 1165, "did justice on the sons of Rhys, and also on the sons and daughters of other noblemen that were his accomplices, very rigorously; causing the eyes of the young striplings to be pecked out of their heads, and their noses to be cut off or alt; and the eares of the young gentlewomen to be stuffed. But yet I find in other authors that in this journey King Henry did not greatly prevail against his enemies, but rather lost many of his men of war, both horsemen and footmen; for by his severe proceeding against them, he rather made them more eager to seek revenge, than quieted them in any tumult." — Holinshed. Among these unhappy hostages were some sons of Owen Gwynedd.

⁵ "The foot-bearer shall hold the feet of the king in his lap from the time when he reclines* at the board till he goes to rest, and he shall chafe them with a towel; and during all that time he shall watch that no hurt happen to the king.
He shall eat of the same dish from which the king takes his meat, having his back turned toward the fire. He shall light the first candle before the king at his meal." — Laws of Howel Dda."

* Accubavit is the word in Wotton's version. It is evident that the king must have lain at his meal, after the Roman fashion, or this pedlar could not have chafed his feet.

Have wax'd and waned, since from that distant world,
The country of my dreams and hope and faith,
We spread the homeward sail : a goodly world,
My Sister! thou wilt see its goodness,
And greet Cadwallon there.... But this shall be
To-morrow's tale; . . . indulge we now the feast! . .
You know not with what joy we mariners
Behold a sight like this.

Smiling he spake,
And turning, from the sewer's hand he took
The flowing mead. David, the while, relieved
From rising jealousies, with better eye
Regards his venturous brother. Let the Bard,
Exclaim'd the king, give his accustom'd lay;
For sweet, I know, to Marloc is the song
He loved in earlier years.

Then, strong of voice,
The officer proclaim'd the sovereign will,¹
Bidding the hall be silent; loud he spake,
And smote the sounding pillar with his wand,
And hush'd the banqueters. The chief of Bards
Then raised the ancient lay.²

Then, Lord! he sung,

¹ The crier to command silence was one of the royal household; first he performed this service by his voice, then by striking with the rod of his office the pillars above the king's head. A fine was due to him for every disturbance in the court.

² The lines which follow represent the Bardic system, as laid down in the following Triads of Bardism:—

"12. There are three Circles of Existence; the Circle of Infinity, where there is nothing but God, of living or dead, and none but God can traverse it; the Circle of Inchoation, where all things are by Nature derived from Death, . . . this Circle hath been traversed by man; and the Circle of Happiness, where all things spring from Life, . . . this man shall traverse in Heaven.

"13. Animated Beings have three States of Existence: that of Inchoation in the Great Deep, or Lowest point of Existence; that of Liberty in the State of Humanity; and that of Love, which is Happiness in Heaven.

"14. All animated Beings are subject to three Necessities; beginning in the Great Deep; Progression in the Circle of Inchoation; and Plenitude in the Circle of Happiness. Without these things nothing can possibly exist but God.

"15. Three things are necessary in the Circle of Inchoation; the least of all animation, and thence Beginning; the materials of all things, and thence Increase, which cannot take place in any other state; the formation of all things out of the dead mass, and thence Discriminate Individuality.

"16. Three things cannot but exist towards all animated Beings from the nature of Divine Justice: Co-sufferance in the Circle of Inchoation, because without that none could attain to the perfect knowledge of any thing: Co-participation in the Divine love; and Co-ultimity from the nature of God's Power, and its attributes of Justice and Mercy.

"17. There are three necessary occasions of Inchoation: to collect the materials and properties of every nature; to collect the knowledge of every thing; and to collect power towards subduing the Adverse and the Devastative, and for the divestation of Evil. Without this traversing every mode of animated existence, no state of animation, or of any thing in nature, can attain to Plenitude."

³ "By the knowledge of three things will all Evil and Death be diminished and subdued; their nature, their cause, and their operation. This knowledge will be obtained in the Circle of Happiness."—Triads of Bardism, Tr. 35.

⁴ Angau, the Welsh word for Death, signifies Enlargement.

O Father! Thee, whose wisdom, Thee, whose power,
Whose love, . . . all love, all power, all wisdom, Thou!
Tongue cannot utter, nor can heart conceive.
He in the lowest depth of Being framed
The imperishable mind; in every change,
Through the great circle of progressive life,
He guides and guards, till evil shall be known,
And being known as evil, cease to be;³
And the pure soul, emancipate by Death,
The Enlarger⁴, shall attain its end predestin'd,
The eternal newness of eternal joy.⁵

He left this lofty theme; he struck the harp
To Owen's praise⁶, swift in the course of wrath,
Father of Heroes. That proud day he sung,
When from green Erin came the insulting host,
Lochlin's long burthens of the flood, and they
Who left their distant homes in evil hour,
The death-doom'd Normen. There was heaviest toll,
There deeper tumult, where the dragon race
Of Mona trampled down the humbled head
Of haughty power; the sword of slaughter carved
Food for the yellow-footed fowl of heaven,

⁵ Nefoedd, the Welsh word for Heaven, signifies Renovation.

"The three Excellencies of changing the mode of Existence in the Circle of Happiness:—Acquisition of Knowledge; beautiful Variety; and Repose, from not being able to endure uniform Infinity and uninterrupted Eternity.

"Three things none but God can do: endure the Eternities of the Circle of Infinity; participate of every state of Existence without changing; and reform and renovate every thing without the loss of it.

"The three Plenitudes of Happiness:—Participation of every nature, with a plenitude of One predominant; conformity to every cast of genius and character, possessing superior excellence in One; the Love of all Beings and Existences, but chiefly concentrated in one object, which is God; and in the predominant One of each of these will the Plenitude of Happiness consist."—Triads of Bardism, 40, 38, 45.

⁶ "I will extol the generous Hero, descended from the race of Roderic, the bulwark of his country, a Prince eminent for his good qualities, the glory of Britain: Owen, the brave and expert in arms, that neither hoardeth nor coveteth riches.

"Three fleets arrived, vessels of the main, three powerful fleets of the first rate, furiously to attack him on the sudden: one from Iwerddon⁷, the other full of well-armed Lochlynians, making a grand appearance on the floods, the third from the transmarine Normans, which was attended with an immense though successful toil.

"The dragons of Mona's sons were so brave in action, that there was a great tumult on their furious attack; and before the prince himself there was vast confusion, havoc, conflict, honourable death, bloody battle, horrible consternation, and upon Tal Mavra, a thousand banners: there was an outrageous carnage, and the rage of spears and hasty signs of violent indignation. Blood raised the tide of the Menai, and the crimson of human gore stained the brine. There were glittering cuirasses, and the agony of gashing wounds, and the mangled warriors prostrate before the chief, distinguished by his crimson lance. Loegria was put into confusion; the contest and confusion was great, and the glory of our Prince's wide-wasting sword shall be celebrated in an hundred languages to give him his merited praise."—Panegyric upon Owen Gwynedd, Prince of North Wales, by Gwalchmai the son of Meir, in the year 1187.—Evans's Specimens of Welsh Poetry.

* Ireland.

And Menai's waters, burst with plunge on plunge,
Curling above their banks with tempest-swell'
Their bloody billows heaved.

The long-past days
Came on the mind of Madoc, as he heard
That song of triumph; on his sun-burnt brow
Sate exultation: . . . other thoughts arose,
As on the fate of all his gallant house
Mournful he mused; oppressive memory swell'd
His bosom, over his fix'd eye-balls swam
The tear's dim lustre, and the loud-toned harp
Rung on his ear in vain; . . . its silence first
Roused him from dreams of days that were no more.

III.

CADWALLON.

THEN on the morrow, at the festal board,
The Lord of Ocean thus began his tale.

My heart beat high when with the favouring wind
We sail'd away; Aberfraw! when thy towers,
And the huge headland of my mother isle,
Shrunk and were gone.

But, Madoc, I would learn,
Quoth David, how this enterprize arose,
And the wild hope of worlds beyond the sea;
For at thine outset being in the war,
I did not hear from vague and common fame
The moving cause. Sprung it from bardic lore,
The hidden wisdom of the years of old,
Forgotten long? or did it visit thee
In dreams that come from Heaven?

The Prince replied,
Thou shalt hear all; . . . but if, amid the tale,
Strictly sincere, I haply should rehearse
Aught to the King ungrateful, let my brother
Be patient with the involuntary fault.

I was the guest of Rhys at Dinevawr,¹
And there the tidings found me, that our sire
Was gather'd to his fathers: . . . not alone
The sorrow came; the same ill messenger
Told of the strife that shook our royal house,
When Hoel, proud of prowess, seized the throne²
Which you, for elder claim and lawful birth,
Challenged in arms. With all a brother's love,
I on the instant hurried to prevent
The impious battle: . . . all the day I sped;
Night did not stay me on my eager way . . .
Where'er I pass'd, new rumour raised new fear . . .
Midnight, and morn, and noon, I hurried on,
And the late eve was darkening when I reach'd
Arvon, the fatal field. . . The sight, the sounds,
Live in my memory now, . . . for all was done!
For horse and horseman side by side in death,
Lay on the bloody plain; . . . a host of men,
And not one living soul, . . . and not one sound,

One human sound; . . . only the raven's wing,
Which rose before my coming, and the neigh
Of wounded horses, wandering o'er the plain.

Night now was coming on; a man approach'd
And bade me to his dwelling nigh at hand.
Thither I turn'd, too weak to travel more;
For I was overspent with weariness,
And having now no hope to bear me up,
Trouble and bodily labour master'd me.
I ask'd him of the battle: . . . who had fallen
He knew not, nor to whom the lot of war
Had given my father's sceptre. Here, said he,
I came to seek if haply I might find
Some wounded wretch, abandon'd else to death.
My search was vain, the sword of civil war
Had bit too deeply.

Soon we reach'd his home,
A lone and lowly dwelling in the hills,
By a grey mountain stream. Beside the hearth
There sate an old blind man; his head was raised
As he were listening to the coming sounds,
And in the fire-light shone his silver locks.
Father, said he who guided me, I bring
A guest to our poor hospitality;
And then he brought me water from the brook,
And homely fare, and I was satisfied:
That done, he piled the hearth, and spread around
The rushes of repose. I laid me down;
But worn with toil, and full of many fears,
Sleep did not visit me: the quiet sounds
Of nature troubled my distemper'd sense;
My ear was busy with the stirring gale,
The moving leaves, the brook's perpetual flow.

So on the morrow languidly I rose,
And faint with fever: but a restless wish
Was working in me, and I said, My host,
Wilt thou go with me to the battle-field,
That I may search the slain? for in the fray
My brethren fought; and though with all my speed
I strove to reach them ere the strife began,
Alas, I sped too slow!

Grievest thou for that?
He answer'd, grievest thou that thou art spared
The shame and guilt of that unhappy strife,
Briton with Briton in unnatural war?
Nay, I replied, mistake me not! I came
To reconcile the chiefs; they might have heard
Their brother's voice.

Their brother's voice? said he,
Was it not so? . . . And thou, too, art the son
Of Owen! . . . Yesternight I did not know
The cause there is to pity thee. Alas,
Two brethren thou wilt lose when one shall fall! . . .
Lament not him whom death may save from guilt;
For all too surely in the conqueror
Thou wilt find one whom his own fears henceforth
Must make to all his kin a perilous foe.

¹ Dinas Vawr, the Great Palace, the residence of the Princes of Deheubarth, or South Wales. This also was erected by Rhodri Mawr.

² I have taken some liberties here with the history. Hoel kept possession of the throne nearly two years; he then went to Ireland to claim the property of his mother Pyvog. the daughter of an Irish chieftain; in the mean time David seized the government. Hoel raised all the force he could to recover the crown, but after a severe conflict was wounded and defeated. He returned to Ireland with the remains of his army, which probably consisted chiefly of Irishmen, and there died of his wounds.—Cambrian Biography.

I felt as though he wrong'd my father's sons,
And rais'd an angry eye, and answer'd him, . . .
My brethren love me.

Then the old man cried,
Oh what is Princes' love? what are the ties
Of blood, the affections growing as we grow,
If but ambition come? . . . Thou deemest sure
Thy brethren love thee; . . . ye have play'd together
In childhood, shared your riper hopes and fears,
Fought side by side in battle: . . . they may be Brave, generous, all that once their father was,
Whom ye, I ween, call virtuous.

At the name,
With pious warmth I cried, Yes, he was good,
And great, and glorious! Gwyneth's ancient annals
Boast not a name more noble. In the war
Fearless he was, . . . the Saxon found him so;
Wise was his counsel, and no suppliant
For justice ever from his palace-gate.
Unrighted turn'd away. King Owen's name
Shall live to after times without a blot!

There were two brethren once of kingly line,
The old man replied; they loved each other well,
And when the one was at his dying hour,
It then was comfort to him that he left
So dear a brother, who would duly pay
A father's duties to his orphan boy.
And sure he loved the orphan, and the boy
With all a child's sincerity loved him,
And learnt to call him father: so the years
Went on, till when the orphan gain'd the age
Of manhood, to the throne his uncle came.
The young man claim'd a fair inheritance,
His father's lands; and . . . mark what follows, Prince!
At midnight he was seized, and to his eyes
The brazen plate was held. . . He cried aloud,
He look'd around for help, . . . he only saw
His Uncle's ministers, prepared to do
Their wicked work, who to the red hot brass
Forced his poor eyes, and held the open lids.
Till the long agony consumed the sense;
And when their hold relax'd, it had been worth
The wealth of worlds if he could then have seen,
Dreadful to him and hideous as they were,
Their ruffian faces! . . . I am blind, young Prince,
And I can tell how sweet a thing it is
To see the blessed light!

Must more be told?
What farther agonies he yet endured?
Or hast thou known the consummated crime,
And heard Cynetha's fate?

A painful glow
Inflamed my cheek, and for my father's crime
I felt the shame of guilt. The dark-brow'd man
Beheld the burning flush, the uneasy eye,
That knew not where to rest. Come! we will search
The slain; arising from his seat, he said.
I follow'd; to the field of fight we went,

¹ The history of Cynetha and his brothers is very honestly related in the Pentarchia.

"Cadwallionis erat primævus jure Cynetha;
Proh pudor! hunc oculis patruus privavit
Testiculisque simul, fundum dum raptat avitum;

And over steeds and arms and men we held
Our way in silence. Here it was, quoth he,
The fiercest war was waged; lo! in what heaps Man upon man fell slaughter'd! Then my heart
Smote me, and my knees shook; for I beheld
Where, on his conquer'd foemen, Hoel lay.

He paused, his heart was full, and on his tongue
The imperfect utterance died; a general gloom
Sadden'd the hall, and David's cheek grew pale.
Commanding first his feelings, Madoc broke
The oppressive silence.

Then Cadwallion took
My hand, and, pointing to his dwelling, cried,
Prince, go and rest thee there, for thou hast need
Of rest; . . . the care of sepulture be mine.
Nor did I then comply, refusing rest,
Till I had seen in holy ground inearth'd
My poor lost brother. Wherefore, he exclaim'd,
(And I was awed by his severer eye)
Wouldst thou be pampering thy distempered mind?
Affliction is not sent in vain, young man,
From that good God, who chastens whom he loves.
Oh! there is healing in the bitter cup!
Go yonder, and before the unerring will Bow, and have comfort! To the hut I went,
And there beside the lonely mountain-stream,
I veil'd my head, and brooded on the past.

He tarried long; I felt the hours pass by,
As in a dream of morning, when the mind,
Half to reality awaken'd, blends
With airy visions and vague phantasies
Her dim perception; till at length his step
Aroused me, and he came. I question'd him
Where is the body? hast thou bade the priests
Perform due masses for his soul's repose?

He answer'd me, The rain and dew of heaven
Will fall upon the turf that covers him,
And greener grass will flourish on his grave.
But rouse thee, Prince! there will be hours enough
For mournful memory; . . . it befits thee now
Take counsel for thyself: . . . the son of Owen
Lives not in safety here.

I bow'd my head
Opprest by heavy thoughts: all wretchedness
The present; darkness on the future lay;
Fearful and gloomy both. I answer'd not.

Hath power seduced thy wishes? he pursued,
And wouldst thou seize upon thy father's throne?
Now God forbid! quoth I. Now God forbid!
Quoth he; . . . but thou art dangerous, Prince! and what Shall shield thee from the jealous arm of power?
Think of Cynetha! . . . the unsleeping eye
Of justice hath not closed upon his wrongs;
At length the avenging arm is gone abroad,
One woe is past, . . . woe after woe comes on, . . .

Houel ab irato suspensus rege Johanne,
Et Leolinus, eum privarunt lumine fratres."

This curious summary of Welsh history still remains unprinted.

There is no safety here, . . here thou must be
The victim or the murderer! Does thy heart
Shrink from the alternative? . . look round! . . behold
What shelter, . . whither wouldst thou fly for peace?
What if the asylum of the Church were safe, . .
Were there no better purposes ordain'd
For that young arm, that heart of noble hopes?
Son of our kings, . . of old Cassibelan,
Great Caratach, immortal Arthur's line,
Oh, shall the blood of that heroic race
Stagnate in cloister-sloth? . . Or wouldst thou leave
Thy native isle, and beg in awkward phrase
Some foreign sovereign's charitable grace, . .
The Saxon or the Frank, . . and earn his gold,
The hireling in a war whose cause thou know'st not,
Whose end concerns not thee?

I sat and gazed,
Following his eye with wonder, as he paced
Before me to and fro, and listening still,
Though now he paced in silence. But anon,
The old man's voice and step, awakened us,
Each from his thought; I will come out, said he,
That I may sit beside the brook, and feel
The comfortable sun. As forth he came,
I could not choose but look upon his face:
Gently on him had gentle nature laid
The weight of years; all passions that disturb
Were pass'd away; the stronger lines of grief
Softened and settled, till they told of grief
By patient hope and piety subdued:
His eyes, which had their hue and brightness left,
Fix'd lifelessly, or objectless they roll'd,
Nor moved by sense, nor animate with thought.
On a smooth stone beside the stream he took
His wonted seat in the sunshine. Thou hast lost
A brother, Prince, he said . . or the dull ear
Of age deceived me. Peace be with his soul!
And may the curse that lies upon the house
Of Owen turn away! Wilt thou come hither,
And let me feel thy face? . . I wondered at him:
Yet while his hand perused my lineaments
Deep awe and reverence fill'd me. O my God,
Bless this young man! he cried; a perilous state
Is his; . . but let not thou his father's sins
Be visited on him!

I raised my eyes
Enquiring, to Cadwallon; Nay, young Prince,
Despise not thou the blind man's prayer! he cried;
It might have given thy father's dying hour
A hope, that sure he needed . . for, know thou,
It is the victim of thy father's crime,
Who asks a blessing on thee!

At his feet
I fell, and clasp'd his knees: he raised me up; . .
Blind as I was, a mutilated wretch,
A thing that nature owns not, I survived,
Loathing existence, and with impious voice
Accused the will of heaven, and gron'd for death.
Years pass'd away; this universal blank
Became familiar, and my soul repos'd

On God, and I had comfort in my prayers.
But there were blessings for me yet in store
Thy father knew not, when his bloody fear
All hope of an avenger had cut off;
How there existed then an unborn babe,
Child of my lawless love. Year after year
I lived a lonely and forgotten wretch,
Before Cadwallon knew his father's fate,
Long years and years before I knew my son;
For never, till his mother's dying hour,
Learnt he his dangerous birth. He sought me then;
He woke my soul once more to human ties; . .
I hope he hath not wean'd my heart from heaven,
Life is so precious now! . . .

Dear good old man!
And lives he still? Gocrvyl ask'd, in tears;
Madoc replied, I scarce can hope to find
A father's welcome at my distant home.
I left him full of days, and ripe for death;
And the last prayer Cynetha breathed upon me
Went like a death-bed blessing to my heart!

When evening came, toward the echoing shore
I and Cadwallon walk'd together forth:
Bright with dilated glory shone the west;
But brighter lay the ocean-flood below,
The burnish'd silver sea, that heaved and flash'd
Its restless rays, intolera'bly bright.
Prince, quoth Cadwallon, thou hast rode the waves
In triumph, when the invaders felt thine arm.
Oh what a nobler conquest might be won,
There, . . upon that wide field! . . What meanest thou?
I cried. . . That yonder waters are not spread
A boundless waste, a bourne impassable! . .
That man should rule the Elements! . . that there
Might manly courage, manly wisdom find
Some happy isle, some undiscovered shore,
Some resting place for peace. . . Oh that my soul
Could seize the wings of Morning! soon would I
Behold that other world, where yonder sun
Speeds now, to dawn in glory!

As he spake
Conviction came upon my startled mind,
Like lightning on the midnight traveller.
I caught his hand; . . Kinsman and guide and friend
Yea, let us go together! . . Down we sat,
Full of the vision on the echoing shore;
One only object fill'd ear, eye, and thought:
We gaz'd upon the awful world of waves,
And talk'd and dreamt of years that were to come.

IV.

THE VOYAGE.

Nor with a heart unmoved I left thy shores,
Dear native isle! oh . . not without a pang,
As thy fair uplands lessen'd on the view,²
Cast back the long involuntary look!
The morning cheer'd our outset; gentle airs

¹ "Finitum cuique rei magnitudinem natura dederat, dedit et modum: nihil infinitum est nisi Oceanus. Fertiles in Oceano jacere terras, utraque Oceanum rursus alia littora, aliunde nasci orbem, nec usquam naturam rerum desinere, sed semper inde ubi desilisse videatur, novam exsurgere; facile ista finguntur, quia Oceanus navigari non potest." — Ann. Seneca. Suasoria, l.

² "Two of the names of Britain were derived from its hills. Clas Merddin, the high lands in the sea, and Clas Meiddin, the hilly lands or fields." — E. Williams's Poems.

Curl'd the blue deep, and bright the summer sun
Play'd o'er the summer ocean, when our barks
Began their way.

And they were gallant barks,
As ever through the raging billows rode;
And many a tempest's buffeting they bore.
Their sails all swelling with the eastern breeze,
Their tighten'd cordage clattering to the mast,
Steady they rode the main: the gale aloft
Sung in the shrouds, the sparkling waters hiss'd
Before, and froth'd and whiten'd far behind.
Day after day, with one auspicious wind,
Right to the setting sun we held our course.
My hope had kindled every heart; they blest
The unvarying breeze, whose unabating strength
Still sped us onward; and they said that Heaven
Favour'd the bold empirze.

How many a time,
Mounting the mast-tower-top, with eager ken
They gazed, and fancied in the distant sky
Their promised shore, beneath the evening cloud,
Or seen, low lying, through the haze of morn.¹
I too with eyes as anxious watch'd the waves,
Though patient, and prepared for long delay;
For not on wild adventure had I rush'd
With giddy speed, in some delirious fit
Of fancy; but in many a tranquil hour
Weigh'd well the attempt, till hope matured to faith.
Day after day, day after day the same. . .
A weary waste of waters! still the breeze
Hung heavy in our sails, and we held on
One even course: a second week was gone,
And now another past, and still the same,
Waves beyond waves, the interminable sea!
What marvel, if at length the mariners
Grew sick with long expectance? I beheld
Dark looks of growing restlessness, I heard
Distrust's low murmurings; nor avail'd it long
To see and not perceive. Shame had awhile
Represt their fear, till like a smother'd fire
It burst, and spread with quick contagion round,
And strengthen'd as it spread. They spake in tones
Which might not be mistaken; . . . They had done
What men dared do, ventured where never keel
Had cut the deep before: still all was sea,
The same unbounded ocean! . . . to proceed
Were tempting heaven.

I heard with feign'd surprise,
And, pointing then to where our fellow bark,
Gay with her fluttering streamers and full sails,
Rode, as in triumph, o'er the element,
I ask'd them what their comrades there would deem
Of those so bold ashore, who, when a day,
Perchance an hour might crown their glorious toll,
Shrunk then, and coward-like return'd to meet
Mockery and shame? True, they had ventured on
In seas unknown, beyond where ever man
Had plough'd the billows yet: more reason so
Why they should now, like him whose happy speed
Well nigh hath run the race, with higher hope

Press onward to the prize. But late they said,
Marking the favour of the steady gale,
That Heaven was with us; Heaven vouchsafed us still Fair seas and favouring skies: nor need we pray
For other aid, the rest was in ourselves;
Nature had given it, when she gave to man
Courage and constancy.

They answer'd not,
Awhile obedient; but I saw with dread
The silent sullenness of cold assent.
Then, with what fearful eagerness I gazed
At earliest daybreak, o'er the distant deep!
How sick at heart with hope, when evening closed,
Gazed through the gathering shadows! . . . but I saw
The sun still sink below the endless waves,
And still at morn, beneath the farthest sky,
Unbounded ocean heaved. Day after day
Before the steady gale we drove along, . . .
Day after day! The fourth week now had pass'd;
Still all around was sea, . . . the eternal sea!
So long that we had voyaged on so fast,
And still at morning where we were at night,
And where we were at morn, at nightfall still,
The centre of that drear circumference,
Progressive, yet no change! . . . almost it seem'd
That we had pass'd the mortal bounds of space,
And speed was tolling in infinity.²
My days were days of fear, my hours of rest
Were like a tyrant's slumber. Sullen looks,
Eyes turn'd on me, and whispers meant to meet
My ear, and loud despondency, and talk
Of home, now never to be seen again, . . .
I suffer'd these, dissembling as I could,
Till that avail'd no longer. Resolute
The men came round me: They had shown enough
Of courage now, enough of constancy;
Still to pursue the desperate enterprize
Were impious madness! they had deem'd, indeed,
That Heaven in favour gave the unchanging gale; . . .
More reason now to think offended God,
When man's presumptuous folly strove to pass
The fated limits of the world, had sent
His winds, to waft us to the death we sought.
Their lives were dear, they bade me know, and they
Many, and I, the obstinate, but one.
With that, attending no reply, they hail'd
Our fellow bark, and told their fix'd resolve.
A shout of joy approved. Thus, desperate now,
I sought my solitary cabin: there
Confused with vague tumultuous feelings lay,
And to remembrance and reflection lost,
Knew only I was wretched.

Thus entranced
Cadwallon found me; shame, and grief, and pride,
And baffled hope, and fruitless anger swell'd
Within me. All is over! I exclaim'd;
Yet not in me, my friend, hath time produced
These tardy doubts and shameful fickleness;
I have not fail'd, Cadwallon! Nay, he said, very boisterous. "On the second evening the King began to get anxious and restless, fearing (says Mr. Williams), that we had missed the island, and were sailing 'i te tareva kaua,' into wide gaping space."—Missionary Enterprises in the South Sea Islands, 163.

² "When Makea, the king of Barotonga, who had never before been from his own island, made a voyage with Mr. Williams the Missionary, in a vessel named the Messenger of Peace, which Mr. Williams had built, they were three days and nights in returning, the wind being unfavourable and

The coward fears which persecuted me
Have shown what thou hast suffer'd. We have yet
One hope . . . I pray'd them to proceed a day, . . .
But one day more ; . . this little have I gain'd,
And here will wait the issue ; in yon bark
I am not dead, . . they are masters there.

One only day ! . . The gale blew strong, the bark
Sped through the waters ; but the silent hours,
Who make no pause, went by ; and center'd still,
We saw the dreary vacancy of heaven
Close round our narrow view, when that brief term,
The last poor respite of our hopes expired.
They shorten'd sail, and call'd with coward prayer
For homeward winds. Why, what poor slaves are we,
In bitterness I cried ; the sport of chance ;
Left to the mercy of the elements,
Or the more wayward will of such as these,
Blind tools and victims of their destiny !
Yen, Madoc ! he replied, the Elements
Master indeed the feeble powers of man !
Not to the shores of Cambria wilt thy ship
Win back their shameful way ! . . Or He, whose will Unchains the winds, hath bade them minister
To aid us, when all human hope was gone,
Or we shall soon eternally repose
From life's long voyage.

As he spake, I saw
The clouds hang thick and heavy o'er the deep,
And heavily, upon the long slow swell,
The vessel labour'd on the labouring sea.
The reef-points rattled on the shivering sail ;
At fits the sudden gust howl'd ominous,
Anon with unremitting fury raged ;
High roll'd the mighty billows, and the blast
Swept from their sheeted sides the showery foam.
Vain now were all the seamen's homeward hopes,
Vain all their skill ! . . we drove before the storm.

'Tis pleasant, by the cheerful hearth, to hear
Of tempests and the dangers of the deep,
And pause at times, and feel that we are safe ;

¹ The saint to whom sailors address themselves. The St. Elmo of the Welsh.

"It was usual for all, even females, who went from North Wales in pilgrimage to St. David's, to pass the dangerous straits and sail over the rough bays in slight coracles, without any one to guide or assist them ; so firmly were they convinced that that Saint and St. Cyric, the ruler of the waves, would protect them."—*E. Then listen to the perilous tale again,
And with an eager and suspended soul,
Woo terror to delight us . . . But to hear

O God, this is indeed a dreadful thing !
And he who hath endured the horror once
Of such an hour, doth never hear the storm
Howl round his home, but he remembers it,
And thinks upon the suffering mariner.

Onward we drove : with unbating force
The tempest raged ; night added to the storm
New horrors, and the morn arose o'erspread
With heavier clouds. The weary mariners
Call'd on Saint Cyric's aid¹ ; and I too placed
My hope on Heaven, relaxing not the while

"Stat immotum mare, et quasi deficientis in suo fine

Three dreadful nights and days we drove along;
The fourth the welcome rain came rattling down,
The wind had fallen, and through the broken cloud
Appeared the bright dilating blue of heaven.
Embolden'd now, I call'd the mariners : . .
Vain were it should we bend a homeward course,
Driven by the storm so far; they saw our barks,
For service of that long and perilous way
Disabled, and our food belike to fail.
Silent they heard, reluctant in assent;
Anon, they shouted joyfully, . . I look'd
And saw a bird slow sailing overhead,
His long white pinions by the sunbeam edged
As though with burnish'd silver; . . never yet
Heard I so sweet a music as his cry!

Yet three days more, and hope more eager now,
Sure of the signs of land, . . weed-shoals, and birds
Who flock'd the main, and gentle airs which breathed,
Or seem'd to breathe, fresh fragrance from the shore,¹

On the last evening, a long shadowy line
Skirted the sea; . . how fast the night closed in!
I stood upon the deck, and watch'd till dawn.
But who can tell what feelings fill'd my heart,
When like a cloud the distant land arose
Grey from the ocean, . . when we left the ship,
And cleft, with rapid oars, the shallow wave,
And stood triumphant on another world!

V.

LINCOYA.

Manoc had paused awhile; but every eye
Still watch'd his lips, and every voice was hush'd.
Soon as I leapt ashore, pursues the Lord
Of Ocean, prostrate on my face I fell,
Kiss'd the dear earth, and pray'd with thankful tears.
Hard by a brook was flowing; . . never yet,
Even from the gold-tipt horn of victory
With harp and song amid my father's hall,
Pledged I so sweet a draught, as lying there.
Beside that streamlet's brink! . . to feel the ground,
To quaff the cool clear water, to inhale
The breeze of land, while fears and dangers past
Recurr'd and heighten'd joy, as summer storms
Make the fresh evening lovelier!

To the shore

The natives throng'd; astonish'd, they beheld
Our winged barks, and gazed with wonderment
On the strange garb, the bearded countenance
And the white skin, in all unlike themselves.
I see with what enquiring eyes you ask
What men were they? Of dark-brown colour, tinged

With sunny redness; wild of eye; their brows
So smooth, as never yet anxiety
Nor busy thought had made a furrow there;
Beardless, and each to each of lineaments
So like, they seem'd but one great family.
Their loins were loosely clutched, all beside Bare to the sun and wind; and thus their limbs
Unmanacled display'd the truest forms
Of strength and beauty. Fearless sure they were,
And while they eyed us grasp'd their spears, as if,
Like Britain's injured but unconquer'd sons,
They too had known how perilous it was
To let a stranger, if he came in arms,
Set foot upon their land.

But soon the guise

Of men nor purporting nor fearing ill,
Gain'd confidence; their wild distrustful looks
Assumed a milder meaning; over one
I cast my mantle, on another's head
The velvet bonnet placed, and all was joy.
We now besought for food; at once they read
Our gestures, but I cast a hopeless eye
On hills and thickets, woods, and marshy plains,
A waste of rank luxuriance all around.
Thus musing to a lake I follow'd them,
Left when the rivers to their summer course
Withdrew; they scatter'd on its water drugs
Of such strange potency, that soon the shoals
Coop'd there by Nature prodigally kind,
Floated inebriate. As I gazed, a deer
Sprung from the bordering thicket; the true shaft
Scarcely with the distant victim's blood had stain'd
Its point, when instantly he dropt and died,
Such deadly juice imbued it; yet on this
We made our meal unharm'd; and I perceived
The wisest leech that ever in our world
Cull'd herbs of hidden virtue, was to these
A child in knowledge.

Sorrowing we beheld

The night come on; but soon did night display
More wonders than it veil'd: innumerable tribes
From the wood-cover swarm'd, and darkness made
Their beauties visible; one while they stream'd
A bright blue radiance upon flowers which closed
Their gorgeous colours from the eye of day;
Now motionless and dark eluded search,
Self-shrouded; and anon starring the sky
Rose like a shower of fire.

Our friendly hosts

Now led us to the hut, our that night's home,
A rude and spacious dwelling: twisted boughs,
And canes and withies formed the walls and roof;
And from the unhewn trunks which pillar'd it,
Low nets of interwoven reeds were hung;²
With shouts of honour here they gather'd round me,

*naturæ pigra moles; novæ ac terribiles figuræ; magna etiam
Oceano portenta, quæ profunda ista vastitas nutrit; confusa lux altâ caligine, et intercepta tenebris dies; ipsum vero grave et devium mare, et aut nulla, aut ignota sidera.* — *An.
Seneca. Suasoria, l.*

¹ "Our first notice of the approach of land was the fragrant and aromatic smell of the continent of South America, or of the islands in its vicinity, which we sensibly perceived as a squall came from that quarter." — M^r Kinnear's Tour through the British West Indies.

Dogs always are sensible when land is near, before it can be seen.

² "And for as much as I have made mention of their houses, it shall not be greatly from my purpose to describe in what manner they are builded: they are made round, like bells or round pavilions. Their frame is raised of exceeding high trees, set close together, and fast rampired in the ground, so standing aslope, and bending inward, that the toppes of the trees joyne together, and bear one against another, having also within the house certain strong and short

Ungarmented my limbs, and in a net
With softest feathers lined, a pleasant couch,
They laid and left me.

To our ships return'd,
After soft sojourn here we coasted on,
Insatiate of the wonders and the charms
Of earth and air and sea. Thy summer woods
Are lovely, O my mother isle! the birch
Light bending on thy banks, thy elmy vales,
Thy venerable oaks! . . . But there, what forms
Of beauty clothed the inlands and the shore!
All these in stateliest growth, and mixt with these Dark spreading cedar, and the cypress tall,
Its poluted summit waving to the wind
Like a long beacon flame; and loveliest
Amid a thousand strange and lovely shapes,
The lofty palm, that with its nuts supplied
Beverage and food; they edged the shore and crown'd
The far-off highland summits, their straight stems
Bare without leaf or bough, erect and smooth,
Their tresses nodding like a crested helm,
The plumage of the grove.

Will ye believe
The wonders of the ocean? how its shoals
Sprang from the wave¹, like flashing light, . . . took wing,

And twinkling with a silver glitterance,
Flew through the air and sun-shine? yet were these
To sight less wondrous than the tribe who swam,
Following like fowls with uplifted eye
Their falling quarry: . . . language cannot paint
Their splendid tints²; though in blue ocean seen,
Blue, darkly, deeply, beautifully blue, propped or posts, which susteyne the trees from falling. They cover them with the leaves of date trees and other trees strongly compact and hardened, wherewith they make them close from wind and weather. At the short posts or proppes, within the house, they tie ropes of the cotton of gossampine trees, or other ropes made of certain long and tough roots, much like unto the shrubbe called Spartum, whereof in old time they used to make bands for vines, and gables and ropes for shippes. These they tie overthwart the house from post to post; on these they lay as if were certain mattresses made of the cotton of gossampine trees, which grow plentifully in these islands. This cotton the Spanyards call Algodon, and the Italians Bombasine, and thus they sleepe in hanging beddes." — Pietro Martire.

¹ I have somewhere seen an anecdote of a sailor's mother, who believed all the strange lies which he told her for his amusement, but never could be persuaded to believe there could be in existence such a thing as a flying fish. A Spanish author, who wrote before the voyage of Columbus, describes these fish as having been seen on the coast of Flanders. "Hay alli unos pescados que vuelan sobre el agua; algunos dellos atravessaban volando por encima de las galeras, e aun algunos dellos caian dentro." — Coronica de D. Péro Nino.

A still earlier author mentions such a sight in the Straits as a miracle. "As they sailed from Algeziras, a fish came flying through the air, and fell upon the deck of the Infante's Galley, with which they had some fresh food that day; and because I, who wrote this history, have never heard or seen of any like thing, I here recount it, because it appears to me a thing marvellous, and in my judgement out of the course of nature." — Gomes Eannes.

"At Barbadoes the negroes, after the example of the Charrabos tako the flying fish very successfully in the dark; they spread their nets before a light, and disturb the water at a small distance; the fish, rising eagerly, fly towards the light,

In all its rich variety of shades,
Suffused with glowing gold.

Heaven too had there
Its wonders: . . . from a deep, black, heavy cloud,
What shall I say? . . . a shoot, . . . a trunk, . . . an arm
Came down: . . . yea! like a Demon's arm, it seized
The waters, Ocean smoked beneath its touch,
And rose like dust before the whirlwind's force.
But we sail'd onward over tranquil seas,
Wafted by airs so exquisitely mild,
That even to breathe became an act of will
And sense and pleasure. Not a cloud by day
With purple islanded the dark-blue deep;
By night the quiet billows darkened and glanced
Under the moon, . . . that heavenly Moon! so bright,
That many a midnight have I paced the deck,
Forgetful of the hours of due repose;
Yea till the Sun in his full majesty
Went forth, like God beholding his own works.

Once when a chief was feasting us on shore,
A captive served the food: I mark'd the youth,
For he had features of a gentler race;
And oftentimes his eye was fix'd on me,
With looks of more than wonder. We return'd
At evening to our ships, at night a voice
Came from the sea, the intelligible voice
Of earnest supplication; he had swum
To trust our mercy; up the side he sprang,
And look'd among the crew, and signaling me
Fell at my feet. Such friendly tokenings
As our short commerce with the native tribes
Had taught, I proffer'd, and sincerity

and are intercepted by the nets." — M'Kinnen. — These flying fishes, says the writer of Sir Thomas Roe's Voyage, are like men professing two trades, and thrive at neither.

² Atkins, with some feeling, describes the Dolphin as a glorious-coloured fish. A laboured description of its beauty would not have conveyed so lively a sense of admiration. He adds, quite as naturally, that it is of dry taste, but makes good broth. — Voyage to Guinea in his Majesty's Ships the Swallow and Weymouth.

Herbert has given this fish a very extraordinary character, upon the authority of the ancients.

"The Dolphin is no bigger than a salmon, it glitters in the ocean with a variety of beautiful colours; has few scales; from its swiftness and spirit metonymically signified the Prince and Arrow of the sea; celebrated by many learned Pens in sundry Epithets; Philanthropoi, for affecting men, and Monogamoi, for their turtle constancy; generated they be of sperme, nourish like men, imbrace, join, and go 10 months great. 'In faciem versi dulces celebrant hymenæos Delphines, simulæ hominis complexibus hærent.' A careful husband over his gravid associate, detesting incest, abhorring bigamy, tenderly affecting Parents, whom, when 300 years old, they feed and defend against hungry fishes; and when dead (to avoid the Shark and like marine Tyrants) carry them ashore, and there (if Aristotle, Ælian, and Pliny, erre not) inhumate and bedew their Sepulchres; they were glad of our company, as it were affecting the sight and society of men, many hundred miles in an eager and unwearied pursuit, frisking about us; and as a Poet observed,

"Undique dant saltus, multaque aspergine rorant
Emerguntque iterum, redeuntque sub æquora rursum,
Inque chori ludunt speciem lascivæ jactant
Corpora, et acceptum patulis mare naribus efflant."

Herbert's Travels.

Gave force and meaning to the half-learn't forms.
For one we needed who might speak for us ;
And well I liked the youth, — the open lines
Which character'd his face, the fearless heart,
Which gave at once and won full confidence.
So that night at my feet Lincoya slept.

When I display'd whate'er might gratify,
Whate'er surprise, with most delight he view'd
Our arms, the iron helm, the pliant mail,
The buckler strong to save ; and then he shook
The lance, and grasp'd the sword, and turn'd to me
With vehement words and gestures, every limb
Working with one strong passion ; and he placed
The falchion in my hand, and gave the shield,
And pointed south and west, that I should go
To conquer and protect ; anon he wept
Aloud, and clasp'd my knees, and falling faint
He would have kiss'd my feet. Went we to shore ?
Then would he labour restlessly to show
A better place lay onward ; and in the sand,
To south and west he drew the line of coast,
And figured how a mighty river there
Ran to the sea. The land bent westward soon,
And thus confirm'd we veyaged on to seek
The river inlet, following at the will
Of our new friend : and we learnt after him,
Well pleased and proud to teach, what this was call'd
What that, with no unprofitable pains.
Nor light the joy I felt at hearing first
The pleasant accents of my native tongue,
Albeit in broken words and tones uncouth,
Come from these foreign lips.

At length we came
Where the great river, amid shoals and banks
And islands, growth of its own gathering spoils,
Through many a branching channel, wide and full,
Rush'd to the main. The gale was strong ; and safe,
Amid the uproar of conflicting tides,
Our gallant vessels rode. A stream as broad
And turbid, when it leaves the Land of Hills,
Old Severn rolls ; but banks so fair as these Old Severn views not in his Land of Hills,
Nor even where his turbid waters swell
And sully the salt sea.

So we sail'd on
By shores now cover'd with impervious woods,
Now stretching wide and low, a reedy waste,
And now through vales where earth profusely pour'd
Her treasures, gather'd from the first of days.
Sometimes a savage tribe would welcome us,
By wonder from their lethargy of life
Awaken'd ; then again we voyaged on Through tracts all desolate, for days and days,
League after league, one green and fertile mead,

¹ " There is in every village of the Susquannah Indians, a vacant dwelling called the Stranger's House. When a traveller arrives within hearing of a village, he stops and hallooos, for it is deemed uncivil to enter abruptly. Two old men lead him to the house, and then go round to the inhabitants, telling them a stranger is arrived fatigued and hungry. They send them all they can spare, bring tobacco after they are refreshed, and then ask questions whence they come and whither they go." — Franklin.

² " They are easily persuaded that the God that made Englishmen is a greater God than theirs, because he hath so

That fed a thousand herds.

A different scene
Rose on our view, of mount on mountain piled,
Which when I see again in memory,
Star-gazing Idris's stupendous seat
Seems dwarf'd, and Snowdon with its eagle haunts
Shrinks, and is dwindled like a Saxon hill.

Here with Cadwallon and a chosen band,
I left the ships. Lincoya guided us
A toilsome way among the heights ; at dusk
We reach'd the village skirts ; he bade us halt,
And raised his voice ; the elders of the land
Came forth, and led us to an ample hut,
Which in the centre of their dwellings stood,
The Stranger's House.¹ They eyed us wondering,
Yet not for wonder ceased they to observe
Their hospitable rites ; from but to but
The tidings ran that strangers were arrived,
Fatigued and hungry and athirst ; anon,
Each from his means supplying us, came food
And beverage such as cheers the weary man.

VI. ERILLYAB.

At morning their high-priest Ayayaca
Came with our guide : the venerable man
With reverential awe accosted us,
For we, he ween'd, were children of a race
Mightier than they, and wiser, and by heaven
Beloved and favour'd more : he came to give
Fit welcome, and he led us to the Queen.
The fate of war had reft of her realm ;
Yet with affection and habitual awe,
And old remembrances, which gave their love
A deeper and religious character,
Fallen as she was, and humbled as they were,
Her faithful people still in all they could Obey'd Erillyab. She too in her mind
Those recollections cherish'd, and such thoughts
As, though no hope allay'd their bitterness,
Gave to her eye a spirit and a strength,
And pride to features which belike had borne,
Had they been fashion'd by a happier fate,
Meaning more gentle and more womanly,
Yet not more worthy of esteem and love.
She sat upon the threshold of her hut ;
For in the palace where her sires had reign'd
The conqueror dwelt. Her son was at her side,
A boy now near to manhood ; by the door,
Bare of its bark, the head and branches shorn,
Stood a young tree with many a weapon hung,
Her husband's war-pole², and his monument.

richly endowed the English above themselves. But when they hear that about 1600 years ago England and the inhabitants thereof were like unto themselves, and since have received from God clothes, books, &c. they are greatly affected with a secret hope concerning themselves." — A Key into the Language of America, by Roger Williams, 1643.

³ " The war-pole is a small peeled tree painted red, the top and boughs cut off short. It is fixed in the ground opposite the door of the dead warrior, and all his implements of war are hung on the short boughs of it till they rot." — Adair.

This author, who knew the manners of the North American

There had his quiver moulder'd, his stone-axe
Had there grown green with moss, his bow-string
there
Sung as it cut the wind.

She welcom'd us
With a proud sorrow in her mien; fresh fruits
Were spread before us, and her gestures said
'That when he lived whose hand was wont to wield
Those weapons, . . . that in better days, . . . that ere
She let the tresses of her widowhood
Grow wild, she could have given to guests like us
A worthier welcome. Soon a man approach'd,
Hooded with sable, his half-naked limbs
Smear'd black; the people at his sight drew round,
The women wail'd and wept, the children turn'd
And hid their faces on their mothers' knees.
He to the Queen address his speech, then look'd
Around the children, and laid hands on two,
Of different sexes but of age alike
Some six years each, who at his touch shriek'd out.
But then Lincoya rose, and to my feet
Led them, and told me that the conquerors claim'd
These innocents for tribute; that the Priest
Would lay them on the altar of his god,
Pluck out their little hearts in sacrifice,
And with his brotherhood in impious rites
Feast on their flesh! . . . I shudder'd, and my hand
Instinctively unsheathed the avenging sword,
As he with passionate and eloquent signs,
Eye-speaking earnestness and quivering lips,
Besought me to preserve himself, and those
Who now fell suppliant round me, . . . youths and maids,
Grey-headed men, and mothers with their babes.

I caught the little victims up. I kiss'd
Their innocent cheeks, I raised my eyes to heaven,
I call'd upon Almighty God to hear
And bless the vow I made; in our own tongue
Was that sworn promise of protection pledged . . .
Impetuous feeling made no pause for thought.
Heaven heard the vow; the suppliant multitude
Saw what was stirring in my heart; the Priest,
With eye inflamed and rapid answer, raised
His menacing hand; the tone, the bitter smile,
Interpreting his threat.

Meanwhile the Queen,
With watchful eye and steady countenance,
Had listen'd; now she rose and to the Priest
Address'd her speech. Low was her voice and calm,
As one who spake with effort to subdue
Sorrow that struggled still; but while she spake
Her features kindled to more majestic,

Indians well, though he formed a most wild theory to account for them, describes the rites of mourning. "The widow, through the long term of her weals, is compelled to refrain from all public company and diversions, at the penalty of an adulteress, and likewise to go with flowing hair, without the privilege of oil to anoint it. The nearest kinsmen of the deceased husband keep a very watchful eye over her conduct in this respect. The place of interment is also calculated to wake the widow's grief, for he is entombed in the house under her bed; and if he was a war-leader, she is obliged, for the first moon, to sit in the day-time under his mourning war-pole, which is decked with all his martial trophies, and must be heard to cry with bewailing notes. But none of them are

Her eye became more animate, her voice
Rose to the height of feeling; on her son
She call'd, and from her husband's monument
His battle-axe she took; and I could see,
That when she gave the boy his father's arms,
She call'd his father's spirit to look on
And bless them to his vengeance.

Silently
The tribe stood listening as Erillyab spake.
The very Priest was awed: once he essayed
To answer; his tongue fail'd him, and his lip
Grew pale and fell. He to his countrymen
Of rage and shame and wonder full, return'd,
Bearing no victims for their shrines accurst,
But tidings that the Hoamen had cast off
Their vassalage, roused to desperate revolt
By men in hue and speech and garment strange,
Who in their folly dared defy the power
Of Aztlan.

When the King of Aztlan heard
The unlook'd-for tale, ere yet he roused his strength,
Or pitying our rash valour, or perhaps
Curious to see the man so bravely rash,
He sent to bid me to his court. Surprised,
I should have given to him no credulous faith,
But fearlessly Erillyab bade me trust
Her honourable foe. Unarm'd I went,
Lincoya with me to exchange our speech
So as he could, of safety first assured;
For to their devilish idols he had been
A victim doom'd, and from the bloody rites
Flying been carried captive far away.

From early morning till the midnoon hour
We travell'd in the mountains; then a plain
Open'd below, and rose upon the sight,
Like boundless ocean from a hill-top seen.
A beautiful and populous plain it was;
Fair woods were there and fertilizing streams,
And pastures spreading wide, and villages
In fruitful groves embower'd, and stately towns,
And many a single dwelling specking it,
As though for many a year the land had been
The land of peace. Below us, where the base
Of the great mountain to the level sloped,
A broad blue lake extended far and wide
Its waters, dark beneath the light of noon.
There Aztlan stood upon the farther shore:
Amid the shade of trees its dwellings rose,
Their level roofs with turrets set around,
And battlements all burnish'd white, which shone
Like silver in the sunshine.¹ I beheld fond of that month's supposed religious duty, it chills, or sweats and wastes them so exceedingly, for they are allowed no shade or shelter."

¹ "So dazzlingly white were the houses at Zempoalla, that one of the Spaniards galloped back to Cortes to tell him the walls were of silver." — Bernal Diaz, 30.

Torquemada also says, "that the temple and palace courts at Mexico were so highly polished, that they actually shone like burnished gold or silver in the sun." — et. i. p. 251.

I have described Aztlan like the cities which the Spaniards found in New Spain. How large and how magnificent they were may be learnt from the True History of the Conquest of Mexico, by Bernal Diaz. This delightful work has been

The imperial city, her far-circling walls,
Her garden groves and stately palaces,
Her temple's mountain-size, her thousand roofs;
And when I saw her might and majesty
My mind misgave me then.

We reach'd the shore :

A floating islet waited for me there,¹
The beautiful work of man. I set my feet
Upon green-growing herbs and flowers, and sate
Embower'd in odorous shrubs: four long light boats
Yoked to the garden, with accordant song,
And dip and dash of oar in harmony,
Bore me across the lake.

Then in a car

Aloft by human bearers was I borne;
And through the city gate, and through long lines
Of marshal'd multitudes who throng'd the way,
We reach'd the palace court. Four priests were there;
Each held a burning censer in his hand,²
And strew'd the precious gum as I drew nigh,
And held the steaming fragrance forth to me,
Honouring me like a god. They led me in,
Where on his throne the royal Azteca Coanocotzin sate. Stranger, said he, abridged into English by Mr. Keating; and if the reader has not seen it, he may thank me for recommending it to his notice.

Gomara's description of Zempoallan will show, that cities as splendid in their appearance as Aztlan did exist among the native Americans.

"They doctored Zempoallan, which stode a myle distant from them, all beset with fayre Orchardes and Gardens, verye pleassante to beholde: they used alwayes to water them with sluices when they pleased. There proceeded out of the Towne many persons to behold and receyve so strange a people unto them. They came with smiling countenance, and presented unto them divers kinde of floures and sundry fruites which none of our meyne had heretofore seene. These people came without feare among the ordinance; with this pompe, triumphe, and joy, they were received into the Citie, which seemed a beautifull Garden: for the trees were so greene and high that scarcely the houses appeared.

"Sixe horsemen, which hadde gone before the army to discover, returned backe as Cortez was entering into the Citie, saying, that they had seene a great house and court, and that the walles were garnished with silver. Cortez commanded them to proceed on, willing them not to show any token of wonder of any thing that they should see. All the streets were replenished with people, whiche stode gaping and wondering at the horses and straungers. And passing through a great market-place, they saw, on their right hand, a great walled house made of lyme and stone, with loupe holes and towers, whited with playster that shined lyke silver, being so well burnished and the sunne glistering upon it, and that was the thing that the Spaniards thought had bene walles of silver. I doe believe that with the imagination and great desire which they had of golde and silver, all that shined they deemed to be of the same metall."—Conquest of the West India.

Cortez himself says of Cholula, that he counted above four hundred temple towers in that city; and the city of Iztapalapa, he says, contained from 12,000 to 15,000 inhabitants.—Carta de Relacion, 16. 20.

¹ "Islets of this kind, with dwelling huts upon them, were common upon the Lake of Mexico. They were moved at pleasure from bay to bay, as the inhabitants wanted sunshine or shelter."—Clavigero.

² "Tjandilli," says the old translator of Gomara, "according to their usance, did his reverence to the Capitaine, burning

Welcome; and be this coming to thy weal!
A desperate warfare doth thy courage court;
But thou shalt see the people and the power
Whom thy deluded zeal would call to arms;
So may the knowledge make thee timely wise.
The vallant love the vallant... Come with me!
So saying he rose; we went together forth
To the Great Temple.³ 'Twas a huge square hill,
Or rather like a rock it seem'd, hewn out
And squared by patient labour. Never yet
Did our forefathers, o'er beloved chief
Fallen in his glory, heap a monument
Of that prodigious bulk, though every shield
Was laden for his grave, and every hand
Toil'd unremitting at the willing work
From morn till eve, all the long summer day.

The ascent was lengthened with provoking art,
By steps which led but to a wearying path
Round the whole structure; then another flight,
Another road around, and thus a third,
And yet a fourth, before we reach'd the height.
Lo, now, Coanocotzin cried, thou seest
The cities of this widely peopled plain;

frankincense, and little straws touched in bloud of his own bodie. And at Chiauiztlan, the Lord took a little chafyn-dish in his hande, and east into it a certaine gum, whyche savoured in sweete smel much like unto frankincense; and with a censer he smoked Cortez, with the ceremonye they use in their salutations to their Gods and nobilitie. So also the Tlascallan Embassadors burnt copal before Cortez, having thrice made obeisance, and they touched the ground with their hands, and kissed the earth.

"The nexte day in the morning, the Spaniards came to Chololla, and there came out near ten thousand Indians to receyve him, with their Captaynes, in good order. Many of them presented unto him bread, foules, and roses: and every Captayne as he approached, welcomed Cortez, and then stood aside, that the rest, in order, might come unto him; and when he came entering into the citie, all the other citizens receyved him, marvelling to see such men and horses.

"After all this came out all the religious meyne, as Priests and Ministers to the idols, who were many and straunge to behold, and all were clothed in white, lyke unto surplices, and hemmed with common thredde; some brought instruments of musick like unto Cornettes, others brought instruments made of bones; others an instrument like a ketel covered with skin; some brought chafyn-dishes of coals, with perfumes; others brought idols covered; and, finally, they all came singing in their language, which was a terrible noyse, and drew neere Cortez and his company, singing them with sweete smelles in their sensers. With this pompe of solemnitie, which truly was great, they brought him unto the citie."—Conquest of the West India.

Gage's account of Mexico is copied verbatim from this old translation, even, in some places, to the literal error of using the hard c instead of x, which the g with the cedilla represents.

³ "The great Cu of Mexico, for thus these mounds were called, had 114 steps to the summit: that of Texcuco, 115; of Cholula, 120. Gold and Jewels, and the different seeds of the country, and human blood, were thrown in the foundations. The Spaniards found great treasures when they levelled the Cu at Mexico, to make room for a church to Santiago."—Bernal Diaz.

The lines which follow describe its structure, as related by Clavigero and by the Spanish Conquerors. The Tower of Babel is usually painted with the same kind of circuitous ascent.

And wert thou on yon farthest temple-top,
Yet as far onward wouldst thou see the land
Well husbanded like this, and full of men.
They tell me that two floating palaces
Brought thee and all thy people; . . . when I sound
The Tambour of the God¹, ten Cities hear
Its voice², and answer to the call in arms.

In truth I felt my weakness, and the view
Had wakened no unreasonable fear,
But that a nearer sight had stirr'd my blood;
For on the summit where we stood four Towers
Were piled with human skulls³, and all around
Long files of human heads were strung to parch
And whiten in the sun. What then I felt
Was more than natural courage . . . 'twas a trust
In more than mortal strength . . . a faith in God, . . .
Yea, inspiration from Him! . . . I exclaim'd,
Not though ten Cities ten times told obey'd
The King of Aztlan's bidding, should I fear
The power of man!

Art thou then more than man?
He answered; and I saw his tawny cheek
Lose its life-colour as the fear arose;
Nor did I undecieve him from that fear,
For sooth I knew not how to answer him,
And therefore let it work. No not a word
Spake he, till we again had reach'd the court,
And I too went in silent thoughtfulness:
But then when, save Lincoya, there was none
To hear our speech, again did he renew
The query . . . Stranger! art thou more than man,
That thou shouldst set the power of man at naught?

Then I replied, Two floating Palaces
Bore me and all my people o'er the seas.
When we departed from our mother-land,
The Moon was newly born; we saw her wax
And wane, and witnessed her new birth again;
And all that while, alike by day and night,
We travell'd through the sea, and caught the winds,

¹ Gumilla (c. 36.) describes a prodigious drum used as a signal to assemble the people in time of danger, by some of the Orinoco tribes, especially by the Caverres, to whom the invention is ascribed. It is a hollowed piece of wood, in thickness about an inch, in girth as much as two men can clasp, in length about eleven or twelve feet. This is suspended by a with at each end from a sort of gallows. On the upper surface are three apertures like those in a fiddle, and in the bottom of the instrument, immediately under the middle of the middle aperture, which is shaped like a half-moon, a flint about two pounds in weight is fastened with gum. This is said to be necessary to the sound. Both ends of this long tube are carefully closed, and it is beaten on the middle aperture with a pellet which is covered with a sort of gum called Curruca. Gumilla positively affirms, and on his own knowledge, that its sound may be heard four leagues round. This is scarcely possible. I doubt whether the loudest gong can be heard four miles, and it is not possible that wood can be made as sonorous as metal.

² "There, in the great Cu, they had an exceeding large drum; and when they beat it, the sound was such and so dismal, that it was like an instrument of hell, and was heard for more than two leagues round. They said that the cover of that drum was made of the skin of huge serpents." — Bernal Diaz.

After Cortes had been defeated, he always heard this drum

And made them bear us forward. We must meet
In battle, if the Hoamen are not freed
From your accursed tribute, . . . thou and I,
My people and thy countless multitudes.
Your arrows shall fall from us as the hall
Leaps on a rock, . . . and when ye smite with swords,
Not blood but fire shall follow from the stroke.
Yet think not thou that we are more than men!
Our knowledge is our power, and God our strength,
God, whose almighty will created thee,
And me, and all that hath the breath of life.
He is our strength; . . . for in His name I speak, . . .
And when I tell thee that thou shalt not shed
The life of man in bloody sacrifice,
It is His holy bidding which I speak:
And if thou wilt not listen and obey,
When I shall meet thee in the battle-field,
It is His holy cause for which I fight,
And I shall have His power to vanquish thee!

And thinkest thou our Gods are feeble? cried
The King of Aztlan; thinkest thou they lack Power to defend their altars, and to keep
The kingdom which they gave us strength to win?
The Gods of thirty nations have opposed
Their irresistible might, and they lie now
Conquer'd and caged and fetter'd at their feet.
That we who serve them are no coward race,
Let prove the ample realm we won in arms: . . .
And I their leader am not of the sons
Of the feeble! As he spake, he reach'd a mace,
The trunk and knotted root of some young tree,
Such as old Albion and his monster-brood
From the oak-forest for their weapons pluck'd,
When father Brute and Corineus set foot
On the White Island first. Lo this, quoth he,
My club! and he threw back his robe; and this
The arm that wields it! . . . 'Twas my father's once:
Erillyab's husband, King Tepollomi,
He felt its weight. . . Did I not show thee him?
He lights me at my evening banquet.⁴ There, when they were offering up the reeking hearts of his men. The account in Bernal Diaz, of their midnight sacrifice, performed by torch-light, and in the sight of the Spanish army, is truly terrific.

⁴ "The King of Chalco having treacherously taken and slain two sons of the King of Tetzeuco, had their bodies dried, and placed as candelabras in his palace, to hold the lights." — Turquemade, l. 151.

"This same king wore round his neck a chain of human hearts set in gold — the hearts of the bravest men whom he had slain, or taken, and sacrificed." — Id. 152.

The more usual custom was to stuff the skin of the royal, or noble prisoner, and suspend it as a trophy in the palace, or the house of the priest. Gomara's account of this custom is a dreadful picture of the most barbarous superstition which ever yet disgraced mankind. "On the last day of the

In very deed, the dead Tepollom!
 Stood up against the wall, by devilish art.
 Preserv'd; and from his black and shrivell'd hand
 The steady lamp hung down.

My spirit rose

At that abomination; I exclaim'd
 Thou art of noble nature, and full fain
 Would I in friendship plight my hand with thine;
 But till that body in the grave be laid,
 Till thy polluted altars be made pure,
 There is no peace between us. May my God,
 Who, though thou know'st him not, is also thine,
 And after death will be thy dreadful Judge,
 May it please Him to visit thee, and shed
 His mercy on thy soul. . . . But if thy heart
 Be harden'd to the proof, come when thou wilt!
 I know thy power, and thou shalt then know mine.

VII.

THE BATTLE.

Now then to meet the war! Erilleyab's call
 Roused all her people to revenge their wrong;
 And at Lincoya's voice, the mountain tribes
 Arose and broke their bondage. I meantime
 Took counsel with Cadwallon and his sire,
 And told them of the numbers we must meet,
 And what advantage from the mountain-straits
 I thought, as in the Saxon wars, to win.
 Thou saw'st their weapons then, Cadwallon said;
 Are they like these rude works of ignorance,
 Bone-headed shafts, and spears of wood, and shields,
 Strong only for such strife?

We had to cope

With wiser enemies, and abler arm'd.
 What for the sword they wielded was a staff
 Set thick with stones athwart; you would have deem'd
 The uncouth shape was cumbrous; but a hand
 Expert, and practis'd to its use, could drive
 The sharpen'd flints with deadly impulse down.
 Their mail, if mail it may be call'd, was woven
 Of vegetable down, like finest flax,
 Bleach'd to the whiteness of the new-fallen snow,
 To every bend and motion flexible,
 Light as a warrior's summer-garb in peace;
 Yet, in that lightest, softest, habergeon
 Harmless the sharp stone arrow-head would hang.
 Others, of higher office, were array'd
 In feathery breast-plates of more gorgeous hue
 Than the gay plumage of the mountain-cock,
 Or pheasant's glittering pride. But what were these, first month, a hundred slaves were sacrificed: this done, they pluck'd off the skinnings of a certain number of them, the which skinnings so many ancient persons put, incontinent, upon their naked bodies, all fresh and bloody as they were flane from the dead carcasses. And being open in the backe parts and shoulders, they used to lace them, in such sort that they came fitte upon the bodies of those that ware them: and being in this order attired, they came to daunce among many others. In Mexico the King himself did put on one of these skinnings, being of a principall captive, and daunced among the other disguised persons, to exhale and honour the dead; and an infinite number followed him, to behold this terrible gesture; although some hold opinion, that they followed him to contemplate his greatest devotion.

Or what the thin gold hauberk, when oppos'd
 To arms like ours in battle? What the mail
 Of wood fire-harden'd, or the wooden helm,
 Against the iron arrows of the South,
 Against our northern spears, or battle-axe,
 Or good sword, wielded by a British hand?

Then, quoth Cadwallon, at the wooden helm,
 Of these weak arms the weakest, let the sword
 Hew, and the spear be thrust. The mountaineers,
 So long inured to crouch beneath their yoke,
 We will not trust in battle; from the heights
 They with their arrows may annoy the foe;
 And when our closer strife has won the fray,
 Then let them loose for havoc.

O my son,

Exclaim'd the blind old man, thou counsell'st ill!
 Blood will have blood, revenge beget revenge,
 Evil must come of evil. We shall win,
 Certes, a cheap and easy victory
 In the first field; their arrows from our arms
 Will fall, and on the hauberk and the helm
 The flint-edge blunt and break; while through their Naked, or vainly fenced, the griding steel [limbs,
 Shall sheer its mortal way. But what are we Against a nation? Other hosts will rise
 In endless warfare, with perpetual fights
 Dwindling our all-too-few; or multitudes
 Will wear and weary us, till we sink subdued
 By the very toil of conquest. Ye are strong;
 But he who puts his trust in mortal strength
 Leans on a broken reed. First prove your power;
 Be in the battle terrible, but spare
 The fallen, and follow not the flying foe:
 Then may ye win a nobler victory,
 So dealing with the captives as to fill
 Their hearts with wonder, gratitude, and awe,
 That love shall mingle with their fear, and fear
 'Stablish the love, else wavering. Let them see,
 That as more pure and gentle is your faith,
 Yourselves are gentler, purer. Ye shall be
 As gods among them, if ye thus obey
 God's precepts.

Soon the mountain tribes, in arms

Rose at Lincoya's call: a numerous host,
 More than in numbers, in the memory
 Of long oppression, and revengeful hope,
 A formidable foe. I station'd them
 Where at the entrance of the rocky straits,
 Secure themselves, their arrows might command
 The coming army. On the plain below
 We took our stand, between the mountain-base

After the sacrifice ended, the owner of the slaves did carry their bodies home to their houses, to make of their flesh a solemne feast to all their friends, leaving their heads and heartes to the Priests, as their dutie and offering: and the skinnings were filled with cotton wool, or straws, to be hung in the temple and kyng's palyace for a memorie. — Conquest of the West India.

"After the Inga Yupangui had successfully defended Cusco against the Chancas, he had all of them who were slain skinned, and their skins stuffed and placed in various attitudes, some beating tambours, others blowing flutes, &c. in a large building which he erected as a monument for those who had fallen in defending the city." — Herrera, 5. 2. 12.

And the green margin of the waters. Soon
Their long array came on. Oh what a pomp
And pride and pageantry of war¹ was there!
Not half so gaudied, for their May-day mirth,
All wreathed and ribanded, our youths and maids,
As these stern Astecas in war attire!
The golden glitterance, and the feather-mail,
More gay than glittering gold; and round the helm
A coronal of high upstanding plumes
Green as the spring grass in the sunny shower;
Or scarlet bright, as in the wintry wood
The cluster'd holly; or of purple tint, . .
Whereto shall that be liken'd? to what gem
Indladem'd, . . what flower, . . what insect's wing?
With war songs and wild music they came on,
We the while kneeling, rais'd with one accord
The hymn of supplication.

Front to front,
And now the embattled armies stood: a band
Of priests, all sable-garmented, advanced;
They piled a heap of sedge before our host,²
And warn'd us, . . Sons of Ocean! from the land
Of Aztlan, while ye may, depart in peace!
Before the fire shall be extinguish'd, hence!
Or, even as yon dry sedge amid the flame
So ye shall be consumed. . . The arid heap
They kindled, and the rapid flame ran up,
And blazed, and died away. Then from his bow,
With steady hand, their chosen archer loosed
The Arrow of the Omen.³ To its mark

¹ Gomara thus describes the Tlascallan army: "They were trimme felowes, and wel armed, according to their use, although they were paynted so, that their faces shewed like diuels, with great tuffes of feathers and triumphed gallantry. They had also splinges, staves, speares, swordes, bowes, and arrowes, skulles, splintes, gantletttes, all of wood, gilte, or else covered with feathers, or leather; their corselets were made of cotton woole, their targettes and bucklers, gallant and strong, made of woode covered with leather, and trimmed with laton and feathers; theyr swordes were staves, with an edge of flint stone cunningly joynd into the staffe, which would cutte very well, and make a sore wounde. Their instruments of warre were hunters' hornes, and drummes, called attabales, made like a caldron, and covered with vellum." — Conquest of the West India.

In the inventory of the treasure which Grjvalva brought from his expedition are, a whole harness of furniture for an armed man, of gold thin beaten; another whole armour of wood, with leaves of gold, garnished with little black stones; four pieces of armour of wood, made for the knees, and covered with golden leaf. And among the presents designed for the king, were five targets of feathers and silver, and 24 of feathers and gold, set with pearls, both curious and gallant to behold.

² "When the Spaniards discovered Campeche, the Indians heaped up a pile of dry sedge, and ranged themselves in troops. Ten Priests then came from a temple with censers and copal, wherewith they incensed the strangers; and then told them by signs to depart, before that pile, which they were about to kindle, should be burnt out. The pile was immediately lighted; the Priest withdrew without another word or motion, and the people began to whistle and sound their shells. The Spaniards were weak, and many of them wounded, and they prudently retired in peace." — Bernal Diaz, 3.

³ "At the sacring of the Popes, when the new-elected Pope passeth (as the manner is) before St. Gregory's chapel, the Master of the Ceremonies goeth before him, bearing two dry

The shaft of divination fled; it smote
Cadwallon's plated breast; the brittle point
Rebounded. He, contemptuous of their faith,
Stooped for the shaft, and while with zealous speed
To the rescue they rushed onward, snapping it
Asunder, toss'd the fragments back in scorn.

Fierce was their onset; never in the field
Encounter'd I with braver enemies.
Nor marvel ye, nor think it to their shame,
If soon they stagger'd, and gave way, and fled,
So many from so few; they saw their darts
Recoil, their lances shiver, and their swords
Fall ineffectual, blunted with the blow.
Think ye no shame of Aztlan that they fled,
When the bowmen of Deheubarth piled so well
Their shafts with fatal aim; through the thin gold
Or feather-mail, while Gwyneth's deep-driven spears⁴
Pierced to the bone and vitals; when they saw
The falchion, flashing late so lightning-like,
Quench'd in their own life-blood. Our mountaineers
Shower'd from the heights, meantime, an arrowy storm,
Themselves secure; and we who bore the brunt
Of battle, iron men, impassable,
Stood in our strength unbroken. Marvel not
If then the brave felt fear, already impress'd
That day by ominous thoughts, to fear akin;
For so it chanced, high Heaven ordaining so,
The King, who should have led his people forth,
At the army-head, as they began their march,

reeds, at the end of the one a burning wax candle tied, and at the end of the other a handful of flax, the which he setteth on fire, saying, with a loud voice, 'Pater Sancte, sic transi gloria mundi.' — Camerarius.

³ "The Tlaxcaltecas had two arrows, which they regarded with great reverence, and used to augur the event of a battle. Two of their bravest Chiefs were to shoot them at the enemy, and recover them or die. If the arrow struck and wounded, it was held an omen that the fight would be prosperous; but if they neither struck, nor drew blood, the army retired." — Torquemada, i. 34.

This is more particularly noticed by Gomara. "In the warres the Tlascallans use their standerde to be carried before the army; but when the battyle is to be fought, they place the standerde where all the hosts may see it; and he that commeth not incontinent to hys ancient, payeth a penaltie. Their standerde hath two crossbow arrowes set thereon, whiche they esteeme as the relikes of their ancestors. Thys standerde two olde soldiers, and vallant menne, being of the chiefest Captaynes, have the charge to carrie; in the which standerde, an abuson of southsaying, eyther of losse or victory, is noted. In this order they shote one of these arrowes against the first enemies that they meete; and if with that arrowe they do eyther kill or hurte, it is a token that they shall have the victorie; and if it nyether kill nor hurte, then they assuredly believe that they shall lose the field." — Conquest of the West India.

Thus also Trevisa, in his lame rhymes:

"The south hete Demectia,
And the other Venedotia,
The first shoteth and arrowes beres,
That other dealeth all with spere.

Polychronicon.

Was with sore sickness stricken ; and the stroke
Came like the act and arm of very God,
So suddenly, and in that point of time.

A gallant man was he, who in his stead,
That day commanded Aztlan : his long hair,
Tufted with many a cotton lock, proclaim'd
Of princely prowess many a feat achieved
In many a field of fame. Oft had he led
The Astecas, with happy fortune, forth ;
Yet could not now Yuhidthiton inspire
His host with hope : he, not the less, that day,
True to his old renown, and in the hour
Of rout and ruin with collected mind,
Sounded his signals shrill, and in the voice
Of loud reproach and anger, and brave shame,
Call'd on the people . . . But when nought avail'd,
Seizing the standard from the timid hand
Which held it in dismay, alone he turn'd,
For honourable death resolved, and praise
That would not die. Thereat the braver chiefs
Rallied, anew their signals rung around,
And Aztlan, seeing how we spared her flight,
Took heart, and roll'd the tide of battle back.
But when Cadwallon from the chieftain's grasp
Had cut the standard-staff away, and stunn'd
And stretch'd him at his mercy on the field,
Then fled the enemy in utter rout,
Broken and quell'd at heart. One chief alone
Bestrode the body of Yuhidthiton ;
Bareheaded did young Malinal bestride
His brother's body, wiping from his brow
With the shield-hand the blinding blood away,
And dealing frantically with broken sword
Obstinate wrath, the last resisting foe.
Him, in his own despite, we seized and saved.

Then in the moment of our victory,
We purified our hands from blood, and knelt,
And pour'd to heaven the grateful prayer of praise
And raised the choral psalm. Triumphant thus
To the hills we went our way ; the mountaineers
With joy, and dissonant song, and antic dance ;
The captives sullenly, deeming that they went
To meet the certain death of sacrifice,
Yet stern and undismay'd. We bade them know
Ours was a law of mercy and of love ;
We heal'd their wounds, and set the prisoners free.
Bear ye, quoth I, my bidding to your King ;
Say to him, Did the stranger speak to thee
The words of truth, and hath he proved his power ?
Thus saith the Lord of Ocean, in the name
Of God, Almighty, Universal God,
Thy Judge and mine, whose battles I have fought,
Whose bidding I obey, whose will I speak ;
Shed thou no more in impious sacrifice
The life of man ; restore unto the grave
The dead Tepolloml ; set this people free,
And peace shall be between us.

On the morrow
Came messengers from Aztlan, in reply.
Coanocotzin with sore malady
Hath, by the Gods, been stricken : will the Lord
Of Ocean visit his sick bed ? . . . He told
Of wrath, and as he said, the vengeance came :
Let him bring healing now, and 'stablish peace.

VIII

THE PEACE.

Again, and now with better hope, I sought
The city of the King ! there went with me
Iolo, old Iolo, he who knows
The virtue of all herbs of mount or vale,
Or greenwood shade, or quiet brooklet's bed ;
Whatever lore of science, or of song,
Sages and Bards of old have handed down.
Aztlan that day pour'd forth her swarming sons,
To wait my coming. Will he ask his God
To stay the hand of anger ? was the cry,
The general cry, . . . and will he save the King ?
Coanocotzin too had nurs'd that thought,
And the strong hope upheld him ; he put forth
His hand, and rais'd a quick and anxious eye, . .
Is it not peace and mercy ? . . thou art come
To pardon and to save !

I answer'd him,
That power, O King of Aztlan, is not mine !
Such help as human cunning can bestow,
Such human help I bring ; but health and life
Are in the hand of God, who at his will
Gives or withdraws ; and what he wills is best.
Then old Iolo took his arm, and felt
The symptom, and he bade him have good hope,
For life was strong within him. So it proved :
The drugs of subtle virtue did their work ;
They quell'd the venom of the malady,
And from the frame expell'd it, . . that a sleep,
Fell on the King, a sweet and natural sleep,
And from its healing he awoke refresh'd
Though weak, and joyful as a man who felt
The peril pass'd away.

Ere long we spake
Of concord, and how best to knit the bonds
Of lasting friendship. When we won this land,
Coanocotzin said, these fertile vales
Were not, as now, with fruitful groves embower'd,
Nor rich with towns and populous villages,
Abounding, as thou seest, with life and joy ;
Our fathers found bleak heath, and desert moor,
Wild woodland, and savannahs wide and waste,
Rude country of rude dwellers. From our arms
They to the mountain fastnesses retired,
And long with obstinate and harassing war
Provoked us, hoping not for victory,
Yet mad for vengeance : till Tepolloml
Fell by my father's hand ; and with their King,
The strength and flower of all their youth cut off,
All in one desolating day, they took
The yoke upon their necks. What wouldst thou
That to these Hoamen I should now concede ?
Lord of the Ocean, speak !

Let them be free !
Quoth I. I come not from my native isle
To wage the war of conquest, and cast out
Your people from the land which time and toil
Have rightly made their own. The land is wide ;
There is enough for all. So they be freed
From that accursed tribute, and ye shed
The life of man no more in sacrifice,
In the most holy name of God I say,
Let there be peace between us !

Thou hast won
 Their liberty, the King replied : henceforth,
 Free as they are, if they provoke the war,
 Reluctantly will Aztlan raise her arm.
 Be thou the peace-preserver. To what else
 Thou say'st, instructed by calamity,
 I lend a humble ear; but to destroy
 The worship of my fathers, or abate
 Or change one point, lies not within the reach
 And scope of kingly power. Speak thou hereon
 With those whom we hold holy, with the sons
 Of the Temple, they who commune with the Gods;
 Awe them, for they awe me. So we resolved
 That when the bones of King Tepolloni
 Had had their funeral honours, they and I
 Should by the green-lake side, before the King,
 And in the presence of the people, hold
 A solemn talk.

Then to the mountain-huts,
 The bearer of good tidings, I return'd
 Leading the honourable train who bore
 The relics of the King; not parch'd and black,
 As I had seen the unnatural corpse stand up,
 In ghastly mockery of the attitude
 And act of life, . . his bones had now been blanch'd
 With decent reverence. Soon the mountaineers
 Saw the white deer-skin shroud¹; the rumour-spread;
 They gather'd round, and follow'd in our train.
 Before Erillyab's hut the bearers laid
 Their burden down. She, calm of countenance,
 And with dry eye, albeit her hand the while
 Shook like an agueish limb, unroll'd the shroud.
 The multitude stood gazing silently,
 The young and old alike all awed and hush'd

¹ "The Indians use the same ceremonies to the bones of their dead, as if they were covered with their former skin, flesh, and ligaments. It is but a few days since I saw some return with the bones of nine of their people, who had been two months before killed by the enemy. They were tied in white deer-skins separately, and when carried by the door of one of the houses of their family, they were laid down opposite to it, till the female relations convened, with flowing hair, and wept over them about half an hour. Then they carried them home to their friendly magazines of mortality, wept over them again, and then buried them with the usual solemnities. The chieftains carried twelve short sticks, tied together in the form of a quadrangle, so that each square consisted of three. The sticks were only peeled, without any painting, but there were swan feathers tied to each corner. They called that frame the White Circle, and placed it over the door while the women were weeping over the bones."
 — Adair.

² "The Mosquito Indian, when they die, are buried in their houses, and the very spot they lay over when alive, and have their hatchet, harpoon lances, with muschelaw, and other necessities, buried with them; but if the defunct leaves behind him a gun, some friend preserves that from the earth, that would soon damnify the powder, and so render it unserviceable in that strange journey. His boat, or dorra, they cut in pieces, and lay over his grave, with all the rest of his household goods, if he hath any more. If the deceased leave behind him no children, brothers, or parents, the cousins, or other his relations, cut up, or destroy his plantations, lest any living should, as they esteem it, rob the dead." — The Mosquito Indian and his Golden River, by M. W. Lintot and Osborn's Collection.

³ "When the body is in the grave, they take care to cover

Under the holy feeling, . . and the hush
 Was awful; that huge multitude so still,
 That we could hear distinct the mountain-stream
 Roll down its rocky channel far away
 And this was all; sole ceremony this,
 The sight of death and silence, . . till at length,
 In the ready grave his bones were laid to rest.
 'Twas in her hut and home, yea, underneath
 The marriage bed, the bed of widowhood,
 Her husband's grave was dug²; on softest fur
 The bones were laid³, with fur were covered o'er,
 Then heap'd with bark and boughs, and, last of all,
 Earth was to earth trod down.

And now the day
 Appointed for our talk of peace was come.
 On the green margin of the lake we met,
 Elders, and Priests, and Chiefs; the multitude
 Around the Circle of the Council stood.
 Then, in the midst, Coanocotsin rose,
 And thus the King began: Pabas⁴ and Chiefs
 Of Aztlan, hither ye are come to learn
 The law of peace. The Lord of Ocean saith,
 The Tribes whom he hath gathered underneath
 The wings of his protection, shall be free;
 And in the name of his great God he saith,
 That ye shall never shed in sacrifice
 The blood of man. Are ye content? that so
 We may together here, in happy hour,
 Bury the sword.

Hereat a Paba rose,
 And answer'd for his brethren: . . He hath won
 The Hoamen's freedom, that their blood no more
 Shall on our altars flow; for this the Lord
 Of Ocean fought, and Aztlan yielded it

it in such a manner, that the earth does not touch it. It lies as in a little cave, lined with skins, much neater, and better adorned, than their cabins." — Charlevoix.

Adair was present at one of their funerals. "They laid the corpse in his tomb in a sitting posture, with his feet towards the east, his head anointed with bear's oil, and his face painted red; but not streaked with black, because that is a constant emblem of war and death. He was dressed in his finest apparel, having his gun and pouch, and trusty hictory bow, with a young panther's skin full of arrows, alongside of him, and every other useful thing he had been possessed of, that when he rises again they may serve him in that track of land which pleased him best before he went to take his long sleep. His tomb was firm and clean inside; they covered it with thick logs so as to bear several tiers of cypress bark, and such a quantity of clay, as would confine the putrid smell, and be on a level with the rest of the floor. They often sleep over these tombs; which, with the loud wailing of the women at the dusk of the evening, and dawn of the day, on benches close by the tombs, must awake the memory of their relations very often; and if they were killed by an enemy, it helps to irritate, and set on such revengeful tempers to retaliate blood for blood."

⁴ Papa is the word which Bernal Diaz uses when he speaks of the Mexican priests; and in this he is followed by Purchas. The appellation in Torquemada is Quaquil. I am not certain that Bernal Diaz did not mean to call them Pope, and that Purchas has not mistaken his meaning. An easy alteration made it more suitable for English verse, than the more accurate word would have been.

I perceive by Herrera (3. 2. 15.) that the word is Mexican, and that the Devil was the author of it, in imitation of the Church.

In battle. But if we forgo the rites
Of our forefathers, if we wrong the Gods,
Who give us timely sun and timely showers,
Their wrath will be upon us; they will shut
Their ears to prayer, and turn away the eyes
Which watch for our well-doing, and withhold
The hands dispensing our prosperity.

Cynetha then arose, between his son
And me supported, rose the blind old man.
Ye wrong us, men of Astlan, if ye deem
We bid ye wrong the Gods; accurst were he
Who would obey such bidding. . . more accurst
The wretch who should enjoin implety.
It is the will of God which we make known,
Your God and ours. Know ye not Him who laid
The deep foundations of the earth, and built
The arch of heaven, and kindled yonder sun,
And breathed into the woods and waves and sky
The power of life?

We know Him, they replied,
The great For-Ever One, the God of Gods,
Ipalmemoani, He by whom we live! ¹
And we too, quoth Ayayaca, we know
And worship the Great Spirit, who in clouds
And storms, in mountain caves, and by the fall
Of waters, in the woodland solitude,
And in the night and silence of the sky,
Doth make his being felt. ² We also know,
And fear, and worship the Beloved One.

Our God, replied Cynetha, is the same,
The Universal Father. He to the first
Made his will known; but when men multiplied,
The Evil Spirits darken'd them, and sin
And misery came into the world, and men

¹ "The Mexicans had some idea, though a very imperfect one, of a supreme, absolute, and independent being. They represented him in no external form, because they believed him to be invisible; and they named him only by the common appellation of God, or in their language Teotl, a word resembling still more in its meaning than its pronunciation, the Θεός of the Greeks. But they applied to him certain epithets, which were highly expressive of the grandeur and power which they conceived him to possess, Ipalmemoani, 'He by whom we live'; and Tloque Nahuaque, 'He who has all in himself.' — Clavigero.

Torquemada has a very characteristic remark upon these appellations: — "Although," says he, "these blinded men went astray in the knowledge of God, and adored the Devil in his stead, they did not err in the names which they gave him, those being truly and properly his own: the Devil using this cunning with them, that they should apply to him these, which, by nature and divine right, are God's; his most holy Majesty permitting this on account of the enormity and shamefulness of their depraved customs, and the multitude of their iniquities." — L. vi. c. 8.

² "About thirty miles below the falls of St. Anthony, is a remarkable cave, of an amazing depth. The Indians term it Wakon-teebe; that is, the dwelling of the Great Spirit. The entrance into it is about ten feet wide; the arch within is near fifteen feet high, and about thirty feet broad. The bottom of it consists of fine clean sand. About twenty feet from the entrance begins a lake, the water of which is transparent, and extends to an unsearchable distance; for the darkness of the cave prevents all attempts to acquire a knowledge of it. I threw a small pebble towards the interior parts of it, with my

Forsook the way of truth, and gave to stocks
And stones the incommunicable name.
Yet with one chosen, one peculiar Race,
The knowledge of their Father and their God
Remain'd, from sire to son transmitted down.
While the bewilder'd Nations of the earth
Wander'd in fogs, and were in darkness lost,
The light abode with them; and when at times
They sinn'd and went astray, the Lord hath put
A voice into the mouths of holy men,
Raising up witnesses unto himself,
That so the saving knowledge of his name
Might never fail; nor the glad promise, given
To our first parent, that at length his sons,
From error, sin, and wretchedness redeem'd,
Should form one happy family of love.
Nor ever hath that light, howe'er bedimm'd,
Wholly been quench'd; still in the heart of man
A feeling and an instinct it exists,
His very nature's stamp and privilege,
Yea, of his life the life. I tell ye not,
O Aztecas! of things unknown before;
I do but waken up a living sense
That sleeps within ye! Do ye love the Gods
Who call for blood? Doth the poor sacrifice
Go with a willing step, to lay his life
Upon their altars? . . Good must come of good,
Evil of evil; if the fruit be death,
The poison springeth from the sap and root,
And the whole tree is deadly; if the rites
Be evil, they who claim them are not good,
Not to be worshipp'd then; for to obey
The evil will is evil. Aztecas!
From the For-Ever, the Beloved One,
The Universal Only God I speak,
Your God and mine, our Father and our Judge.

utmost strength; I could hear that it fell into the water, and, notwithstanding it was of so small a size, it caused an astonishing and horrible noise, that reverberated through all those gloomy regions. I found in this cave many Indian hieroglyphics, which appeared very ancient, for time had nearly covered them with moss. They were cut in a rude manner upon the inside of the walls, which were composed of a stone so extremely soft, that it might easily be penetrated with a knife. A stone every where to be found near the Mississippi. The cave is only accessible by ascending a narrow steep passage that lies near the brink of the river." — Carver.

"The Prince had no sooner gained the point that overlooks this wonderful cascade (the falls of St. Anthony) than he began with an audible voice to address the Great Spirit, one of whose places of residence he supposed this to be. He told him he had come a long way to pay his adorations to him, and now would make him the best offerings in his power. He accordingly first threw his pipe into the stream; then the roll that contained his tobacco; after these, the bracelets he wore on his arms and wrists; next, an ornament that encircled his neck, composed of beads and wires; and at last, the earrings from his ears; in short, he presented to his God every part of his dress that was valuable; during this he frequently smote his breast with great violence, threw his arms about, and appeared to be much agitated.

"All this while he continued his adorations, and at length concluded them with fervent petitions that the Great Spirit would constantly afford us his protection on our travels, giving us a bright sun, a blue sky, and clear untroubled waters; nor would he leave the place till we had smoked together with my pipe in honour of the Great Spirit." — Carver.

Hear ye his law, . . . hear ye the perfect law
Of love, "Do ye to others, as ye would
That they should do to you!" He bids us meet
To praise his name, in thankfulness and joy;
He bids us, in our sorrow, pray to him,
The Comforter. Love him, for he is good!
Fear him, for he is just! Obey his will,
For who can bear his anger!

While he spake,
They stood with open mouth, and motionless sight,
Watching his countenance, as though the voice
Were of a God; for sure it seem'd that less
Than inspiration could not have infused
That eloquent passion in a blind man's face.

1 There is a passage in Bede which well illustrates the different feelings whereby barbarians are induced to accept a new religion.

Edwin of Northumbria had summoned his chiefs and counsellors to advise with him concerning his intended conversion. The first person who delivered his opinion was Coifi, the Chief Priest of the Idols. For this which is preached to us," said he, "do you, O King, see to it what it may be. I will freely confess to you what I have learnt that the religion which we have held till now has no virtue in it. No one of your subjects has devoted himself to the worship of our Gods more earnestly than I, and yet many there are who have received greater bounties and greater favours from your hand and have prospered better in all their undertakings and desires. Now, if our Gods could have done any thing, they would rather have assisted me than them." To this another of the nobles added, "The present life of man upon earth, when compared with the future has appeared to me, O King, like as when you and your Chiefs and servants have been seated at your supper, in winter time the hearth blazes in the centre and the winds smoking while without it is storm, or rain or snow, and a sparrow flies through the hall, entering at one door and passing out at another, while he is within, in that little minute he does not feel the weather, but after that instant of calm, he returns again to winter as from winter he came and is gone. Such and so transitory is the life of man, and of what follows it or what preceded it we are altogether ignorant. Wherefore, if this new doctrine should bring any thing more certain, it well deserves to be followed."—
Lib ii c 13

John Wesley has preserved a very interesting dialogue between himself and the Chicasaws.

"Q Do you believe there is One above who is over all things?"—Paustobee answered, We believe there are four Beloved Things above the Clouds, the Sun, the Clear Sky, and He that lives in the Clear Sky.

"Q Do you believe there is but one that lives in the Clear Sky?"

"A We believe there are Two with him, Three in all.
"Q Do you think He made the Sun and the other Beloved Things?"

"A We cannot tell. Who hath seen?"

"Q Do you think He made you?"

"A We think He made all men at first.

"Q How did He make them at first?"

"A Out of the ground.

"Q Do you believe He loves you?"

"A I do not know. I cannot see Him.

"Q But has He not often saved your life?"

"A He has. Many bullets have gone on this side, and many on that side, but he would never let them hurt me. And many bullets have gone into these young men, and yet they are alive.

"Q Then cannot He save you from your enemies now?"

"A Yes, but we know not if he will. We have now so

And when he ceased, all eyes at once were turn'd
Upon the Pabas, waiting their reply,
If that to that acknowledged argument
Reply could be devised. But they themselves,
Stricken by the truth, were silent; and they look'd
Toward their chief and mouth-piece, the High Priest
Tecosmocc, he too was pale and mute,
And when he gather'd up his strength to speak,
Speech fail'd him, his lip falter'd, and his eye
Fell utterly abash'd, and put to shame.
But in the Chiefs, and in the multitude,
And in the King of Astlan, better thoughts
Were working; for the Spirit of the Lord
That day was moving in the heart of man.¹

many enemies round about us, that I think of nothing but death, and if I am to die, I shall die, and I will die like a man. But if He will have me to live, I shall live. Though I had ever so many enemies He can destroy them all.

"Q How do you know that?"

"A From what I have seen. When our enemies came against us before, then the Beloved Clouds came for us; and often much rain and sometimes hail has come upon them, and that in a very hot day. And I saw when many French and Choctaws and other nations came against one of our towns, and the ground made a noise under them, and the Beloved Ones in the air behind them, and they were afraid, and went away and left their meat and their drink, and their guns. I tell no lie, all these saw it too.

"Q Have you heard such noises at other times?"

"A Yes, often, before and after almost every battle.

"Q What sort of noises were they?"

"A Like the noise of drums and guns and shouting.

"Q Have you heard any such lately?"

"A Yes, four days after our last battle with the French.

"Q Then you heard nothing before it?"

"A The night before I dreamed I heard many drums up there and many trumpets there, and much stamping of feet and shouting. Till then I thought we should all die, but then I thought the beloved ones were come to help us. And the next day I heard above a hundred guns go off before the fight began, and I said, When the Sun is there the Beloved Ones will help us, and we shall conquer our enemies, and we did so.

"Q Do you often think and talk of the Beloved Ones?"

"A We think of them always wherever we are. We talk of them and to them, at home and abroad, in peace and in war, before and after we fight, and indeed whenever and wherever we meet together.

"Q Where do you think your souls go after death?"

"A We believe the souls of red men walk up and down near the place where they died, or where their bodies lie, for we have often heard cries and noises near the place where any prisoners had been burnt.

"Q Where do the souls of white men go after death?"

"A We cannot tell, we have not seen.

"Q Our belief is, that the souls of bad men only walk up and down, but the souls of good men go up.

"A I believe so too, but I told you the talk of the nation.

"Mr Andrews. They said at the burying they knew what you was doing. You was speaking to the Beloved Ones above to take up the soul of the young woman.

"Q We have a book that tells us many things of the Beloved Ones above, would you be glad to know them?"

"A. We have no time now but to fight. If we should ever be at peace, we should be glad to know.

"Q Do you expect ever to know what the white men know?"

"Mr Andrews. They told Mr. O. they believe the time will come when the red and white man will be one.

Coanocotsin rose : Pabas, and Chiefs,
And men of Aztlan, ye have heard a talk
Of peace and love, and there is no reply.
Are ye content with what the Wise Man saith ?
And will ye worship God in that good way
Which God himself ordains ? If it be so,
Together here will we in happy hour
Bury the sword.

Tezozbmoc replied,
This thing is new, and in the land till now
Unheard : . . what marvel, therefore, if we find
No ready answer ? Let our Lord the King
Do that which seemeth best.

Yubidthiton,
Chief of the Chiefs of Aztlan, next arose.
Of all her numerous sons, could Aztlan boast
No mightier arm in battle, nor whose voice
To more attentive silence hush'd the hall
Of council. When the Wise Man spake, quoth he,
I ask'd of mine own heart if it were so,
And, as he said, the living instinct there
Answer'd, and own'd the truth. In happy hour,
O King of Aztlan, did the Ocean Lord
Through the great waters hither wend his way ;
For sure he is the friend of God and man.

With that an uproar of assent arose
From the whole people, a tumultuous shout
Of universal joy and glad acclaim.
But when Coanocotsin raised his hand.
That he might speak, the clamour and the buz
Ceased, and the multitude, in tiptoe hope,
Attent and still, await the final voice.
Then said the Sovereign, Hear, O Aztecas,
Your own united will ! From this day forth
No life upon the altar shall be shed,
No blood shall flow in sacrifice ; the rites
Shall all be pure, such as the blind Old Man,
Whom God hath taught, will teach. This ye have will'd ;
And therefore it shall be !

The King hath said !
Like thunder the collected voice replied :
Let it be so !

Lord of the Ocean, then
Pursued the King of Aztlan, we will now
Lay the war-weapon in the grave, and join
In right-hand friendship. By our custom, blood
Should sanctify and bind the solemn act ;
But by what oath and ceremony thou
Shalt proffer, by the same will Aztlan swear.
Nor oath, nor ceremony, I replied,
O King, is needful. To his own good word
The good and honourable man will act,
Oaths will not curb the wicked. Here we stand
In the broad day-light ; the For-Ever One,
The Every-Where beholds us. In his sight
We join our hands in peace : if e'er again
Should these right hands be raised in enmity,
Upon the offender will his judgement fall.

" Q. What do the French teach you ?

" A. The French Black Kings (the Priests) never go out.
We see you go about : we like that ; that is good.

" Q. How came your nation by the knowledge they have ?

" A. As soon as ever the ground was sound and fit to stand upon, it came to us, and has been with us ever since. But

The grave was dug ; Coanocotsin laid
His weapon in the earth ; Eriliyah's son,
Young Amalahta, for the Hoamen, laid
His hatchet there ; and there I laid the sword.

Here let me end. What follow'd was the work
Of peace, no theme for story ; how we fix'd
Our sojourn in the hills, and sow'd our fields,
And, day by day, saw all things prospering.
Thence have I come, Goeryyl, to announce
The tidings of my happy enterprise ;
There I return, to take thee to our home.
I love my native land ; with as true love
As ever yet did warm a British heart,
Love I the green fields of the beautiful Isle,
My father's heritage ! But far away,
Where nature's booner hand has blest the earth,
My lot hath been assign'd ; beyond the seas
Madoc hath found his home ; beyond the seas
A country for his children hath he chosen,
A land wherein their portion may be peace.

EMMA.

But while Aberfraw echoed to the sounds
Of merriment and music, Madoc's heart
Mourn'd for his brethren. Therefore, when no ear
Was nigh, he sought the King, and said to him,
To-morrow, for Mathraval I set forth ;
Longer I must not linger here, to pass
The easy hours in feast and revelry,
Forgetful of my people far away.
I go to tell the tidings of success,
And seek new comrades. What if it should chance
That, for this enterprise, our brethren,
Foregoing all their hopes and fortunes here,
Would join my banner ? . . Let me send abroad
Their summons, O my brother ! so secure,
You may forgive the past, and once again
Will peace and concord bless our father's house.

Hereafter will be time enow for this,
The King replied ; thy easy nature sees not,
How, if the traitors for thy banner send
Their bidding round, in open war against me
Their own would soon be spread. I charge thee, Madoc,
Neither to see nor aid these fugitives,
The shame of Owen's blood.

Sullen he spake,
And turn'd away ; nor farther commune now
Did Madoc seek, nor had he more endured ;
For bitter thoughts were rising in his heart,
And anguish, kindling anger. In such mood
He to his sister's chamber took his way.
She sat with Emma, with the gentle Queen ;
For Emma had already learnt to love
The gentle maid. Goeryyl saw what thoughts

we are young men, our old men know more ; but all of them do not know. There are but a few whom the Beloved One chooses from a child, and is in them, and takes care of them, and teaches them. They know these things, and our old men practise, therefore they know : but I do not practise, therefore I know little."—Wesley's Journal, No. 1. 39.

Troubled her brother's brow. Madoc, she cried,
Thou hast been with the King, been rashly pleading
For Ririd and for Rodri! . . . He replied,
I did but ask him little, . . . did but say,
Belike our brethren would go forth with me,
To voluntary exile; then, methought,
His fear and jealousy might well have ceased,
And all be safe.

And did the King refuse?
Quoth Emma: I will plead for them, quoth she,
With dutiful warmth and seal will plead for them;
And surely David will not say me nay.

O sister! cried Goervyl, tempt him not!
Sister, you know him not! Alas, to touch
That perilous theme is, even in Madoc here,
A perilous folly . . . Sister, tempt him not!
You do not know the King!

But then a fear
Fled to the cheek of Emma, and her eye,
Quickening with wonder, turn'd toward the Prince,
As if expecting that his manly mind
Would mould Goervyl's meaning to a shape
Less fearful, would interpret and amend
The words she hoped she did not hear aright.
Emma was young; she was a sacrifice
To that cold king-craft, which, in marriage-vows
Linking two hearts, unknowing each of each,
Perverts the ordinance of God, and makes
The holiest tie a mockery and a curse.
Her eye was patient, and she spake in tones
So sweet and of so pensive gentleness,
That the heart felt them. Madoc! she exclaimed,
Why dost thou hate the Saxons? O my brother,
If I have heard aright, the hour will come
When the Plantagenet shall wish herself
Among her nobler, happier countrymen,
From these unnatural enmities escaped,
And from the vengeance they must call from Heaven!

Shame then suffused the Prince's countenance,
Mindful how, drunk in anger, he had given
His hatred loose. My sister Queen, quoth he,
Marvel not you that with my mother's milk
I suck'd that hatred in. Have they not been
The scourge and the devouring sword of God,
The curse and pestilence which he hath sent
To root us from the land? Alas, our crimes
Have drawn this dolorous visitation down!
Our sun hath long been westering, and the night

¹ "Dolwyddelan is situated in a rocky valley which is sprinkled with stunted trees, and watered by the Lieder. The boundaries are rude and barren mountains, and among others, the great bending mountain Seabod, often conspicuous from most distant places. The castle is placed on a high rock precipitous on one side, and insulated: it consists of two square towers, one 40 feet by 25, the other 32 by 20; each had formerly three floors. The materials of this fortress are the shattery stone of the country; yet well squared, the masonry good, and the mortar hard; the castle yard lay between the towers."—Pennant's Snowdon

The rudeness and barrenness of the surrounding mountains I can well testify, having been bewildered and benighted upon them.

"In the beginning of Edward the Fourth his reign, Dolwyddelan was inhabited by Howell ap Evan ap Rhys Gethin,

And darkness and extinction are at hand.
We are a fallen people! . . . From ourselves
The desolation and the ruin come;
In our own vitals doth the poison work . . .
The House that is divided in itself,
How should it stand? . . . A blessing on you, Lady!
But in this wretched family strife
Is rooted all too deep; it is an old
And cankered wound, . . . an eating, killing sore,
For which there is no healing. . . If the King
Should ever speak his fears, . . . and sure to you
All his most inward thoughts he will make known, . . .
Counsel him then to let his brethren share
My enterprise, to send them forth with me
To everlasting exile. . . She hath told you
Too hardly of the King; I know him well;
He hath a stormy nature; and what germs
Of virtue would have budded in his heart,
Cold winds have check'd, and blighting seasons nipt,
Yet in his heart they live. . . A blessing on you,
That you may see their blossom and their fruit!

MATHRAVAL.

Now for Mathraval went Prince Madoc forth;
O'er Menai's ebbing tide, up mountain-paths,
Beside grey mountain-stream, and lonely lake,
And through old Snowdon's forest-solitude,
He held right on his solitary way.
Nor paused he in that rocky vale, where oft
Up the familiar path, with gladder pace,
His steed had hastened to the well-known door, . . .
That valley, o'er whose crags, and sprinkled trees,
And winding stream, so oft his eye had loved
To linger, gazing, as the eve grew dim,
From Dolwyddelan's Tower; . . . alas! from thence
As from his brother's monument, he turn'd
A loathing eye, and through the rocky vale
Sped on. From morn till noon, from noon till eve,
He travelled on his way: and when at morn
Again the Ocean Chief bestrode his steed,
The heights of Snowdon on his backward glance
Hung like a cloud in heaven. O'er heath and hill
And barren height he rode; and darker now,
In loftier majesty thy mountain-seat,
Star-loving Idris, rose. Nor turn'd he now
Beside Kregennan, where his infant feet

a base son, captain of the country, and an outlaw. Against this man David ap Jenkin rose and contended with him for the sovereignty of the country, and being superior to him in the end, he drew a draught for him, and took him in his bed at Penanon with his concubine, performing by craft what he could not by force; for after many bickerings between Howell and David, David being too weak was faine to fly the country and to go to Ireland, where he was a year or thereabouts, in the end he returned, in a summer time, having himself and all his followers clad in greene; which being come into the country, he dispersed here and there among his friends, lurking by day and walking by night, for fear of his adversaries; and such of the country as happened to have a sight of him and of his followers, said they were fayries, and so ran away."—Guyot's History.

Had trod Ednywain's hall¹; nor loitered he
In the green vale of Powys, till he came
Where Wainway tells its waters underneath
Ancient Mathraval's venerable walls,
Cyveilloc's princely and paternal seat.

But Madoc sprung not forward now to greet
The chief he loved, for from Cyveilloc's hall
The voice of harp and song commingled came;
It was that day the feast of victory there,
Around the Chieftain's board the warriors sate;
The sword and shield and helmet, on the wall
And round the pillars, were in peace hung up,
And, as the flashes of the central fire
At fits arose, a dance of wavy light

¹ "At some distance beyond the two pools called Llynian Cragennan, in the neighbourhood of Cader Idris near the river Kregennan, I saw the remains of Llys Bradwen, the Court or Palace of Ednowain, chief of one of the fifteen tribes of North Wales, either in the reign of Gruffydd ap Cynan, or soon after. The relics are about thirty yards square the entrance above seven feet wide, with a large upright stone on each side by way of door-case, the walls with large stones, uncemented by any mortar. In short, the structure of this palace shows the very low state of architecture in those times, it may be paralleled only by the artless fabric of a cattle house."—Pennant's Snowdon

² Mr Owen, to whose indefatigable industry Cymric literature is so much indebted, has favoured me with a literal version of this remarkable poem

"When the dawn uprose a shout was given,
Foes were sending a luckless destiny
Mangled with ruddy wounds our men after heavy toil, were seen scattered about the wall of the Vale of Maelor.
I chased away the strangers inured to contention,
dauntless in the conflict with red stained weapons
Who insults the brave let him beware his presence!
the result of molesting him is a source of affliction

"Pour out, thou Cup-bearer, thus yielding pleasure, the Horn in the hand of Rhys in the hall of the director of bounty,

the hall of Owen, that has ever been maintained on spoil, the feasting of a thousand thou mayest hear, open are the gates

Cup-bearer! I am sad and silent has he not left me?
Reach thou the horn for mutual drinking,
Full of sorrow am I for the leader of the hue of the ninth wave,*
long and blue its characteristic, gold its cover
so bring it forth with Bragod, a liquor of exalted pledge, into the hand of the froward Gwgan, to requite his deed
The whelps of Goronwy are mighty in the path of wrath, aptly springing whelps, confident their feet,
men who claim a reward in every difficulty;
men in the shout greatly valued, of mighty deliverance
The shepherd of Havern (Severn) it elates the soul to hear them
sounding the Horns of mead that greatly rouse desire.

"Pour out thou the Horn covered with a yellow top, honourably drunk with over frothing mead,
and if thou seekest life to one year's close,
diminish not its respect, since it is not meet;

* The ninth wave is an expression much used by the Welsh Poets. It occurs in the Holman of Myddin. "I will prophesy before the ninth wave."—Arsk p. 135. So in the elegy on Idris. "Ere, of the hue of the spraying foam before the ninth wave"—Arsk p. 217

Play'd o'er the reddening steel. The Chiefs, who late
So well had welded in the work of war
Those weapons, sate around the board, to quaff
The beverage of the brave, and hear their fame.
Mathraval's Lord, the Poet and the Prince,
Cyveilloc stood before them, . . . in his pride;
His hands were on the harp, his eyes were closed,
His head, as if in reverence to receive
The inspiration, bent; anon, he raised
His glowing countenance and brighter eye,
And swept with passionate hand the ringing harp.

Fill high the Hirlas Horn²! to Gruffydd bear
Its frothy beverage, . . from his crimson lance
The invader fled, . . fill high the gold-tipt Horn!

And bear to Gruffydd, the crimson-lanced foe,
wine with pellucid glass around it,
the dragon of Arwstll, safe guard of the borders,
the dragon of Owen, the generous, of the race of Cynvyn, a dragon from his beginning, and never scared by a conflict of triumphant slaughter, or afflicting chase
Men of combat departed for the acquirement of fame, armed sons of the banquet with gleaming weapons,
they requited well their mead, like Belyn's men of yore, fairly did they toil while a single man was left

"Pour out thou the Horn, for it is my purpose that its potent way may incite a sprightly conversation, in the right hand of our leader of devastation,
gleaming beneath the broad light shield,
in the hand of Ednyvred, the lion of his land irreproachable, all dexterous in the push of spears shivered away his shield
The tumult hurries on the two fearless of nature,
they would break as a whirlwind over a fair retreat,
with opposing fronts in the combat of battle where the face of the gold-beangled shield they would quickly break

Thoroughly stained their shafts after head-cleaving blows,
Thoroughly active in defending the glory-bounded Garthran, and there was heard in Maelor a great and sudden outcry,
with horrid scream of men in agony of wounds,
and thronging round the carnage they interwove their paths
As it was in Bangor round the fire of spears, when two sovereigns over horns made discord,
when there was the banquet of Morac Morvrau

"Pour thou out the Horn for I am contemplating where they defend both their mead and their country
Belye the undaunted, of the station of Gwygyr, look to it, who insults him of eagle heart!
And Madoc's only son the generous Tudyr of high renown,
and the claim of the wolf, a slayer with gleaming shafts
Two heroic ones, two lions in their onset,
two of cruel energy, the two sons of Ynry,
two, unrestrained in the day of battle their onward course,
of irresistible progress and of matchless feat
The stroke of the fierce lions fiercely cut through warriors of battle-leading forms, red their ashen thrusters of violence, bending in pursuit with ruthless glory
The shivering of their two shields may be likened to the loud-voiced wind, over the green-sea brink checking the incessant waves, so seemed the scene of Talgarth

"Pour out, thou Cup-bearer, seek not death,
the Horn with honour in festivals
The long blue bugle of high privilege, with ancient silver that covers it, with opposite lips,
and bear to Tudyr, eagle of conflicts,
a prime beverage of the blushing wine.

Heard ye in Maelor the step of war.
 The hastening shout . . the onset ? . . Did ye hear
 The clash and clang of arms . . the battle-din,
 Loud as the roar of Ocean, when the winds
 At midnight are abroad ? . . the yell of wounds . .
 The rage . . the agony ? . . Give to him the Horn
 Whose spear was broken, and whose buckler pierced
 With many a shaft, yet not the less he fought
 And conquered ; . . therefore let Ednyved share
 The generous draught, give him the long blue Horn !
 Pour out again, and fill again the spoil
 Of the wild bull, with silver wrought of yore ;
 And bear the golden lip to Tudyr's hand,
 Eagle of battle ! For Moreiddig fill
 The honourable Hirlas ! . . Where are They ?
 Where are the noble Brethren ? Wolves of war,
 They kept their border well, they did their part,
 Their fame is full, their lot is praise and song . .
 A mournful song to me, a song of woe ! . .
 Brave Brethren ! for their honour brim the cup,
 Which they shall quaff no more.

We drove away
 The strangers from our land ; profuse of life,
 Our warriors rush'd to battle, and the Sun

If there come not in of mead the best of all the liquor from the bowl, thy head is forfeit, to the hand of Moreiddig the encourager of songs ;
 may they become old in fame before their cold depository !
 Brothers blameless ! of highly soaring minds,
 of dauntless vigour earning your deserts,
 warriors who for me have achieved services,
 not old with unsightliness, but old in dexterity, tollers, impellers, leaders that are wolves of the cruel foremost rank, with gory limbs.
 Brave captains of the men of Moenat, a Powysian land,
 both possess the prowess of the brave ;
 the deliverers in every need, ruddy are their weapons,
 securely they would keep their bounds from tumult, praise is their meed, they who are so best. —
 Cry of death was it ? be the two to me changed !
 Oh my Christ ! how sad am I from these wounds !
 By the loss of Moreiddig greatly is his absence felt.

" Pour thou out the Horn, for they do not sigh for me !
 the Hirlas, cheerfully in the hand of Morgant,
 a man who deserves the homage of peculiar praise.
 Like poison to the happy is the track of his spear,
 a matter accursed is the abiding his blade,
 smooth its two sides, keen its edges.

" Pour out, thou Cup-bearer, from a silver vessel
 the solemn festive boon with due respect.
 On the plain of great Gwestun I saw the raw throbbing.
 To baffle Goronwy were a task for a hundred men ;
 the warriors a mutual purpose did accomplish there,
 supporters of the battle, heedless of life.
 The exalted chief did meet the dispersed ones of slaughter, a governor was slain, burnt was a fort on the flood mark of the sea ;
 a magnanimous prisoner they fetched away,
 Mairyo son of Gruffydd, the theme of prophetic song :
 Were they not all bathed in sweat when they returned,
 for full of sunshine were the extended hill and dale ?

" Pour thou out the Horn to the mutually tolling ones,
 the whelps of Owen with connected spears in united leap ;
 they would pour abroad in a noted spot
 a store where the glittering irons go rebounding ;

Saw from his noontide fields their manly strife,
 Pour thou the flowing mead ! Cup-bearer, fill
 The Hirlas ! for hadst thou beheld the day
 Of Llidom, thou hadst known how well the Chieftain
 Deserve this honour now. Cyveilloc's shield
 Were they in danger, when the Invader came ;
 Be praise and liberty their lot on earth,
 And joy be theirs in heaven !

Here ceased the song ;
 Then from the threshold on the rush-strewn floor
 Madoc advanced. Cyveilloc's eye was now
 To present forms awake, but even as still
 He felt his harp-chords throb with dying sounds,
 The heat and stir and passion had not yet
 Subsided in his soul. Again he struck
 The loud-toned harp . . . Pour from the silver vase,
 And brim the honourable Horn, and bear
 The draught of joy to Madoc, . . he who first Explored the desert ways of Ocean, first
 Through the wide waste of sea and sky, held on Undaunted, till upon another World,
 The Lord and Conqueror of the Elements,
 He set his foot triumphant ? Fill for him
 The Hirlas ! fill the honourable Horn !

Madoc and Meller, men nurtured in depredation, for iniquity the stemming opponents,
 the instructors for tumult of a shield-bearing host,
 and froward conductors of subjects trained for conflicts.
 It is heard how from the feast of mead went the chief of Catraeth ;
 upright their purpose with keen-edged weapons ;
 the train of Mynyddoc, for their being consigned to sleep,
 obtained their recording, leaders of a wretched fray !
 None achieved what my warriors did in the hard toll of Maelor, —
 the release of a prisoner belongs to the harmonious eulogy.

" Pour out, thou Cup-bearer, sweet mead distilled of spear-impelling spirit in the sweating toil, from bugle horns proudly overlaid with gold
 to requite the pledge of their lives.
 Of the various distresses that chieftains endure
 no one knows but God and he who speaks.
 A man who will not pay, will not pledge, will abide no law,
 Daniel the auxiliary chief, so fair of loyalty.
 Cup-bearer, great the deed that claims to be honoured,
 of men refraining not from death if they find not hospitality.
 Cup-bearer, a choicest treat of mead must be served us together,
 an ardent fire bright, a light of ardently bright tapers.
 Cup-bearer, thou mightest have seen a house of wrath in Lledwn land,
 a sullenly subjected prey that shall be highly praised.
 Cup-bearer, I cannot be continued here : nor avoid a separation ;
 Be it in Paradise that we be received ;
 with the Supreme of Kings long be our abode, where there is to be seen the secure course of truth."

The passage in the poem would have stood very differently had I seen this literal version before it was printed. I had written from the faithless paraphrase of Evans, in which every thing characteristic or beautiful is lost.

Few persons who read this song can possibly doubt its authenticity. They who chose to consider the Welsh poems as spurious had never examined them. Their groundless and impudent incredulity, however, has been of service to literature, as it occasioned Mr. Turner to write his Vindication, which has settled the question for ever.

This for Mathraval is a happy hour,
When Madoc, her hereditary guest,
Appears within her honour'd walls again,
Madoc, the British Prince, the Ocean Lord,
Who, never for injustice rear'd his arm;
Whose presence fills the heart of every foe
With fear, the heart of every friend with joy;
Give him the Hirlas Horn, fill, till the draught
Of joy shall quiver o'er the golden brim!
In happy hour the hero hath return'd!
In happy hour the friend, the brother treads
Cyveilloc's floor!

He sprung to greet his guest;
The cordial grasp of fellowship was given;
So in Mathraval there was double joy
On that illustrious day; they gave their guest
The seat of honour, and they fill'd for him
The Hirlas Horn. Cyveilloc and his Chiefs,
All eagerly, with wonder-waiting eyes,
Look to the Wanderer of the Water's tale.
Nor mean the joy which kindled Madoc's brow,
When as he told of daring enterprise
Crown'd with deserved success. Intent they heard
Of all the blessings of that happier clime;
And when the adventurer spake of soon return,
Each on the other gazed, as if to say,
Methinks it were a goodly lot to dwell
In that fair land in peace.

Then said the Prince
Of Powys, Madoc, at an happy time
Thou hast toward Mathraval bent thy way;
For on the morrow, in the eye of light,
Our hards will hold their congress. Seekest thou
Comrades to share success? proclaim abroad
Thine invitation there, and it will spread
Far as our fathers' ancient tongue is known.

Thus at Mathraval went the Hirlas round;
A happy day was that! Of other years
They talk'd, of common toils, and fields of war
Where they fought side by side; of Corwen's scene
Of glory, and of comrades now no more: . .
Themes of delight, and grief which brought its joy.
Thus they beguiled the pleasant hours, while night
Waned fast away; then late they laid them down,
Each on his bed of rushes, stretch'd around
The central fire.

The Sun was newly risen
When Madoc join'd his host, no longer now
Clad as the conquering chief of Maelor,
In princely arms, but in his nobler robe,
The sky-blue mantle of the Bard, arrayed.
So for the place of meeting they set forth;
And now they reach'd Melangell's lonely church.
Amid a grove of evergreens it stood,
A garden and a grove, where every grave
Was deck'd with flowers, or with unfading plants

1 "In Ponant-Melangell church was the tomb of St. Monacella, who, protecting a hare from the pursuit of Brocwall Yecytharog, Princes of Powys, he gave her land to found a religious house, of which she became first Abbess. Her hard bed is shown in the cleft of a neighbouring rock, her tomb was in a little chapel, now the vestry, and her image is still to be seen in the churchyard, where is also that of Edward, eldest son of Owen Gwynedd, who was set aside from the succession on account of a broken nose, and lying here for O'ergrown, sad rue, and funeral rosemary.

Here Madoc paused. The morn is young, quoth he,
A little while to old remembrance given
Will not belate us. . . Many a year hath fled,
Cyveilloc, since you led me here, and told
The legend of the Saint. Come! . . be not loth!
We will not loiter long. . . So soon to mount
The bark, which will for ever bear me hence,
I would not willingly pass by one spot
Which thus recalls the thought of other times,
Without a pilgrim's visit.

Thus he spake,
And drew Cyveilloc through the church-yard porch,
To the rude image of Saint Monacel.¹
Dost thou remember, Owen, said the Prince,
When first I was thy guest in early youth,
That once, as we had wandered here at eve,
You told, how here a poor and hunted hare
Ran to the Virgin's feet, and look'd to her
For life? . . I thought, when listening to the tale,
She had a merciful heart, and that her face
Must with a saintly gentleness have beam'd,
When beasts could read its virtue. Here we sate
Upon the jutting root of this old yew. . .
Dear friend! so pleasant didst thou make those days,
That in my heart, long as my heart shall beat,
Minutest recollections still will live,
Still be the source of joy.

As Madoc spake,
His glancing eye fell on a monument,
Around whose base the rosemary droop'd down,
As yet not rooted well. Sculptured above,
A warrior lay; the shield was on his arm;
Madoc approach'd, and saw the blazonry. . .
A sudden chill ran through him, as he read,
Here Yorwerth lies, . . it was his brother's grave.

Cyveilloc took him by the hand: For this,
Madoc, was I so loth to enter here!
He sought the sanctuary, but close upon him
The murderers follow'd, and by yonder cope
The stroke of death was given. All I could
Was done; . . I saw him here consign'd to rest,
Daily due masses for his soul are sung,
And duly hath his grave been deck'd with flowers.

So saying, from the place of death he led
The silent Prince. But lately, he pursued,
Llewelyn was my guest, thy favourite boy.
For thy sake and his own, it was my hope
That at Mathraval he would make his home:
He had not needed then a father's love.
But he, I know not on what enterprise,
Was brooding ever; and those secret thoughts
Drew him away. God prosper the brave boy!
It were a happy day for this poor land
If e'er Llewelyn mount his rightful throne.

safety, was slain not far off, at a place called Bwlch Croes Yorwerth. On his shield is inscribed, "Hic jacet Edward." "Gough's Camden."

Mr. Gough has certainly been mistaken concerning one of these monuments, if not both. What he supposed to be the image of St. Monacel is the monumental stone of some female of distinction, the figure being recumbent, with the hands joined, and the feet resting upon some animal. And the letters which he read for Edward, are plainly Et Mado.

XL

THE GORSEDD.

THE place of meeting was a high hill-top,¹
Nor bower'd with trees nor broken by the plough,
Remote from human dwellings and the stir
Of human life, and open to the breath
And to the eye of Heaven. In days of old,
There had the circling stones been planted; there,
From earliest ages, the primeval lore,
Through Bard to Bard with reverence handed down.
They whom to wonder, or the love of song,
Or reverence of their fathers' ancient rites
Drew thither, stood without the ring of stones.
Cyveilioc entered to the initiate Bards,
Himself, albeit his hands were stain'd with war,
Initiate; for the Order, in the lapse
Of years and in their nation's long decline
From the first rigour of their purity
Somewhat had fallen.² The Masters of the Song
Were clad in azure robes, for in that hue
Deduced from Heaven, which o'er a sinful world
Spreads its eternal canopy serene,
Meet emblem did the ancient Sages see
Of unity and peace and spotless truth.

Within the stones of Federation there,
On the green turf, and under the blue sky,
A noble band, the Bards of Britain stood,
Their heads in reverence bare, and bare of foot.
A deathless brotherhood! Cyveilioc there,
Lord of the Hirlas; Llywarc there was seen,
And old Cynddelow, to whose lofty song,
So many a time amid his father's court
Resigning up his soul, had Madoc given
The flow of feeling loose. But Madoc's heart
Was full; old feelings and remembrances,
And thoughts from which was no escape, arose;
He was not there to whose sweet lay, so oft,

¹ The Bardic meetings, or Gorseddau, were held in the open air, on a conspicuous place, while the sun was above the horizon, for they were to perform every thing in the eye of light, and in the face of the sun. The place was set apart by forming a Circle of btones, with a large stone in the middle, beside which the presiding Bard stood. This was termed Cyic Cynghair, or the Circle of Federation, and the middle stone Maen Llog, the Stone of Covenant.

Mr Owen's very curious introduction to his translation of Llywarc Hen has supplied me with materials for the account of the Gorsedd, introduced in the poem. That it might be as accurate as possible, he himself and Edward Williams the Bard did me the favour of examining it. To their knowledge and to that of Mr. Turner, the historian of the Anglo-Saxons, and to the liberality and friendliness with which they have ever been willing to assist me therewith, I am greatly and variously indebted.

The Bard at these meetings wore the distinguishing dress of his order: a robe of sky blue, as an emblem of truth, being uncoloured, and also as a type, that, amid the storms of the moral world, he must assume the serenity of the unclouded sky. The dress of the Owydd, the third order, or first into which the candidate could be admitted, was green. The Awengyddion, the Disciples, wore a variegated dress of blue, green, and white, the three Bardic colours, white being the dress of the Druids, who were the second order. The bards

With all a brother's fond delight, he lov'd
To listen, . . . Hoel was not there! . . . the hand
That once so well, amid the triple chords,
Moved in the rapid maze of harmony,
It had no motion now; the lips were dumb
Which knew all tones of passion; and that heart,
That warm, ebullient heart, was cold and still,
Upon its bed of clay. He look'd around,
And there was no familiar countenance,
None but Cynddelow's face, which he had learnt
In childhood, and old age had set its mark,
Making unsightly alteration there.
Another generation had sprung up,
And made him feel how fast the days of man
Flow by, how soon their number is told out.
He knew not then that Llywarc's lay should give His future fame; his spirit on the past
Brooding, beheld with no forefeeling joy
The rising sons of song, who there essay'd
Their eaglet flight. But there among the youth
In the green vesture of their earliest rank,
Or with the aspirants clad in motley garb,
Young Benfras stood; and, one whose favoured race
Heaven with the hereditary power had blest,
The old Gwalchmai's not degenerate child;
And there another Elinon; gifted youths,
And heirs of immortality on earth,
Whose after-strains, through many a distant age
Cambria shall boast, and love the songs that tell
The fame of Owen's house.

There, in the eye
Of light and in the face of day, the rites
Began. Upon the stone of Covenant
First, the sheathed sword was laid; the Master then Upraised his voice, and cried, Let them who seek
The high degree and sacred privilege
Of Bardic science, and of Cimbric lore,
Here to the Bards of Britain make their claim!
Thus having said, the Master bade the youths
Approach the place of peace, and merit there
The Bard's most honourable name³: With that, stood within the circle bareheaded and barefooted, and the ceremony opened by sheathing a sword and laying it on the Stone of Covenant. The Bardic traditions were then recited.

² "By the principles of the Order a Bard was never to bear arms, nor in any other manner to become a party in any dispute, either political or religious; nor was a naked weapon ever to be held in his presence, for under the title of Bardd Yng Prydarn, Bard of the Isle of Britain, he was recognised as the sacred Herald of Peace. He could pass unmolested from one country to another, where his character was known; and whenever he appeared in his uncoloured robe, attention was given to him on all occasions; if it was even between armies in the heat of action, both parties would instantly desist."—Owen's Llywarc Hen.

Six of the elder Bards are enumerated in the Triads as having borne arms in violation of their Order; but in these latter days the perversion had become more frequent. Meiler, the Bard of Gruffydd ab Cynan, distinguished himself in war; Cynddelw, Bryddad Mawr, the Great Bard, was eminent for his valour; and Gwalchmai boasts in one of his poems that he had defended the Marches against the Saxons."—Warrington.

³ No people seem to have understood the poetical character so well as the Welsh; witness their Triads.

"The three primary requisites of poetical Genius; an eye

Heirs and transmitters of the ancient light,
The youths advanced; they heard the Cimbric lore,¹
From earliest days preserved; they struck their harps,
And each in due succession raised the song.

Last of the aspirants, as of greener years,
Young Caradoc advanced; his lip as yet
Scarce darkened with its down, his flaxen locks
Wreathed in contracting ringlets waving low;
Bright were his large blue eyes, and kindled now
With that same passion that inflamed his cheek;
Yet in his cheek there was the sickliness
Which thought and feeling leave, wearing away
The hue of youth. Inclining on his harp,
He, while his comrades in probation song
Approved their claim, stood hearkening, as it seem'd,
And yet like unintelligible sounds

that can see Nature, a heart that can feel Nature, and a resolution that dares follow Nature.

"The three foundations of Genius: the gift of God, man's exertion, and the events of life.

"The three indispensables of Genius; understanding, feeling, and perseverance.

"The three things which constitute a poet; genius, knowledge, and impulse.

"The three things that enrich Genius: contentment of mind, the cherishing of good thoughts, and exercising the memory."—E. Williams's Poems. Owen's Lygware Hen.

² "Gavran, the son of Aeddan Vradog ab Dyrnwal Hen, a chieftain of distinguished celebrity in the latter part of the fifth century. Gavran, Cadwallon, and Gwenddolau, were the heads of the three faithful tribes of Britain. The family of Gavran obtained that title by accompanying him to sea to discover some islands, which, by a traditional memorial, were known by the name of Gwerddonau Llao, or the green islands of the Ocean. This expedition was not heard of afterwards, and the situation of those islands became lost to the Britons. This event, the voyage of Merddin Emrys with the twelve Bards, and the expedition of Madoc, were called the three losses by disappearance."—Cambrian Biography.

Of these Islands, or Green Spots of the Floods, there are some singular superstitions. They are the abode of the Tylwyth Teg, or the Fair Family, the souls of the virtuous Druids, who, not having been Christians, cannot enter the Christian heaven, but enjoy this heaven of their own. They however discover a love of mischief, neither becoming happy Spirits, nor consistent with their original character; for they love to visit the earth, and, seizing a man, inquire whether he will travel above wind, mid wind, or below wind; above wind is a giddy and terrible passage, below wind is through bush and brake; the middle is a safe course. But the spell of security is, to catch hold of the grass, for these beings have not power to destroy a blade of grass. In their better moods they come over and carry the Welsh in their boats. He who visits these islands imagines on his return that he has been absent only a few hours, when, in truth, whole centuries have passed away.

If you take a turf from St. David's church-yard, and stand upon it on the sea-shore, you behold these islands. A man once, who had thus obtained sight of them, immediately went to sea to find them; but they disappeared, and his search was in vain. He returned, looked at them again from the enchanted turf, again set sail, and failed again. The third

He heard the symphony and voice attuned;
Even in such feelings as, all undefined,
Come with the flow of waters to the soul,
Or with the motions of the moonlight sky.
But when his bidding came, he at the call
Arising from that dreamy mood, advanced,
Threw back his mantle, and began the lay.

Where are the sons of Gavran? where his tribe
The faithful? following their beloved chief,
They the Green Islands of the Ocean sought;
Nor human tongue hath told, nor human ear,
Since from the silver shores they went their way,
Hath heard their fortunes. In his crystal Ark,
Whither sail'd Merlin with his band of Bards,
Old Merlin, master of the mystic lore?³
Belike his crystal Ark, instinct with life, time he took the turf into his vessel, and stood upon it till he reached them.

"The inhabitants of Arran More, the largest of the south isles of Arran, on the coast of Galway, are persuaded that in a clear day they can see Hy Brazil, the Enchanted Island, from the coast, the Paradise of the Pagan Irish"—Collectanea de Rebus Hibernicis. Beauclerk's Ancient Topography of Ireland.

General Vallancey relates a different history of this superstition. "The old Irish," he says, "say, that great part of Ireland was swallowed up by the sea, and that the sunken part often rises, and is frequently to be seen on the horizon from the Northern coast. On the North-west of the island they call this enchanted country Tír Huid, or the city of Hud, believing that the city stands there which once possessed all the riches of the world, and that its key lies buried under some druidical monument. When Mr. Burton, in 1765, went in search of the Ogham monument, called Cosane's Tomb, on Callan mountain, the people could not be convinced that the search was made after an inscription, but insisted that he was seeking after an Enchanted Key that lay buried with the Hero, and which, when found, would restore the Enchanted City to its former splendour, and convert the moory heights of Callan mountain into rich and fruitful plains. They expect great riches whenever this city is discovered."

This enchanted country is called O Bransil, or O Brazil, which, according to General Vallancey's interpretation, signifies the Royal Island. He says it is evidently the lost city of Arabian story, visited by their fabulous prophet Houdi, . . . the City and Paradise of Irem! He compares this tradition with the remarks of Whitehurst on the Giant's Causeway, and suspects that it refers to the lost Atlantis, which Whitehurst thinks perhaps existed there.

Is that remarkable phenomenon, known in Sicily by the name of Morgaine la Fay's works, ever witnessed on the coast of Ireland? If so, the superstition is explained by an actual apparition. — I had not, when this note was written, seen Mr. Latham's account of a similar phenomenon at Hastings, (Phil. Trans. 1798), which completely establishes what I had here conjectured. Mr. Nicholson, in his remarks on it, says the same thing has been seen from Broadstairs, and that these appearances are much more frequent and general than has usually been supposed.

³ The name of Merlin has been so canonised by Ariosto and our divine Spenser, that it would have been a bereavement to poetry to have altered it to its genuine orthography.

Merddin was the bard of Emrys Wladig, the Ambrosius of Saxon history, by whose command he erected Stonehenge, in memory of the Plot of the Long Knives, when, by the treachery of Gwrythyrn, or Vortigern, and the Saxons, three hundred British chiefs were massacred. He built it on the

Obedient to the mighty Master, reach'd
The Land of the Departed; there, belike, site of a former Circle. The structure itself affords proof that it cannot have been raised much earlier, inasmuch as it deviates from the original principle of Bardic circles, where no appearance of art was to be admitted. Those of Avebury, Stanton-Drew, Keswick, &c. exemplify this. It is called by the Welsh Gwaith Emrys, the work of Ambrosius. Drayton's reproach, therefore, is ill founded,

"Ill did those mighty men to trust thee with their story, Thou hast forgot their names who reared thee for their glory."

The Welsh traditions say that Merddin made a House of Glass, in which he went to sea, accompanied by the Nine Cyfwerdd Bards, and was never heard of more. This was one of the Three disappearances from the Isle of Britain. Merddin is also one of the Three principal Christian Bards of Britain, Merddin Wylt and Taliesin are the other two.—Cambrian Biography.

A diving House of Glass is also introduced in the Spanish Romance of Alexander, written about the middle of the 14th century, by Joan Lorenzo Segura de Astorga —

"Unas facianas suelen los gentes retraer,
Non yas en escrito, é es grave de creer,
Si es verdat ó non, yo non he y que veer,
Pero no lo quiero en olvido poner.

"Dicen que por saber que facen los pescados,
Como viven los chicos entre los mas granados,
Fiso cuba de vidrio con puntos bien cerrados,
Metios en ella dentro con dos de sus criados.

"Estos furon catados de todos los mejores,
Por tal que non oviesen dona los traedores,
Ca que el é que ellos avrien aguardadores,
Non farien á sus guisas los malos revoltiores.

"Fu de bona betume la cuba aguisada,
Fu con bonas cadenas bien presa é calzada,
Fu con priegos firmes á las aaves pregada,
Que fonder non se podliesse é estodliesse colgada.

"Mando que quinze dias lo dexassen hy durar,
Las aaves con todesto pensassen de tost andar,
Assaz podrie en esto saber é mesurar,
Metria en escrito los secretos del mar

"La cuba fue fecha en quel Rey acia,
A los unos pesaba, á los otros placia
Bien cuidaban algunos que nunca ende saldria,
Mas destalado era que en mar non moriria

"Andabal bon Rey en su casa cerrada,
Seia grant corazon en angosta posada;
Veia toda la mar de pescados poblada,
No es bestia nel sieglo que non fus y trobada.

"Non vive en el mundo nenguna creatura
Que non cria la mar semeiante figura;
Traen enemisadas entre sí por natura,
Los fuertes á los flacos danles mala ventura.

"Estonce vio el Rey en aquellas andadas
Como echan los unos á los otros celadas
Dicen que ende furon presas é sossacadas,
Furon desent aca por el sieglo usadas.

"Tanto se acogien al Rey los pescados
Como si los ovies el Rey por subuagados,

They in the clime of immortality,
Themselves immortal, drink the gales of bliss,

Vienen fasta la cuba todos cabececolgados,
Tremian todos antel como mosos moiadens.

"Juraba Alexandre per lo su diestro llado,
Que nunca fura domes mejor accompanado;
De los pueblos del mar tovose por pagado,
Contaba que avie grant emperio ganado.

"Otra faciana vio en esos pobladores,
Vio que los maiores comien á los menores,
Los chicos á los grandes tenienos por seniores,
Ma'traen los mas fuertes á los que son menores.

"Diz el Rey, soberbia es en todolos lugares,
Forcia es enna tierra é dentro ennos mares:
Las aaves esao mismo non se catan por pares,
Dios confunda tal vicio que tien tantos lugares.

"Nacio entre los angelos é fizo muchos caer,
Arramónlos Dios per la tierra, é díoles grant poder,
La menada non puede su derecho aver
Ascondio la cabeza, non osaba parecer.

"Quien mas puede mas face, non de bien, mas de mal,
Quien mas á aver mas quier, é morre por ganál;
Non veeria de su grado nenguno si igual:
Mal peccado, nenguno no es á Dios leal.

"Las aaves é las bestias, los omes, los pescados,
Todos son entre sí á bandos derramados,
De vicio é de soberbia son todos entregados,
Los flacos de los fuertes andan desafiados.

"Se como sabel Rey bien todesto omar
Quisicase assimismo á derechas lugar,
Bien debie un poco su lengua refrenar,
Que en tant fieras grandias non quisiesse andar.

"De su gradol Rey mas oviera estado
Mas á sus criaciones faciesles pesado;
Temiendo la ocasion que suel venir privado,
Sacaronlo bien ante del termino pasado."

The sweet flow of language and metre in so early a poem is very remarkable, but no modern language can boast of monuments so early and so valuable as the Spanish. To attempt to versify this passage would be laborious and unprofitable. Its import is that Alexander, being desirous to see how the Fish lived, and in what manner the great Fish behaved to the little ones, ordered a vessel of glass to be made, and fastened with long chains to his ships, that it might not sink too deep. He entered it with two chosen servants, leaving orders that the ships should continue their course, and draw him up at the end of fifteen days. The vessel had been made perfectly water-tight. He descended, and found the fish as curious to see him as he had been to see the fish. They crowded round his machine, and trembled before him as if he had been their conqueror, so that he thought he had acquired another empire. But Alexander perceived the same system of tyranny in the water as on the land, the great eat the little, and the little eat the less; upon which tyranny he made sundry moral observations, which would have come with more propriety from any other person than from himself. However, he observed the various devices which were used for catching fish, and which, in consequence of this discovery, have been used in the world ever since. His people were afraid some accident might happen, and drew him up long before the fifteen days were expired.

The Poet himself does not believe this story. "People

Which o'er Flathinnis¹ breathe eternal spring,
 Blending whatever odours make the gale
 Of evening sweet, whatever melody
 Charms the wood-traveller In their high roof'd halls
 There, with the Chiefs of other days, feel they
 The mingled joy pervade them? Or beneath
 The mid-sea waters, did that crystal Ark
 Down to the secret depths of Ocean plunge
 Its fated crew? Dwell they in coral bowers
 With Mermaid loves, teaching their paramours
 The songs that stir the sea, or make the winds
 Hush, and the waves be still? In fields of joy
 Have they their home, where central fires maintain
 Perpetual summer, and an emerald light
 Pervades the green translucent element?²

say so "he says, "but it is not in writing, and it is a thing difficult to believe. It is not my business to examine whether it be true or not, but I do not choose to pass it over unnoticed." The same story was pointed out to me by Mr Coleridge in one of the oldest German poems, and what is more remarkable, it is mentioned by one of the old Welsh bards — Davies's Celtic Researches, p 196. Jests and the fictions of romance and superstition, seem to have travelled everywhere.

¹ Flath-innis, the Noble Island lies surrounded with tempests in the Western Ocean. I fear the account of this Paradise is but apocryphal, as it rests upon the evidence of Macpherson, and has every internal mark of a modern fiction.

"In former days there lived in Skerr² a magician † of high renown. The blast of wind waited for his commands at the gate, he rode the tempest, and the troubled wave offered itself as a pillow for his repose. His eye followed the sun by day, his thoughts travelled from star to star in the season of night, he thirsted after things unseen, he sighed over the narrow circle which surrounded his days: he often sat in silence beneath the sound of his groves, and he blamed the careless billows that rolled between him and the Green Isle of the West.

"One day, as the Magician of Skerr sat thoughtful upon a rock, a storm arose on the sea, a cloud, under whose squalid skirts the foaming waters complained, rushed suddenly into the bay, and from its dark womb at once issued forth a boat with its white sails bent to the wind, and hung around with a hundred moving oars. But it was destitute of mariners itself seeming to live and move. An unusual terror seized the aged Magician, he heard a voice though he saw no human form. 'Arise! behold the boat of the heroes' arise, and see the Green Isle of those who have passed away!'

"He felt a strange force on his limbs: he saw no person, but he moved to the boat; immediately the wind changed, in the bosom of the cloud he sailed away. Seven days gleamed faintly round him, seven nights added their gloom to his darkness: his ears were stunned with shrill voices, the dull murmurs of winds passed him on either side, he slept not but his eyes were not heavy, he ate not, but he was not hungry on the eighth day the waves swelled into mountains, the boat was rocked violently from side to side, the darkness thickened around him, when a thousand voices at once cried aloud, 'The Isle! the Isle!' The billows opened wide before him, the calm land of the departed rushed in light on his eyes.

"It was not a light that dazzled, but a pure, distinguishing, and placid light, which called forth every object to view in their most perfect form. The Isle spread large before him like a pleasing dream of the soul, where distance faded not on the sight, where nearness fatigued not the eye. It had its

Twice have the sons of Britain left her shores,
 As the fledged eaglets quit their native nest;
 Twice over ocean have her fearless sons
 For ever sail'd away. Again they launch
 Their vessels to the deep... Who mounts the bark?
 The son of Owen, the beloved Prince,
 Who never for injustice rear'd his arm.
 Respects his enterprise, ye Ocean Waves!
 Ye Winds of Heaven, waft Madoc on his way!
 The Waves of Ocean, and the Winds of Heaven,
 Became his ministers, and Madoc found
 The world he sought.

Who seeks the better land?
 Who mounts the vessel for a world of peace?
 He who hath felt the throb of pride, to hear

gently sloping hills of green, nor did they wholly want their clouds, but the clouds were bright and transparent, and each involved in its bosom the source of a stream, a beautiful stream which, wandering down the steep, was like the faint notes of the half touched harp to the distant ear. The valleys were open and free to the ocean, trees loaded with leaves which scarcely waved to the light breeze, were scattered on the green declivities and rising ground, the rude winds walked not on the mountain, no storm took its course through the sky. All was calm and bright, the pure sun of Autumn shone from his blue sky on the fields; he hastened not to the West for repose, nor was he seen to rise from the East: he sits in his mid-day height, and looks obliquely on the Noble Isle.

"In each valley is its slow moving stream, the pure waters swell over the bank yet abstain from the fields, the showers disturb them not nor are they lessened by the heat of the sun. On the rising hill are the halls of the departed, the high-roofed dwellings of the heroes of old.

"The departed according to the Tale retained, in the midst of their happiness, a warm affection for their country and living friends. They sometimes visited the first, and by the latter as the Bard expresses it, they were transiently seen in the hour of peril and especially on the near approach of death, it was then that at midnight the death devoted to use the words of the Tale, were suddenly awakened by a strange knocking at their gates: it was then that they heard the indistinct voice of their departed friends calling them away to the Noble Isle, 'a sudden joy rushed in upon their minds, and that pleasing melancholy which looks forward to happiness in a distant land.' — Macpherson's Introduction to the History of Great Britain.

"The softer sex, among the Celts," he adds, "passed with their friends to the fortunate isles, their beauty increased with the change, and, to use the words of the Bard, they were ruddy lights in the Island of Joy."

² I have supplied Merlin with light when he arrived at his world of Mermankind, but not for his submarine voyage, let Paracelsus do this.

"Urim and Thummim were the Philosopher's Stone, and it was this which gave light in the Ark.

"For God commanded Noah to make a clear light in the Ark, which some take for a window. But since the Text saith, 'Day and night shall no more cease,' it seems it did then cease, and therefore there could be no exterior light.

"The Rabbis say, that the Hebrew word Zohar, which the Chaldees translate Neher, is only to be found in this place. Other Hebrew doctors believe it to have been a precious stone hung up in the Ark, which gave light to all living creatures therein. This the greatest circumbule could not do, nor any precious stone which is only natural. But the Universal Spirit, fixed in a transparent body, shines like the sun in glory, and this was the light which God commanded Noah to make." — Paracelsus's Urim and Thummim.

² A magician is called Druid in the Gaelic.

Our old illustrious annals; who was taught
To list the fame of Arthur, to reverse
Great Caratach's unconquer'd soul, and call
That gallant chief his countryman, who led
The wrath of Britain from her chalky shores
To drive the Roman robber. He who loves
His country, and who feels his country's shame;
Whose bones amid a land of servitude
Could never rest in peace; who if he saw
His children slaves, would feel a pang in Heaven, . .
He mounts the bark, to seek for liberty.

Who seeks the better land? The wretched one
Whose joys are blasted all, whose heart is sick,
Who hath no hope, to whom all change is gain,
To whom remember'd pleasures strike a pang
That only guilt should know, . . he mounts the bark,
The Bard will mount the bark of banishment;
The harp of Cambria shall in other lands
Remind the Cambrian of his father's fame; . .
The Bard will seek the land of liberty,
The world of peace. . . O Prince, receive the Bard!

He ceased the song. His cheek, now fever-flush'd
Was turn'd to Madoc, and his asking eye
Linger'd on him in hope: nor linger'd long
The look expectant; forward sprung the Prince,
And gave to Caradoc the right-hand pledge,
And for the comrade of his enterprize,
With joyful welcome, hail'd the joyful Bard.

Nor needed now the Searcher of the Sea
Announce his enterprize, by Caradoc
In song announced so well; from man to man
The busy murmur spread, while from the Stone
Of Covenant the sword was taken up,
And from the Circle of the Ceremony
The Bards went forth, their meeting now fulfill'd.
The multitude, unheeding all beside,
Of Madoc and his noble enterprize
Held stirring converse on their homeward way,
And spread abroad the tidings of a Land,
Where Plenty dwelt with Liberty and Peace.

XII.

DINEVAWR.

So in the court of Powys pleasantly,
With hawk and hound afield, and harp in hall,

¹ Rhys was one of the bravest, wisest, most liberal, and most celebrated of the princes of South Wales. He is thus praised in the Pentateuch :—

"Quis quæst heroem calamo describere tantum,
Quantus ut ipse fuit, modo civibus Hectoris instat,
Fortis in hostiles modo turmas instat Achilles,
Ultus avos patriæ fere sexaginta per annos,
Quot fusas acies, quot castra recepta, quot urbes,
Spes patriæ, columen pacis, lux urbis et orbis,
Gentis honos, decus armorum, fulmenque duelli,
Quo neque pace prior, neque fortior alter in armis."

In Hearne's Collection of Curious Discourses, are these funeral verses upon Lord Rhys, as preserved by Camden :—

"Nobis Cambrensis cecidit diadema decoris,
Hoc est Rheus oblit, Cambria tota gemit.
Subtrahitur, sed non moritur, quia semper habetur
Ipseus egregium nomen in orbe novum.

The days went by; till Madoc, for his heart
Was with Cadwallon, and in early spring
Must he set forth to join him over-sea,
Took his constrain'd farewell. To Dinevavr
He bent his way, whence many a time with Rhys
Had he gone forth to smite the Saxon foe.
The son of Owen greets his father's friend
With reverential joy; nor did the Lord
Of Dinevavr with cold or deaden'd heart
Welcome the Prince he loved; though not with joy
Unmingled now, nor the proud consciousness,
Which in the man of tried and approved worth
Could bid an equal hail. Henry had seen
The Lord of Dinevavr between his knees
Vow homage; yea, the Lord of Dinevavr
Had knelt in homage to that Saxon king,
Who set a price upon his father's head,
That Saxon, on whose soul his mother's blood
Cried out for vengeance. Madoc saw the shame
Which Rhys would fain have hidden, and, in grief
For the degenerate land, rejoiced at heart
That now another country was his home.

Musing on thoughts like these did Madoc roam
Alone along the Towy's winding shore.
The beavers² in its bank had hollow'd out
Their social place of dwelling, and had damm'd
The summer-current with their perfect art
Of instinct, erring not in means nor end.
But as the floods of spring had broken down
Their barrier, so its breaches unrepair'd
Were left; and round the piles, which, deeper driven,
Still held their place, the eddying waters whirl'd.
Now in those habitations desolate
One sole survivor dwelt: him Madoc saw,
Labouring alone, beside his hermit house;
And in that mood of melancholy thought, . .
For in his boyhood he had loved to watch
Their social work, and for he knew that man
In bloody sport had well-nigh rooted out
The poor community, . . the ominous sight
Became a grief and burthen. Eve came on;
The dry leaves rustled to the wind, and fell
And floated on the stream; there was no voice
Save of the mournful rooks, who overhead
Wing'd their long line; for fragrance of sweet flowers,
Only the odour of the autumnal leaves; . .
All sights and sounds of sadness. . . And the place
To that despondent mood was ministrant; . .

Hic tegitur, sed detegitur, quia fama perennis
Non sinit illustrem voce latere duem.
Excessat probitate modum, sensu probitatem,
Eloquio sensum, moribus eloquium."

Rhys ap Griffith, say the Chroniclers, was no less remarkable in courage, than in the stature and lineaments of his body, wherein he exceeded most men.—Royal Tythes.

² When Giraldus Cambrensis wrote, that is, at the time whereof the poem treats, the only Beavers remaining in Wales or England were in the Towy. "Inter universos Cambria, seu etiam Loegria fuvios, solus hic (Tewi) castores habet."

The Beaver is mentioned also in the laws of Hoel Dda, and one of those dark deep resting-places or pits of the river Conway, which the Spaniards call the remansos del rio, is called the Beavers' pool.

Among the hills of Gwyneth and its wilds
And mountain glens, perforce he cherish'd still
The hope of mountain liberty; they braced
And knit the heart and arm of hardihood; . .
But here, in these green meads, by these low slopes
And hanging groves, attempter'd to the scene,
His spirit yielded. As he loiter'd on,
There came toward him one in peasant garb,
And call'd his name; . . he started at the sound,
For he had heeded not the man's approach;
And now that sudden and familiar voice
Came on him, like a vision. So he stood
Gazing, and knew him not in the dim light,
Till he again cried, Madoc! . . then he woke,
And knew the voice of Ririd, and sprang on,
And fell upon his neck, and wept for joy
And sorrow.

O my brother! Ririd cried,
Long, very long it is since I have heard
The voice of kindness! . . Let me go with thee!
I am a wanderer in my father's land, . .
Hoel he kill'd, and Yorwerth hath he slain;
Ilewelyn hath not where to hide his head
In his own kingdom; Rodri is in chains; . .
Let me go with thee, Madoc, to some land
Where I may look upon the sun, nor dread
The light that may betray me; where at night
I may not, like a hunted beast, rouse up,
If the leaves rustle over me.

The Lord
Of Ocean struggled with his swelling heart.
Let me go with thee? . . but thou didst not doubt
Thy brother? . . Let thee go? . . with what a joy,
Ririd, would I collect the remnant left, . .
The wretched remnant now of Owen's house,
And mount the bark of willing banishment,
And leave the tyrant to his Saxon friends,
And to his Saxon yoke! . . I urged him thus,
'Curb'd down my angry spirit, and besought
Only that I might bid our brethren come,
And share my exile; . . and he spurn'd my prayer! . .
Thou hast a gentle pleader at his court;
She may prevail; till then abide thou here; . .
But not in this, the garb of fear and guilt.
Come thou to Dinevawr, . . assume thyself; . .
The good old Rhys will bid thee welcome there,
And the great Palace, like a sanctuary,
Is safe.¹ If then Queen Emma's plea should fail,
My timely bidding hence shall summon thee,
When I shall spread the sail. . . Nay, hast thou learnt
Suspicion? . . Rhys is noble, and no deed
Of treachery ever sullied his fair fame!

Madoc then led his brother to the hall
Of Rhys. I bring to thee a supplicant,
O King, he cried; thou wert my father's friend!
And till our barks be ready in the spring,

¹ Dinas Fawr, the Great Palace. It was regarded as an asylum.

² Properly Gwgan; but I have adapted the orthography to an English eye. This very characteristic story is to be found as narrated in the poem, in Mr. Yorke's curious work upon the Royal Tribes of Wales. Gwgan's demand was for five poems, instead of ten marks; this is the only liberty I have taken with the fact, except that of fitting it to the business of

I know that here the persecuted son
Of Owen will be safe.

A welcome guest!

The old warrior cried; by his good father's soul,
He is a welcome guest at Dinevawr!
And rising as he spake, he pledged his hand
In hospitality. . . How now! quoth he,
This raiment ill becoms the princely son
Of Owen! . . Ririd at his words was led Apart; they wash'd his feet, they gave to him
Fine linen as becom'd his royal race,
The tunic of soft texture woven well,
The broider'd girdle, the broad mantle edged
With fur, and flowing low, the bonnet last,
Form'd of some forest martin's costly spolia.
The Lord of Dinevawr sat at the dice
With Madoc, when he saw him thus array'd,
Returning to the hall. Ay! this is well!
The noble Chief exclaim'd: 'tis as of yore,
When in Aberfraw, at his father's board,
We sat together, after we had won
Peace and rejoicing with our own right hands,
By Corwen, where, commixt with Saxon blood,
Along its rocky channel the dark Dee
Roll'd darker waters. . . Would that all his house
Had, in their day of trouble, thought of me,
And honour'd me like this! David respects
Deheubarth's strength, nor would respect it less,
When such protection leagu'd its cause with Heaven.

I had forgot his messenger! quoth he,
Arising from the dice. Go, bid him here!
He came this morning at an ill star'd hour,
To Madoc he pursued; my lazy grooms
Had let the hounds play havoc in my flock,
And my old blood was chafed. I faith, the King
Hath chosen well his messenger: . . he saw
That in such mood, I might have render'd him
A hot and hasty answer, and hath waited,
Perhaps to David's service and to mine,
My better leisure.

Now the Messenger

Enter'd the hall; Goagan of Powys-land,²
He of Caer-Einion was it, who was charged
From Gwyneth to Deheubarth; a brave man
Of copious speech. He told the royal son
Of Gryffidd, the descendant of the line
Of Rhys-ab-Tudyr mawr, that he came there
From David, son of Owen, of the stock
Of kingly Cynan. I am sent, said he,
With friendly greeting; and as I receive
Welcome and honour, so, in David's name,
Am I to thank the Lord of Dinevawr.

Tell on! quoth Rhys, the purport and the cause
Of this appeal?

Of late, some fugitives

the poem, by the last part of Rhys's reply. The ill humour in which the Lord of Dinawr confesses the messenger had surprised him, is mentioned more bluntly by the historian. "Gwgan found him in a furious temper, beating his servants and hanging his dogs." I have not lost the character of the anecdote, by relating the cause of his anger, instead of the effects.

Came from the South to Mona, whom the King
Received with generous welcome. Some there were
Who blamed his royal goodness; for they said,
These were the subjects of a rival Prince,
Who, peradventure, would with no such bounty
Cherish a northern suppliant. This they urged,
I know not if from memory of old feuds,
Better forgotten, or in envy. Moved
Hereby, King David swore he would not rest
Till he had put the question to the proof,
Whether with liberal honour the Lord Rhys
Would greet his messenger; but none was found
Of all who had instill'd that evil doubt,
Ready to bear the embassy: I heard it,
And did my person tender, . . . for I knew
The nature of Lord Rhys of Dinevawr.

Well! quoth the Chief, Goagan of Powys-land,
This honourable welcome that thou seekest
Wherein may it consist?

In giving me,
Goagan of Powys-land replied, a horse
Better than mine, to bear me home; a suit
Of seemly raiment, and ten marks in coin,
With raiment and two marks for him who leads
My horse's bridle.

For his sake, said Rhys,
Who sent thee, thou shalt have the noblest steed
In all my studs, . . . I double thee the marks,
And give the raiment threefold. More than this, . . .
Say thou to David, that the guests who sit
At board with me, and drink of my own cup,
Are Madoc and Lord Ririd. Tell the King,
That thus it is Lord Rhys of Dinevawr
Delighteth to do honour to the sons
Of Owen, of his old and honour'd friend.

XIII.

LLEWELYN.

FAREWELL, my brother, cried the Ocean Chief;
A little while farewell! as through the gate
Of Dinevawr he pass'd, to pass again
That hospitable threshold never more.
And thou too O thou good old man, true friend
Of Owen, and of Owen's house, farewell!
'Twill not be told me, Rhys, when thy grey hairs
Are to the grave gone down; but oftentimes

In the distant world I shall remember thee,
And think that, come thy summons when it may
Thou wilt not leave a braver man behind. . . .
Now God be with thee, Rhys!

The old Chief paused
A moment ere he answer'd, as for pain;
Then shaking his hoar head, I never yet
Gave thee this hand unwillingly before!
When for a guest I spread the board, my heart
Will think on him, whom ever with most joy
It leapt to welcome: should I lift again
The spear against the Saxon, . . . for old Rhys
Hath that within him yet, that could uplift
The Cimbric spear, . . . I then shall wish his aid,
Who oft has conquer'd with me: when I kneel
In prayer to Heaven, an old man's prayer shall beg
A blessing on thee!

Madoc answer'd not,
But press'd his hand in silence, then sprang up
And spur'd his courser on. A weary way,
Through forest and o'er fell, Prince Madoc rode;
And now he skirts the bay whose reckless waves
Roll o'er the plain of Gwaelod: 'fair fields
And busy towns and happy villages,
They overwhelm'd in one disastrous day;
For they by their eternal siege had sapp'd
The bulwark of the land, while Seitheny
Took of his charge no thought, till in his sloth
And riotous cups surprised, he saw the waves
Roll like an army o'er the level'd mound.
A suppliant in other courts, he mourn'd
His crime and ruin; in another's court
The kingly harp of Garanhir was heard,
Wailing his kingdom wreck'd; and many a Prince,
Warn'd by the visitation, sought and gain'd
A saintly crown, Tynele, Merini,
Boda and Brenda and Aëlgvarch,
Gwynon and Celynin and Gwynodyl.

To Bardsey was the Lord of Ocean bound;
Bardsey, the holy Islet, in whose soil
Did many a Chief and many a Saint repose,
His great progenitors. He mounts the skiff;
Her canvass swells before the breeze, the sea
Sings round her sparkling keel, and soon the Lord
Of Ocean treads the venerable shore.

There was not, on that day, a speck to stain
The azure heaven; the blessed Sun alone
In unapproachable divinity

one set fire to the standing corn in his country, and so occasioned a famine; Gwrtheyrn, the other, is the Vortigern of Saxon history, thus distinguished for ceding the Isle of Thanet in his drunkenness, as the price of Rowena. This worthless King is also recorded as one of the Three disgraceful men of the Island, and one of the Three treacherous conspirators, whose families were for ever divested of privilege."
— Cambrian Biography.

"This little island," says Giraldus, "is inhabited by certain monks of exceeding piety, whom they call Culdees (Calibes vel Colides). This wonderful property it hath, either from the salubrity of its air, which it partakes with the shores of Ireland, or rather from some miracle by reason of the merits of the Saints, that diseases are rarely known there, and seldom or never does any one die till worn out by old age. Infinite numbers of Saints are buried there."

¹ "A large tract of fenny country, called Cantrev y Gwaelod, the Lowland Canton, was, about the year 800, inundated by the sea; for Seitheny, in a fit of drunkenness, let the sea through the dams which secured it. He is therefore distinguished with Gerald and Gwrtheyrn, under the appellation of the Three arrant Drunkards. This district, which forms the present Cardigan Bay, contained sixteen principal towns of the Cymry, the inhabitants of which, who survived the inundation, fled into the mountainous parts of Melirion and Arvon, which were till then nearly uncultivated. Gwyddno Garanhir, one of the petty Princes, whose territories were thus destroyed, was a poet. There were lately (and I believe, says Edmund Williams, are still) to be seen in the sands of this bay large stones with inscriptions on them, the characters Roman, but the language unknown." — E. Williams's Poems. — Cambrian Biography.
"The two other arrant Drunkards were both Princes; the Career'd, rejoicing in his fields of light.

 How beautiful, beneath the bright blue sky
 The billows heave ! one glowing green expanse,
 Save where along the bending line of shore
 Such hue is thrown, as when the peacock's neck
 Assumes its proudest tint of amethyst,
 Embathed in emerald glory. All the flocks
 Of Ocean are abroad : like floating foam,
 The sea-gulls rise and fall upon the waves ;
 With long protruded neck the cormorants
 Wing their far flight aloft, and round and round
 The plovers wheel, and give their note of joy.
 It was a day that sent into the heart
 A summer feeling : even the insect swarms
 From their dark nooks and coverts issued forth,
 To sport through one day of existence more ;
 The solitary primrose on the bank
 Seem'd now as though it had no cause to mourn
 Its bleak autumnal birth ; the Rocks, and Shores,
 The Forest and the everlasting Hills,
 Smiled in that joyful sunshine, . . they partook
 The universal blessing.

To this Isle,
 Where his forefathers were to dust consign'd,
 Did Madoc come for natural piety,
 Ordering a solemn service for their souls.
 Therefore for this the Church that day was drest :
 For this the Abbot, in his alb arrayed,
 At the high altar stood ; for this infused,
 Sweet incense from the waving thuribule
 Rose like a mist, and the grey brotherhood
 Chaunted the solemn mass. And now on high
 The mighty Mystery had been elevate,
 And now around the graves the brethren
 In long array proceed : each in his hand,
 Tall as the staff of some wayfaring man,
 Bears the brown taper, with their daylight flames
 Dimming the cheerful day. Before the train
 The Cross is borne, where, fashion'd to the life
 In shape and size and ghastly colouring,
 The awful Image hangs. Next, in its shrine
 Of gold and crystal, by the Abbot held,
 The mighty Mystery came ; on either hand
 Three Monks uphold above, on silver wands,
 The purple pall. With holy water next
 A father went, therewith from hyssop branch
 Sprinkling the graves ; the while, with one accord,
 The solemn psalm of mercy all entoned.

Pure was the faith of Madoc, though his mind
 To all this pomp and solemn circumstance
 Yielded a willing homage. But the place
 Was holy ; . . the dead air, which underneath
 Those arches never felt the healthy sun,
 Nor the free motion of the elements,
 Chilly and damp, infused associate awe :
 The sacred odours of the incense still
 Floated ; the daylight and the taper-flames
 Commingled, dimming each, and each bedimm'd ;
 And as the slow procession paced along,
 Still to their hymn, as if in symphony,
 The regular foot-fall sounded : swelling now,

Their voices in one chorus, loud and deep,
 Rung through the echoing aisles ; and when it ceased,
 The silence of that huge and sacred pile
 Came on the heart. What wonder if the Prince Yielded his homage there ? the influences
 Of that sweet autumn day made every sense
 Alive to every impulse, . . and beneath
 The stones whereon he stood, his ancestors
 Were mouldering, dust to dust. Father ! quoth he,
 When now the rites were ended, . . far away
 It hath been Madoc's lot to pitch his tent
 On other shores ; there, in a foreign land,
 Far from my father's burial-place, must I
 Be laid to rest ; yet would I have my name
 Be held with theirs in memory. I beseech yoh,
 Have this a yearly rite for evermore,
 As I will leave endowment for the same,
 And let me be remember'd in the prayer.
 The day shall be a holy day with me,
 While I do live ; they who come after me,
 Will hold it holy ; it will be a bond
 Of love and brotherhood, when all beside
 Hath been dissolved ; and though wide ocean rolls
 Between my people and their mother Isle,
 This shall be their communion : They shall send,
 Link'd in one sacred feeling at one hour,
 In the same language, the same prayer to Heaven,
 And each remembering each in piety,
 Pray for the other's welfare.

The old man
 Partook that feeling, and some pious tears
 Fell down his aged cheek. Kinsman and son,
 It shall be so ! said he ; and thou shalt be Remember'd in the prayer : nor then alone ;
 But till my sinking sands be quite run out,
 This feeble voice shall, from its solitude,
 Go up for thee to Heaven !

And now the bell
 Rung out its cheerful summons ; to the hall,
 In seemly order, pass the brotherhood :
 The serving-men wait with the ready ewer ;
 The place of honour to the Prince is given,
 The Abbot's right-hand guest ; the viands smoke,
 The horn of ale goes round : and now the cates
 Removed, for days of festival reserved
 Comes choicer beverage, clary, hippocras,
 And mead mature, that to the goblet brim
 Sparkles and sings and smiles. It was a day
 Of that allowable and temperate mirth
 Which leaves a joy for memory. Madoc told
 His tale ; and thus, with question and reply
 And cheerful intercourse, from noon till none
 The brethren sat ; and when the quire was done,
 Renew'd their converse till the vesper bell.

But then the Porter call'd Prince Madoc out,
 To speak with one, he said, who from the land
 Had sought him and required his private ear.
 Madoc in the moonlight met him : in his hand
 The stripling held an oar, and on his back,
 Like a broad shield, the coracle was hung.¹
 Uncle ! he cried, and with a gush of tears,

¹ The coracles are generally five feet and a half long and four broad, their bottom is a little rounded, and their shape nearly oval. These boats are ribbed with light laths, or split twigs, in the manner of basket-work, and are covered with a

Above the winter torrents did it stand,
Upon a craggy bank; an orchard slope
Arose behind, and joyous was the scene
In early summer, when those antic trees
Shone with their blushing blossoms, and the flax
Twinkled beneath the breeze its liveliest green.
But save the flax-field and that orchard slope,
All else was desolate, and now it wore
One sober hue; the narrow vale which wound
Among the hills, was grey with rocks, that peer'd
Above its shallow soil; the mountain side
Was loose with stones bestrewn, which oftentimes
Clattered adown the steep, beneath the foot
Of straggling goat dislodged; or tower'd with crags,
One day when winter's work hath loosen'd them,
To thunder down. All things assorted well
With that grey mountain hue; the low stone lines,
Which scarcely seem'd to be the work of man,
The dwelling rudely rear'd with stones unhewn,
The stubble flax, the crooked apple-trees
Grey with their fleecy moss and misletoe,
The white-bark'd birch now leafless, and the ash
Whose knotted roots were like the rifted rock,
Through which they forced their way. Adown the vale,
Broken by stones and o'er a stony bed,
Roll'd the loud mountain-stream.

When Madoc came,
A little child was sporting by the brook,
Floating the fallen leaves, that he might see them
Whirl in the eddy now and now be driven
Down the descent, now on the smoother stream
Sail onward far away. But when he heard
The horse's tramp, he raised his head and watch'd
The Prince, who now dismounted and drew nigh.
The little boy still fix'd his eyes on him,
His bright blue eyes; the wind just moved the curls
That cluster'd round his brow; and so he stood,
His rosy cheeks still lifted up to gaze
In innocent wonder. Madoc took his hand,
And now had ask'd his name, and if he dwelt
There in the hut, when from that cottage-door
A woman came, who, seeing Madoc stopt,
With such a fear, . . . for she had cause for fear, . . .
As when a bird returning to her nest,
Turns to a tree beside, if she behold
Some prying boy too near the dear retreat.
Howbeit advancing soon she now approach'd
The approaching Prince, and timidly enquired,
If on his wayfare he had lost the track,
That thither he had strayed. Not so, replied
The gentle Prince; but having known this place,
And its old habitants, I came once more
To see the lonely hut among the hills.
Hath it been long your dwelling?

Some few years,
Here we have dwelt, quoth she, my child and I.
Will it please you enter, and partake such fare
As we can give? Still timidly she spake,
But gathering courage from the gentle mien
Of him with whom she conversed. Madoc thank'd

1. Eight poems by Prince Hoel are preserved: they are here given in Mr. Owen's translation.

1.
"My choice is a lady, elegant, slender, and fair, whose lengthened white form is seen through the thin blue veil;

Her friendly proffer, and toward the hut
They went, and in his arms he took the boy.
Who is his father? said the Prince, but wish'd
The word unutter'd; for thereat her cheek
Was flush'd with sudden heat and manifest pain;
And she replied, He perish'd in the war.

They enter'd now her home; she spread the board,
And set before her guest soft curds, and cheese
Of curd-like whiteness, with no foreign die
Adulterate, and what fruits the orchard gave,
And that old British beverage which the bees
Had toll'd to purvey all the summer long.
Three years, said Madoc, have gone by, since here
I found a timely welcome, overworn
With toil and sorrow and sickness: . . . three long years!
'Twas when the battle had been waged hard by,
Upon the plain of Arvon.

She grew pale,
Suddenly pale; and seeing that he mark'd
The change, she told him, with a feeble voice,
That was the fatal fight which widow'd her.

O Christ, cried Madoc, 'tis a grief to think
How many a gallant Briton died that day,
In that accursed strife! I trod the field
When all was over, . . . I beheld them heap'd. . .
Ay, like ripe corn within the reaper's reach,
Strewn round the bloody spot where Hoel lay;
Brave as he was, himself cut down at last,
Oppress'd by numbers, gash'd with wounds, yet still Clenching in his dead hand the broken sword! . . .
But you are moved, . . . you weep at what I tell.
Forgive me, that renewing my own grief,
I should have waken'd yours! Did you then know
Prince Hoel?

She replied, Oh no! my lot
Was humble, and my loss a humble one;
Yet was it all to me! They say, quoth she, . . .
And, as she spake, she struggled to bring forth
With painful voice the interrupted words, . . .
They say Prince Hoel's body was not found;
But you who saw him dead perchance can tell
Where he was laid, and by what friendly hand.

Even where he fell, said Madoc, is his grave;
For he who buried him was one whose faith
Reck'd not of boughten prayers, nor passing bell.
There is a hawthorn grows beside the place,
A solitary tree, nipt by the winds,
That it doth seem a fitting monument
For one untimely slain. . . But wherefore dwell we
On this ungrateful theme?

He took a harp
Which stood beside, and passing o'er its chords
Made music. At the touch the child drew nigh,
Pleased by the sound, and leant on Madoc's knee,
And bade him play again: So Madoc play'd,
For he had skill in minstrelsy, and raised
His voice, and sung Prince Hoel's lay of love.¹

and my choicest faculty is to muse on superior female excellence, when she with diffidence utters the becoming sentiment; and my choicest participation is to become united with the maid, and to share mutual confidence as to thoughts and speech, chosen by me art thou; what am I with thee? how! dost thou refrain from speaking? ah! thy silence even is fair! I have chosen a maid, so that with me there should be no hesitation; it is right to choose the choicest fair one; choose, fair maid!

"I love the white glittering walls on the side of the bank, clothed in fresh verdancy, where bashfulness loves to observe the modest sea-mew's course; it would be my delight, though I have met with no great return of love in my much-desired visit on the sleek white steed, to behold my sister of suppliant smile; to talk of love since it has come to my lot; to restore my ease of mind, and to renew her slighted troth with the nymph as fair as the hue of the shore-beating wave.

"From her country, who is bright as the coldly-drifted snow upon the lofty hill, a censure has come to us, that I should be so treated with disdain in the Hall of Ogyrvan

"Playful, from her promise was new-born expectation; . . she is gone with my soul away: I am made wretched! Am I not become for love like Garwy Hir to the fair one of whom I am debarred in the Hall of Ogyrvan!

"I love the castle of proud workmanship in the Cywyd, where my own assuming form is wont to intrude: the high of renown, in full bustle, seek admittance there, and by it speaks the mad resounding wave.

"It is the chosen place of a luminary of splendid qualities and fair; glorious her rising from the verge of the torrent, and the fair one shines upon the now progressive year in the wild of Arvon, in the Snowdonian hills.

"The tent does not attract, the glossy silk is not looked on by her I love, with passing tenderness: if her conquest could be wrought by the muse's aid, ere the night that comes, I should next to her be found.

"I have harnessed thee to-day, my steed of shining grey, I will traverse on thee the fair region of Cynlas, and I will hold a hard dispute before death shall cut me off in obstructing sleep, and thus obstructing health; and on me it has been a sign, no longer being the honoured youth, the complexion is like the pale blue waves.

"Oppressed with longing is my memory in society, regret for her by whom I am hated, whilst I confer on the maid the honoured eulogy, she, to prosper pain, deigns not to return the consolation of the slightest grace

"Broken is my heart! my portion is regret, caused by the form of a slender lady, with a girdle of ruddy gold; my treatment is not deserved, she is not this day where my appointed place was fixed: Son of the God of Heaven! I! before a promise of forbearance she goes away, woe to me that I am not slain.

"When the ravens rejoice, when blood is hastening, when the gore runs bubbling, when the war doth rage, when the houses redden in Russian, when the red hall is burning, when we glow with wrath; the ruddy flame it blows up to heaven; our abode affords no shelter; and plainly is the bright conflagration seen from the white walls upon the shore of Menai.

"They perished on the third day of May, three hundred ships of a fleet roving the ocean; and ten hundred times the number the sword would put to flight, leaving not a single beard on Menai.

"Five evening tides were celebrated when France was saved, when barbarian chiefs were made to fly, when there

I love the white walls by the verdant bank,
That glitter in the sun, where Bashfulness was pressure round the steel-clad bodies; should a weapon yet be brandished round the beard, a public triumph would my wrath procure, scouring the bounds of Loegyr, and on her habitation hurling ruin; there should be the hand of the hastening host upon the cross, the keen edge slaughtering, the blade reeking with blood, the blood hue over the abject throng, a blood veil hiding its place of falling, and a plain of blood, and a cheek suffused with gore.

"I love the time of summer; then the gladly-exulting steed of the warrior prances before a gallant chief; the wave is crowned with foam; the limb of the active mors quickly moves; the apple tree has arrayed itself in another livery; bordered with white is my shield on my shoulder, prepared for violence: I have loved, with ardency of desire, the object which I have not obtained.

"Ceridwen, fair and tall, of slowly languid gait, her complexion vies with the warm dawn in the evening hour, of a splendid delicate form, beautifully mild and white-headed presence, in stepping over a rush nearly falling seems the little tiny fair one, gentle in her air, she appears but scarcely older than a tenth year infant. Young, shapely, and full of gracefulness, it were a congenial virtue that she should freely give; but the youthful female does more embarrass good fortune by a smile, than an expression from her lips checks impertinence.

"A worshipping pilgrim, she will send me to the celestial presence, how long shall I worship thee? stop and think of thine office! If I am unskilful through the dotage of love, Jesus, the well-informed, will not rebuke me.

"Fair foam-crowned wave, spraying over the sacred tomb of Rhyon the brave, the chief of princes, behold this day I love the utmost hate of England, a flat and unenergetic land, with a race involved in every wile. I love the spot that gave me the much-desired gift of mead, where the seas extend a tedious conflict. I love the society and thick inhabitants therein, and which, obedient to its lord, directs its view to peace. I love its sea-coast and its mountains, its city bordering on its forest, its fair landscape, its dales, its water, and its vales, its white sea-mews, and its beauteous women. I love its warriors and its well-trained steeds, its woods, its strong-holds, and its social domicile. I love its fields clothed with tender trefail, where I had the glory of a mighty triumph. I love its cultivated regions, the prerogative of heroism, and its far-extended wild, and its sports of the chase, which, Son of God I have been great and wonderful. how sleek the melodious deer, and in what plenty found! I achieved by the push of a spear an excellent deed before the chief of Powys and happy Gwynnes, and upon the pale-hued element of ever-struggling motion may I accomplish a liberation from exile. I will not take breath until my party comes; a dream declares it, and God wills it to be so, fair foam-crowned wave spraying over the grave.

"Fair foam-crowned wave, impetuous in thy course, like in colour to the hoar when it accumulates; I love the sea-coast in Meirionys, where I have had a white arm for a pillow. I love the nightingale upon the privet-brake in Cymmer Densur, a celebrated vale. Lord of heaven and earth, the glory of the blest, though so far it is from Ceri to Caerliwelys, I mounted the yellow steed, and from Maellwys reached the land of Reged between the night and day. Before I am in the grave, may I enjoy a new blessing from the land of Te-gnyl of fairest aspect! Since I am a love-wight, one inured to wander, may God direct my fate, fair foam-crowned wave of impetuous course!

"I will implore the Divine Supreme, the wonderful in sub-

Watches the silver sea-mew sail along.
I know that glittering dwelling, where we hear
The ever-sounding billows; for there dwells
The shapely Maiden, fair as the sea-spray,
Her cheek as lovely as the apple flower,
Or summer evening's glow. I pine for her;
In crowded halls my spirit is with her;
Through the long sleepless night I think on her;
And happiness is gone, and health is lost,
And fled the flush of youth, and I am pale
As the pale ocean on a sunless morn.
I pine away for her, yet ply her,
That she should spurn so true a love as mine.

He ceased, and laid his hand upon the child, . . .
And didst thou like the song? The child replied, . . .
Oh yes! it is a song my mother loves,
And so I love it too. He stooped and kiss'd
The boy, who still was leaning on his knee,
Already grown familiar. I should like
To take thee with me, quoth the Ocean Lord,
Over the seas.

Thou art Prince Madoc, then! . . .
The mother cried, . . . thou art indeed the Prince!
That song . . . that look . . . and at his feet she fell,
Crying . . . Oh take him, Madoc! save the child!
Thy brother Hoel's orphan!

Long it was
Ere that in either agitated heart
The tumult could subside. One while the Prince
Gazed on the child, tracing intently there
His brother's lines; and now he caught him up,
And kiss'd his cheek, and gazed again till all
Was dim and dizzy, . . . then blest God, and vow'd
That he should never need a father's love.

At length when copious tears had now relieved
Her burthen'd heart, and many a broken speech
In tears had died away, O Prince, she cried,
Long hath it been my dearest prayer to heaven,
That I might see thee once, and to thy love
Commit this friendless boy! For many a time,
In phrase so fond did Hoel tell thy worth,
That it hath waken'd misery in me
To think I could not as a sister claim
Thy love! and therefore was it that till now
Thou knew'st me not; for I entreated him
That he would never let thy virtuous eye
Look on my guilt, and make me feel my shame

jugating to his will, as king, to create an excelling muse for a song of praise to the women, such as Merlin sung, who have claimed my hardie lore so long, who are so tardy in dispensing grace. The most eminent in all the west I name, from the gates of Chester to the port of Ysgwin. The first is the nymph who will be the subject of universal praise, Gwen-liant, whose complexion is like the summer's day. The second is another of high state, far from my embrace, adorned with golden necklace, fair Gwilyr, from whom nor token nor confidence have I obtained, nor has any of my race, though I might be slain by two-edged blades, she whose foster brother was a king, should be my theme. And next for the handsome Gwladys, the young and modest virgin, the idol of the multitude, I utter the secret sigh; I will worship her with the yellow blossoms of the fume. Soon may I see my vigour rouse to combat, and in my hand my blade,

Madoc, I did not dare to see thee then,
Thou wilt not scorn me now, . . . for I have now
Forgiven myself; and, while I here perform'd
A mother's duty in this solitude,
Have felt myself forgiven.

With that she clasp'd
His hand, and bent her face on it and wept.
Anon collecting she pursued, . . . My name
Is Lliana: by the chance of war I fell
Into his power, when all my family
Had been cut off, all in one hour of blood.
He saved me from the ruffian's hand, he sooth'd
With tenderest care my sorrow. . . You can tell
How gentle he could be, and how his eyes,
So full of life and kindness, could win
All hearts to love him. Madoc, I was young;
I had no living friend; . . . and when I gave
This infant to his arms, when with such joy
He view'd it o'er and o'er again, and press'd
A father's kiss upon its cheek, and turn'd
To me, and made me feel more deeply yet
A mother's deep delight, . . . oh! I was proud
To think my child in after years should say,
Prince Hoel was his father!

Thus I dwell
In the white dwelling by the verdant bank, . . .
Though not without my melancholy hours,
Happy. The joy it was when I beheld
His steed of shining grey come hastening on,
Across the yellow sand! . . . Alas, ere long,
King Owen died. I need not tell thee, Madoc,
With what a deadly and forefearing fear
I heard how Hoel seized his father's throne,
Nor with what ominous woe I welcomed him,
In that last little miserable hour
Ambition gave to love. I think his heart,
Brave as it was, misgave him. When I spake
Of David and my fears, he smiled upon me;
But 'twas a smile that came not from the heart, . . .
A most ill-boding smile! . . . O Madoc! Madoc!
You know not with what misery I saw
His parting steps, . . . with what a dreadful hope
I watch'd for tidings! . . . And at length it came, . . .
Came like a thunderbolt! . . . I sought the field!
O Madoc, there were many widows there,
But none with grief like mine! I look'd around;
I dragg'd aside the bodies of the dead,
To search for him, in vain; . . . and then a hope
Seized me, which it was agony to lose!

bright Leucu, my companion, laughing, and whose husband laughs not from anxiety. Great anxiety oppresses me, makes me sad, and longing, alas! is habitual for fair Nêst, for her who is like the apple-tree blossom and for Esgwewr, the centre of my desire; for Generys the chaste, who grants not a smile for me, may continue not overcome her! for Hunys, whose fame will last till the day of doom; for Havis, who claims my choicest eulogy. On a memorable day I had a nymph; I had a second, more be their praise; I had a third and a fourth with prosperity; I had a fifth of those with a skin white and delicate; I had a sixth bright and fair, avoiding not the temptation, above the white walls did she arrest me; I had a seventh, and this was satiety of love; I had eight in recompense for a little of the praise which I sung; but the teeth most opportunely bar the tongue."

Night came. I did not heed the storm of night;
But for the sake of this dear babe, I sought
Shelter in this lone hut: 'twas desolate;
And when my reason had return'd, I thought
That here the child of Hoel might be safe,
Till we could claim thy care. But thou, meantime,
Didst go to roam the Ocean; so I learnt
To bound my wishes here. The carkanet,
The embroider'd girdle, and what other gauds
Were once my vain adornments, soon were changed
For things of profit, goats and bees, and this,
The tuneful solace of my solitude.
Madoc, the harp is as a friend to me;
I sing to it the songs which Hoel loved,
And Hoel's own sweet lays; it comforts me,
And gives me joy in grief.

Often I grieved,
To think the son of Hoel should grow up
In this unworthy state of poverty;
Till Time, who softens all regrets, had worn
That vain regret away, and I became Humbly resign'd to God's unerring will.
To him I look'd for healing, and he pour'd
His balm into my wounds. I never form'd
A prayer for more, and lo! the happiness
Which he hath, of his mercy, sent me now!

XLV.

THE EXCOMMUNICATION.

ON Madoc's docile courser Llaian sits,
Holding her joyful boy; the Prince beside Paces afoot, and like a gentle Squire
Leads her loose bridle; from the saddle-bow
His shield and helmet hang, and with the lance,
Staff like, he stay'd his steps. Before the sun
Hadeclimb'd his southern eminence, they left
The mountain feet; and hard by Bangor now,
Travelling the plain before them they espy
A lordly cavalcade, for so it seem'd,
Of knights, with hawk in hand and hounds in leash,
Squires, pages, serving-men, and armed grooms,
And many a sumpter-beast and laden wain,
Far following in the rear. The bravery
Of glittering bauldricks and of high-plumed crests,
Embroider'd surcoats and emblazon'd shields,
And lances whose long streamers play'd aloft,
Made a rare pageant, as with sound of trumpet,
Tambour and cittern, proudly they went on;
And ever, at the foot-fall of their steeds,
The tinkling horse-bells, in rude symphony,
Accorded with the joy.

What have we here?
Quoth Madoc then to one who stood beside
The threshold of his order-woven hut.
'Tis the great Saxon Prelate, he return'd,
Come hither for some end, I wist not what,

Only be sure ye good!... How stands the tale?
Said Madoc; 'yea we pass?... 'Tis even as thou
The man must answer, and the Monastery
Will have no hospitality to spare
For one of Wales to-day. Be ye content
To greet with us.

He took the Prince's sword;
The daughter of the house brought water then,
And wash'd the stranger's feet; the board was spread,
And o'er the bowl they communed of the days
Ere ever Saxon set his hateful foot
Upon the beautiful Isle.

As so they sat,
The bells of the Cathedral rung abroad
Unusual summons. What is this? exclaim'd
Prince Madoc: let us see!... Forthwith they went,
He and his host, their way. They found the rites
Begun; the mitred Baldwin, in his hand
Holding a taper, at the altar stood.
Let him be curs'd!... were the words which first
Assail'd their ears, living and dead, in limb
And life, in soul and body, be he curs'd
Here and hereafter! Let him feel the curse
At every moment, and in every act,
By night and day, in waking and in sleep!
We cut him off from Christian fellowship;
Of Christian sacraments we deprive his soul;
Of Christian burial we deprive his corpse;
And when that carrion to the Fiends is left
In unprotected earth, thus let his soul
Be quenched in hell!

He dash'd upon the floor
His taper down, and all the ministering Priests
Extinguish'd each his light, to consummate
The imprecation.

Whom is it ye curse,
Cried Madoc, with these horrors? They replied,
The contumacious Prince of Powys-land,¹ Cyvelloc.

What! quoth Madoc, and his eye
Grew terrible, . . . Who is he that sets his foot
In Gwyneth, and with hellish forms like these Dare outrage here Mathraval's noble Lord?
We wage no war with women nor with Priests;
But if there be a knight amid your train,
Who will stand forth, and speak before my face
Dishonour of the Prince of Powys-land,
Lo! here stand I, Prince Madoc, who will make
That slanderous wretch cry craven in the dust,
And eat his lying words!

Be temperate!
Quoth one of Baldwin's Priests, who, Briton born,
Had known Prince Madoc in his father's court;
It is our charge, throughout this Christian land,
To call upon all Christian men to join
The armies of the Lord, and take the cross;
That so, in battle with the Infidels,
The palm of victory or of martyrdom,

¹ The three names of this Island; the first, before it was inhabited it was called the Water-guarded Green Spot; after it was inhabited it was called the Honey-Island; and after its subjection to Frydain, the son of Aedd Mawr, he gave it the name of the Isle of Frydain.—Cambrian Register.

This name was appropriately given to it, for Ynys Fry-dain signifies the Beautiful Isle.—Cambrian Itinerary, E. Williams.

² "Ocenus de Covelloc, quis scilicet inter Wallie principes Archiepiscopi cum populo non occurrerit, excommunicamus. Ocenus iste pro illis Cambrie principibus, et linguis diocesis cattherat, et in terra sua maledicentibus ingentis perapicatis."—Giraldus Cambrensis.

Glorious, may be their recompense.
 This language, whether in godless scorn,
 Or the intensest bitterness of his heart,
 Cyvallic both refused; thereby incurring
 The pain, which, not of our own impulse, we Smelt upon his soul, but at the will
 Of our most holy Father, from whose word
 Let no appeal on earth.

'Tis well for thee,
 Intemperate Prince! said Baldwin, that our blood
 Flows with a calmer action than thine own!
 Thy brother David hath put on the cross,
 To our most pious warfare piously
 Pledging his kingly sword. Do thou the like,
 And for this better object lay aside
 Thine other enterprise, which, lest it rob
 Judea of one single Christian arm,
 We do condemn as sinful. Follow thou
 The banner of the church to Palestine;
 So shalt thou expiate this rash offence,
 Against the which we else should fulminate
 Our ire, did we not see in charity,
 And therefore rather pity than resent,
 The rudeness of this barbarous land.

At that,
 Scorn tempering wrath, yet anger sharpening scorn,
 Madoc replied, Barbarians! as we are,
 Lord Prelate, we received the law or Christ
 Many a long age before your pirate sires
 Had left their forest dens; nor are we now
 To learn that law from Norman or from Dane,
 Saxon, Jute, Angle, or whatever name
 Suits best your mongrel race! Ye think, perchance,
 That like your own poor woman-hearted King,

"Owen Gwyneth was buried at Bangor. When Baldwin, Archbishop of Canterbury, coming to preach the crusade against the Saracens, saw his tomb, he charged the Bishop to remove the body out of the Cathedral, when he could find a fit opportunity so to do, in regard that Archbishop Becket had excommunicated him heretofore, because he had married his first cousin, the daughter of Grono ab Edwyn, and that notwithstanding he had continued to live with her till she died. The Bishop, in obedience to the charge, made a passage from the vault through the south wall of the church under ground, and so secretly shoved the body into the churchyard."—Basal Tribes. From the Hengwrt MS

"One of the first things we asked to see was the tomb of Potemkin. All Europe has heard that he was buried in Cherson; and a magnificent sepulchre might naturally be expected for a person so renowned. The reader will imagine our surprise, when, in answer to our inquiries concerning his remains, we were told that no one knew what was become of them.

"Potemkin, the illustrious, the powerful, of all the princes that ever lived the most princely, of all imperial favourites the most favoured, had not a spot which might be called his grave. He, who not only governed all Russia, but even made the haughty Catherine his suppliant, had not the distinction possessed by the humblest of the human race. The particulars respecting the ultimate disposal of his body, as they were communicated to me upon the spot on the most credible testimony, merit cursory detail.

"The corpse soon after his death was brought to Cherson, and placed beneath a dome of the small church belonging to the palace, opposite to the altar. After the usual ceremony of interment, the vault was covered, merely by fastening up their former situation the planks of wood belonging to the

We too in Gwyneth are to take the yoke
 Of Rome upon our necks; . . . but you may tell
 Your Pope, that when I sail upon the seas,
 I shall not strike a top-sail for the breath
 Of all his maledictions!

Saying thus,
 He turn'd away, lest farther speech might call
 Farther reply, and kindle farther wrath,
 More easy to avoid than to allay.
 Therefore he left the church; and soon his mind
 To gentler mood was won, by social talk
 And the sweet prattle of that blue-eyed boy,
 Whom in his arms he fondled.

But when now
 Evening had settled, to the door there came
 One of the brethren of the Monastery,
 Who called Prince Madoc forth. Apart they went,
 And in the low auspicious voice of fear,
 Though none was nigh, the Monk began. Be calm,
 Prince Madoc, while I speak, and patiently
 Hear to the end! Thou know'st that, in his life,
 Becket did excommunicate thy sire
 For his unlawful marriage; but the King,
 Feeling no sin in conscience, heeded not
 The inefficient censure. Now when Baldwin
 Beheld his monument to-day, impell'd,
 As we do think, by anger against thee,
 He swore that, even as Owen in his deeds
 Disown'd the Church when living, even so
 The Church disown'd him dead, and that his corpse
 No longer should be suffered to pollute
 The Sanctuary. . . Be patient, I beseech,
 And hear me out. Gerald at this, who felt
 A natural horror, sought, . . . as best he knew floor of the building. Many inhabitants of Cherson, as well as English officers in the Russian service, who resided in the neighbourhood, had seen the coffin: this was extremely ordinary, but the practice of showing it to strangers prevailed for some years after Potemkin's decease. The Empress Catherine either had, or pretended to have, an intention of erecting a superb monument to his memory, whether at Cherson or elsewhere, is unknown. Her sudden death is believed to have prevented the completion of this design.

"The most extraordinary part of the story remaining now to be related, the coffin itself has disappeared instead of any answer to the various inquiries we made concerning it, we were cautioned to be silent. 'No one,' said a countryman of ours, living in the place, 'dares to mention the name of Potemkin.' At length we received intelligence that the verger could satisfy our curiosity, if we would venture to ask him.

"We soon found the means of encouraging a little communication on his part; and were then told, that the body, by the Emperor Paul's command, had been taken up, and thrown into the ditch of the fortress. These orders were implicitly obeyed. A hole was dug in the fosse, into which his remains were thrown, with as little ceremony as if they were those of a dead dog; but the procedure taking place during the night, very few were informed of the disposal of the body. An eye-witness of the fact assured me that the coffin no longer existed in the vault where it was originally placed; and the Verger was actually proceeding to point out the place where the body was abandoned, when the Bishop himself, happening to arrive, took away my guide, and with excuses but too likely to be fulfilled, prevented our being more fully informed concerning the obloquy at present involving Potemkin."—Clarke's Travels, vol. i. p. 602.

MADOC IN WALES

The haughty Primat's temper, . . . to dissuade
By politic argument, and chiefly urged
The quick and fiery nature of our nation, . .
How at the sight of such indignity,
They would arise in arms, and limb from limb
Tear piecemeal him and all his company.
So far did this prevail, that he will now
Commit the deed in secret; and, this night,
Thy father's body from its resting place,
O Madoc! shall be torn, and cast aside
In some unhallow'd pit, with foul disgrace
And contumelious wrong.

Sayest thou to-night?
Quoth Madoc. . . Ay, at midnight, he replied,
Shall this impiety be perpetrated.
Therefore hath Gerald, for the reverence
He bears to Owen's royal memory, . .
Sent thee the tidings. Now be temperate
In thy just anger, Prince! and shed no blood.
Thou know'st how dearly the Plantagenet
Atones for Becket's death; and be thou sure,
Though thou thyself shouldst sail beyond the storm,
That it would fall on Britain.

While he spake,
Madoc was still; the feeling work'd too deep
For speech, or visible sign. At length he said,
What if amid their midnight sacrilege
I should appear among them?

It were well;
The Monk replied, if, at a sight like that,
Thou canst withhold thy hand.

Oh, fear me not!
Good and true friend, said Madoc. I am calm,
And calm as thou beholdest me will prove
In word and action. Quick I am to feel
Light ills, . . perhaps o'er-hasty: summer gnats,
Finding my cheek unguarded, may infix
Their skin-deep stings, to vex and irritate;
But if the wolf, or forest boar, be nigh,
I am awake to danger. Even so
Bear I a mind of steel and adamant
Against all greater wrongs. My heart hath now
Received its impulse; and thou shalt behold
How in this strange and hideous circumstance
I shall find profit. . . Only, my true friend,
Let me have entrance.

At the western porch,
Between the complines and the matin-bell, . .
The Monk made answer: thou shalt find the door
Ready. Thy single person will suffice;
For Baldwin knows his danger, and the hour
Of guilt or fear convicts him, both alike
Opprobrious. Now, farewell!

Then Madoc took
His host aside, and in his private ear
Told him the purport, and wherein his help
Was needed. Night came on; the hearth was heapt,
The women went to rest. They twain, the while,
Sat at the board, and while the untasted bowl
Stood by them, watch'd the glass whose falling sands
Told out the weary hours. The hour is come;
Prince Madoc helm'd his head, and from his neck
He slung the bugle-horn; they took their shields,
And lance in hand went forth. And now arrived,
The bolts give back before them, and the door
Rolls on its heavy hinge.

Behind the grave
Stood Baldwin, and the Prior, who, albeit Cambrian himself, in fear and awe obey'd
The lordly Primat's will. They stood and watch'd
Their ministers perform the irreverent work.
And now with spade and mattock have they broken
Into the house of death, and now have they
From the stone coffin wrench'd the iron cramps,
When sudden interruption 'clashed them,
And clad in complete mail from head to foot,
They saw the Prince come in. Their tapers gleam'd
Upon his visage, as he wore his helm
Open; and when in that pale countenance, . .
For the strong feeling blanch'd his cheek, . . they saw
His father's living lineaments, a fear
Like ague shook them. But soon that fit
Of scared imagination to the senses
Of other peril yielded, when they heard
Prince Madoc's dreadful voice. Stay! he exclaim'd,
As now they would have fled; . . stir not a man, . .
Or if I once put breath into this horn,
All Wales will hear, as if dead Owen call'd
For vengeance from that grave. Stir not a man,
Or not a man shall live! The doors are watch'd,
And ye are at my mercy!

But at that,
Baldwin from the altar seized the crucifix,
And held it forth to Madoc, and cried out,
He who strikes me, strikes Him; forbear, on pain
Of endless —

Peace! quoth Madoc, and profane not
The holy Cross, with those polluted hands
Of midnight sacrilege! . . Peace! I harm thee not, . .
Be wise, and thou art safe. . . For thee, thou know'st,
Prior, that if thy treason were divulged,
David would hang thee on thy steeple top,
To feed the steeple daws: Obey and live!
Go, bring fine linen and a coffer meet
To bear these relics; and do ye, meanwhile,
Proceed upon your work.

They at his word
Raised the stone cover, and display'd the dead,
In royal grave-clothes habited, his arms
Cross'd on the breast, with precious gums and spice
Fragrant, and incorruptibly preserved.
At Madoc's bidding, round the corpse they wrap
The linen web, fold within fold involved;
They laid it in the coffer, and with cloth
At head and foot filled every interval
And prest it down compact; they closed the lid,
And Madoc with his signet seal'd it thrice.
Then said he to his host, Bear thou at dawn
This treasure to the ships. My father's bones
Shall have their resting-place, where none one day
May moulder by their side. He shall be free
In death, who living did so well maintain
His and his country's freedom. As for ye, . .
For your own safety, ye I wean will keep
My secret safe. So saying, he went his way.

XVI DAVID.

Now hath the Lord of Ocean once again
Set foot in Mona. Lillian there receives
Sisterly greeting from the royal maid,

Who, when she tempests to the public eye,
Her welcome, ready to the boy indulged
In first acknowledgments of instinctive love
When the first flow of joy was overpast,
Now went the equipment on, the Prince enquired.
Nay, brother, quoth Goervyl, ask thou that
Of Ulen . . . It hath been his sole employ
Daily from cock-crow until even-song,
That he hath laid aside all other thoughts,
Forgetful even of me! She said and smiled
Playful reproach upon the good old man,
Who in such chiding as affection loves,
Ballying with terms of wrong, return'd rebuke
There, Madoc, pointing to the shore, he cried,
There are they moor'd, six gallant barks, as trim
And worthy of the sea as ever yet
Gave canvass to the gale The mariners
Flock to thy banner, and the call hath roused
Many a brave spirit Soon as Spring shall serve,
There need be no delay I should depart
Without one wish that lingers, could we bear
Ri'd from hence, and break poor Rodri's chains,
Thy lion-hearted brother, and that boy,
If he were with us, Madoc! that dear boy
Llewelyn!

Sister, said the Prince at that,
How sped the Queen?

Oh, Madoc! she replied,
A hard and unrelenting heart hath he
The gentle Emma told me she had fall'd,
And that was all she told, but in her eye
I could see sorrow struggling She complains not,
And yet I know, in bitterness laments
The hour which brought her as a victim here

Then I will seek the Monarch, Madoc cried,
And forth he went Cold welcome David gave,
Such as might chill a suppliant, but the Prince
Fearless began I found at Dinevaur
Our brother Rrid, and he made his suit
That he might follow me, a banish'd man
He waits thine answer at the court of Rhya.
Now I beseech thee, David, say to him
His father's hall is open!

Then the King
Replied, I told thee, Madoc, thy request
Displeased me heretofore, I warn'd thee, too,
To shun the rebel, yet my messenger
Tells me, the guests at Dinevaur who sat
At board with Rhys and drank of his own cup
Were Madoc and Lord Rrid Was this well,
This open disobedience to my will,
And my express command?

Madoc subdued
His rising wrath If I should tell thee, Sire,
He answer'd, by what chance it so fell out,
I should at disobedience stand excused,
Even were it here a crime. Yet think again,
David, and let thy better mind prevail!
I am his surety here; he comes alone,
The strength of yonder armament is mine;
And when did I deceive thee? . . . I did hope,
For natural love and public decency,
Thou'ya wouldst part in friendship. . . let that pass!
He may remain and join me in the hour
Of embarkation But for thine own sake,

Cast off these vile suspicions, and the fear
That makes its danger! Call to mind, my brother,
The rampart that we were to Owen's throne!
Are there no moments when the thoughts and loves
Of other days return? Let Rodri leave!
Restore him to his brightness! . . . Why wouldst thou
Hold him in chains, when benefits would bind
His noble spirit?

Leave me! cried the King;
Thou know'st the theme is hateful to my ear.
I have the mastery now, and idle words,
Madoc, shall never thrust me from the throne,
Which this right arm in battle hardly won.
There must he be till nature set him free,
And so deliver both. Trespass no more!

A little yet bear with me, Madoc cried.
I leave this land for ever, let me first
Behold my brother Rodri, lest he think
My summer love be withered, and in wrath
Remember me hereafter

Leave me, Madoc!
Speedily, ere indulgence grow a fault,
Exclaim'd the Monarch Do not tempt my wrath,
Thou know'st me!

Ay! the Ocean Prince replied,
I know thee, David, and I pity thee,
Thou poor, suspicious, misrable man!
Friend hast thou none, except thy country's for,
That hateful Saxon, he whose bloody hand
Pluck'd out thy brethren's eyes, and for thy kin,
Thou hast thou made thy perilous enemies
What if the Lion Rodri were abroad?
What if Llewelyn's banner were display'd?
The sword of England could not save thee then
Frown not, and menace not! for what am I,
That I should fear thine anger? And with that
He turn'd indignant from the wrathful king

XVII

THE DEPARTURE.

WINTER hath pass'd away, the vernal storms
Have spent their rage, the ships are stow'd, and now
To-morrow they depart That day a Boy,
Weary and foot-sore, to Aberffraw came,
Who to Goervyl's chamber made his way,
And caught the hem of her garment, and exclaim'd,
A boon, a boon, dear Lady! Nor did he
Wait more reply than that encouragement,
Which her sweet eye and lovely smile bestow'd,
I am a poor, unhappy, orphan boy,
Born to fair promises and better hopes,
But now forlorn. Take me to be your page! . .
For blessed Mary's sake, refuse me not!
I have no friend on earth, nor hope but this.

The boy was fair; and though his eyes were swain,
And cheek defiled with tears, and though his voice
Came choked by grief, yet to that earnest eye
And supplicating voice so musical,
It had not sure been easy to refuse
The boon he begg'd I cannot grant thy suit,
Goervyl cried, but I can aid it, boy! . .
Go ask of Madoc! And herself arose,
And led him where her brother on the shore

That day the last-embarkment oversaw,
Merry then took his mantle by the skirt,
And knelt and made his suit; she too began
To sue, but Madoc smiling on the Maid,
Went by the virtue of the countenance
Which look'd for favour, lightly gave the yea.

Where wert thou, Caradoc, when that fair boy
Told his false tale? for hadst thou heard the voice,
The gentle voice so musically sweet,
And seen that earnest eye, it would have heal'd
Thy wounded heart, and thou hadst voyaged on
The happiest man that ever yet forsook
His native country! He, on board the bark,
Leant o'er the vessel-side, and there he stood
And gazed, almost unconscious that he gazed,
Toward yon distant mountains where she dwelt,
Senena, his beloved Caradoc,
Senena, thy beloved, is at hand!
Her golden locks are clipt, and her blue eye
Is wandering through the throng in search of thee,
For whose dear sake she hath forsaken all.
You deem her false, that her fall constancy
Shrunk from her father's anger, that she lives
Another's victim bride, but she hath fled
From that unnatural angu, hath escaped
The unnatural union, she is on the shore,
Senena, blue-eyed maid, a seemly boy,
To share thy fortunes, to reward thy love,
And to the land of peace to follow thee,
Over the ocean waves

Now all is done
Stores, beeves and flocks and water all aboard,
The dry East blows, and not a sign of change
Stains the clear firmament. The Sea-Lord sate
At the last banquet in his brother's court,
And heard the song. It told of Owen's fame,
When with his Normen and assembled force
Of Guienne and Gascony, and Anjou's strength,
The Fleming's aid and England's chosen troops,
Along the ascent of Berwyn, many a day
The Saxon vainly on his mountain foes
Denounced his wrath, for Mona's dragon sons,
By wary patience baffled long his force,
Winning slow Famine to their aid, and help'd
By the angry Elements, and Sickness sent
From Heaven, and Fear that of its vigour robb'd
The healthy arm; then in quick enterprise
Fell on his weary and dishearten'd host,
Till with defeat and low and obloquy
He fled with all his nations. Madoc gave
His spirit to the song, he felt the theme
In every pulse, the recollection came.
Revived and heighten'd to intense pain,
That in Aberffraw, in his father's hall,
He never more should share the feast, nor hear
The echoing harp again! His heart was full.

1 "I am much affected," says old Fuller, "with the ingenuity of an English nobleman who, following the camp of King Henry III. in these parts (Caernarvonshire), wrote home to his friends, about the end of September, 1242, the staked cross indeed as followeth: 'We lie in our tents, watching, fasting, praying, and freezing, we watch for fear of the Welshmen, who are wont to invade us in the night, we fast for want of meat, for the half-penny loaf is worth

And, yielding to his yearnings, in that mood
Of aweful feeling, he call'd forth the King,
And led him from the palace-porch, and stretch'd
His hand toward the ocean, and exclaim'd,
To-morrow o'er you wide waves I go;
To-morrow, never to return, I leave
My native land! O David, O my brother,
Turn not impatiently a reckless ear
To that affectionate and natural voice
Which thou wilt hear no more! Release our brethren,
Recall the wanderers home, and link them to thee
By cordial confidence, by benefits
Which bless the benefactor. Be not thou
As is the black and melancholy yew
That strikes into the grave its baleful roots,
And prospers on the dead! The Saxon King, . .
Think not I wrong him now; . . an hour like this
Hath soften'd all my harsher feelings down;
Nor will I hate him for his sister's sake,
Thy gentle Queen, . . whom, that great God may bless,
And, blessing her, bless thee and our dear country,
Shall never be forgotten in my prayers;
But he is far away, and should there come
The evil hour upon thee, . . if thy kin,
Wearied by suffering, and driven desperate,
Should lift the word, or young Llewelyn raise
His banner and demand his father's throne, . .
Were it not trusting to a broken reed,
To lean on England's aid? . . I urge thee not
For answer now, but sometimes, O my brother!
Sometimes recall to mind my parting words,
As 'twere the death-bed counsel of the friend
Who loved thee best!

The affection of his voice,
So mild and solemn, soften'd David's heart;
He saw his brother's eyes, suffused with tears,
Shine in the moon-beam as he spake; the King
Remember'd his departure, and he felt
Feelings, which long from his disordered breast
Ambition had expell'd; he could almost
Have follow'd their strong impulse. From the shore,
Madoc with quick and agitated step
Had sought his home, the monarch went his way,
Serious and slow, and laid him down that night
With painful recollections, and such thoughts,
As might, if Heaven had will'd it, have matur'd
To penitence and peace.

The day is come,
The adventurers in Saint Cybi's holy fane
Hear the last mass, and all assembl'd of sin
Partake the bread of Christian fellowship.
Then, as the Priest his benediction gave,
They knelt, in such an aweful stillness hush'd,
As with yet more oppression seem'd to load
The burthen'd heart. At times and half suppress'd,
Womanly sobs were heard, and manly cheeks
Were wet with silent tears. Now forth they go,

five pence, we pray to God to send us home speedily; we freeze for want of winter garments, having nothing but thin linen betwixt us and the wind."

2 "Like the black and melancholy yew-tree,
Doest think to root thyself in dead men's graves,
And yet to prosper!"

Wolfe's White Death, or Victoria Coronation.

And at the portal of the Church unfurl
Prince Madoc's banner; at that sight a shout
Burst from his followers, and the hills and rocks
Thrice echoed their acclaim.

There lie the ships,
Their sails all loose, their streamers rolling out
With sinuous flow and swell, like water-snakes,
Curling aloft, the waves are gay with boats,
Pinnace and barge and coracle, the sea
Swarms like the shore with life. Oh what a sight
Of beauty for the spirit unconcern'd,
If heart there be which unconcern'd could view
A sight like this! how yet more beautiful
For him, whose soul can feel and understand
The solemn import! Yonder they embark,
Youth, beauty, valour, virtue, reverend age,
Some led by love of noble enterprise,
Others, who, desperate of their country's weal,
Fly from the impending yoke, all warm alike
With confidence and high heroic hope,
And all in one fraternal bond conjoin'd
By reverence to their Chief, the best beloved
That ever yet on hopeful enterprise
Led gallant army forth. He, even now
Lord of himself, by faith in God and love
To man subdues the feeling of this hour,
The bitterest of his being.

At this time,
Pale, and with feverish eye, the king came up,
And led him somewhat from the throng apart,
Saying, I sent at day-break to release
Rodri from prison, meaning that with thee
He should depart in peace, but he was gone,
This very night he had escaped! Purchase,
As I do hope, it was thy doing, Madoc?
Is he aboard the fleet?

I would he were!
Madoc replied, with what a lighten'd heart
Then should I sail away! Ridir is there
Alone—alas! that this was done so late!

Reproach me not! half sullenly the king,
Answering, exclaimed, Madoc, reproach me not!
Thou know'st how hardly I attain'd the throne,
And is it strange that I should guard with fear
The precious prize? Now, when I would have taken
Thy counsel, be the evil on his head!
Blame me not now, my brother, lest sometimes
I call again to mind thy parting words
In sorrow!

God be with thee! Madoc cried,
And if at times the harshness of a heart,
Too prone to wrath, have wrong'd thee, let these tears
Erase all faults, I leave thee, O my brother,
With all a brother's feelings!

So he said,
And grasp'd, with trembling tenderness, his hand,
Then calm'd himself, and moved toward the boat.
Emma, though tears would have their way and sighs
Would swell, suppressing still all words of woe,

1 * The three Restorations in the Circle of Happiness; Restoration of original genius and character, Restoration of all that was beloved, and the Restoration of Remembrance from the origin of all things without these perfect happiness cannot exist.—Tragedy of Bardism, 32.

I follow'd Goervyl to the extremest shore.
But then as on the plank the mad set foot,
Did Emma, staying her by the hand, pluck out
The crucifix, which next her heart she wore
In reverence to its relic, and she cried,
Yet ere we part change with me, dear Goervyl,
Dear sister, loved too well, or lost too soon! . . .
I shall betake me often to my prayers,
Never in them, Goervyl, of thy name
Unmindful, thou too wilt remember me
Still in thy orisons, but God forefend
That ever misery should make thee find
This Cross thy only comforter!

She said,
And kiss'd the holy pledge, as each to each
Transferr'd the mutual gift. Nor could the Maid
Answer for agony, to that farewell;
She held Queen Emma to her breast, and close
She clasp'd her with a strong convulsive sob,
Silently Madoc too in silence went,
But prest a kiss on Emma's lips, and left
His tears upon her cheek. With dizzy eyes
Gazing she stood, nor saw the boat push off.
The dashing of the oars awaken'd her,
She wipes her tears away, to view once more
Those dear familiar faces, they are dim
In the distance, never shall her waking eye
Behold them, till the hour of happiness,
When death hath made her pure for perfect bliss!

Two hearts alone of all that company,
Of all the thousands who beheld the scene,
Partook unmingled joy. Dumb with delight,
Young Hoel views the ships and feels the boat
Rock on the heaving waves, and Llanan felt
Comfort though sad, yet comfort, that for her
No eye was left to weep, nor heart to mourn.

Hark! 'tis the mariners with voice attuned
Timing their toil! and now with gentle gales,
Slow from the holy haven they depart.

RODRI.

Now hath the evening settled, the broad Moon
Rolls through the rifted clouds. With gentle gales
Slowly they glide along, when they behold
A boat with press of sail and stress of oar
Speed forward to the fleet, and now, arrived
Beside the Chieftain's vessel, one enquires
If Madoc be aboard? the answer given,
Swift he ascended up the lofty side.
With joyful wonder did the Ocean Lord
Again behold Llewelyn, but he gazed
Doubtfully on his comrade's countenance,
A meagre man, severe of brow, his eye
Stern. Thou dost view me, Madoc, he exclaim'd,
As 'twere a stranger's face. I marvel not!

I have thought it unnecessary to give a connected account of the Bardic system in these Notes, as it has been so well done by my friend, Mr Turner, in his Vindication of the Ancient British Poems.

The long afflictions of my prison house
Have changed me.

Rodri! cried the Prince, and fell
Upon his neck; . . . last night, subdued at length
By my solicitations, did the King
Send to deliver thee, that thou shouldst share
My happy enterprise; . . . and thou art come,
Even to my wish!

Nay, Madoc, nay, not so!
He answered, with a stern and bitter smile;
This gallant boy hath given me liberty,
And I will pay him with his father's throne,
Ay, by my father's soul! . . . Last night we fled
The house of bondage, and in the sea-caves
By day we lurk'd securely. Here I come,
Only to see thee once before I die,
And say farewell, . . . dear brother!

Would to God
This purpose could be changed! the Sea Lord cried;
But thou art roused by wrongs, and who shall tame
That lion heart? . . . This only, if your lot
Fall favourable, will I beseech of ye,
That to his Queen the fair Plantagenet,
As honourable humanity ye show,
For her own virtue, and in gratitude,
As she hath pleaded for you, and hath urged
Her husband on your part, till it hath turn'd
His wrath upon herself. Oh! deal ye by her
As by your dearest sister in distress,
For even so dear is she to Madoc's heart:
And now I know she from Aberfraw's tower
Watcheth these specks upon the moonlight sea.
And weeps for my departure, and for me
Sends up her prayers to Heaven, nor thinks that now
I must make mine to man in her behalf!

Quoth Rodri, Rest assured for her. I swear,
By our dead mother, so to deal with her
As thou thyself wouldst dictate, as herself
Shall wish.

The tears fell fast from Madoc's eyes:
O Britain! O my country! he exclaim'd,
For ever thus by civil strife convulsed,
Thy children's blood flowing to satisfy
Thy children's rage, how wilt thou still support
The struggle with the Saxon?

Rodri cried,
Our strife shall not be long. Mona will rise
With joy, to welcome me her rightful Lord;
And woe be to the King who rules by fear,
When danger comes against him!

Fear not thou
For Britain! quoth Llewelyn; for not yet
The country of our fathers shall resign
Her name among the nations. Though her Sun
Slope from his eminence, the voice of man
May yet arrest him on his downward way.
My dreams by day, my visions in the night,
Are of her welfare. I shall mount the throne, . . .
Yes, Madoc! and the Bard of years to come,
Who harps of Arthur's and of Owen's deeds,
Shall with the Worthies of his country rank
Llewelyn's name. Dear Uncle, fare thee well! . . .
And I almost could wish I had been born
Of humbler lot, that I might follow thee,
Companion of this noble enterprise.

Think of Llewelyn often, who will oft
Remember thee in love!

For the last time
He press'd his Uncle's hand, and Rodri gave
The last farewell; then went the twain their way.

So over ocean through the moonlight waves,
Prince Madoc sail'd with all his company.
No nobler crew fill'd that heroic bark,
Which bore the first adventurers of the deep
To seek the Golden Fleece on barbarous shores:
Nor richer fraught did that illustrious fleet
Home to the Happy Island hold its way,
When Amadis with his prime chivalry,
He of all chivalry himself the flower,
Came from the rescue, proud of Roman spoils,
And Oriana, freed from Roman thrall.

MADOC IN AZTLAN.

PART II.

I.

THE RETURN TO AZTLAN.

Now go your way, ye gallant company,
God and good Angels guard ye as ye go!
Blow fairly, Winds of Heaven! Ye Ocean Waves,
Swell not in anger to that fated fleet!
For not of conquest greedy nor of gold,
Seek they the distant world. . . . Blow fairly, Winds!
Waft, Waves of Ocean, well your blessed load!

Fair blew the Winds, and safely did the Waves
Bear that beloved charge. It were a tale
Would rouse adventurous courage in a boy,
Making him long to be a mariner
That he might rove the main, if I should tell
How pleasantly for many a summer-day,
Over the sunny sea with wind at will,
Prince Madoc sail'd; and of those happy Isles,
Which had he seen ere that appoluted storm
Drove southward his slope course, there he had pitch'd
His tent, and blest his lot that it had fallen
In land so fair; and human blood had reek'd
Daily on Aztlan's devilish altars still,
But other doom was his, more arduous toil
Yet to achieve, worse danger to endure,
Worse evil to be quell'd, and higher good
Which passeth not away educed from ill;
Whereof all unforeseeing, yet for all
Prepared at heart, he over ocean sailed,
Wafted by gentle winds o'er gentle waves,
As if the elements combined to serve
The perfect Prince, by God and man beloved.
And now how joyfully he views the land,
Skirting like morning clouds the dusky sea;
With what a searching eye recalls to mind

Foreland and creek and cape, how happy now
Up the great river bends at last his way!

No watchman had been station'd on the height
To seek his sails, . . . for with Cadwallon's hope
Too much of doubt was blended and of fear
Yet thitherward whene'er he walked abroad
His face, as if instinctively, was turn'd,
And duly morn and eve Luncoy there,
As though religion led his duteous feet,
Went up to gaze He on a staff had scored
The promised moons and days, and many a time
Counting again its often-told account,
So to beguile impatience, day by day
Smooth'd off with more delight the daily notch
But now that the appointed time was nigh,
Did that perpetual presence of his hope
Haunt him, and mingle with his sleep, and mar
The natural rest, and trouble him by day,
That all his pleasure was at earliest light
To take his station, and at latest eve,
If he might see the sails where far away
Through wide savannahs roll'd the silver stream.
Oh then with what a sudden start his blood
Flow'd from its quicken'd spring, when far away
He spied the glittering topsails! To a while Distrustful of that happy sight, till now
Slowly he sees them rise, and wind along
Through wide savannahs up the silver stream
Then with a breathless speed he flies to spread
The joy, and with Cadwallon now descends,
And drives adown the tide the light canoe
And mounts the vessel side, and once again
Falls at the Ocean Lord's beloved feet

First of the general weal did Madoc ask,
Cadwallon answer'd, All as yet is well,
And, by this seasonable aid secured,
Will well remain Thy father's quoth the Prince
Even so, replied Cadwallon, as that eye
Of hesitation aurs, . . . fallen asleep
The good old man remember'd thee in death,
And bless'd thee ere he died

By this the shores
And heights were throng'd, from hill to hill, from rock
To rock, the shouts of welcome rung around.
Forward they press to view the man beloved,
Britons and Roamen with one common joy
Hailing their common friend Happy that day
Was he who heard his name from Madoc's voice,
Happy who met the greeting of his eye,
Yea happy he who shared his general smile,
Amid the unacknowledged multitude

¹ Columbus inferred this from the elevation of the Pole at Paria "How it cometh to pass," says Pietro Martire, "that at the beginning of the evening twilight it is elevate in that region only five degrees in the month of June and in the morning twilight to be elevate fifteen degrees by the same quadrant, I do not understand, nor yet do the reasons which he bringeth in any point satisfy me. For he saith that he thereby conjectured that the Earth is not perfectly round, but flat, when it was created, there was a certain heap raised upwards, much higher than the other parts of the same So that, as he saith, it is not round after the form of an apple or

Caermadoc, . . . by that name Cadwallon's love
Call'd it in memory of the absent Prince,
Stood in a mountain vale, by rocks and heights,
A natural bulwark, girt. A rocky stream
Which from the fells came down there spread itself
Into a quiet lake, to compass which
Had been a two hours' pleasurable toil,
And he, who from a well-strung bow could send
His shaft across, had need a snowy arm,
And might from many an archer far and near
Have borne away the bell Here had the Chief
Chosen his abiding place, for strength preferr'd,
Where vainly might an host in equal arms
Attempt the difficult entrance, and for all
That could delight the eye and heart of man;
Whate'er of beauty or of usefulness
Heart could desire, or eye behold, being here.
What he had found an idle wilderness
Now gave rich increase to the husbandmen,
For Heaven had blest their labour Flourishing
He left the happy vale, and now he saw
More fields reclaim'd, more habitations rear'd,
More harvest rising round The raptile race,
And every beast of rapine, had retired
From man's asserted empire, and the sound
Of axe and dashing oar and fisher's net,
And song beguiling toil, and pastoral pipe,
Were heard, where late the solitary hills
Gave only to the mountain-cataract
Their wild response

Here, Urien, crad the Prince,
These craggy heights and overhanging groves
Will make thee think of Gwyneth And this hut,
Rejoin'd Cadwallon, with its roof of reeds,
Goervyl, is our palace * it was built
With lighter labour than Aberffraw's towers,
Yet, Lady, safer are its wattle'd sides
Than Mona's kingly walls Like Gwyneth, said he
Oh no! we neighbour nearer to the Sun,¹
And with a more benignant eye the Lord
Of Light beholds us here.

So thus did they
Cheerfully welcome to their new abode
Those, who albeit awary of their way,
And glad to reach at length the place of rest,
Left their hearts overburthen'd, and their eyes
Ready to overflow Yet not the less
The buzz of busy joy was heard around,
Where every dwelling had its guest, and all
Gave the long eve to hospitable mirth.

a ball, as others think, but rather like a pear as it hangeth on the tree, and that Paria is the region which possesseth the supereminence or highest part thereof, nearest unto heaven. In so much, that he earnestly contendeth the earthly Paradise to be situate in the tops of those three hills which the Watchmen saw out of the top castle of the ship, and that the outrageous streams of the fresh waters which so violently issue out of the said gulphs, and strive so with the salt water, fall headlong from the tops of the said mountains "— Pietro Martire, Dec 1 Book 6

THE TIDINGS.

But when the Lord of Ocean from the stir
And tumult was retired, Cadwallon then
Thus render'd his account.

When we had quell'd
The strength of Aztlan, we should have thrown down
Her altars, cast her Idols to the fire,
And on the ruins of her fines accurst
Planted the Cross triumphant. Vain it is
To sow the seed where noxious weeds and briars
Must choke it in the growth.

Yet I had hope
The purer influence of exampled good
Might to the saving knowledge of the truth
Lead this bedarken'd race; and when thy ship
Fell down the stream to distant Britain bound,
All promised well. The strangers' God had proved Mightier in war; and Aztlan could not choose
But see, nor seeing could she fail to love,
The freedom of his service. Few were now
The offerings at her altars, few the youths
And virgins to the temple-tolls devote.
Therefore the Priests combined to save their craft;
And soon the rumour ran of evil signs
And tokens; in the temple had been heard
Wailings and loud lament, the eternal fire
Gave dimly a dim and doubtful flame;
And from the censer, which at morn should steam
Sweet odours to the sun, a fetid cloud
Black and portentous rose. And now no Priest
Approach'd our dwelling. Even the friendly Prince
Yuhidhilton was at Caermadoc now
Rarely a guest; and if that tried good-will
Which once he bore us did at times appear,
A sullen gloom and silence like remorse
Followed the imagined crime.

But I the while
Reck'd not the brooding of the storm; for then
My father to the grave was hastening down.
Patiently did the pious man endure,
In faith anticipating blessedness,
Already more than man in those sad hours
When man is meanest. I sat by his side,
And pray'd with him and talk'd with him of death
And life to come. O Madoc! those were hours
Which even in anguish gave my soul a joy:
I think of them in solitude, and feel
The comfort of my faith.

But when that time
Of bitterness was past and I return'd
To daily duties, no suspicious sign
Betoken'd ill; the Priests among us came

As heretofore, and I their intercourse
Encouraged as I could, suspecting nought,
Nor conscious of the subtle-minded men
I dealt with, how inveterate in revenge,
How patient in deceit. Lincoya first
Forewarn'd me of the danger. He, thou know'st,
Had from the death of sacrifice escaped,
And lived a slave among a distant tribe,
When seeing us he felt a hope, that we,
Lords as he deem'd us of the Elements,
Might pity his poor countrymen oppress,
And free them from their bondage. Didst thou hear
How from yon bloody altars he was saved?
For in the eternal chain his fate and ours
Were link'd together then.

The Prince replied,
I did but hear a broken tale. Tell on!

Among the Gods of yon unhappy race,
Tezcalipoca¹ as the chief they rank,
Or with the chief co-equal; Maker he,
And Master of created things, esteem'd.
He sits upon a throne of trophied skulls,
Hideous and huge; a shield is on his arm,
And with his black right hand he lifts, as though
In wrath, the menacing spear. His festival,
Of all this wicked nation's wicked rites,
With most solemnity and circumstance
And pomp of hellish piety, is held.
From all whom evil fortune hath subdued
To their inhuman thralldom, they select Him whom they judge, for comely countenance
And shapely form and all good natural gifts,
Worthiest to be the victim; and for this
Was young Lincoya chosen, being in truth
The flower of all his nation. For twelve months,
Their custom is, that this appointed youth
Be as the Idol's living image held.
Garb'd therefore like the Demon Deity,
Whene'er he goes abroad, an antic train
With music and with dance attend his way;
The crowd before him fall and worship him;
And those infernal Priests who guard him then,
To be their victim and their feast at last,
At morning and at evening incense him,
And mock him with knee-reverence. Twenty days
Before the bloody festival arrive,
As 'twere to make the wretch in love with life,
Four maids, the loveliest of the land, are given
In spousals. With Lincoya all these rites
Duly were kept; and at the stated time,
Four maids, the loveliest of the land, were his.
Of these was one, whom even at that hour
He learnt to love, so excellently good
Was she; and she loved him and pitied him.

¹ "A devout worshipper of this Deity once set out to see if he could find him; he reached the sea-coast, and there the God appeared to him, and bade him call the Whale, and the Mermaid, and the Tortoise, to make a bridge for him, over which he might pass to the house of the Sun, and bring back from thence instruments of music and singers to celebrate his festivals. The Whale, the Mermaid, and the Tortoise accordingly made the bridge, and the man went over it, singing, as he went, a song which the God taught him. As soon as the Sun heard him, he cautioned all his servants and people not to answer to the song, for they who answered would be obliged to abandon his House and follow the Singer. Some there were, however, who could not resist the voice of the charmer, and these he brought back with him to earth, together with the drum called Huachumach and the Tepunastils." — Torquemada, l. vi. c. 43.

The particular sacrifice related in the poem is described by this author, l. x. c. 14. It is sufficient merely to refer to my authorities in such instances as these, where no other liberty has been taken than that of omission.

She is the daughter of an aged Priest ;
I oftentimes have seen her ; and in truth,
Compared with Britain's maids so beautiful,
Or with the dark-eyed daughters of the South,
She would be lovely still. Her cotton vest
Falls to the knee, and leaves her olive arms
Bare in their beauty ; loose, luxuriant, long,
Flow the black tresses of her glossy hair ;
Mild is her eye's jet lustre ; and her voice . .
A soul which harbour'd evil never breathed
Such winning tones.

Thou know'st how manfully
These tribes, as if insensible to pain,
Welcome their death in battle, or in bonds
Defy their torturers. To Lincoya's mind
Long preparation now had made his fate
Familiar ; and, he says, the thought of death
Broke not his sleep, nor mingled with his dreams,
Till Coätel was his. But then it woke ; . .
It hung, . . it prest upon him like a weight
On one who scarce can struggle with the waves ;
And when her soul was full of tenderness,
That thought recurring to her, she would rest
Her cheek on his and weep.

The day drew nigh ;
And now the eve of sacrifice was come . .
What will not woman, gentle woman, dare,
When strong affection stirs her spirit up ? . .
She gather'd herbs, which, like our poppy, bear
The seed of sleep¹, and with the temple-food
Mingled their power ; herself partook the food,
So best to lull suspicion ; and the youth,
Instructed well, when all were laid asleep,
Fled far away.

After our conquering arms
Had freed the Hoamen from their wretched yoke,
Lincoya needed but his Coätel
To fill his sum of earthly happiness
Her to the temple had her father's vow
Awhile devoted, and some moons were still
To pass away, ere yet she might become
A sojourner with us, Lincoya's wife,
When from the Paba's wiles his watchful mind
Foreboded ill. He bade me take good heed,
And fear the sudden kindness of a foe.
I started at his words ; . . these artful men,
Hostile at heart, as well we knew they were,
These were lip-lavish of their friendship now,
And courted confidence, while our tried friend
Yuhidthiton, estranged, a seldom guest,
Sullen and joyless, seem'd to bear at heart
Something that rankled there. These things were strange ;

The omens too had ceased ; . . we heard no more
Of twilight voices, nor the unholly cloud
Steam'd from the morning incense. Why was this ?

Young Malinal had from the hour of peace
Been our in-dweller, studious to attain
Our language and our arts. To him I told

"Poppy, which beareth the seed of sleepe."

² The Spanish name for the poppy is adormidera.

My doubts, assured of his true love and truth ;
For he had learnt to understand and feel
Our holy faith, and tended like a son
Cynetha's drooping age, and shared with me
His dying benediction. He, thus long
Intent on better things, had been estranged
From Aztlan and her councils ; but at this
He judged it for her welfare and for ours,
Now to resume his rank ; . . belike his voice
Might yet be heard, or, if the worst befel,
His timely warning save us from the snare.

But in their secret councils Malinal
No longer bore a part. the Chiefs and King
Yielding blind reverence to the Pabas now,
Deluded or dismay'd. He sent to say
Some treachery was design'd, and bade me charge
His brother with the crime. On that same day,
Lincoya came from Aztlan ; he had found
Coätel labouring with a wretchedness . .
She did not seek to hide ; and when the youth
Reveal'd his fear, he saw her tawny cheek
Whiten, and round his neck she clung and wept.
She told him something dreadful was at hand,
She knew not what. That, in the dead of night,
Coänucoztin at Mexitli's shrine
Had stood with all his nobles, human blood
Had then been offer'd up, and secret vows
Vow'd with mysterious horror : That but late,
When to her father of the days to come
She spake, and of Lincoya and her lot
Among the strangers, he had frown'd, and strove
Beneath dissembled anger to conceal
Visible grief. She knew not what to fear,
But something dreadful surely was at hand,
And she was wretched.

When I heard these things,
Yuhidthiton and the Priest Helhua
Were in our dwellings. Them I call'd apart . .
There should be peace between us I began ;
Why is it otherwise ?

The Priest replied,
Is there not peace, Cadwallon ? Seek we not
More frequent and more friendly intercourse,
Even we, the servants of our Country-Gods,
Whose worship ye have changed, and for whose sake
We were and would have been your enemies ?
But as those Gods have otherwise ordain'd,
Do we obey. Why therefore is this doubt ?

The Power who led us hither, I replied,
Over the world of waters, who hath saved,
And who will save his people, warns me now.
Then on Yuhidthiton I fix'd my eye.
Danger is near ! I cried ; I know it near !
It comes from Aztlan.

His disorder'd cheek,
And the forced and steady boldness of his eye,
Which in defiance met the look it fear'd,
Confess'd the crime. I saw his inward shame ;
Yet with a pride like angry innocence
Did he make answer, I am in your hands,
And you believe me treacherous ! . . Kill me now !

Not so, Yuhidthiton ! not so ! quoth I ;
You were the Strangers' friend, and yet again

That wisdom may return. We are not changed ; . .
 Lovers of peace, we know, when danger comes,
 To make the evil on the guilty head
 Fall heavily and sure ! With our good arms,
 And our good cause, and that Almighty One,
 We are enough, had we no other aid,
 We of Caernadoc here, to put to shame
 Astlan, with all her strength and all her wiles.
 But even now is Madoc on the seas ;
 He leads our brethren here ; and should he find
 That Astlan hath been false, . . oh ! hope not then,
 By force or fraud, to baffle or elude
 Inevitable vengeance ! While ye may,
 Look to your choice ; for we are friends or foes,
 Even to your own desert.

So saying, I left
 The astonish'd men, whose unprovided minds
 Fall'd them ; nor did they aim at answer more,
 But homeward went their way. Nor knew I then, . .
 For this was but a thing of yesterday, . .
 How near the help I boasted. Now I trust,
 Thy coming shall discomfit all their wiles.

III. NEOLIN.

Nor yet at rest, my Sister ! quoth the Prince,
 As at her dwelling-door he saw the Maid
 Sit gazing on that lovely moonlight scene . .
 To bed, Goervyl. Dearest, what hast thou
 To keep thee wakeful here at this late hour,
 When even I shall bid a truce to thought,
 And lay me down in peace ? . Good night, Goervyl !
 Dear sister mine, . . my own dear mother's child !

She rose, and bending on with lifted arms,
 Met the fond kiss, obedient then withdrew.
 Yet could not he so lightly as he ween'd
 Lay wakeful thoughts aside ; for he foresaw
 Long strife and hard adventure to achieve,
 And forms of danger vague disturb'd his dreams.

Early at morn the colonists arose ;
 Some pitch the tent-pole, and pin down the lines
 That stretch the o'er-awning canvass ; to the wood
 Others with saw and axe and bill for stakes,
 And undergrowth to weave the wicker walls ;
 These to the ships, with whom Cadwallon sends
 The Elk and Bison, broken to the yoke.

Ere noon Erillyab and her son arrived,
 To greet the Chief. She wore no longer now
 The lank loose locks of careless widowhood ;
 Her braided tresses round her brow were bound,
 Bedeck'd with tufts of grey and silvery plumes
 Pluck'd from the eagle's pennons. She with eye
 And countenance which spake no feign'd delight,
 Welcomed her great deliverer. But her son

Had Nature character'd so legibly,
 That when his tongue told fair his face bewray'd
 The lurking falsehood ; sullen, slow of speech,
 Savage, down-looking, dark, that at his words
 Of welcome, Madoc in his heart conceived
 Instinctive enmity.

In a happy hour
 Did the Great Spirit, said Erillyab,
 Give bidding to the Winds to speed thee here !
 For this I made my prayer ; and when He sent
 For the Beloved Teacher, to restore him
 Eyesight and youth, of him I then besought,
 As he had been thy friend and ours on earth,
 That he would intercede. . . Brother, we know
 That the Great Spirit loves thee ; He hath blest
 Thy going and thy coming, and thy friends
 Have prosper'd for thy sake ; and now when first
 The Powers of Evil do begin to work,
 Lo ! thou art here ! . . Brother, we have obeyed
 Thy will, and the Beloved Teacher's words
 Have been our law ; but now the Evil Ones
 Cry out for blood, and say they are athirst,
 And threaten vengeance. I have brought the Priest
 To whom they spake in darkness. . . Thou art wise,
 And the Great Spirit will enlighten thee ; . .
 We know not what to answer. . . Tell thy tale, Neolin !

Hereat did Madoc fix upon him
 A searching eye ; but he, no whit abash'd,
 Began with firm effrontery his speech.
 The Feast of the Departed is at hand,
 And I, in preparation, on the Field
 Of the Spirit¹ pass'd the night. It came to me
 In darkness, after midnight, when the moon
 Was gone, and all the stars were blotted out ;
 It gather'd round me, with a noise of storms,
 And enter'd into me, and I could feel
 It was the Snake-God roll'd and writhed within ;
 And I too with the inward agony,
 Roll'd like a snake and writhed. Give ! give ! he cried :
 I thirst ! . . His voice was in me, and it burnt
 Like fire, and all my flesh and bones were shaken ;
 Till, with a throe which seem'd to rend my joints
 Asunder, he pass'd forth, and I was left
 Speechless and motionless, gasping for breath.

Then Madoc, turning to Ayayaca,
 Enquired, who is the man ? . . The good old Priest
 Replied, he hath attended from his youth
 The Snake-God's temple, and received for him
 His offerings, and perform'd his sacrifice,
 Till the Beloved Teacher made us leave
 The wicked way.

Hear me ! quoth Neolin,
 With antic gesture and loud vehemence ;
 Before this generation, and before
 These ancient forests, . . yea, before yon lake
 Was hollow'd out, or one snow-feather fell
 On yonder mountain-top, now never bare, . .

¹ " Every Spring the Akansees go in a body to some retired place, and there turn up a large space of land, which they do with the drums beating all the while. After this they take care to call it the Desert, or the Field of the Spirit. And thither they go in good earnest when they are in their enthusiastic fits, and there wait for inspiration from their pretended Deity. In the meanwhile, as they do this every year, it proves of no small advantage to them, for by this means they turn up all their land insensibly, and it becomes abundantly more fruitful." — Tont.

Before these things I was¹, . . . where, or from whence, I know not, . . . who can tell? But then I was,

And in the shadow of the Spirit stood;
And I beheld the Spirit, and in him

1 "The manner in which, he says, he obtained the spirit of divination was this: He was admitted into the presence of a Great Man, who informed him that he loved, pitied, and desired to do him good. It was not in this world that he saw the Great Man, but in a world above, at a vast distance from this. The Great Man, he says, was clothed with the Day, yea with the brightest Day, he ever saw, a Day of many years, yea of everlasting continuance! This whole world, he says, was drawn upon him, so that to him the Earth and all things in it might be seen. I asked him if rocks, mountains, and seas were drawn upon or appeared as him? he replied, that every thing that was beautiful and lovely in the earth was upon him, and might be seen by looking on him, as well as if one was on the earth to take a view of them there. By the side of the Great Man, he says, stood his Shadow or Spirit, for he used chichung, the word they commonly make use of to express that of the man which survives the body, which word properly signifies a shadow. This shadow, he says, was as lovely as the Man himself, and filled all places, and was most agreeable as well as wonderful to him. Here, he says, he tarried some time, and was unspeakably entertained and delighted with a view of the Great Man, of his Shadow, and of all things in him. And what is most of all astonishing, he imagines all this to have passed before he was born; he never had been, he says, in this world at that time, and what confirms him in the belief of this is, that the Great Man told him, that he must come down to earth, be born of such a woman, meet with such and such things and in particular that he should once in his life be guilty of murder; at this he was displeased, and told the Great Man he would never murder. But the Great Man replied, I have said it, and it shall be so, which has accordingly happened. At this time, he says, the Great Man asked him what he would choose in life. he replied, first to be a Hunter, and afterwards to be a Powwow, or Divine, whereupon the Great Man told him he should have what he desired, and that his Shadow should go along with him down to earth, and be with him for ever. There was, he says, all this time no words spoken between them, the conference was not carried on by any human language, but they had a kind of mental intelligence of each other's thoughts, dispositions, and proposals. After this, he says, he saw the Great Man no more, but supposes he now came down to earth to be born, but the Shadow of the Great Man still attended him, and ever after continued to appear to him in dreams and other ways. This Shadow used sometimes to direct him in dreams to go to such a place and hunt, assuring him he should there meet with success, which accordingly proved so; and when he had been there some time the Spirit would order him to another place, so that he had success in hunting, according to the Great Man's promise, made to him at the time of his choosing this employment.

"There were some times when this Spirit came upon him in a special manner, and he was full of what he saw in the Great Man, and then, he says, he was all light, and not only light himself, but it was light all around him, so that he could see through men, and knew the thoughts of their hearts. These depths of Satan I leave to others to fathom or to dive into as they please, and do not pretend, for my own part, to know what ideas to affix to such terms, and cannot well guess what conceptions of things these creatures have at these times when they call themselves all light."—David Brainerd's Journal

Had Brainerd been a Jesuit, his superiors would certainly have thought him a fit candidate for the crown of martyrdom, and worthy to be made a Saint.

I found one of the Indian conjurers who seemed to have something like grace in him, only he would not believe in the Devil. "Of all the sights," says he, "I ever saw among them, or indeed any where else, none appeared so frightful, or so near akin to what is usually imagined of infernal powers! none ever excited such images of terror in my mind as the appearance of one, who was a devout and zealous reformer, or rather restorer, of what he supposed was the ancient religion of the Indians. He made his appearance in his pontifical garb, which was a coat of bears' skins, dressed with the hair on, and hanging down to his toes, a pair of bear-skin stockings, and a great wooden face, painted the one half black, and the other tawny, about the colour of an Indian's skin, with an extravagant mouth, cut very much awry, the face fastened to a bear-skin cap, which was drawn over his head. He advanced towards me with the instrument in his hand that he used for music in his idolatrous worship, which was a dry Tortoise-shell, with some corn in it, and the neck of it drawn on to a piece of wood, which made a very convenient handle. As he came forward, he beat his tune with the rattle, and danced with all his might, but did not suffer any part of his body, not so much as his fingers to be seen, and no man would have guessed by his appearance and actions that he could have been a human creature if they had not had some intimation of it otherwise. When he came near me, I could not but shrink away from him, although it was then noon day, and I knew who it was. His appearance and gestures were so prodigiously frightful. He had a house consecrated to religious uses, with divers images cut out upon the several parts of it. I went in and found the ground beat almost as hard as a rock, with their frequent dancing on it. I discoursed with him about Christianity, and some of my discourse he seemed to like, but some of it he disliked entirely. He told me, that God had taught him his religion and that he never would turn from it but wanted to find some that would join heartily with him in it, for the Indians, he said, were grown very degenerate and corrupt. He had thought, he said, of leaving all his friends and travelling abroad in order to find some that would join with him, for he believed God had some good people somewhere that felt as he did. He had not always, he said, felt as he now did but had formerly been like the rest of the Indians, until about four or five years before that time, then he said, his heart was very much distressed so that he could not live among the Indians, but got away into the woods and lived alone for some months. At length he said, God comforted his heart, and showed him what he should do, and since that time he had known God, and tried to serve him, and loved all men, be they who they would, so as he never did before. He treated me with uncommon courtesy, and seemed to be hearty in it, and I was told by the Indians, that he opposed their drinking strong liquor with all his power, and if at any time he could not dissuade them from it by all he could say, he would leave them, and go crying into the woods. It was manifest he had a set of religious notions that he had looked into for himself, and not taken for granted upon bare tradition, and he relished or disrelished whatever was spoken of a religious nature, according as it either agreed or disagreed with his standard. And while I was discouraging he would sometimes say, 'Now that I like, so God has taught me,' and some of his sentiments seemed very just. Yet he utterly denied the being of a Devil, and declared there was no such creature known among the Indians of old times, whose religion, he supposes, he was attempting to revive. He likewise told me that departed souls all went southward, and that the difference between the good and bad was this, that the former were admitted into a beautiful town with spiritual walls, or walls agreeable to the nature of souls; and that the latter would for ever hover round those walls, and in vain attempt to get in. He seemed to be sincere, honest, and conscientious in his own way, and according to his own religious notions, which was more than I ever saw in any

Saw all things, even as they were to be;
And I held commune with him, not of words,
But thought with thought. Then was it given me
That I should choose my station when my hour
Of mortal birth was come, . . . hunter, or chief,
Or to be mightiest in the work of war,
Or in the shadow of the Spirit live,
And He in me. According to my choice,
For ever, overshadow'd by his power,
I walk among mankind. At times I feel not
The burthen of his presence; then am I
Like other men; but when the season comes,
Or if I seek the visitation, then
He fills me, and my soul is carried on,
And then do I forelive the race of men,
So that the things that will be, are to me
Past.

Amalahta lifted then his eyes
A moment; . . . It is true, he cried; we know
He is a gifted man, and wise beyond
The reach of mortal powers. Ayayaca
Hath also heard the warning.

As I slept,
Replied the aged Priest, upon the Field
Of the Spirit, a loud voice awaken'd me,
Crying, I thirst! Give, . . . give! or I will take!
And then I heard a hiss, as if a snake
Were threatening at my side. . . But saw you nothing?
Quoth Madoc. . . Nothing; for the night was dark.
And felt you nothing? said the Ocean Prince.
He answered, Nothing; only sudden fear. . .
No inward struggle, like possession? . . . None.
I thought of the Beloved Teacher's words,
And cross'd myself, and then he had no power.

Thou hast slept heretofore upon the Field,
Said Madoc; didst thou never witness voice,
Or ominous sound? Ayayaca replied,
Certes the Field is holy! it receives,
All the year long, the operative power
Which falleth from the sky, or from below
Pervades the earth; no harvest growth there,
Nor tree, nor bush, nor herb, is left to spring;
But there the virtue of the elements
Is gathered, till the circle of the months
Be full; then, when the Priest, by mystic rites, other Pagan: and I perceived he was looked upon and derided by most of the Indians as a precise zealot, who made a needless noise about religious matters. But I must say, there was something in his temper and disposition, that looked more like true religion than anything I ever observed amongst other Heathens." — Brainerd.

¹ Olearius mentions a very disinterested instance of that hated of innovation which is to be found in all ignorant persons, and in some wise ones.

"An old country fellow in Livonia being condemned, for faults enormous enough, to lie along upon the ground to receive his punishment, and Madam de la Barre, pitying his almost decrepit age, having so far interceded for him, as that his corporal punishment should be changed into a pecuniary mult of about fifteen or sixteen pence; he thanked her for her kindness, and said, that, for his part, being an old man, he would not introduce any novelty, nor suffer the customs of the country to be altered, but was ready to receive the chastisement which his predecessors had not thought much to undergo; put off his clothes, laid himself upon the ground,

Long vigils, and long abstinence prepared,
Goeth there to pass the appointed night alone,
The whole collected influence enters him.
Doubt not but I have felt strange impulses
On that mysterious Field, and in my dreams
Been visited; and have heard sounds in the air,
I knew not what; . . . but words articulate
Never till now. It was the Wicked One!
He wanted blood.

Who says the Wicked One?

It was our fathers' God! cried Neolin.
Sons of the Ocean, why should we forsake
The worship of our fathers? Ye obey
The White-Man's Maker; but to us was given
A different skin and speech and land and law.
